townes and lands to inhabite. They seemed to be men like vnto them, that had bene taken by assault, or by siege within a citie, which had bene compelled to forsake their countrie. Furthermore, the shamefull death of Demosthenes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, and of Hyperides, by the citie of CLEONES, (whereof we haue written heretofore) were almost occasion giuen them to lament the times of the raigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported that when Antigonus was slaine, they that had ouercome him, were so cruell vnto their subiects, that a labourer in the countrie of PHRYGIA digging the earth, being asked what he sought for, answered sighing: I seeke for Antigonus. Then many men beganne to say as much, when they remembred the noble minds of those two Princes, how mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their displeasure: not like vnto Antipater, who craftily cloaked his tyrannicall power, which he vsurped, by being familiar, going simply apparelled, and faring meanely: and yet shewed himselfe notwithstanding a more cruell Lord and tyrant vnto them whom he had ouercome. Neuertheless, Phocion obtained of him the restoring againe of diuerse men, whome he had banished: and those whom he could not get to be restored, yet he procured that they should not be banished into so farre countries, as others which had bene sent beyond the Mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tænarus out of GRECE, but that they had libertie to remaine within the countrey of PELOPONNESVS: among the which was one Agnonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remained in ATHENS with great iustice and lenitie, and such as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwaies preferred to some office: but such as he saw were phantasticall people, and desirous of change, he kept them from office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished away of themselues, and learned in time to loue the countrey, and to follow tillage. When he saw Xenocrates also pay a certaine pension or tribute to the Commonwealth, which all straungers dwelling in ATHENS did vse yearely to paye: he would haue made him a freeman, and offered to put his name amongest the number of the free citizens. But Xenocrates refused it, saying he would haue no part of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof, he had bene sent Ambassadour. And when Menyllus had sent Phocion money, he made him answer: that Menyllus was no greater Lord then Alexander had bene, neither had he at that time any greater occasion to receiue his present, then when he had refused king Alexanders gift. Menyllus replying againe, said, that if he had no neede of it for himselfe, yet he might let his sonne Phocus haue it. But Phocion answered: If my sonne Phocus will leaue his naughtie life, and become an honest man, that which I will leaue him, shall serue his turne very well: but if it be so that he will still hold on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. Another time also he answered Antipater more roundly, when he would haue had him done an vnhonest thing: Antipater said he, cannot haue me to be his friend, and flatterer both. Antipater selfe was wont to say, that he had two friends at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could neuer make the one to take any thing of him, and the other, he could neuer satisfie. And truly Phocions pouertie was a great glorie vnto his vertue, sithence he was growne old, continuing in the same, after he had bene so many times Generall of the ATHENIANS, and had receiued such friendship and courtesie of so many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrarie delighted to shew his riches, in things that were contrarie to the lawes of the citie. For a decree being made at ATHENS, commaunding that no straunger, vpon forfeiture of a thousand Drachmas to be payed by the defrayer of the dauncs of the citie, should be any of the dauncers that daunced at any common playes or sports: Demades one day making certaine games and sports at his owne charges, brought a hundred dancers of strangers at one time, and withal brought also a hundred thousand Drachmas to pay the forfeiture thereof. Another time, when he maried his son Demas, he said vnto him: Son, when I maried thy mother there was so small rost, that my next neighbour knew not of it: where now at thy mariage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the feast. Furthermore, when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to go vnto Antipater, to intreate him to take his garrison out of their citie: he still refused the ambassade, either because he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he saw the people more obedient vnto reason, for feare of the garrison. Howbeit, he obtained of Antipater, that he should not be too hastie in the demaunding of his money, but should deferre it vntill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiuing they could do no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter vpon him, and went with his sonne into MACEDON, whither doubtlesse his destinie

caried him to his vtter deſtruction, euen at that very time when Antipater was fallen ſicke of a diſeaſe whereof he died: whereby the affaires of the Realme went through the hands of Caſſander his ſonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had ſent vnto Antigonus in ASIA, willing him to come in all poſſible ſpeed to win GREECE and MACEDON, which hung but of an old rotten threed, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherefore Caſſander being aduertiſed of his arriuall, he made him preſently to be apprehended, and ſetting his ſonne hard by him, ſlue him before his father, ſo neare him, that the bloud of his ſonne ſprang vpon him: ſo that the father was all bloudied with the murther of his ſonne. Then Caſſander caſting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and trecherous treaſon againſt his father, giuing him all the reprochfull wordes he could deuiſe: at the length he ſlue him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death, had eſtabliſhed Polyperchon Generall of the armie of the MACEDONIANS, and Caſſander his ſon onely Colonell of a thouſand footmen. He notwithſtanding, after his fathers deceaſe, taking vpon him the gouernment of the realme: ſent Nicanor with ſpeed to ſucceed Menillus in the Captaineſhip of the garriſon of ATHENS, before his death ſhould be reuealed, commaunding him firſt in any caſe, to take the caſtle of MVNYCHIA, which he did. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS vnderſtanding of the death of Antipater, they accuſed Phocion for that he had knowne of his death long before, and yet kept it ſecret to pleaſe Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not this accuſation, but fell in acquaintance notwithſtanding with Nicanor: whom he handled ſo wiſely, that he made him not only friendly vnto the ATHENIANS, but furthermore perſwaded him to be at ſome charge to giue the people the paſtime of common playes, which he made to be done at his coſt. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings perſon, meaning to giue Caſſander a ſlampant and blurt, he ſent letters patents vnto the people at ATHENS, declaring how the young king did reſtore vnto them their popular ſtate againe, and commanded that all the ATHENIANS ſhould vſe their former auncient lawes of their city. This was a wile and craftie fetch againſt Phocion. For Polyperchon deuiſing this practiſe to get the city of ATHENS into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpoſe, vnleſſe he found meanes firſt to baniſh Phocion: and thought that he ſhould eaſily bring that to paſſe, when ſuch as had before bene put off their freedom by his means, ſhold come again to haue voyces in the aſſembly, and that the ſeditious Orators and accuſers might be turned at libertie againe, to ſay what they would. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the contents of theſe letters patents, began to be ſomewhat quickened and moued withall: whereupon Nicanor deſiring to ſpeake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was aſſembled in the hauen of PIRÆA: he went and hazarded his perſon amongſt them, vpon Phocions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being ſecretly aduertiſed thereof, and in the field, not far from the city, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor hauing warning of it in time, ſaued himſelfe. Then it appeared, that Nicanor would preſently be reuenged of the citie, and they accuſed Phocion becauſe he kept him not, but did let him go. Whereunto he anſwered: That he truſted Nicanors word, and that he did not think he would offer the city any hurt, but if it ſhould fall out otherwiſe, he had rather the world ſhould know, that he had the wrong offered him, then that he ſhould offer any. This truly appeared to be nobly ſpoken, in reſpect of himſelfe: but conſidering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the ſafetie of his countrey, I cannot tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had to the ſafetie of his countrimen. Neither could he alſo alleage for his excuſe, that he did not lay hands on Nicanor, for feare to bring the city into manifeſt war: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had ſworne and promiſed vnto him, and the iuſtice that he would obſerue in his behalfe: that for his ſake, Nicanor ſhold afterwards keepe himſelfe in peace, and do no hurt to the ATHENIANS. Howbeit in truth it ſeemed, that nothing deceiued Phocion: but the ouer truſt he had in this Nicanor. The which ſeemeth to be ſo, becauſe when diuers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he ſought all the ſecret meanes he could to ſurpriſe the hauen of PIRÆA, and that he daily paſſed ouer ſouldiers in the Ile of SALAMINA, and practiſed to bribe certaine of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen: he wold neuer heare of it, and much leſſe beleeue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMBRIAN made a motion, that the ATHENIANS ſhould prepare to be in readineſſe to wait vpon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commanded them: he made no account of it, vntill he ſaw Nicanor come out with his ſouldiers from the fort of MVNYCHIA, and that he began to caſt trenches to compaſſe in the hauen of PIRÆA. But then, when Phocion thought to leade out the people to preuent him: he found found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commaundement. In the meane time, Alexander the ſon of Polyperchon came with an armie, pretending to aide them of the citie against Nicanor, where indeed he meant (if he could) to get the reſt of the citie into his hands, then ſpecially, when they were in greateſt broile one againſt another, and the rather, becauſe the baniſhed men entred hand ouer head with him, and diuers ſtrangers alſo, & other defamed men: ſo that there was a confuſed councel and aſſembly of Omnigatherum kept within the citie, without any order, in the which Phocion was depriued of his office of Generall, and others were alſo choſen Captaines in his place. And had they not ſeene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the wals of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS afraid and miſtruſtfull, they had neuer ſaued it from taking. At that time Phocion was preſently accuſed of treaſon by the Oratour Agnonides: the which Callimedon and Pericles fearing, got them out of the citie betimes. And Phocion alſo with his friends that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: with whom alſo Solon PLATÆIAN, and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN, went for companie, who thought to haue found friendſhip and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling ſick by the way, in the city of ELATIA, they ſtayed there many daies, hoping of his recouerie. But in the meane time, the people at the perſwaſion of the Orator Agnonides, and at the requeſt of Archeſtratus, ſtabliſhed a decree, to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuſe Phocion: inſomuch as both parties met at one ſelfe time, and found him in the field with the king about a village of the country of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGES, ſtanding at the foot of the mountaine Acrorion, which they ſurname alſo Galaten. There Polyperchon commaunded a cloth of gold to be ſet vp, and cauſed the king to be ſet vnder the ſame, and all his chiefeſt friends about him. But to begin withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commanded them to put him to death after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to ſay. Then they beganne to quarrell, and to be loude one with another, accuſing one another in the preſence of the king and his councell: vntill Agnonides at length ſtepped foorth, and ſaid: My Lords of MACEDON, put vs all in priſon, and then ſend vs bound hands and feet to ATHENS, to giue account of our doings. The king laughed to heare him ſay ſo. But the Noblemen of MACEDON that were preſent then, and diuerſe ſtraungers beſides to heare their complaints, made ſigne to the Ambaſſadours to vtter their accuſations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did ſtill cut off his tale, as he thought to purge himſelf: inſomuch as in anger, he beate his ſtaffe he had in his hand againſt the ground, and commaunded him at length to hold his peace, and to get him thence. And when Hegemon alſo told Polyperchon, that he himſelfe could beſt witneſſe, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully ſerued and loued the people: he angrily anſwered him, Come not hither to lye falſly vpon me in the preſence of the king. Therewith the king roſe out of his ſeat, and tooke a ſpeare in his hand, thinking to haue killed Hegemon, had not Polyperchon ſodainly embraced him behind, and ſtaid him. So the councell roſe, & brake vp, but preſently Phocion was apprehended, and they that ſtood by him. Certaine of his friends ſeeing that, which ſtood further of, muffled their faces, and ſtraight conueyed themſelues away. The reſt were ſent priſoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not ſo much to haue their cauſes heard there, as to haue them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carying of them to ATHENS was ſhamefull. For they were caryed vpon cartes through the great ſtreete Ceramicum, vnto the Theater: where Clitus kept them, vntill the Senate had aſſembled the people, excepting no bondman, no ſtraunger, nor defamed perſon out of this aſſemblie, but left the Theater wide open to all commers in whatſoeuer they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euery man that would ſpeake againſt them. So firſt of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aduertiſe the people, that he had found theſe offenders conuicted of treaſon: notwithſtanding, that he referred the ſentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were freemen. Then Clitus brought his priſoners before the people, where the Noblemen when they ſaw Phocion, were aſhamed, and hiding their faces, wept to ſee him. Howbeit, there was one that roſe vp and ſaid: My Lords, ſith the king referreth the iudgement of ſo great perſons vnto the people, it were great reaſon all the bondmen and ſtraungers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, ſhould be taken out of this aſſembly. The people would not agree to it, but cryed out, that ſuch traitors ſhould be ſtoned to death, that fauour the authoritie of a few, and are enemies of the people: whereupon ſilence was made, and no man durſt ſpeake any more for Phocion. Neuertheles when Phocion with much a do had obtained audience, he asked them: My Lords, will ye iuſtly or wrongfully put vs to death? Some anſwered him, iuſtly. How then can ye do it, quoth he, that will not heare our iuſtifications? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming nearer, ſaid vnto them: For my ſelfe, my Lords, I confeſſe I haue done you wrong, and haue in gouernment committed faults deſeruing death: but for theſe priſoners with me, what haue they done, why you ſhould put them to death? The common people anſwered him: becauſe they are thy friends. With this anſwer Phocion departed, and ſpake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in his hand ready written, read it openly to the people, declaring how they ſhould be iudged by voyces, whether the offendors had deſerued death or not: and if it were found they had, then that they ſhould all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was read, cried out, that they ſhould adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion ſhould be put to death, they ſhould firſt torment him: and therwithall commandement was giuen that the wheele ſhould be ſet vp to breake his ioynts vpon it, and alſo that the hangman ſhould be ſent for. But then Agnonides perceiuing that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking beſides it were too beaſtly and barbarous a part to vſe him in that ſort, he ſaid openly: My Lords, when you ſhall haue ſuch a varlet in your hands at CALLIMEDON, then you may caſt him on the wheele: but againſt Phocion, I would not wiſh ſuch crueltie. Then roſe vp a nobleman among them, and added to his words: Thou haſt reaſon to ſay ſo, Agnonides: for if Phocion ſhould be laid on the wheele, what ſhould we then do with thee? The decree being confirmed according to the contents thereof, iudgement was giuen by voyces of the people, no man ſitting but all ſtanding vp, and moſt of them with garlands on their heads, for the ioy they had to condemne theſe priſoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned, Nicocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pythocles: but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedon and Charicles were alſo in their abſence condemned to die. Now when the aſſembly was broken vp, and that the perſons condemned were caried backe to priſon, from thence to be conueyed to execution: others embracing their friends, and taking their laſt leaue of them as they went, wept, and lamented their curſed fortune. But Phocion looking as chearefully of it as he was wont to do being Generall, when they honorably waited on him to his houſe from the aſſembly: he made many of them pitie him in their hearts to conſider his conſtancie and noble courage. On the other ſide alſo, there were many of his enemies that came as neare vnto him as they could, to reuile him, amongſt whom there was one that ſtepped before him, and did ſpit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magiſtrates, ſaid: Will ye not cauſe this impudent fellow to leaue his railing? When they were in priſon, Thudippus ſeeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a morter to giue them to drinke: he began deſperatly to curſe and ban, ſaying, that they wrongully put him to death with Phocion. Why, ſaid Phocion againe: and doeſt thou not rather reioyce to dye with me? When one that ſtood by asked Phocion, if he would any thing to his ſon Phocus: Yes, quoth he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the ATHENIANS do me. Then Nicocles one of Phocions deareſt friends, prayed him to let him drinke the poiſon before him. Phocion anſwered him, thy requeſt is grieuous to me, Nicocles: but becauſe I neuer denyed thee any thing in my life, I will alſo graunt thee this at my death. When all the reſt had drunke, there was no more poiſon left, and the hangman ſaid he would make no more, vnleſſe they gaue him twelue Drachmas, for ſo much the pound did coſt him. Phocion perceiuing then that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends vnto him, and prayed him to giue the hangman that litle money he demaunded, ſith a man cannot dye at ATHENS for nothing, without coſt. It was the ninteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, (to wit, March) on which day the knights were wont to make a ſolemne proceſſion in the honour of Iupiter: howbeit ſome of them left off the garlands of flowers which they ſhould haue worne on their heads, and others alſo looking towards the priſon doore as they went by, burſt out a weeping. For, they whoſe hearts were not altogether hardened with crueltie, and whoſe iudgements were not wholly ſuppreſſed with enuie, thought it a grieuous ſacriledge againſt the gods, that they did not let that day paſſe, but that they did defile ſo ſolemne a feaſt, with the violent death of a man. His enemies notwithſtanding, continuing ſtill their anger againſt him, made the people paſſe a decree, that his bodie ſhould be baniſhed, and caried out of the bounds of the countrie of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire ſhould be made for the ſolemnizing of his funerals. For this reſpect no friend of his durſt once touch his body. Howbeit a poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his liuing that that way, being hired for money to burne mens bodies: he tooke his corſe, and caried it beyond the citie of ELEVSIN, and getting fire out of a womans houſe of MEGARA, he ſolemnized his funerals. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of MEGARA, who comming by chaunce that way, with her gentlewomen, where his bodie was but newly burnt: ſhe cauſed the earth to be caſt vp a litle where the bodie was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, whereupon ſhe did vſe ſuch ſprinklings and effuſions, as are commonly done at the funerals of the dead: and then taking vp his bones in her lappe in the night, ſhe brought them home, and buried them in her harth, ſaying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring them one day to the graue of his auncеſtors, when the ATHENIANS ſhall come to confeſſe the fault and wrong they haue done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardneſſe of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who onely maintained iuſtice, and honeſtie at ATHENS. Wherupon they made his image to be ſet vp in braſſe, and gaue honourable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accuſers, they condemned Agnonides of treaſon, and put him to death themſelues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwards met with by his ſonne Phocus, who was reuenged of them. This Phocus as men report, was otherwiſe no great good man, who fancying a young maide which a bawd kept, comming by chaunce one day into the ſchoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheiſt (to wit, that beleeued not there were any gods) make this argument: If it be no ſhame, ſaid he, to deliuer a mans friend from bondage, no more ſhame is it to redeeme his lemman which he loueth: euen ſo it is all one to redeeme a mans lemman, as his friend. This young man taking this argument to ſerue his turne, beleeuing that he might lawfully do it, got the young maid he loued from the bawd. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did alſo reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the GRECIANS: for men thought that it was a like hainous offence and calamity vnto the citie of ATHENS.

The end of Phocions life.

THE LIFE OF Cato Vtican.

The parentage of Cato.

THe familie and houſe of Cato tooke his firſt glorie and name of his great grandfather, Cato the Cenſor: who for his vertue (as we haue declared in his life) was one of the famouſeſt and worthieſt men of Rome in his time. This Cato whome we now write of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Cæpio, and Porcia his ſiſter. Seruilia was alſo Catoes halfe ſiſter by his mothers ſide. All theſe were brought vp with their Vncle Liuius Druſus, at that time the greateſt man of the citie: for he was paſſing eloquent, and very honeſt, and of as great a courage beſides, as any other Romaine. Men report, that Cato from his childhood ſhewed himſelfe both in word and countenance, and alſo in all his paſtimes and recreations, very conſtant and ſtable. For he would go through with that he tooke vpon him to do, and would force himſelfe aboue his ſtrength: and as he could not away with flatterers, ſo was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh; and yet had euer a pleaſant countenance. He was not cholericke, nor eaſie to be angred: but when the bloud was vp, he was hardly pacified. When he was firſt put to ſchoole, he was very dull of vnderſtanding, and ſlow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men elſe cõmonly do. For ſuch as are quicke of conceipt, haue commonly the worſt memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, do keepe that better which they haue learned. For euery kind of learning is a motion and quickening of the mind. He ſeemed beſides not to be light of credit, and that may be ſome cauſe of his ſlowneſſe in conceipt. For truly he ſuffereth ſomewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth, that they that haue leaſt reaſon to reſiſt, are thoſe which do giue lighteſt credit. For yong men are eaſilier perſwaded then old men, and the ſicke then the whole. And where a man hath leaſt reaſon for his doubts: there he is ſooneſt brought to beleeue any thing. This notwithſtanding, it is reported that Cato was obedient vnto his ſchoolemaiſter, and would do what he commaunded him: howbeit he would aske him ſtill the cauſe and reaſon of euery thing. Indeed his ſchoolemaiſter was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to ſtrike him with his fiſt. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of Italie which were confederates of the Romaines, ſued to be made free citizens of Rome. At that time it chaunced one Pompedius Silo, a valiant ſouldier, and of great eſtimation among the confederates of the Romaines, and a great friend beſides of Druſus, to be lodged many daies at his houſe. He in this time falling acquainted with theſe young boyes, ſaid one day vnto them: Good boyes, intreat your vncle to ſpeake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of

ROME. Cæpio ſmiling nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no anſwer, looked very wiſely vpon the ſtrangers that lay in the houſe. Then Pompedius taking him aſide, asked him: And thou, my pretie boy, what ſayeſt thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle as well as thy brother, to be good to his gueſts? Cato ſtill held his peace and anſwered nothing, but ſhewed by his ſilence and looke, that he would not heare their requeſt. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he wold haue let him haue gone: and ſpeaking more ſharply to him then he did before, he caſt him many times out of his armes without the window, and ſaid, Promiſe vs then, or elſe I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer quinched for it, nor ſhewed countenance of feare. Therupon Pompedius ſetting him downe againe, told his friends that ſtood by him: O what good hap doth this child promiſe one day vnto ITALIE, if he liue? Sure if he were a man, I beleeue we ſhould not haue one voice of al the people on our ſide. Another time there were ſome of Catoes neere kinſmen, that keeping the feaſt day of his birth, bad many young boyes to ſupper, and amongſt others this Cato. The boyes to occupie themſelues till ſupper was ready, gathered themſelues together great and ſmall, into ſome priuate place of the houſe. Their play was, counterfeiting pleadings before the Iudges, accuſing one another, and carying them that were condemned to priſon. Amongſt them a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bound as a condemned perſon. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cryed out vnto Cato: who miſtruſting what it was, went ſtraight to the chamber dore, and putting them by by force that withſtood him to come vnto it, he took out the young boy, and caried him very angrily with him to his owne houſe, and all the other yong boies followed him alſo. So Cato had ſuch name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of yong boyes running a horſebacke, which the ROMAINES call Troia: to appoint thē before that they might be ready at the day of the ſhew, he hauing gotten all the young boies of noble houſes together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, becauſe of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephew to Pompey the Great, neither would they be exerciſed vnder him, nor follow him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cryed then Cato, and Sextus himſelfe did willingly giue him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers friend, and therefore did ſend for them many times to come vnto him, and he would talke with them: the which kindnes he ſhewed to few men, for the maieſty & great authority he had. Sarpedo alſo (Catoes ſchoolemaiſter) thinking it a great preferment and ſafety for his ſcholers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes houſe, to wait vpon him: the which was rather like vnto a iayle or priſon, for the great number of priſoners which were daily brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but fourteen yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heads brought which were ſaid to be of great men, and that euery bodie ſighed and mourned to ſee them: he aſked his ſchoolemaiſter, how it was poſſible the tyrant ſcaped, that ſome one or other killed him not? Becauſe, quoth Sarpedo, that all men feare him, more then they hate him. Why then, replyed Cato again, didſt thou not giue me a ſword that I might kill him, to deliuer my country of this ſlauery and bondage? Sarpedo hearing the boy ſay ſo, and ſeeing his countenance and eyes on fire with choler, he maruelled much at it, and afterwards had a very good eye vnto him, leſt raſhly he ſhould attempt ſomething againſt Sylla. When he was but a litle boy, ſome asked him whom he loued beſt? My brother, ſaid he. Then the other continuing ſtill to aske him, and who next? he anſwered likewiſe, his brother. Then the third time againe, likewiſe his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was wearie with asking him ſo oft. Yea and when he was come of age alſo, he then confirmed the loue he bare to his brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he neuer ſupped without his brother Cæpio, neither went he euer out of his houſe into the market place, nor into the fields without him: but when his brother did noint himſelfe with ſweet oyles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things elſe, he led a ſtreight and hard life. So that his brother Cæpio being commended of euery man for his temperance, honeſtie, and ſober life: he graunted in deede that in reſpect of others, he led a ſober and temperate life: but when I do (ſaid he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinkes then there is no difference betwixt me and Sippius. This Sippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once choſen Apolloes Prieſt, he went from his brother, and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the ſum of an hundred and twentie talents. Then he liued more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintance with Antipater TYRIAN, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gaue himselfe chiefly vnto the studie of morall and ciuill Philosophie, embracing all exercise of vertue with such an earnest desire, that it seemed he was prickt forward by some god: but aboue all other vertues, he loued the seuerity of iustice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauour. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, because he would there should be certaine warlike forces entertained in ciuill Philosophie, as also in a great citie. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any bodie, neither would he euer haue any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so litle in companie: It skilleth no matter, quoth he, so they cannot reproue my life, for I will begin to speake, when I can say something worthie to be spoken. Hard by the market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the citie, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Censorship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience: and because there was a pillar that troubled their seates, they would either haue taken it away, or else haue set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to go into the market place, and to get vp into the pulpit for orations, to speake against them: where hauing giuen this first proofe of his eloquence and noble mind, he was maruellously esteemed of. For his oration was not like a young man, counterfeiting fineneſſe of speech and affectation, but stout, full of wit and vehemencie: and yet in the shortnesse of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he maruellously delighted the hearers: and furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine grauity besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very ful and audible voyce that might be heard of a maruellous number of people, and such a strong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speech: for many times he would speake a whole day together, and was neuer weary. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, he returned againe to keepe his former great silence, and to harden his body with painefull exercises, as to abide heate, frost, and snow bare headed, and alwaies to go a foot in the field, where his friends that did accompanie him rode a horsebacke, and somtime he would come and talke with one, sometime with another, as he went a foot by them. He had a wonderfull patience also in his sickneſſe: for when he had any ague, he would be alone all day long, and suffer no man to come and see him, vntill he perceiued his fit was off him, and that he found he was better. When he supped with his friends and familiars, they drew lots who should chuse their parts. If he chanced not to chuse, his friends notwithstanding gaue him the preferment to chuse: but he refused it, saying it was no reason, sith the goddesse Venus was against him. At the first he did not vse to sit long at the table, but after he had drunke one draught onely, he would straight rise. But when he came to be elder, he sate long at the table: so that oftentimes he would sit it out all night with his friends, till the next morning. But they seeking to excuse it, sayd, that his great businesse and affaires in the commonwealth was the cause of it: for following that all the day long, hauing no leysure nor time to studie, when night came he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers at the boord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in companie, sayed, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night: Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, answered him, Thou doest not adde this vnto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dice. To be short, Cato thinking that the manners and fashions of mens liues in his time were so corrupt, and required such great chaunge and alteration, that to go vprightly, he was to take a contrarie course in all things: therfore when he saw that purple, red, & the lightest colors were best esteemed of, he in contrarie manner desired to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner he wold go abroad bare footed without shooes, and without any gowne: not because he would be wondered at for any such strangeneſſe, but to acquaint himselfe to be ashamed only of shameleſſe and dishonest things, and to despise those which were not reproued, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talents by the death of a cousin of his, that likewise was called Cato: he put it all into readie money, to lend to his friends that lacked, and without vsurie. And there were some of his friends also that would morgage his land, or his slaues, to the chamber of the citie, for their owne priuate businesse: the which he himselfe would either giue them to morgage, or else afterwards confirme the morgage of them. Furthermore, when he was come of age to marie, hauing neuer knowne woman before, he was made sure to Lepida. This Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio: but afterwards the precontract being broken, he forsooke her, so that she was free, when Cato was contracted to her.

Notwithſtanding, before Cato maried her, Scipio repenting him that he had refuſed her, made all the meanes he could to haue her againe: and ſo he had. Cato tooke it ſo grieuouſly, that he thought to go to law for her: but his friends diſſwaded him from it. Then ſeeing no other remedie, to ſatisfie his angry mind, he wrote verſes againſt Scipio, in the which he reuiled him all he could: vſing the bitter taunts of Archilocus verſes, but not ſuch impudent, lewde, and childiſh reproaches as be there. After that he maried Attilia, Soranus daughter, being the firſt woman he euer knew: yet not the onely woman whome he did know, as is reported of Lælius, Scipioes friend, who therein was counted the happier, becauſe all that long time wherein he liued, he neuer knew other woman but his firſt wife. Furthermore, in the warre of the bondmen (otherwiſe called Spartacus warre) one Gellius was choſen Prætor of the armie, vnder whom Cato ſerued of his owne good will, for the loue he bare vnto his brother Capio, who in that armie had charge of a thouſand footemen. Now Cato could not as he wiſhed, ſhew his valiantnes and good ſeruice, becauſe of the inſufficiencie of the Prætor that gaue ill direction. This notwithſtanding, in the midſt of all the ryot and inſolencie of them in the campe, he ſhewing himſelfe a ſtayed man in all his doings, valiant where need was, and very wiſe alſo: all men eſteemed him to be nothing inferiour vnto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prætor gaue him many honours in token of his valiantneſſe, which are giuen in reward of mens good ſeruice: howbeit Cato refuſed them, and ſayd, that he was nothing worthie of thoſe honours. Theſe things made him to be thought a maruellous ſtraunge man. Furthermore, when there was a law made, forbidding all men that ſued for any office in the commonwealth, that they ſhould haue no prompters in any of the aſſemblies, to blow into their eares the names of priuate citizens: he alone making ſute to be Colonell of a thouſand footmen, was obedient to the law, and committed all the priuate citizens names to memorie, to ſpeake vnto euery one of them, and to call them by their names: ſo that he was enuied euen of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deedes praiſeworthie, by ſo much more were they grieued, for that they could not follow them. So Cato being choſen Colonell of a thouſand footmen, he was ſent into MACEDON, vnto Rubrius, Prætor there. Some ſay, that at his departure from thence, his wife lamenting, and weeping to ſee him go: one Munatius a friend of his ſaid vnto her: Take no thought Attilia, and leaue weeping, for I promiſe thee I will keepe thy husband for thee. It is well ſaid, anſwered Cato. Then when they were a daies iourney from ROME, Cato after ſupper ſaid vnto this Munatius: Thou muſt looke well to thy promiſe thou haſt made Attilia, that thou wouldſt keepe me for her, and therfore forſake me not night nor day. Thereupon he commanded his men that from thencefoorth they ſhould prepare two beds in his chamber, that Munatius alſo might lye there: who was rather pleaſantly himſelfe looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fifteen ſlaues with him, two freemē, and foure of his friends, which rode, & he himſelf went a foot: ſometime talking with one, otherwhile with another as he went. When he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the ROMAINES, the Prætor immediatly gaue him charge of one of thē: who thinking it ſmal honor to him for himſelf only to be valiant, ſith he was but one man, he practiſed to make all his ſouldiers vnder him, like vnto himſelfe. The which he did not by feare & terror, but by lenity and gentle perſwaſion, training and inſtructing thē in euery point what they ſhould do: adding to his gentle inſtruction and perſwaſions, reward to thoſe that did well, and puniſhment to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to iudge, whether he had made them more quiet, then warlike: more valiant, then iuſt. So dreadfull they ſhewed themſelues to their enemies, and curteous to their friends: fearefull to do euill, and ready to win honor. Wherof followed that which Cato leaſt accounted of, that is, he wan fame and goodwil: for his ſouldiers did greatly honour and loue him, becauſe he himſelfe would euer firſt ſet his hand to any thing he commanded them, and becauſe alſo both in his diet, in his apparell, and in any iourney or paines, he was rather like vnto the meaneſt ſoldier, then any of the other Captaines. In contrary manner alſo, in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he far exceeded all the other Colonels and Captaines. For the true loue of vertue, (to wit, the deſire to follow it) taketh no roote in mens minds, vnleſſe they haue a ſingular loue and reuerence vnto the perſon, whom they deſire to follow. When Cato vnderſtood that Athenodorus ſurnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philoſopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the city of PERGAMVS, being a very old man, and one that ſtiffely refuſed the friendſhip of kings, princes, and noblemen, deſirous to haue him about them: to write to him, he thought it was but loſt labor. the lawes of the ROMAINES, to follow his owne affaires: he tooke sea, and went into ASIA to him, hoping he should not lose his iourny, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of diuerse matters together: at length he brought him from his first determination, and caried him to the campe with him, esteeming this victorie more, then all the conquests of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most part of all the prouinces and realmes of the East parts of the world. In the meane time, whilst he lay at his charge in the camp, being Colonell of a thousand footemen: his brother preparing to go into ASIA, fell sicke in the citie of ÆNVS, in the countrey of THRACIA. Cato hauing speedie intelligence thereof, tooke sea presently, when it was maruellous rough and boisterous, and imbarked in a litle crayer of a merchants of THESSALIE, with two of his friends, and three bondmen only, and did escape drowning very narrowly: and yet by good fortune arriued safely, a litle after his brother Cæpioes death. He tooke his death more sorrowfully then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, embracing the dead corps of his brother: but also for the exceeding charge and sumptuous funerals, which he bestowed vpon him, in perfumes, sweet sauours, and sumptuous silkes that were burnt with his bodie: and furthermore, in the stately tombe of THRACIAN marble which he made for him, and set vp in the market place of the ÆNIANS, that cost eight talents. Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modesty and temperance he vsed in all things else, not regarding with iudgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinsmen, which was mingled in him with his seuerity and hardnesse, against all voluptuousnesse, feare, and shameleſse requests. Diuers cities, Princes and Noblemen sent him many sundry presents, to honour the funerals of his brother Cæpio: howbeit he tooke no money of all thē, sauing only spices, and sweet sauours, and such other ornaments, as honored the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the land that fell vnto him, and a litle daughter of his, by the death of his brother: notwithstanding, the charge he had bene at in his funerals, he did not recken it in the partition of the land, betwixt him and his brother Cæpioes daughter. All the which things when they were solemnized, some* write notwithstanding, that he did cleanse the imbers where his brothers bodie had bene burnt, through a siue or riddle, where through they cleanse corne, & all to get out the gold & siluer that was molten there: but such thinke that their writings should be as far frō controlment, as their doings. So when Catoes time of his charge was expired, they did accompanie him at his departure, not only with ordinary praises, vowes, & prayers to the gods for his health: but with embracings, teares, and maruellous lamentations of the souldiers, which spred their garments on the ground as he went, & kissing of his hands, which honor the ROMAINS did but to very few of their generals. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to ROME to deale in the affaires there, to go & see ASIA, partly to be an eye-witnesse of the maners, customs, and power of euery prouince as he went: and partly also to satisfie king Deiotarus request, who hauing bene his fathers friend, had earnestly intreated him to come & see him: he went the iorny, and vsed it in this sort. First, by peepe of day, he sent his baker and cooke before, where he meant to lye that night. They coming soberly into the city or village, inquired if there were none of Catoes friends & acquaintance there, & if they found none, then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man: but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernours of the towne, & prayed them to helpe thē to lodging, & did content thēselues with the first that was offered thē. Oftentimes the towns men did not beleeue they were Catoes men, & made no account of thē: because they took all things so quietly, & made no ado with the officers. Insomuch as Cato somtime came himself, & found nothing ready for him, & when he was come, they made as smal account of him, seeing him set vpon his cariages, and speake neuer a word: for they tooke him for some meane man, and a timerous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he called them vnto him, and told them: O poore men, learne to be more courteous to receiue trauelling ROMAINES that passe by you, and looke not alwaies to haue Catoes to come vnto you: and therefore see that you vse them with such courtesie and entertainement, that they may bridle the authoritie they haue ouer you: for you shall find many that will desire no better colour nor occasion by force to take from you that they would haue: because you vnwillingly also do graunt them the things they would, and neede. There is a report of a pretie ieast happened him in SYRIA. When he came to ANTIOCH, he found a great number of people deuided on either side of the street, standing a row one by another very decently: the yong men by thēselues in faire clokes, boies by themselues in seemely seemely array, and priests and other officers of the city also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this solemne procession to honor him, and fell out with his men he had sent before, because they did suffer them to make such preparation for his coming. So he made his friends light from their horses, and go a foote to accompany him. But when they came neare to the gate of the city, the maister of these ceremonies that had assembled all that company (an old man, hauing a rod in his hand, and a crowne on his head) came to Cato without saluting of him, and asked him only, where they had left Demetrius, and when he wold come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeys slaues, and because Pompeys fame was great with all men, his seruant Demetrius also was much honored and made of aboue his desert, for that he was in great credite with Pompey. Catoes friends hearing what question the old man asked him, burst out a laughing as they went through this procession. Cato being ashamed of it, said no more then: but, O vnfortunate city! Afterwards notwithstanding, when he told it to any body, he wold laugh at it himselfe. But Pompey rebuked them, that through ignorance had failed to honor Cato.

Demetrius a slaue, great with Pompey.

When Cato came to the city of EPHESVS, and was comming towards Pompey to salute him, being the elder man, and of greater dignitie and estimation then he, who at that time also was Generall of a great and puissant army: Pompey seeing him coming towards him a far off, would not tary till he came to him, sitting in his chaire of estate, but rising vp went to meet him, as one of the greatest and noblest persons of ROME, & taking him by the hand, after he had embraced and welcomed him, he presently fell in praise of his vertue before his face, and afterwards also cõmended him in his absence, when he was gone from him. Whereupon, euery man after that had him in great veneration for those things which before they despised in him, when they considered better of his noble and curteous mind. For men that saw Pompeys entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced, and for a kind of dutie obserued, more then for any loue he bare him: & they noted further, that he honored him greatly while he was with him, but yet that he was glad when Cato went from him. For he sought to keep back all the young gentlemen of ROME that went to see him, and desired them to remaine with him: but for Cato, he was nothing desirous of his cõpany, for that in his presence he thought he could not command as he would, and therfore was willing to let him go, recõmending his wife & his children to him, the which he neuer did before vnto any other ROMAINE that returned to ROME: howbeit indeed Cato was partly allyed vnto him. After that time, all the cities whereby he passed, deuised (in emulation one of the other) which of them should honor him most, and made him great feasts and banquets: in the which he prayed his friends to haue an eye to him, lest vnwares he should proue Curioes words true. For Curio somtime being his friend, & a familiar of his, misliking notwithstanding his seuerity: asked Cato if he wold go see ASIA, when his charge were expired. Cato answered againe, that it was his full determination. O well said, quoth Curio, I hope then thou wilt returne more pleasant and ciuill. And these were Curioes words. Furthermore, Deiotarus king of GALATIA, being a very old man, sent for Cato to come into his countrey to recõmend his sons and house vnto him: who when he arriued there, had great rich presents of all sorts offered him by the king, intreating him all he could to take them. This so much misliked and angred Cato, that he coming thither in the euening, (after he had taried there one whole day only) the next morning he went his way frõ thence at the third houre. Howbeit he had not gone one daies iourney, but he found greater gifts that taried him, with Deiotarus letters, at the city of PESSINVNTA: in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the least if he would refuse them himselfe, that then he would let them be deuided amongst his friends, sith euery way they did deserue it, but specially for his sake, for that his goods also were not so great, as could content all his friends. But Cato would not suffer them to take any iot of it more then before, although he saw well enough that there were some of them so tender harted, that they complained of him, for that he would not suffer them to take any of it. For he told thẽ, that otherwise, corruption & briberie could lacke no honest colour to take: and for his friends, they should alwaies haue part with him of that which was his own iustly. So he returned king Deiotarus presents backe againe. Now when he was ready to imbarke, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM: some of his friends perswaded him, that it was better to put the ashes of his brother Cæpioes bones into another shippe. But he aunswered them, that he would rather lose his owne life, then to leaue his brothers reliques. Thereupon he presently hoisted saile, and it is reported that he passed ouer in great daunger, where other shippes arriued very safely. When he was returned vnto ROME, he was alwaies either talking Philoſophie with Athenodorus the Philoſopher, or elſe in the market place to pleaſure his friends. When his turne came that he was to make ſute to be Quæſtor, he would neuer ſue for it, before he had firſt diligently peruſed all the ordinances touching the office of Quæſtor,, and that he had particularly made enquirie of men of greateſt experience to know what the authoritie of the office was. So he no ſooner came to his office, but he preſently made great alteration amongſt the Clearkes and Officers of the treaſurie: who hauing the lawes and records in their hands, and exerciſing the office commonly vnder young men which were choſen Treaſurers (who for their ignorance and lacke of experience, ſtood rather in neede of maiſters to teach them, then that they were able to correct others) they themſelues were the officers, and controlled them. But Cato not contenting himſelfe with the name and honour of the thing, did throughly vnderſtand what the Clearkes and Regiſters ſhould be, and therefore would haue them to be as they ought to be, miniſters vnder the Quæſtors onely, telling them of their briberie and corruption which they committed, and reformed them alſo that faulted through ignorance. And when he ſaw ſome inſolent and impudent perſons, that curried fauour with other treaſurers to be againſt him: he cauſed the chiefeſt of them to be condemned for falſhood, in making diuiſion betwixt two coheires, and conſequently turned him cleare out of his office, for euer doing any thing there any more. He accuſed another alſo for forging of a Will, whom Catulus Luctatius defending, being then Cenſor, and a man of great honour for the dignitie of his office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the iuſteſt man one of them in his time at Rome, and one of thoſe alſo that highly commended Cato, and was conuerſant with him for his honeſt life: when he perceiued that he could not defend his man by no reaſon, he prayed them at his requeſt that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wiſe grant it. But Catulus earneſtly intreating ſtill for him: then Cato plainly ſaid vnto him: It is ſhame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Cenſor, and ſhouldeſt reforme all our liues, thus to forget the dutie of thine office, to pleaſe our miniſters. Catulus looking at Cato when he had ſpoken, as though he would anſwer him: whether it were for ſhame or anger, he went his way, and ſaid neuer a word more. Yet was not the partie condemned, though there was one voice more that did condemne then cleare him, becauſe of the abſence of one of the Iudges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catoes colleagues in the Quæſtorſhip, being ſicke at that time, and abſent, Catulus ſent vnto him, to pray him to come and helpe the poore man. Thereupon Lollius being brought thither in a litter, after iudgement giuen, gaue his laſt voice, which abſolutely cleared him. Cato, this not withſtanding, would neuer vſe him as a Clearke, nor pay him his wages, nor would count of Lollius voyce among others. Thus hauing pulled downe the pride and ſtomacke of theſe Clearkes, and brought them vnto reaſon: in ſhort time he had al the tables and records at his commandement, and made the Treaſure chamber as honourable as the Senate it ſelfe: ſo that euery man thought, and ſaid, that Cato had added vnto the Quæſtorſhip the dignitie of the Conſulſhip. For finding diuers men indebted before vnto the commonwealth, and the commonwealth alſo vnto diuers men: he ſet downe ſuch an order, that neither the commonwealth ſhould be deceiued by any man, nor that any man alſo ſhold haue wrong of it. For being rough with them that were indebted to the chamber, he compelled them to pay their debt, and willingly and quickly alſo payed them to whom the chamber ought any thing: ſo that the people were aſhamed to ſee ſome pay which neuer thought to haue payed any thing, and on the contrary ſide alſo others payd, which neuer looked to haue had any part of their debts paid them. Furthermore, diuers men did before make falſe bils of their debts, and brought thē ſo to be put into the coffer of the Quæſtors: and many times alſo his predeceſſors were wont of fauor & friendſhip to receiue falſe meſſages. But whileſt he was Quæſtor, he neuer did paſſe away matters ſo lightly. For one day, he being doubtful of a meſſage that was ſent vnto him, to know whether it was true or no: albeit diuers men did witnes it was true, yet would he not beleeue it, vntill ſuch time as the Conſuls themſelues came in their owne perſons to iuſtifie it was true, and to ſweare, that it was ſo ordained. Now there were many vnto whom Lucius Sylla (being Dictator) had appointed in his ſecond proſcription twelue thouſand ſiluer Drachmas for euery citizen and outlawe which they had ſlaine with their owne hands. Theſe men, though euery man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked people and cruell murtherers: yet no man durſt offer to be reuenged of them. Cato called theſe men in ſute, as thoſe that did wrongfully detaine the money of the common treaſure, and compelled thē to repay it backe againe: ſharpely reprouing (and iuſtly) the wicked diuelliſh fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were ſtraight accuſed by others for murder: and as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one iudgement, they were brought into another, to the great ioy of all the ROMAINES, who then thought they ſaw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla himſelfe punished. Beſides all this, Catoes continuall paines and care of the treaſure, was ſo well thought of, and liked of the people as could be. For he was alwayes the firſt that came to the coffer of the treaſurers, and alſo the laſt that went from thence, and was neuer weary of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer miſſed to be at any aſſembly of the people or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, leaſt lightly by fauour, any money due to the common wealth ſhould be forgiuen: or elſe that they ſhould abate the rent of the farmers, or that they ſhould giue no money but to them that had iuſtly deſerued it. Thus hauing ridde all accuſers, and alſo filled the coffers with treaſure: he made men ſee, that the commonwealth might be rich, without oppreſſing of any man. Indeed at his firſt comming into the office his colleagues and companions found him maruellous troubleſome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and ſeuere: howbeit they all loued him in the end, becauſe he onely withſtood the complaints and cries of all men againſt them (which complained that they would not for any mans reſpect or fauour let go the money of the common treaſure) and was contented his companions ſhould excuſe themſelues vnto their friends that were importunate, and lay the fault vpon him, ſaying, that it was vnpoſſible for them to bring Cato vnto it. The laſt day that he went out of his office, being very honourably brought home to his houſe by the people: it was told him that Marcellus, being in the treaſure chamber, was attempted and enuironed with many of his friends, and men of great authoritie, that were earneſtly in hand with him to record a certaine gift of money, as a thing that had bene due by the commonwealth. This Marcellus had bene Catoes friend euen from their childhood, and whileſt Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him: but when he was left alone, he was of ſo gentle a nature, that he would eaſily be intreated, and was as much aſhamed to deny any man, as he was alſo ouer-ready to graunt euery man that he required. Cato ſtraight returned backe vpon it, and finding that Marcellus had yeelded vnto their importunacy, and recorded the gift: he cauſed the bookes to be brought vnto him, and did raze it out before his face, Marcellus ſpeaking neuer a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and neuer once repined againſt that he had done, neither then, nor at any time after, but continued ſtill friendſhip with him, as he had done before. But now, though Cato was out of his office of Quæſtor, he was not without ſpials of his men in the treaſure chamber: who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and paſſed in the treaſury. And Cato himſelfe hauing bought the bookes of account for the ſumme of fiue talents, containing the reuenew of the whole ſtate of the common wealth, from Syllaes time vntill the very yeare of his Quæſtorſhip: he euer had them about him, and was the firſt man that came to the Senate and the laſt that went out of it. There many times the Senators tarying long before they came, he went and ſate downe in a corner by himſelfe, and read cloſely the booke he had vnder his gowne, clapping his gowne before it, and would neuer be out of the city on that day when he knew the Senate ſhould aſſemble. After that, Pompey and his conſorts perceiuing that it was vnpoſſible to compell Cato, and much leſſe to win or corrupt him, to fauor their vniuſt doings, they ſought what meanes they could to keepe him from comming to the Senate, and defending certaine of his friends cauſes, and to occupy him ſome other wayes about matters of arbiterment. But Cato finding their wiles and craft, to encounter them, he told his friends once for all, whom he would pleaſure: that when the Senate did ſit, no mans cauſe could make him be abſent from thence. For he came not to ſerue the common wealth to enrich himſelfe as many did, neither for any glory or reputation, nor yet at all aduenture: but that he had aduiſedly choſen to ſerue the common wealth, like a iuſt and honeſt man, and therefore thought himſelfe bound to be as carefull of his duty, as the Bee working her waxe in the hony combe. For this reſpect therefore, to performe his dutie the better, by the meanes of his friends which he had in euery prouince belonging to the Empire of ROME: he got into his hands the copies of all the chiefeſt acts, edicts, decrees, ſentences, and the notableſt iudgements of the gouernours that remained in record. Once Cato perceiuing that Publius Clodius a ſeditious Orator amongſt the people, did make great ſtirre, and accuſed diuerſe vnto the aſſembly, as the Prieſts and Veſtall Nunnes: among the which Fabia Terentia, Ciceroes wiues ſiſter was accuſed, he taking their cauſe in hand, did ſo diſgrace Clodius their accuſer, that he was driuen to flie the city. Cicero therefore giuing Cato thankes, Cato told him, that he muſt thanke the common wealth, not him, for whoſe ſake onely he both ſayd and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certaine Orator or common counſellor preferred one witneſſe vnto the Iudges, the counſellor on the other ſide told them, that one witneſſe was not to be credited, though it were Cato himſelfe. Inſomuch as the people tooke it vp for a prouerbe among them, that when any man ſpake any ſtrange and vnlikely matter, they would ſay: Nay, though Cato himſelfe ſayd it, yet were it not to be beleeued. When on a time a certaine prodigall man had made a long oration in the Senate, in praiſe and commendation of ſobriety, temperance, and thriftineſſe: one Amnæus a Senator riſing vp, ſayd vnto him, Alas, friend, what thinkeſt thou? who can abide to heare thee any longer with patience: that fareſt at thy table like Craſſus, buildeſt like Lucullus, and ſpeakeſt to vs like Cato? So men cõmonly (in ſport) called them Catoes, which were graue and ſeuere in their words, and diſſolute in their deeds. When diuerſe of his friends were in hand with him to ſue to be Tribune of the people, he told them he thought it not meete at that time: for ſuch an office (quoth he) of ſo great authority as that, is not to be imployed, but like a ſtrong medicine in time of need. So, the tearme and matters of law ceaſſing for that time, Cato went into the country of Lvca to take his pleaſure there, where he had pleaſant houſes: and tooke with him both his bookes and Philoſophers to keepe him company. But, meeting as he went, with diuerſe ſumpters and great cariage, and a great traine of men beſides, he asked them whoſe cariage it was: they told him it was Metellus Nepos that returned to Rome, to make ſute to be Tribune. Thereupon Cato ſtayed ſuddenly, and bethinking himſelfe commanded his men to returne backe againe. His friends maruelling at it, he anſwered them: Do not you know that Metellus is to be feared of himſelfe, for his raſhneſſe and folly? and now that he commeth inſtructed by Pompey, like a lightning he would ſet all the common-wealth a fire? for this cauſe therefore, we muſt not now go take our pleaſure in the countrey, but ouercome his folly, or otherwiſe die honourably in defence of our libertie. Yet at his friends perſwaſions, he went firſt vnto his houſe in the countrey, and taried not long there, but returned ſtraight againe to Rome. When he came thither ouernight, the next morning betimes he went into the market place, and ſued to be Tribune of the people, purpoſely to croſſe Metellus enterpriſe, becauſe the power and authoritie of the Tribune conſiſteth more in hindering, then doing any thing: for if all men elſe were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were againſt it, the Tribune would carie it from them all. Cato at the firſt had not many of his friends about him, but when they heard of his intent, why he made ſute for the Tribuneſhip, all his friends and Noblemen ſtraight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and encouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to ſerue the common wealth, then his owne turne, conſidering, that where many times before he might (without reſiſtance or deniall) haue obtained the ſame, the ſtate being toward no trouble, he then would neuer ſue for it, but now that he ſaw it in danger, where he was to fight for the common wealth, and the protection of her libertie. It is reported that there was ſuch a number of people about him to fauour his ſute, that he was like to haue bene ſtifled among them, and thought he ſhould neuer haue come to the market place, for the preaſſe of people that ſwarmed about him. Thus when he was choſen Tribune with Metellus and others, he perceiued how they bought and ſold the voices of the people when the Conſuls were choſen: whereupon he made an oration, and ſharply tooke them vp for this deteſtable marchandiſe, and after his oration ended, ſolemnly proteſted by oath: that he wold accuſe him, & bewray his name, which had giuen mony to be choſen Conſull. Howbeit he ſpake nothing of Syllanus, whoſe ſiſter Seruilia he had maried: but he flatly accuſed Lucius Muræna, that had obtained to be Cõſull with Syllanus, by meanes of his mony. Now a law being prouided, that the party accuſed might haue a keeper or ſpiall to follow the accuſer, to ſee what he would accuſe the party with, that he might the better be able to defend himſelfe, knowing what ſhould be obiected againſt him. Muræna hauing one for him to waite vpon Cato, to cõſider throughly what courſe he tooke, when he ſaw that he went not maliciouſly to worke, but tooke a plaine common way of a iuſt accuſer: he had ſo great confidence in Catoes vpright mind and integrity, that not regarding the narrow ſifting of him otherwiſe, he did one day aske him himſelfe in the market place (or at home in his owne houſe) if that day he were determined to proſecute any matter againſt him touching his accuſation. If Cato anſwered him that he did not: then he went his way and ſimply beleeued him. When the day came indeed that his cauſe was to be heard, & pleaded vnto: Cicero being Conſull

that yeare, defending Murena, played so pleasantly with the Stoicke Philosophers, and their strange opinions, that he made all the Iudges laugh: insomuch as Cato himselfe smiling at him, told them that were by him: See, we haue a pleasant Consull that makes men laugh thus. So Murena being discharged by this iudgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but so long as he remained Consull, he was alwayes ruled by his counsell in all his affaires, and continued euer to honor him, following his counsell in all things touching his office. Hereof Cato himselfe was cause, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counsell, and in his orations before the people, for the maintenance onely of equity and iustice: for otherwise, he was very ciuill & courteous to all men. But before he entred into his Tribuneship, Cicero being yet Consul, he did helpe him in many things touching his office, but specially, in bringing Catilines cõspiracy to good end, which was a noble act done of him. For Catiline did practise a generall commotion and stirre in the commonwealth, to ouerthrow the whole state of Rome, by ciuill discord within Rome, and open warres abroad: who being discouered and ouercome by Cicero, he was driuen in the end to flie Rome. But Lentulus, Cethegus, and many other of the accomplices of this conspiracy, blamed Catiline for his faint and cowardly proceeding in it. For their parts, they had determined to burne the whole city of Rome, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by straunge warres, and rebellions of forreine nations and prouinces. Howbeit this treason being discouered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred vnto the iudgement of the Senate, to determine what was to be done therein. Syllanus being the first who was asked his opinion therein, sayd, that he thought it good they should suffer cruell paines: and after him also, all the rest sayd the like, vntill it came to Cæsar. Cæsar being an excellent spoken man, and that rather desired to nourish then to quench any such stirres or seditions in the commonwealth, being fit for his purpose long determined of: made an Oration full of sweete pleasant words, declaring vnto them, that to put such men as them to death without lawfull condemnation, he thought it altogether vnreasonable, and rather that they should do better to keepe them in prison. This Oration of Cæsar so altred all the rest of the Senators minds, for that they were afraid of the people: that Syllanus selfe mended his opinion againe, and sayd, that he meant not they should put them to death, but keepe them fast in prison, because that to be a prisoner, was the greatest paine a Romaine citizen could abide. Thus, the Senators minds being so suddenly chaunged, and bent to a more fauorable sentence: Cato rising vp to say his opinion, began very angrily with maruellous eloquence, grieuously to reproue Syllanus for chaunging his mind, and sharply to take vp Cæsar, that vnder a popular semblance, and maske of sweete sugred words, he sought vnder-hand to destroy the commonwealth, and also to terrifie and make the Senate afraid: where he himselfe should haue bene afraid, and thinke himselfe happy, if he could scape from being suspected, giuing such apparant cause of suspition as he did, going about so openly to take the enemies and traytours of the common wealth out of the hands of iustice, seeming to haue no pity nor compassion of his naturall city, of such Nobility and fame, being euen brought in maner to vtter destruction, but rather to lament the fortune of these wicked men, that it was pity they were euer borne, and whose death preserued Rome from a thousand murthers and mischiefes. Of all the Orations that euer Cato made, that onely was kept: for Cicero the Consull, that day had dispersed diuerse pen-men in sundry places of the Senate house, which had maruellous swift hands, and had further taught them how to make briefe notes and abridgements, which in few lines shewed many words. For vntill that time, writers were not knowne that could by figures and ciphers expresse a whole sentence and word, as afterwards they could: being then the first time that euer they were found out. So Cato at that time preuailed against Cæsar, and made them all change their minds againe, that these men were put to death. But that we may not leaue out a iot of his manners, as the very patterne and impression of his mind: It is reported, that when Cato that day was so hot and vehement against Cæsar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both, a letter was deliuered Cæsar, sent him into the house. Cato began presently to suspect it, and so earnestly misliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commaunded his letter should be seene and read openly. Cæsar thereupon reached his letter vnto Cato, that sate not farre from him. When Cato had read it, and found that it was a loue letter which his sister Seruilia had written vnto Cæsar, whom she loued, and had knowne: he cast it againe to Cæsar, and sayd, There drunkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begun before. In fine, it seemeth that Cato was very vnfortunate in his wiues: for this Seruilia, as we haue sayd, had an ill name by Cæsar. And the other Seruilia also, which was his sister, was worse defamed. For she being maried vnto Lucullus, one of the greatest men of Rome, by whom she had a sonne, was in the end put away from him, for her naughty life. But worst of al, his owne wife Attilia also was not altogether cleare without suspitiō: for though he had two sons by her, yet he was driuen to be diuorced from her, she was so naught and cōmon. After that, he maried Martia, the daughter of Philip, which by report seemed to be a very honest gentlewoman. It is she that is so famous among the Romaines. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a fable or comedie) is disputable, and hard to be iudged. For thus it was, as Thraseas writeth: who referreth all to the report and credite of one Munatius, Catoes very familiar friend. Among many that loued Catoes vertues, and had them in admiration, some of them did shew more what he was, then other some did: amongst the which, was Q. Hortensius, a man of great honesty and authority. He, desiring not onely to be Catoes friend and familiar, but also to ioyne with him in alliance, and by affinity to make both their houses one: was not abashed to moue him, to let him haue his daughter Porcia in mariage (which was Bibulus wife, and had brought him two children) that he might also cast abroad the seed of goodly children, in that pleasant fertile ground. And though to men this might seeme a straunge mind and desire, yet that in respect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the common wealth, not to suffer a young woman in the prime of her youth, to loose the fruite of her wombe, being apt to beare children: nor also that he should impouerish his sonne in law with moe children, then one house needed. And further, that communicating women in this sort from one to another, specially being bestowed vpon worthie and vertuous men: that vertue should thereby be increased the more, being so dispersed in diuerse families, and the city likewise should be the stronger, by making alliances in this sort together. And if it be so, quoth he, that Bibulus do loue his wife so dearly, that he will not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him againe, when he had a child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendship to him, by meanes of this communication of children with Bibulus selfe, and with him. Cato aunswered him, that he loued Hortensius well, and liked of his alliance, bowbeit that he maruelled he would speake to him to let him haue his daughter to get children of, sith he knew that she was maried to another. Then Hortensius altering his tale, stucke not to tell him his mind plainly, and to desire his wife of him, the which was yet a young woman, and Cato had children inough. But a man cannot tell whether Hortensius made this sute, because he saw Cato make no reckoning of Martia, for that she was then with child by him. In fine, Cato seeing the earnest desire of Hortensius, he did not deny him her, but told him, that he must also get Philips good will, the father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had graunted his good will, would not therefore let him haue his daughter, before that Cato himselfe by his presence did confirme the contract and mariage with him. Though these things were done long after, yet hauing occasion to talke of Catoes wiues, I thought it not amisse to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus, and his consorts of Catilines conspiracy being but to death: Cæsar to cloake the accusations wherewith Cato charged him in open Senate, did put himselfe into the peoples hands, and gathering the rakehels & seditious persons together, which sought to set all at sixe and seuen, he did further encourage them in their mischieuous intent and practises. Whereupon, Cato fearing least such a rabble of people should put all the common wealth in vprore and daunger, he perswaded the Senate to winne the poore needy people that had nothing, by distributing of corne amongst them, the which was done: and the charge thereof amounted yearely vnto twelue hundred and fifty talents. This liberalitie did manifestly drinke vp and quench all those troubles which they stood in feare of. But on the other side, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certaine seditious Orations and assemblies, and preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great should presently be called into Italie with his army, that he should keepe the citie by his comming, from the present danger of Catilines conspiracy. These were but words spoken for fashions sake, but indeed the law had a secret meaning, to put the whole common wealth and Empire of Rome into Pompeys hands. Hereupon the Senate assembled, wherein Cato at his first comming, spake somewhat gently, and not too vehemently against Metellus, as his maner was to be sharpe vnto them that were against him: but modestly perswaded him, and fel to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwayes taken part with the Senate and Nobility. But Metellus therewith tooke such pride and conceipt of himselfe, that he began to despise Cato, thinking he had vsed that mildnesse, as though he had bene afraid of him: in so much as he gaue out proud proud ſpeeches againſt him, and cruell threats, that in deſpite of the Senate he would do that which he had vndertaken. Then Cato chaunging his countenance, his voyce and ſpeech, after he had ſpoken very ſharply againſt him: in the end he roughly proteſted, that while he liued, he would neuer ſuffer Pompey to come into ROME with his army. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both well in their wits, but that Metellus doings was a furie, which proceeding of a cancred ſtomacke and extreme malice, would put all in hazard: and that which Cato did, was a rauiſhment and extaſie of his vertue, that made him beſide himſelfe, contending for iuſtice and equity. When the day came that this law ſhould paſſe by voices of the people, Metellus failed not to be in the market place with a world of ſtraungers, ſlaues, and fencers, armed, and ſet in battell ray, beſides a number of the common people that were deſirous to ſee Pompeys returne, hoping after chaunge. Beſides all thoſe, Cæſar then being Prætor, gaue aide likewiſe with his men, in the behalfe of Metellus. On the contrary part alſo, the noble men and Senators of the city were as angry as Cato, and ſayd it was a horrible ſhame: howbeit they were his friends, rather in miſliking the matter, then in defending the common wealth. Whereupon, all his friends at home, and his whole family, were maruellouſly perplexed and ſorowfull, that they both refuſed their meate, and alſo could take no reſt in the night for feare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, hauing a good heart with him, did comfort his people, and bad them not ſorow for him: and after he had ſupped, as he commonly vſed to do, he went to bed, and ſlept ſoundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his colleague and fellow Tribune, came and called him. So they both went together into the market place, accompanied with a very few after them. Whereupon diuerſe of their friends came and met them by the way, and bad them take heed vnto themſelues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato ſaw the temple of Caſtor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or ſteps kept by ſword players and fencers, and Metellus on the top of them ſet by Cæſar: turning to his friends, he ſayd, See I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, againſt one man naked, and vnarmed. Therewithall he ſtraight went forward with his companion Thermus vnto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of themſelues to let him paſſe, but they would let no other go vp but himſelfe: But Cato with much ado, taking Minutius by the hand, got him vp with him, and when he was come vp, he ſate him downe betwixt Metellus and Cæſar, to keepe them aſunder, that they ſhould not whiſper one in anothers eare. Neither of them both could tell what to ſay to him: whereupon the Noblemen that conſidered Catoes countenance and boldneſſe, wondring to ſee it, drew neare, and by their cries willed him not to be afraid, but encouraged one another to ſticke by him, that ſtood for defence of their liberty. So, there was a ſeruant that tooke the written law in his hand, and would haue read it to the people: but Cato would not let him. Then Metellus tooke it himſelfe in his hands to reade it: but Cato alſo ſnatched it out of his hands. Metellus notwithſtanding, hauing it perfect without booke, would needs declare the effect of it by heart. But Thermus clapped his hand before his mouth to keepe him that he ſhould not ſpeake. Metellus ſeeing theſe two men bent by all meanes to keepe this law from paſſing, and that the people did leane on their ſide: he beckned to his men to go for the armed men which were at home in his houſe, that they ſhould come with terrour and cries to make them afraid, and ſo they did. The people thereupon were diſperſed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threw ſtones at him from beneath. But then Muræna, who had before accuſed Cato for buying of the Conſulſhip, forſooke him not in that daunger, but holding his long gowne before him, cried out vnto them beneath, that threw at Cato, to leaue. So ſhewing him the danger he had brought himſelfe vnto, holding him ſtill by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Caſtor and Pollux. Then Metellus ſeeing the pulpit for Orations voided, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the goale: whereupon commaunding his ſouldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to paſſe his law. But his enemies that fled for feare, being gathered againe together in the market place, began a freſh to cry out againſt Metellus, with greater boldneſſe and courage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being afraid and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were prouided, and therefore were the bolder: they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for Orations. So when Metellus and his company were gone, Cato came againe to the pulpit for Orations, and greatly commended the people for the good will they had ſhewed, and perſwaded them to continue in their well doing. Whereupon the common people were then againſt Metellus, and the Senate alſo being aſſembled gaue order, that Cato ſhould haue better aide then he had before, and that by all meanes poſſible they ſhould reſiſt Metellus law, which onely tended to moue ſedition and ciuill warre in Rome. For Metellus ſelfe, he was yet vehemently bent to follow his attempt and enterpriſe: but perceiuing that his friends were maruellouſly affraid of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he ſuddenly came into the market place, and aſſembling the people, told them many reaſons in his oration, ſuppoſing to bring Cato in diſgrace with the people, and amongſt other things he ſayd, that he would withdraw himſelfe out of this tyrannicall power of Catoes, and his conſpiracy againſt Pompey, the which peraduenture the city before it were long ſhould repent, for that they had ſhamed and defaced ſo noble a man. After that, he preſently departed Rome, and went into Asia to informe Pompey of all this matter. Cato on the other ſide was greatly eſteemed for his doings, for that he had freed the common wealth from the great trouble of ſuch a fooliſh Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Metellus, he had alſo ſuppreſſed the power of Pompey. But he was yet much more commended, when he was againſt the Senate, who would haue noted Metellus of infamy, and depriued him of his office, the which he would not ſuffer them to do. The common people thought him of a courteous and gentle nature, becauſe he would not tread his enemy vnder his foote, when he had the vpper hand of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him: but wiſe men iudged it otherwiſe, that it was wiſely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus from the warre, of the which it ſeemed that Pompey had taken the honor and glory from him for the ending of it, and was likely alſo to haue bene put from his honour of triumph, for that Caius Memmius was his aduerſary, who layd many accuſations againſt him before the people, rather to pleaſe Pompey, then for any malice elſe he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had maried his owne ſiſter Seruilia, as alſo for that he ſaw they did him wrong: reſiſted this Memmius, and defended many accuſations againſt him. So that in the end, though Memmius had laboured that Cato ſhould be depriued of his office, as from a tyrannicall power: yet Cato compelled Memmius at the laſt to leaue off his accuſations, & to proſecute law no more againſt him. Thus Lucullus hauing obtained honor of triumph, did embrace Catoes friendſhip more then before, taking him for a ſure bulwarke and defence againſt the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey ſhortly after returning home againe, with great honor from his conqueſts, truſting that for reſpect of his welcome he ſhould be denied nothing at the peoples hands when he came home: ſent before vnto the Senate, to pray them for his ſake to deferre the election of the Conſuls, vntill he came to Rome, that being preſent he might fauour Piſoes ſute, ſuing to be Conſull. Therunto the moſt part of the Senate gaue their conſent, but Cato on the other ſide was againſt it, not that the deferring of time was a matter of ſuch importance, but to cut all hope from Pompey to go about to attempt any new deuiſes: inſomuch that he made the Senate chaunge opinion againe, and Pompeys requeſt was denied. Pompey being maruellouſly troubled withall, and perceiuing that Cato would be againſt him in all things if he found not ſome deuice to win him: he ſent for his friend Munatius, by his meanes to demaund Catoes two neeces of him which were mariable: the eldeſt for himſelfe, & the yongeſt for his ſon. Others ſay alſo, that they were not his neeces, but his owne daughters. Munatius did Pompeys meſſage, & brake the matter vnto him, his wife, & his ſiſters, who maruellouſly deſired Pompeys alliance, for the greatneſſe & dignity of his perſon. But Cato making no farther delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleaſed with the motion, anſwered him preſently: Munatius, go thy way vnto Pompey againe, and tell him that Cato is not to be won by women, though otherwiſe I miſlike not of his friendſhip: and withall, that ſo long as he ſhall deale vprightly in all cauſes, & none otherwiſe, that he ſhall find him more aſſuredly his friend, then by any alliance of mariage: and yet, that to ſatisfie Pompeys pleaſure and will againſt his country, he will neuer giue him ſuch pledges. The women and his friends at that time were angry with his anſwer and refuſall, ſaying, it was too ſtately and vncourteous. But afterwards it chaunced, that Pompey ſuing to haue one of his friends made Conſull, he ſent a great ſumme of money to bribe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, and ſpoken of, becauſe the money was told in Pompeys owne garden. Then did Cato tell the women of his houſe, that if he had now bene bound by alliance of mariage vnto Pompey, he ſhould then haue bene driuen to haue bene partaker of Pompeys ſhamefull acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confeſſed then that he was wiſer to refuſe ſuch alliance, then they were that that wished and desired it. And yet, if men should iudge of wisedome, by the successe and euent of things: I must needs say, that Cato was in great fault for refusing of this alliance. For thereby he was the cause of Pompeys matching with Cæsar, who ioyning both their powers together, was the whole destruction of the Empire of Rome: whereas peraduenture it had not fallen out so, if Cato fearing Pompeys light faults, had not caused him by increasing his power with another, to commit farre greater faults. Howbeit those things were yet to come. Furthermore, Pompey being at iarre with Lucullus, touching certaine ordinances which he had made in the Realme of Pontvs, because both the one and the other would haue their ordinances to take place: Cato fauoured Lucullus, who had open wrong. Pompey therefore seeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, tooke part with the people, and put forth the law for deuiding of the lands amongst the souldiers. But Cato stoutly resisting that law againe, he put it by, and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquaint himselfe with Publius Clodius, the most seditious and boldest person of all the Tribunes, and besides that, made alliance euen at that time with Cæsar, whereof Cato himselfe was the onely author. Cæsar returning out of Spaine from his Prætorship, required the honour of triumph, and withall made sute to be Consull. But being a law to the contrary, that they that sued to be Consuls should be present themselues in the city, and such also as desired honour of triumph, should be without the city: he earnestly required the Senate, that he might sue for the Consulship by his friends. The most part of the Senate were willing vnto it, but Cato was flatly against it. He perceiuing that the other Senators were willing to gratifie Cæsar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he spent all the whole day in his Oration, and by this pollicie preuented the Senate, that they could not conclude any thing. Then Cæsar letting fall his triumph, made sute to be Consull, and entring the citie, ioyned friendship with Pompey. Hereupon he was chosen Consull, and immediatly after maried his daughter Iulia vnto Pompey: and so hauing made in manner a conspiracy against the common wealth betweene themselues, Cæsar preferred the law Agraria, for destributing the lands vnto the citizens, and Pompey was present to maintaine the publication thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on the other side taking part with Bibulus the other Consull, did what they could against it, but specially Cato: who fearing much this alliance of Cæsar and Pompey, that it was a pact and conspiracy to ouerthrow the common wealth, sayd, that he cared not so much for this law Agraria, as he feared the reward they looked for, who by such meanes did intise and please the common people. Therewithall, the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and so were many other honest men of the people besides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his part: maruelling much, and also being offended with Cæsars great vnreasonablenesse and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Consulship did preferre such things, as the most seditiousest Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to do, to currie fauour with the people, and by such vile meanes sought to make them at his commaundement. Wherefore, Cæsar and his friends fearing so great enemies, fell to open force. For to begin withall, as the Consull Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of dung powred vpon his head: and furthermore, the officers rods were broken in their hands, which they caried before him. In fine, darts were throwne at them out of euery corner, and many of them being hurt, they all at length were driuen to flye, and leaue the market place. But Cato, he came last of all, keeping his wonted place, and often cast backe his head, and cursed such citizens. So, they did not onely passe this law Agraria by voyces of the people, but furthermore they added to it: that the Senate should be sworne to stablish that law, and be bound to defend the same (if any attempted the alteration thereof) vpon great penalties and fines to be set on his head, that should refuse the oath. All the other Senators sware against their wils, remembring the example of the mischiefe that chaunced vnto the old Metellus, who was banished out of Italie, because he would not sweare to such a like law. Wherupon, the women that were in Catoes house, besought him with the teares in their eyes, that he would yeeld and take the oath: and so did also diuerse of his friends besides. Howbeit, he that most inforced and brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the Orator: who perswaded him, that peraduenture he would be thought vnreasonable, that being but one man, he should seeme to mislike that, which all other had thought meete and reasonable: and that it were a fond part of him wilfully to put himselfe in so great a daunger, thinking to hinder a matter already past remedie. But yet that besides all this, a greater inconuenience would happen, if he forsooke his countrey (for whose sake he did all these things) and left it a prey vnto them, which ſought the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſame, as if he were glad to be rid from the trouble of defending the common wealth. For (ſayd he) though Cato haue no need of ROME, yet ROME hath need of Cato, and ſo haue all his friends: of the which, Cicero ſayd he was the chiefe, and was moſt maliced of Publius Clodius the Tribune, who ſought to driue him out of the countrey. It is ſayd that Cato being wonne by theſe like words and perſwaſions at home, and openly in the market place, they ſo ſoftened him, that he came to take his oath laſt of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friend of his. Cæſars heart being then lift vp, for that he had brought his firſt purpoſe to paſſe: he began now to preferre another law, to deuide all CAMPANIA, and the countrey called TERRA DI LAVORO (the land of labour) vnto the poore needy people of ROME, and no man ſtood againſt him but Cato. Whereupon Cæſar made his officers to take him from the pulpit for Orations, to cary him to priſon. All this made not Cato ſtoupe, nor leaue his francke ſpeech, but as he went he ſtill ſpake againſt this edict, and perſwaded the people to beware of them that preferred ſuch lawes. All the Senate, and the beſt ſort of citizens followed Cato with heauy hearts, ſhewing by their ſilence that they were offended and angrie for the iniurie they did vnto him, being ſo worthie a man. Inſo much as Cæſars ſelfe perceiued that the people were offended with it, and yet of ambition and ſtomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would haue appealed vnto the people. So when he ſaw that Cato meant no ſuch matter, at length ouercome with ſhame and diſhonour, he himſelfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeants. In fine, all Cæſars practiſe tended to this end, that when he had wonne the peoples fauour by ſuch lawes: they ſhould then graunt him the gouernement of all the GAVLES (as well on this ſide, as beyond the mountaines) and all ILLYRIA, with an armie of foure legions, for the ſpace of fiue yeares, notwithſtanding that Cato told the people before, that they themſelues with their owne voyces did ſet vp a tyraunt, that one day would cut their throats. They did alſo chuſe Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble houſe: a thing directly contrary to the law. But this Clodius had promiſed them, ſo that they would helpe him to baniſh Cicero out of ROME, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calphurnius Piſo (Cæſars wiues father) and Gabinius Paulus (a man wholly at Pompeys commandement, as they write which knew his life and maners) Conſuls the next yeare following. Now, notwithſtanding they had the rule of the commonwealth in their owne hands, and that they had won part of the city with bribes, and the other part alſo with feare: yet they were both afraid of Cato, when they conſidered what trouble they had to ouercome him, which they did very hardly notwithſtanding, and to their great ſhame, being driuen to vſe force, and yet thought they ſhould neuer haue done it. Furthermore, Clodius vtterly diſpaired that he could poſſibly baniſh Cicero, ſo long as Cato was there. So deuiſing wayes how to do it, when he had taken poſſeſſion of his office, he ſent for Cato, and began to tell him, that he thought him the honeſteſt and iuſteſt man of ROME, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deed. For, where many made ſute vnto him to be ſent into CYPRVS, to make warre with king Ptolomie: he thought none ſo worthy as himſelfe, and therefore for the good will he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleaſure. Cato ſtraight cried out with open mouth, that this was a deuice to intrap him, not to pleaſure him. Then Clodius proudly and fiercely aunſwered him, Well, ſeeing thou wilt not go with good will, thou ſhalt go then againſt thy will: and ſo he did. For at the firſt aſſembly of the city, he cauſed the people to graunt his commiſſion for his iourney thither: but they neither appointed him ſhips, nor ſouldiers, nor any miniſters to go with him, ſauing two Secretaries onely, of the which, the one of them was a very villaine and arrant theefe, and the other one of Clodius followers. Beſides all this, as if they had appointed him but litle to do in CYPRVS againſt Ptolomie, he made them commaund him after that, to go and reſtore the outlawes and baniſhed men of the city of BYZANTIVM, vnto their countrey and goods againe, of purpoſe onely to keepe Cato farre inough from ROME, whileſt he continued Tribune. Cato being driuen by neceſſity to obey, he counſelled Cicero (whom Clodius purſued) to beware that he made no ſtirre againſt him, for feare of bringing ROME into ciuill warre and murther for his ſake: but rather, to abſent himſelfe, that he might another time preſerue his countrey. After that, he ſent his friend Canidius before into CYPRVS, vnto Ptolomy, to perſwade him to be quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he ſhould neither lacke honour nor riches, for the ROMAINES would graunt him the Prieſthood of Venus in the citie of PAPHOS. Cato in the meane time remained in the Ile of RHODES, preparing preparing himselfe there, and abiding his aunswer. In the time of these stirres Ptolomy king of Ægypt, for a certaine offence and discord with his subiects, departing out of Alexandria, sailed towards Rome, hoping that Cæsar and Pompey with a great army would restore him to his Crowne and kingdome againe. He being desirous to see Cato, sent vnto him, supposing he would come at his sending for. Cato by chaunce was occupied at that time about some businesse, and bad the messenger will Ptolomie to come to him, if he would see him. So when Ptolomie came, he neither went to meete him, nor rose vp vnto him, but onely welcomed him, and bad him sit downe. It amazed the king at the first, to see vnder so simple and meane a traine, such a statelinesse and maiestie in Catoes behauiour. But he heard him boldly talke with him of his affaires, and such graue talke come from him, reprouing his folly he had committed, to forsake such princely pleasure and wealth, to go and subiect himselfe vnto such dishonour, such extreame paines, and such passing great gifts and presents, as he should throw away, to satisfie the couetousnesse of the rulers at Rome, the which was so vnsatiable, that if all the Realme of Ægypt were conuerted into siluer to giue among them, it would scarce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counselled him to returne backe with his nauie, and to reconcile himselfe againe with his subiects, offering himselfe also to go with him, to helpe to make his peace. Then Ptolomie comming to himselfe, and repenting him of his folly, knowing that Cato told him truly, and wisely: he determined to follow his counsell, had not his friends turned his mind to the contrarie. So when Ptolomie came to Rome, and was driuen to waite at the gates of the Magistrates that were in authoritie: he sighed then, and repented his follie, for that he had not onely despised the counsell of a wise man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolomie that was in Cyprvs (a happy turne for Cato) poysoned himselfe. Cato being also informed that he left a wonderfull summe of mony behind him, he determined to go himselfe vnto Byzantivm, and sent his nephew Brutus into Cyprvs, because he durst not trust Canidius so farre. Then hauing restored the banished men vnto the peoples fauour againe, setting agreement betwixt them, he returned into Cyprvs. There he found a maruellous great treasure, and plate both of gold and siluer, tables, precious stones, hangings, and purple silkes, all the which he was to make ready money of. There he tooke great care and paines to raise all things to the vtmost and dearest prices that could be, and he himselfe was present at all, to keepe the reckening of the last peny. Wherefore, to bring this to passe, he would not stand to the common vse of the sale of the crier, but suspected them all, both criers, praisers, and his owne friends, and therefore talked himselfe with the praisers, and made them set high prises vpon euerie thing that was to be sold. And thus were the most part of the goods sold and caried away, at the dearest prices. This did maruellously offend the most of his friends, when they saw that he did mistrust them: but Munatius specially, his dearest friend, tooke it so inwardly, that he thought neuer to be friends with him againe. In so much as in the booke Cæsar wrote against Cato, in this place he forceth most the accusation against him. Munatius notwithstanding writeth, that he was not angry so much with Cato for that he mistrusted him, but for a certaine disdaine he had himselfe of Cato, and for the emulation betwixt him and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a booke of Catoes deedes and sayings, whom Thrasæas in his historie chiefly followed. In this booke he sheweth that he came late into Cyprvs, and was very ill lodged. And furthermore also, that when he would haue come into Catoes house, they kept him out of the gates, for that Cato was busie, doing some thing with Canidius. He modestly complaining of it vnto Cato, had this churlish aunswer: ouermuch loue, sayth Theophrastus, oftentimes causeth hate. So fareth it with thee, who ouer-louing me, doest thinke that I esteeme thee not as thou deseruest, and therefore art angry with me. And for Canidius, I must tell thee truly, I do rather employ him for his skill and faithfulnesse in things, then any man else: for that he hath bene with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was neuer bribed, but cleane handed still. These words Cato told Munatius secretly betweene them two, but afterwards he knew that he had also reported them vnto Canidius. When he saw that, he would no more go and sup with Cato as he was wont, and when he was also called to counsell, he would not come there neither. Wherefore Cato threatned him, that he would seaze vpon all his goods and cariage, as they vse to handle them that are disobedient vnto iustice. This notwithstanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke sea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to ſupper together, vnto a friend of theirs, called Barca. Thereupon Cato alſo arriued, and came thither, when they were all ſet at ſupper, and asked where he ſhould ſit: Barca told him againe, where it pleaſed him. Then caſting his eyes about, he ſayd he would ſit by Munatius: and ſo fetching a compaſſe about the boord, he went and ſate by him, but offered him no friendſhip and familiarity all ſupper time. Afterwards notwithſtanding, at the requeſt of Martia, that was earneſtly in hand with Cato for him: he wrote vnto him, and willed him to come and ſpeake with him. Munatius went to Catoes houſe in the morning, where Martia ſtayed him, and kept him company, vntill all the reſt that came to ſalute Cato, were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made very much of him. We haue the willinglier dilated this matter at length, becauſe mens natures and maners might be diſcerned euen in theſe ſmall matters of friendſhip priuatly, as otherwiſe in the greateſt publicke cauſes. Now touching Catoes commiſſion, he got together litle leſſe then ſeuen thouſand ſiluer talents. Furthermore, fearing the farneſſe of the iourney he had to go by ſea, he made diuerſe little coffers, and put into euery one of them two talents, and fiue hundred Drachmas, and tied vnto each of them a long rope, and a great peece of corke: becauſe that if the ſhip ſhould fortune to miſcarie, thoſe corkes might ſhew where the cheſts with money lay in the bottome of the ſea. Thus was all the mony ſaued, ſauing a litle, and brought ſafely to ROME. Cato hauing made two bookes wherein he had noted all things done in his iourny, he could neither ſaue the one nor the other of them. For one of his bondmen made free, called Philargyrus, tooke the one away: who taking ſhip at the hauen of Cenchrees, was himſelfe drowned, and the booke he had alſo, loſt with him. The other booke which he himſelfe had kept, vntill he came vnto CORFOV: he lying in the market place of the city in his tents, which he cauſed to be ſet vp: the mariners being very cold in the night, made ſo great a fire, that it burnt the tents, ſtuffe, booke and all. Notwithſtanding, he brought certaine of the late king Ptolomies ſlaues with him, who while he liued, had the charge and cuſtodie of all his treaſure and riches, the which he brought as witneſſes to ſtop the mouths of his malicious enemies, that would haue accuſed him in any thing. But yet the loſſe of them did grieue him, not ſo much for the great care and paines he had taken in ſetting downe the account of his charge, for the iuſtification and proofe of his fidelity and good ſeruice: but alſo, for that they might haue ſerued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to haue bene a like carefull in their charge, as himſelfe. But the gods denied him this good hap. Newes being brought that he was come to ROME by water, when they vnderſtood that he was at hand, by and by all the Magiſtrates, the Prieſts, the Senate, and the moſt part of the people alſo went out to meete him by the riuers ſide: ſo that both ſides of the riuer of Tyber were full of people, and the receiuing of him in, ſeemed not inferiour to the entry of a triumph. Notwithſtanding, ſome thought him very preſumptuous, that the Conſuls and Prætors comming out to meet him, he did not ſtay his gally, but rowed ſtill vp the ſtreame (being in a kings gally of ſix oares to euery banke) and neuer ſtayed, vntill all his fleete arriued in the hauen. This notwithſtanding, when the coffers with money were caried through the market place into the treaſure chamber, the people wondred to ſee ſo great a quantity of it. And thereupon the Senate being aſſembled, with great and honourable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorſhip, and priuiledge alſo, at any common ſports to weare a purple gowne. Cato refuſed all theſe honors, and onely beſought the Senate to make Nicias a free man, Steward of the late deceaſed king Ptolomy, being a witneſſe of his faith and great paines he had taken in this ſeruice. Philip the father of Martia, was that yeare Conſull, ſo that after a ſort, the authority of the Conſull was in Cato: becauſe Lentulus, colleague and fellow Conſull with Philip, did no leſſe reuerence Cato for his vertues, then Philip did for his alliance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was reſtored againe from his baniſhment, the which Publius Clodius (being then Tribune of the people) had put vpon him, and being againe growne to great credite: he went one day into the Capitoll, in the abſence of Clodius, by force to take away the tables which Clodius had conſecrated there, in the which were compriſed all his doings during the time he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being aſſembled, Clodius did accuſe Cicero of this violent fact. Cicero aunſwered him againe: that becauſe Clodius was choſen Tribune, directly againſt the law, therefore all his doings were voyde, and of no validitie. Then ſtood vp Cato, and ſayd: he knew that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was ſcantly good and allowable, but yet if generally any man ſhould vndo all that he had paſſed by that authoritie: then all that he himſelfe had done likewiſe in CYPRVS, muſt

muſt of neceſſitie be reuoked. For the commiſſion that was granted vnto him (by vertue whereof he had done many things) ſhould be vnlawfull: becauſe the Tribune alſo that did graunt it him, was not lawfully choſen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune againſt the law, who by conſent of the law was taken out from a noble houſe, and made a popular perſon: howbeit, if he had behaued himſelfe vndutifully in his office, as other men that haply had offended, then he was to be accuſed to make him mend his fault, and not to deſtroy the authority of the officer, which in it ſelfe was lawfull. After that, there fell miſliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counterbuffe he had giuen him: and Cicero continued a long time after, before he did ſhew him any countenance of friendſhip as he had at other times done. But afterwards they were reconciled together againe, by this occaſion. Pompey and Craſſus hauing bene with Cæſar to talke with him (who for that purpoſe came out of GAVLE beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip together, and when they had it, then to proroge Cæſars gouernment for fiue yeares more, & alſo they would haue the beſt prouinces and greateſt for themſelues, with great armies, and money inough to pay them with. This was indeed a plaine conſpiracy to deuide the Empire of ROME betweene them, and vtterly to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth. At that time there were many Noble men, which came to make ſute for the Conſulſhip. But when they ſaw Pompey and Craſſus offer to make ſute for it, all the reſt gaue ouer, but Lucius Domitius that had maried Porcia, Catoes ſiſter: through whoſe perſwaſion he would not relinquiſh his ſute, conſidering that it was not the office onely of the Conſulſhip that was the chiefeſt matter of importance, but the liberty of the Senate & people. Straight there ran a rumor through the moſt part of the people, that they were not to ſuffer Pompeys power to be ioyned with Craſſus, by meanes of this office: for then his authority would be too great and ſtrong, and therefore, that of neceſſity one of theſe two were to be denied. For this cauſe therefore, the good men tooke Domitius part, and did encourage him to go on with his ſute, aſſuring him of aide vnderhand of diuerſe, which durſt not be ſeene openly for feare of thoſe two great men, who at the day of the election would procure him voyces in his fauour. Pompey and Craſſus miſtruſting this, made Domitius be ſet vpon, going with torch-light before day into the field of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and firſt ſtriking the torch-bearer that went before him, they hurt him ſo ſore, that he fell downe dead at his feet. Then they layed at the reſt in like caſe, who finding themſelues cruelly hurt, ranne away euery man of them, and left Domitius and Cato poſt alone. But Cato, notwithſtanding he was hurt in one of his armes, ſtill held Domitius faſt, and prayed him to tary, and not to leaue to defend the liberty of their countrey, againſt tyrants, which plainly ſhewed after what manner they would gouerne, ſith by ſuch wicked meanes they aſpired to tyrannicall gouernement. All this notwithſtanding, Domitius would tary no longer, but betooke him to his legges, and ranne home. Thus were Craſſus and Pompey without deniall proclaimed Conſuls. Cato neuer yeelded therefore, but came and ſued to be Prætor, becauſe that thereby he might yet make it ſome ſtrength and countenance to him againſt their Conſulſhip, that being no priuate perſon, he ſhould haue ſome better authoritie to reſiſt them that were the chiefeſt perſons. But they fearing, that the Prætorſhip by the eſtimation of Cato, would come to equall their authority of the Conſulſhip: firſt aſſembled the Senate (the moſt part of the Senators not hearing of it) and in that aſſembly cauſed the Senate to decree: that all ſuch as were choſen Prætors, ſhould preſently go to their charge, not attending the time and liberty appointed by the law, during which time men might accuſe thoſe which had bought the voyces of the people with money. Then hauing by this colour and decree ſet ill doers at liberty, without feare of puniſhment, they pretending to vſe corruption, did preferre ſome of their owne miniſters to make ſute for the Prætorſhip, themſelues giuing money to corrupt the people, and being preſent alſo at the election. But notwithſtanding all theſe practiſes, the vertue and reputation of Cato ouercame them. For the people had him in ſo great reuerence, that they thought it too ſhamefull a part to ſell Cato by voyces, who deſerued rather to be hired to take the Prætorſhip vpon him. Then the firſt Tribe being called to giue their voices, declared him Prætor. Pompey ſeeing that, ſtraight brake off the aſſembly, making a ſhamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the ROMAINES do maruellouſly deteſt, and will conclude nothing when it thundreth. Howbeit afterwards they gaue more money then they had done before, and thereby draue away the chiefeſt men out of the field of Mars, and by practiſe obtained, that Vatinius was choſen Prætor for Cato.

Why Cato ſued to be Prætor.

Cato put from the Prætorſhip by Pompey.

And the report went, that they that had ſo wickedly giuen their voices, feeling themſelues pricked in conſcience, fled immediatly out of the field: and the honeſt men that remained, were both very ſorie and angrie, for the iniurie they had offered Cato. At that time one of the Tribunes keeping an aſſembly of the citie, Cato ſtood vp, and told (as if he had propheciedd) before them all, what would happen to the common-wealth by theſe practiſers, and ſtirred vp the people againſt Pompey and Cæſar, ſaying: that they were guiltie of thoſe things, and therefore procured them to be done, becauſe they were afraid that if Cato had bene Prætor, he would too narrowly haue ſifted out their deuiſes. In fine, Cato going home to his houſe, had more companie to waite vpon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had bene choſen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the people, had preferred a law for the deuiding of the prouinces vnto the new Conſuls, SPAINE and AFRICKE vnto the one, and ÆGYPT and SYRIA vnto the other, with full power to make warre as they thought good both by ſea and land: all other men hauing no hope to keepe it back, did let it alone, and ſpake nothing to contrarie it. Then Cato getting vp into the pulpit for Orations, before the people began to giue their voices, could hardly haue two houres ſpace to ſpeake: but at length, they perceiuing that he delayed time by foretelling things to come, would ſuffer him to ſpeake no longer, but ſent a Sergeant to him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cried out notwithſtanding, and diuers gaue good eare vnto him: the Sergeant went to him againe, and tooke him, and caried him out of the market place. Howbeit the officer had no ſooner left him, but he went ſtraight towards the pulpit for Orations, and there cried out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to haue an eye to aide the libertie of their common-wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentimes together did this, Trebonius the Tribune being mad withall, commaunded his Sergeant to carie him to priſon. The people followed him hard notwithſtanding, to heare what he ſaid vnto them. Whereupon Trebonius fearing ſome ſtirre, was forced to commaund his Sergeant to let Cato go. So Cato draue off all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithſtanding, the contrarie faction hauing partly put the ROMAINES in feare, and wonne the othe part alſo by faire words and money, and by force of armes likewiſe kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from comming out of the Senate, and after they had alſo violently driuen Cato out of the market place, for ſaying that it thundred, and hauing hurt many men, and alſo ſlaine ſome out of hand in the market place: in the end they forcibly paſſed the decree by voices of the people. Many being offended therewith, went a companie of them together to plucke downe Pompeys images: but Cato would not ſuffer them. And afterwards alſo, when they preferred another law for the prorogation of the prouinces and armies which Cæſar demaunded, Cato would ſpeake no more to the people to hinder it, but proteſted vnto Pompey himſelfe, that he ſaw not how he plucked Cæſar vpon him, and that he ſhould feele the weight of his force before he looked for it: and then when he could neither ſuffer nor remedie it, he would euen caſt his burthen and himſelfe vpon the common-wealth, and too late would remember Catoes warnings, which were priuatly as profitable for Pompey, as openly iuſt and reaſonable for the common-wealth. Cato vſed manie of theſe perſwaſions ſundrie times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made account of them: for he would not be perſwaded that Cæſar would euer change in that ſort, and beſides he truſted too much to his owne power and proſperitie. Furthermore, Cato was choſen Prætor for the next yeare following, in the which it appeared (though he miniſtred iuſtice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maieſtie and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foote bare-legged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, and there giue ſentence of life and death, otherwhiles of men of great account. And ſome report, that he would giue audience when he had dined, and drunke wine: but that is vntrue. Now Cato perceiuing that the citizens of ROME were marred by bribes and gifts of thoſe which aſpired vnto offices, and that the people made it an art and facultie to gaine by: to roote this vice altogether out of the common-wealth, he perſwaded the Senate to make a law, that ſuch as hereafter ſhould be choſen Conſuls or Prætors, ſhould (if there were no man to accuſe them) come and offer themſelues before the Iudges, and taking their oath, ſhould truly declare what meanes they had vſed to attaine to their office. This offended the ſuters for the offices, but much more the mercenarie multitude. Whereupon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, and all cried out vpon him, reuiled him, and threw ſtones at him: inſomuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and himſelfe alſo was driuen

driuen out of the place by the preaſe of the people, and had much ado to get to the pulpit for Orations, where ſtanding on his feete, he preſently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldneſſe and conſtancie of his countenance onely. Then when all was pacified by the preſent perſwaſions he vſed, aptly ſpoken to purpoſe for the inſtant, they giuing attentiue eare, without ſtir or vprore. The Senate giuing him great commendation therefore, he told them roundly and plainely: but I haue no cauſe to praiſe you, to leaue a Prætor in ſuch danger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the ſuters for the offices, they were in a maruellous caſe: for one way, they were afraid to giue money to buy the peoples voices; and on the other ſide, they were afraid alſo if any other did it, that they ſhould go without their ſute. So they were all agreed together, euery man to put downe twelue Myriades and a halfe a peece, and then they ſhould make their ſute iuſtly and vprightly: and whoſoeuer were taken faultie, and that had otherwiſe made his way by corruption, that he ſhould looſe the money he had layed downe. This agreement being concluded betweene them, they choſe Cato (as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the ſame money. This match was made in Catoes houſe, where they all did put in caution or ſureties to anſwer the money: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cato aſſiſting the Tribune that gouerned the election, and carefully marking how they did giue their voices: he ſpied one of the ſuters for the office breake the accord agreed vpon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the reſt. But they greatly commending his iuſtice and integritie, forgaue the forfeiture, thinking it puniſhment enough vnto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Cato. But thereby Cato procured himſelfe the diſpleaſure of the other Senators, for that he ſeemed therein to take vpon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honour and credite doth procure more enuie, then iuſtice doth: becauſe the people do commonly reſpect and reuerence that more then any other. For they do not honour them as they do valiant men, nor haue them in admiration, as they do wiſe men: but they loue and truſt them better. As for the two firſt, the one they are afraid of, and the other they diſtruſt: beſide, they ſuppoſe that valiancie and wiſedome commeth rather by the benefite of nature, then of our intent and choiſe, eſteeming wiſedome as a readineſſe of conceit; and fortitude, a preſence and courage of the mind. For euery man may be iuſt that will, and therefore iniuſtice is of all other vices moſt ſhamefull: for it is a wilfull and malicious default, and therefore cannot be excuſed. Lo, this was the cauſe why all the noblemen in manner were againſt Cato, as though he onely had ouercome them. Pompey, he thought that the eſtimation of Cato was altogether the diſcountenance of his power and greatneſſe, and therefore did dayly raiſe vp many railers againſt him. Of them Publius Clodius that ſeditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in friendſhip with Pompey, he accuſed Cato and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common-wealth of a wonderfull treaſure, by his commiſſion in Cyprvs: and that he was enemie vnto Pompey, becauſe he did refuſe to marrie his daughter. Cato thereto made anſwer, that he had brought more gold and ſiluer out of Cyprvs, into the treaſure of Rome, without the allowance of either horſe or ſouldier, then Pompey had done with all his triumphs and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreouer, that he did neuer ſeeke alliance with Pompey, not that he thought him vnworthy of it, but becauſe he ſaw he dealt not as vprightly in the common-wealth as he himſelfe did. I, ſaid he, haue refuſed a prouince offered me when I came out of my Prætorſhip: but Pompey hath taken ſome by force, and giuen away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent Cæſar not long ſince, an armie of ſixe thouſand men to ſerue him in the warres in Gavle: the which he neuer required of vs, nor Pompey graunted them him by our conſent. But we ſee, that ſo many armies, armours and weapon, ſo many men and horſes by common pleaſures of our priuate citizens, giuen and lent at our charge: and Pompey himſelfe reſeruing onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenant generall, aſſigneth ouer his armies and prouinces to the gouernement of others, whileſt he himſelfe beſiegeth here the walles of the citie, with ſeditious and tumultuous election of officers, craftily vndermining thereby the ſtate of the common-wealth, to bring all to confuſion, that he himſelfe might be abſolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of Pompey. Among Catoes friends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, ſuch a one as Apollodorus Phalerian was ſaid to be in old time, vnto Socrates, who did counterfaite to be another himſelfe, in doing all things as he did. This man would be farre out of reaſon, and paſſionate in his talke, ſtorming like a drunkard. He one yeare made ſute to be Ædilis, but he was reiected. Howbeit Cato that furthered his ſute, marked, that the tables wherein the voyces were written, were all one hand. So he finding out the falſhood, appealed thereupon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voide for that time. After that Faonius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him foorth in all the other charges of his office, and ſpecially in ſetting foorth playes in the Theater, which are cuſtomably done at the comming in of euery ſuch new officer, to giue the people paſtime: and gaue vnto the common players and dauncers in thoſe playes, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crowns of wild oliue twigges, as they commonly vſe in GREECE at the Olympian games. And where others gaue vnto the poore rich gifts, he gaue the GRECIANS leekes, lettiſes, radiſhes, and peares: and vnto the ROMAINES, they had earthen pots full of wine, porke, figges, cucumbers, and fagots of wood of ſmall value. Inſomuch as ſome thought ſcorne of them they were ſo meane, others were very glad of them, ſeeing that Cato which was ſeuere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by litle and litle they turned this auſteritie of his into pleaſure. In fine, Faonius himſelfe ſitting downe amongſt the people, which looked vpon the players, clapped his hands for ioy at Cato: and cried out to him, that he ſhould giue them good rewards that played well, alluring them alſo about him to do the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of thoſe ſports. At the ſelfe ſame time, Curio, Faonius colleague and companion in the office of Ædilis, had likewiſe goodly playes in another Theater: but all the people forſooke his, and went to ſee Faonius playes, who ſate among them like a priuate man, and Cato as the maiſter of the playes. Cato did this in ſcorne and mockerie of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to beſtow in ſuch triſles, ſhewing thereby, that whoſoeuer will make any playes, he ſhould make the charge but a ſport alſo, furniſhing it only with a conuenient grace, but with no vaine expence or charge about ſuch a triſle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypſeus, and Milo, ſued all three together to be Conſuls, not onely by briberie of money (a common fault then in ſuing for any of the offices in the commonwealth) but by plaine force of armes, ſlaying and killing as in a ciuill warre, they were ſo deſperate and inſolent: ſome preferred a lawe, that they ſhould make Pompey Præſident in theſe elections, becauſe men ſhould moue their ſute after a lawfull ſort. But Cato ſtraight was againſt it, ſaying, that the law could haue no ſafetie by Pompey, but Pompey might haue ſafetie by the law. Notwithſtanding, when he ſaw this trouble continue of a long time, without any Conſuls in ROME, and that daily there were three campes in the market place, that it was almoſt impoſſible to preuent the miſchiefe at hand, and to ſtay that it ſhould go no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne goodwils, rather then by compulſion, ſhould put the gouernment of the ſtate into Pompeys hands alone, chuſing the leſſer euill, to withſtand the greater, and ſo to yeeld to the abſolute gouernment without conſtraint, which the ſedition would bring it vnto. Therfore Bibulus, Catoes friend and kinſman, made a motion to the Senat, that they would chuſe Pompey ſole Conſull. For, ſaid he, either the commonwealth ſhall be well gouerned by him, or elſe ROME ſhall ſerue an ill Lord. Cato then riſing vp, beyond all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and ſaid: that the citie were better to haue one ſoueraigne Magiſtrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could giue preſent order for the pacifying of this confuſion, and that he would be carefull to preſerue the citie, when he ſaw that they truſted him with the gouernement thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes choſen ſole Conſull. Then he ſent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the ſuburbes of the citie. Cato went thither, and was receiued with as great honour and courteſie of Pompey as could be deuiſed: & in the end, after he had giuen him great thanks for the honors he had done him, he prayed him to affoord him his aduice and counſell in his gouernment. Cato anſwered him thus, That he had not ſpoken any thing before that time in reſpect of any ill will he bare him, neither that he deliuered this laſt opinion of his in reſpect of his friendſhip, but wholly for the commonwealths ſake: howbeit otherwiſe, that for his owne priuate affaires, if he thought good to vſe his aduice, whenſoeuer it pleaſed him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the beſt he could. But for common cauſes, that he would alwaies tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him: and in fine, he performed all he ſaid. For, firſt of all, when Pompey did ſet grieuous penalties and new fines vpon their heads, which had bought the peoples voyces for money: Cato counſelled him to prouide for things to come, and to let that alone which was already paſt. For, ſaid he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man ſhould ſeeke to reforme the faults that are paſt: and furthermore, if the puniſhments appointed were newer then the offences committed, then they ſhould do wrong vnto them that were already accuſed, to puniſh them by a new law law which they had not offended. Afterwards alſo, certaine men of good calling (Pompeys friends) being accuſed, Cato perceiuing that Pompey grew remiſſe, and yeelded in many things: he ſharpely reproued and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praiſes which were wont to be ſpoken of the offenders that were accuſed: he himſelfe notwithſtanding hauing written an Oration in the praiſe of Munatius Plancus, ſent it vnto the Iudges, whileſt his cauſe was a hearing. Cato being one of the Iudges at that time, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, and would not haue it read. Wherefore Plancus refuſed him for one of his Iudges, after his cauſe was pleaded vnto: howbeit he was condemned notwithſtanding. To conclude, Cato was ſuch a griefe and trouble vnto them that were accuſed, that they could not tell wel how to deale with him. For, once they durſt not let him be any of their Iudges, neither could they well alſo refuſe him. For there were many that were condemned, which refuſing Cato, ſeemed vnto others that they were guiltie: and many alſo were ſhamefully reproued: becauſe they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Things proceeding in this ſort at ROME, Cæſar remained in GAVLE with his armie, where he made warres: neuertheleſſe he wanne him friends ſtill in ROME, by gifts and money, and made himſelfe very ſtrong. Now appeared Catoes predictions and forewarnings true vnto Pompey, and beganne to quicken his ſpirits which had ſlept ſo long, and made him then to conſider of the daunger, the which before he could not be perſwaded to beleeue. But perceiuing his ſlackneſſe and feare withall, doubting how to proceede: to preuent Cæſars practiſes, Cato determined to ſue to be Conſull, with intent either to make him leaue his armie, or elſe to find out the practiſe he intended. Catoes competitors, they were both of them very honeſt men alſo, of the which Sulpitius had receiued great honour and preferment by Catoes credite and authoritie: in reſpect whereof many thought that it was ſcant honeſtly done of Sulpitius, to ſhew himſelfe ſo vnthankfull, as to ſtand againſt Cato in this ſute. Howbeit, Cato neuer complained of the matter, but ſaid, that it was no maruell he would giue place to no man in that, ſith it was the greateſt good happe that euer came vnto him. This notwithſtanding he perſwaded the Senate to make a law, that from thencefoorth, ſuch as ſued for any office, they ſhould themſelues be ſuters to the people, and not preferre their ſute by others. This cauſed the people to be more offended with him then before, becauſe thereby he did not only take away their fingering of money, which they got by their voices in elections: but tooke from them the meanes they had alſo to pleaſure many, bringing them now into pouerty and contempt. He therefore hauing no face to flatter the people and to currie fauor with them, but rather ſticking to his graue maner and modeſt life, then to ſeeke the dignity of a Conſull by ſuch meanes: made ſute himſelfe in perſon, and would not ſuffer his friends to take the ordinarie courſe which might win the peoples harts, wherupon he was put frō his Conſulſhip. This deniall was wont not only to haue made the parties refuſed, very ſorowfull, but their friends and kinſemen alſo greatly aſhamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckening of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his friends in the field of Mars, and after he had dined, walked againe in the market place, as his maner was, without ſhooes on his feet, and coat. Cicero blamed him much for that, becauſe the cōmonwealth requiring then ſuch a Cōſull as he, he had not carefully endeuoured himſelfe by curteſie and gentle meanes to win the fauor of the people, neither would euer after make ſute for it, although at another time he ſued to be Prætor. Thereunto Cato anſwered, that for the Prætorſhip he was not denyed it by the good-will of the people, but rather for that they were bribed with money. And for the election of the Conſuls, where there was no deceipt vſed, he knew plainely he went without it, for his maners which the people miſliked: the which he thought were no wiſe mans part to chaunge for any mans pleaſure, nor yet by making the like ſute againe to hazard the refuſall. Furthermore, Cæſar making warre with very ſtoute nations, and hauing with no ſmall daunger and trauell ſubdued them: and hauing alſo ſet vpon the GERMAINES, with whom the ROMAINES were at peace, and alſo ſlaine three hundred thouſand perſons: his friends made ſute that the people ſhould do ſolemne ſacrifice to giue thanks vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they ſhould deliuer Cæſar into their hands, whom he had iniured, to receiue ſuch puniſhment as they thought good: to the end the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be caſt vpon him, that the citie might be no partaker of it, ſith they could not do withall. Neuertheleſſe, ſaid he, we are to do ſacrifices vnto the gods, to giue them thankes, for that they turned not the reuenge of the furie and raſhneſſe of the Captaine, vpon our poore ſouldiers which were in no fault, but

haue pardoned the commonwealth. Cæsar being aduertised thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Senate, containing many accusations against Cato. The letter being read, Cato rose, not as a man put in a chafe with choler, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would say) declared that the accusations which Cæsar heaped against him in his letters, were but pretie mockes and sleights which he had gathered together to make the people merie withall. But on the other side, when he began to vnrip his whole intents and practises from the beginning, not as if he had bene his enemie, but rather a confederate with him in his conspiracie, declaring that they were not the GERMAINS, nor the GAVLES, which they were to be afraid of, but of himselfe, if they were wise: he thereupon so offended the Senat, and made such stirre among them, that Cæsars friends repented them they had caused his letters to be read in the Senate, giuing Cato thereby occasion iustly to complaine of Cæsar, and to alleage much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate against Cæsar, but this was said onely, that it were good reason to let him haue a successor. Then Cæsars friends made sute that Pompey should put away his army, and resigne vp the prouinces he kept, or else that they should compell Cæsar no more then him to do it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and said, the thing was now come to passe, which he had euer told them of, and that Cæsar came to oppresse the commonwealth, openly turning the armie against it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the same. All this preuailed not, neither could he thereby win any thing of the Senate, because the people fauoured Cæsar, and would alwaies haue him great: for the Senate did beleeue all that he said, but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Cæsar had wonne the citie of ARIMINVM, and was comming on with his armie towards ROME: then euery man looked vpon Cato, and the people and Pompey confessed, that he only from the beginning had found out the marke Cæsar shot at, and had hit the white of his slie deuise. Then said Cato vnto them, If you would haue beleeued me, my Lords, and followed my counsell: you should not now haue bene afraid of one man alone, neither should you also haue put your only hope in one man. Pompey answered thereunto, that Cato indeede had guessed more truly, howbeit that he also had dealt more friendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counsell that the Senate should referre all vnto Pompeys order: for, said he, they that can do great mischiefe, know also how to helpe it. Pompey perceiuing that he had no armie conuenient about him to tarie Cæsars coming, and that the men also which he had, were but faint hearted: he forsooke the citie. Cato being determined to go with him, sent his younger sonne before vnto Munatius, which lay in the countrie of the BRVTIANS, and tooke his eldest sonne with him. Now, because he was to prouide a stay and gouernor of his house and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widow and very rich, for that Hortensius dying, made her his heire of all that he had. Therein Cæsar vpbraideth Cato much, reprouing his couetousnesse to marie for goods. For, said he, if he had need of a wife, why then did he before graunt her vnto another? If he had no need of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Vnlesse she were before a baite vnto Hortensius, to keepe her whilest she was young, that he might haue her againe when she was rich. But against that me thinkes it is sufficient to recite these verses of Eurypides:

Vnlikelihoods first I will disproue. For why? what man can say,
That euer feare made Hercules to turne his face away?

For I take it to be all one, to reproue Hercules cowardlinesse, and Catoes couetousnesse. But if his mariage be to be reproued, peraduenture it is in another sort. For so soone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his house and his daughters to her gouernment, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men report that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented and bewailed in his heart, the miserie and calamitie of his countrie, whether they had victorie, or were ouercome. So hauing the prouince of SICILE allotted to him, he went vnto SYRACVSA. There vnderstanding that Asinius Pollio was arriued at MESSINA, with men of warre from his enemies: Cato sent vnto him, to know wherefore he came thither. Pollio againe asked of him, who was the causer of all this warre. Againe, when Cato was aduertised that Pompey had forsaken ITALIE, and that he lay in camp beyond the sea by the citie of DYRACHIVM, then he said, he saw a maruellous great change and incertaintie in the prouidence of the gods: that when Pompey did all things beyond reason, and out of course, he was inuincible, and now that he sought to preserue his country, he saw he lacked his former good happe. Now he knew he was strong enough at that time to driue Asinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would: but

but becauſe there came a greater aide vnto him, he would not plague that Iland, with the miſery of warre. Then after he had aduiſed the SYRACVSANS to take the ſtronger part, and to looke to their ſafetie: he tooke the ſea and went towards Pompey. When he was come vnto him, he did alwaies counſell him to prolong the warre, hoping ſtill of ſome treatie of peace: and would in no caſe they ſhould come to fight any battell, where the weaker part ſhould of neceſſitie be put to the ſword by the ſtronger. Therefore he perſwaded Pompey and the counſellers about him, to eſtabliſh certaine lawes to this effect. That they ſhould ſacke no citie in this warre, the which belonged vnto the Empire of ROME: and alſo, that they ſhould kill no citizen of ROME, but in furie of battell, when their ſwords were in their hands. Thereby he wanne himſelfe great honour, and brought many men to take Pompeys part, by the lenitie and clemencie he vſed vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being ſent into ASIA, to aide them that had commiſſion to preſſe ſhippes and men of warre, he tooke his ſiſter Seruilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her: for all the time of her widowhood, ſhe had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name ſhe had before, ſith they ſaw ſhe had ſo willingly giuen her ſelfe to follow him in his flying, and contented her ſelfe with his ſtraight manner of life. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar did not let to ſhame her to Cato. Pompeys Captaines had no need of Cato any where but at RHODES. For he wanne the people there with his courteous vſage and perſwaſion, leauing with them Seruilia and her litle ſonne, and went from thence to Pompeys campe, who had leauied a great armie both by ſea and land. There did Pompey moſt of all diſcouer his mind and intent. For firſt he meant to haue giuen Cato the charge of the army by ſea, which were aboue 500. ſhips of war, beſides an infinite number of foiſts and pinnaſes, and ſuch ſmall bottomes vncouered: but ſodainly conſidering better of it (or poſſibly being informed by ſome of his friends, that all Catoes regard and counſel in matters of gouernment was, to deliuer ROME from tyranny, and that if he had ſo great a charge vnder him, Cæſar being once ouercome, he would alſo force Pompey to leaue his armie, and ſo make him ſubiect to the law) he chaunged his mind, notwithſtanding he had already moued it to Cato, and leauing him, gaue Bibulus the charge of al his army by ſea. But Cato therfore ſhewed no leſſe goodwill vnto Pompey, then before. For it is reported, that in a certain skirmiſh & conflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, Pompey encouraging his ſoldiers, & commaunding euery captaine alſo to do the like in his quarter: the ſoldiers gaue but faint eare vnto thē, and made no maner of ſhew of men whoſe hearts had bene any whit the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came & told them (as the time ſerued) the reaſon of Philoſophie, touching liberty, manhood, death, and honor, and that with a vehement affection: & laſt of all, ending his oration, with calling vpon the gods, turning his ſpeech vnto them, as if they had bene preſent to haue ſeene how valiantly the ſouldiers fought for the liberty of their country: they gaue ſuch a luſty cry, & had ſuch a braue conceit and vehement deſire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope, & ſo led them to battell, where they gaue ſuch a cruell charge and fierce onſet vpon their enemies, that they ouerthrew them, and put them that day to flight. Howbeit Cæſars good fortune tooke the finall end of this victorie from Pompey, by his ouer great feare and miſtruſt: who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victorie, as we haue written more amply in his life. But when all the reſt reioyced that they had done ſo noble an exploit, and made their vaunts of the great aduantage they had of their enemies: Cato to the contrarie bewailed the calamitie of his country, & lamented that curſed ambition which cauſed ſo many good and valiant citizens of one ſelfe citie, ſo to kill and murther one another. After this ouerthrow, Cæſar taking his way into THESSALIE, Pompey raiſed his campe to follow him, and leauing a great power at DYRRACHIVM, of men, armour, munition, and friends: he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fifteene enſignes of footemen beſides. The which he did for the feare and miſtruſt he had of him, being aſſured, that if by ill fortune he ſhould loſe the battell, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a truſtier man then he: but on the other ſide if he wan the victory, he doubted ſore that he could not command as he wold, where Cato was. There were alſo many other noblemen, as a man would ſay, caſt away, and left at DYRRACHIVM with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battel at PHARSALIA being blown abroad, Cato reſolued with himſelfe if Pompey were dead, that he would paſſe ouer all his men into ITALY, and then like a baniſhed man would himſelfe alone wander as farre as he could from the tyrannie: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his armie together for him, as long as he could. With this determination, he paſſed ouer the ſea into the Ile of CORFV, where Pompeys armie by ſea lay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would haue ſurrendred vp his charge vnto him, as to a man of a greater dignitie, for that he had bene Conſull, and Cato onely but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wiſe receiue it, but returned immediatly into ITALIE. Cato then perceiuing that Pompey the younger (ſon vnto Pompey the Great) of a raſh and haughtie mind, would haue puniſhed all them that went into ITALIE, and left the armie by ſea, and that ſpecially he was bent firſt of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproued him priuately for it, ſo that he certainely ſaued Ciceroes life, and many other mo beſides. Now Cato ſuppoſing that Pompey the Great had ſaued himſelf in ÆGYPT or in AFRICKE, he determined to take the ſeas, to meet him with all his men: but before he tooke ſhippe, he gaue all men leaue to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arriued in AFRICKE, ſailing vp and downe the coaſt there, he met with Sextus, the youngeſt ſonne of Pompey, who firſt told him, that his father was ſlaine in ÆGYPT: when the ſouldiers heard it, they tooke it very heauily, and not one of them after the death of Pompey the Great, would ſerue vnder any other Captaine then Cato. He thereupon being aſhamed, and thinking it pitie alſo to leaue ſo many noble and good men that had ſerued ſo faithfully vnder him, without a Captaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whither to go: at their requeſt he was contented to take charge of them, and went firſt vnto the citie of CYRENES, where not many daies before, the citizens had ſhut the gates againſt Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Iuba, who had receiued him, and that Actius Varus, vnto whom Pompey had giuen the charge of the prouince of AFRICKE, was in their company with an army, and determined to go ioyne with them. So he went by land in the winter time, and had gotten a maruellous number of aſſes together, to cary water and victuals, which followed him with a great number of carts beſides, and of thoſe men, which the AFRICANS call PSILLES, to wit, they that do heale the ſtinging of ſerpents, and do ſucke out the poiſon with their mouths, and do furthermore charme and enchaunt the ſnakes, that they haue no power to do any hurt. He was ſeuen dayes together marching continually, and went a foote as a guide vnto his men, without helpe of horſe or beaſt. From that day foorth, on the which he vnderſtood of the battell loſt at PHARSALIA, he neuer ſupped, but ſitting,* and added that vnto the reſt of his ſorrow, that he neuer laid him downe, but when he went to bed for all night. Cato hauing paſſed the winter in LYBIA, he brought his ſouldiers into the field, which were about ten thouſand perſons. The affaires on their ſide had but hard ſucceſſe, for the contention and variance betwixt Scipio and Varus, for the which, they both flattered king Iuba to win his fauour: being a maruellous proud man for his greatneſſe and riches: as he ſhewed the firſt time he ſpake with Cato. For when Cato came, he cauſed his owne chaire to be ſet betwixt Scipio and Cato, to haue the honor to be in the midſt. But Cato perceiuing it, tooke vp his owne chaire, and ſet it on the other ſide by Scipio to put him in the middeſt, notwithſtanding that he was his enemy, and had written a ſhamefull booke againſt him. Many make no account of this fact of Cato, but reproue him, becauſe that walking one day with Philoſtratus in SICILE, he gaue him the vpper hand, honouring him for his Philoſophie. Thus Cato did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vſed Scipio and Varus as his noblemen and ſubiects: howbeit Cato did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the company prayed him to take charge of the whole armie, and that Scipio himſelfe, and Varus both, did firſt giue him place, and willingly reſigned vnto him the honour to command the whole campe: he anſwered them, he would not offend the law, ſith he made warre only to preſerue the authoritie and priuiledge thereof, neither would take vpon him to commaund all, himſelfe being but Viceprætor, where there was a Viceconſull preſent. For Scipio was created Proconſull, and furthermore, the people had a certaine confidence that their affaires would proſper the better if they had but the name of a Scipio to leade them in AFRICKE. Now when Scipio was Generall ouer them, he would ſtraight, for Iubaes ſake, haue put all the inhabitants of the citie of VTICA (without reſpect of age) vnto the ſword, and haue razed the houſes to the ground, as thoſe that had taken Cæſars part. Howbeit Cato would not ſuffer him, but proteſting vnto them that were preſent, and calling the gods to witneſſe in open councell, with great difficultie he ſaued the poore people of VTICA from that cruel tragedie and ſlaughter. Afterwards, partly at the requeſt of the people, and partly alſo at Scipioes inſtance, Cato tooke vpon him to keepe the citie, fearing leſt by treaſon, or againſt their wils it ſhould come into Cæſars hands: becauſe it was a ſtrong place of ſituation, and well repleniſhed with all things neceſſarie for him that ſhould keepe it. Cato did both furniſh it, and alſo fortifie it.

The modeſtie and noble mind of Cato.

Cato ioyneth with Scipio in Africke.

For

For he brought in great ſtore of corne, he repaired the rampers of the wals, made great high towers, and caſt deepe trenches round about the city, paling them in: and betwixt the trenches and the towne, he lodged all the young men of VTICA, and compelled them to deliuer vp their armour and weapon, and kept all the reſt within the city it ſelfe, carefully prouiding, that neuer a man of them ſhould be hurt by the ROMAINES, and beſides, did alſo ſend corne, armor, munition and money vnto the campe: ſo that the city of VTICA was the ſtaple and ſtorehouſe of the wars. Moreouer, as he had before counſelled Pompey not to come to battell, the like counſell he now gaue alſo vnto Scipio: not to hazard battell againſt a man of great skill & experience in wars, but to take time, wherby, by litle and litle, he ſhould conſume the power & ſtrength of Cæſars tyranny. But Scipio was ſo ſtout, that he regarded not Catoes counſell, but wrote otherwhile vnto him, twitting him with his cowardlineſſe in this maner: That it was enough for him to be ſafe in a good city compaſſed about with wals, though otherwiſe he ſought not to hinder men to be valiant, to execute any enterpriſe as occaſion was offered. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to go into ITALIE with his footmen and horſmen which he had brought into AFRICK to draw Cæſar from thẽ, & to turne him againſt him. Scipio made but a ſport at it. Then Cato ſhewed plainely, that he did repent him he had giuen him the preferment to be Generall of the army, becauſe he ſaw he wold but fondly proſecute this war: and alſo, that if he chanced to ouercome, he could not moderatly vſe the victory againſt his countrimen. Then he began to miſtruſt the good ſucceſſe of this war, (and ſo he told his friends) for the generals haſtineſſe and vnskilfulneſſe: and yet if beyond expectation it fell out well, and that Cæſar were ouerthrown, he would neuer dwell at ROME any more, but would fly the crueltie and bitterneſſe of Scipio, who euen at that preſent time did proudly threaten many. But in the end, that fell out ſooner then looked for. For a poſt came to him late that night, who but three daies before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was loſt, in a great battell, by the city of THAPSES, which Cæſar had won: that he had taken both campes, that Scipio and king Iuba were fled with a few men, and that all the reſt of their army was ſlaine. Theſe newes did put the citizens in ſuch a feare and maze, (and ſpecially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could ſcant keepe themſelues within the walles of their city. But Cato meeting with them, ſtayed them that ran vp and downe crying in the ſtreetes, and did comfort them the beſt he could. Yet he tooke not all their feare from them, though he brought them again vnto themſelues from the extaſie they were in, declaring vnto them, that the loſſe was nothing ſo great as it was made, and that it was a common matter to enlarge ſuch newes with words enough. By theſe perſwaſions, he ſomewhat pacified the tumult and vprore, and the next morning by breake of day, he made proclamation, that the three hundred men which he had choſen for his counſellers, ſhould come and aſſemble in the temple of Iupiter, they all being citizens of ROME, which for trafficke of merchandize lay in AFRICKE, and all the ROMAINE Senators and their children alſo. Now whilſt they gathered themſelues together, Cato himſelfe went very grauely with a ſet modeſt countenance, as if no ſuch matter had happened, hauing a litle booke in his hand, which he read as he went. This booke contained the ſtore and preparation of munition he had made for this warre, as corne, armour, weapons, bowes, ſlings, and footmen. When they were all aſſembled, he began greatly to commend the good loue and faithfulneſſe of theſe three hundred ROMAINES, which had profitably ſerued their country with their perſons, mony, and counſell, and did counſell them not to depart one from another, as men hauing no hope, or otherwiſe ſeeking to ſaue themſelues ſcatteringly. For remaining together, Cæſar would leſſe deſpiſe them, if they would make war againſt him: and would alſo ſooner pardon them, if they craued mercie of him. Therefore he counſelled them to determine what they would do, and for his owne part, he ſaid he would not miſlike whatſoeuer they determined of: for if their minds followed their fortune, he wold think this change to proceede of the neceſſitie of time. But if they were reſolued to withſtand their misfortune, and to hazard themſelues to defend their libertie: he then would not onely commend them, but hauing their noble courage in admiration, would himſelfe be their chiefetaine and companion, euen to proue the fortune of their country to the vttermoſt. The which was not VTICA, nor ADRVMETVM, but the city ſelfe of ROME: the which oftentimes through her greatneſſe, had raiſed her ſelfe from greater daungers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many waies to ſaue themſelues, and the greateſt meane of all was this: that they ſhould make warre with a man, who by reaſon of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For SPAINE of the one ſide was vp Catoes oration to the Romains at Vtica.

" againſt him, and tooke part with the younger Pompey: and the city of Rome alſo not being vſed
" to be bridled with the ſnaffle of ſuch inſolencie, could not abide it, but would rather riſe with a" ny other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refuſe any danger, but to take example of " their enemy: who to worke his miſchieuous intent, ſpareth not his perſon in any daunger. And
" contrarily alſo, that vnto them, the incertaintie of the war, if victory followed, would make them
" happy, as alſo in being ouerthrowne, their death would turne to immortall glory. Notwithſtan-
" ding, they were to thinke of the matter among themſelues, and to make their prayers to the gods,
" that in recompence of their vertue and good ſeruice which they had ſhewed thitherunto, they " would grant them grace to determine for the beſt. After Cato had ended his oration, there were diuers of thē that were ſtirred vp by his liuely perſwaſions, but the moſt part of them were enco-raged by his conſtancy and noble mind, and alſo by his kindnes: ſo that they preſently forgat the danger they were in, and prayed him to cōmand their perſons, goods, & weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible Captaine, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to dy obeying his counſell, then to ſaue thēſelues, forſaking ſo valiant and worthy a man.

The equitie of Cato.

Then, when one of the aſſembly made a motion that they ſhould make their bondmen free, and that diuers alſo did confirme it, Cato ſaid he would by no meanes ſuffer it, becauſe it was neither meet nor lawfull: howbeit if their maiſters would manumiſſe thē, that he was contented to receiue thē for ſoldiers, that could weare any weapon. Diuers promiſed him to do it: and Cato cōmanded their names ſhould be enrolled that wold, and ſo went his way. Immediatly after, letters were brought him from king Iuba and Scipio: of the which, king Iuba was hidden in a mountaine with few men with him, who ſent vnto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he meant to forſake Vtica, he would tary him there: & if otherwiſe he determined to keepe Vti-ca, then that he would come & helpe him with an army. Scipio on the other ſide riding at anker, at a point of the land not far frō Vtica, ſtaid for the like anſwer. Thē Cato thought it beſt to ſtay the meſſengers which had brought him their letters, till he ſaw what was the determination of the 300. For all they that were Senatours of Rome, were very glad men, and did preſently make their bondmen free, and gaue thē weapons. But the other three hundred which were merchant-venturers, & that liued by vſury and exchange, who had the moſt part of their goods in ſlaues & bondmen, did not long follow Catoes counſell: but like men, whoſe bodies ſoone receiue heate, and are ſoone cold againe, when they are once gone from the fire: euen ſo thoſe merchants, while Cato was preſent among them, had ſome good prety will & deſire: but when by themſelues they had caſt their account, the feare they had of Cæſar, made thē forget the reuerence they bare vnto Cato, and vnto their duty. For, ſaid they, what are we, & what is he whom we diſdaine to obey?
Is it not Cæſar himſelf, who at this day is Lord & Emperor of Rome? Neuer a one of vs is Scipio, Pompey, nor Cato: and yet now, when all men for feare (and in manner compelled) do yeeld and ſubmit themſelues, we will needes take vpon vs within the wals of Vtica to fight for the liberty of Rome, againſt him, for whom, Cato flying with Pompey, forſooke Italy: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cæſar, hauing no better liberty our ſelues, then it pleaſeth him to giue vs. Let vs therefore now know our ſelues whileſt we haue time, and craue mercy at his hands that is the ſtronger, and ſend vnto him to pray him to pardon vs. The greateſt and wiſeſt men of thoſe three hundred merchants, had this ſpeech. But the moſt part of them ſought means how to entrap the Senatours, hoping the better of mercie at Cæſars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto him. Cato did looke for this chaunge in them, but yet vttered not that he thought, and returned the meſſengers backe againe vnto king Iuba, and Scipio, and wrote vnto them: that they ſhould beware they came not neare Vtica, becauſe he did miſtruſt theſe three hundred merchants. Now there were a great number of horſemen which had eſcaped from the battell, who comming towards Vtica, ſent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one ſelfe determination from all the company. For ſome of them meant to go vnto king Iuba, others alſo to ioyne with Cato, and part of them were affraid to come into Vtica. Theſe things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commaunded Marcus Rubrius to take care of theſe three hundred men, and to receiue the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumiſſed, without compelling of any man. In the meane time, Cato with all the Senatours went out of Vtica, to meet with theſe horſemen, and there he ſpake to the Captaines, & prayed them that they would not forſake ſo many noblemen & Senators of Rome as were there: & that they would not haue king Iuba for their captain before Cato, but to come into Vtica: where they might ſaue thēſelues

the city was of ſuch ſtrength, and beſides, ſo well armed and victualled for many yeares. The like requeſt did the Senatours alſo make vnto them, with the teares running downe their cheekes. Thereupon the Captaines went and ſpake with their ſouldiers. Cato in the meane time ſate him downe on a litle hill, with the Senators, tarying for anſwer. But then on the ſodaine came Rubrius vnto him in great haſt, complaining of the tumult of theſe three hundred merchants, which went about to make the city to rebell: wherupon the reſt (their harts failing them) fell to bewaile their miſerable fortune. But Cato ſought to comfort them, and then ſent vnto the three hundred merchants, to pray them to haue a litle patience. So the Captains returned againe with vnreaſonable demaunds of the horſemen. For they ſaid, that they cared not for king Iubaes pay, neither were they afraid of Cæſars malice, ſo that they had Cato for their generall: yet to be pend vp within the wals of a city with AFRICANS, that were PHOENICIANS, and a traiterous nation as could be, that grieued them moſt of all. For, ſaid they, though now they ſtirre not, and be quiet: yet when Cæſar comes, they will be the firſt that will betray vs, and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato would haue them to ioyne with him in this war, that he ſhould either kill or driue away all the VTICANS out of the city, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleare of all thoſe barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruell and barbarous condition, neuertheleſſe he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and ſo returning againe into VTICA, he ſpake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerence vnto Cato, diſſembling no longer, ſaid openly, that they would not like of him whatſoeuer he were, that ſhould compell them to make war with Cæſar, both becauſe they would not, nor could not do it. Further, there were ſome of them that mumbled to themſelues, that the Senators ſhold be kept there, till Cæſar came. Cato ouerheard them, for indeed his hearing was not very quicke. At that very inſtant one came to him, and told him, that the horſemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing leſt theſe three hundred merchants would lay hands vpon the Senators: he went vnto them himſelfe with his friends, and perceiuing they were gone a great way off, he tooke his horſe and rode after thē. They reioycing to ſee him come, receiued him among them, and prayed him to ſaue himſelfe with them. But Cato prayed them againe to ſaue the Senatours, and that with ſuch affection, as it forced teares in him: beſides, he held vp his hands vnto them, tooke their horſes by the bridles, and themſelues by their weapons, that at the length he obtained of them, that they would remain there one day at the leaſt, to helpe the Senators to ſaue themſelues. So Cato returning with them into the city, he appointed ſome of them to ward at the gates, and put others alſo in garriſon into the caſtell: ſo that the three hundred merchants quaked for feare, leſt he would haue bene reuenged of them, becauſe of their returne with him. Thereupon they ſent vnto Cato, humbly to pray him to come vnto them in any caſe. But the Senators flocking about him, would not ſuffer him to go, and ſaid, that they would not caſt away their ſauior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doubtleſſe, all that were within VTICA, plainly ſaw the vertue and ſimplicity of Cato, and found that there was no fraud nor deceipt in him: who hauing long time reſolued to kill himſelfe, he onely tooke that extreame paines and care for others, that their liues being ſaued, he might then rid himſelf of his own. For men might eaſily ſee, though he diſſembled it, that he was reſolued to die. Wherupon, hauing comforted the Senators, he yeelded vnto the requeſts of the 300. merchants, and went himſelfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his comming, & prayed him to command them, and boldly to truſt thē: ſo that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, & would take pitie of their faint harts, though they were not ſo cōſtant and noble minded as he. For they were determined to ſend vnto Cæſar, ſpecially to intreate him for him: & if that they could not obtaine pardon for him, then they were aſſured they could haue none for themſelues, and therefore would fight for the ſafetie of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their goodwils, anſwered: that they ſhould ſend quickly to craue pardon for themſelues, but to aske none for him. For, ſaid he, men that be ouercome, & haue offended, it ſtandeth them vpon to make humble ſute, & to craue pardon: but for himſelfe, he was neuer ouercome in his life, & yet had ouercome as much as he deſired, and had alwaies bene better then Cæſar in iuſtice, who only (not himſelfe) was now taken and ouercome: the thing being apparantly proued in ſight againſt him, which he had alwaies denyed to haue practiſed againſt his country. When he had made this anſwer vnto the three hundred merchants, he departed frō them. Newes being brought that Cæſar was in his way with all his army, coming towards VTICA: O gods, ſayed he, then he commeth againſt vs, as againſt men. Then turning vnto the Senators, he gaue them counsell quickly to saue thēselues, whilst the horsemen were yet in the citie. So shutting all the gates of the city, sauing that towards the hauen: he appointed ships for them all, and set euery thing at a stay, without tumult or disorder, no man hauing iniurie offered him, and gaue euery one money to make way for their safetie. When Marcus Octauius (who came with two legions, and camped hard by VTICA) sent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two should be Generall: he made no answer, but turning to his friends, said: How can we wonder any more that all goeth to wracke with vs, sith there is such ambition amongst vs for the gouernment, euen now, when we are at the last cast? In the meane time word was brought him, how the horsemen going their way were spoiling of the citizens goods, as a lawfull prey in war. He straight ran thither himselfe, and the first he met withall, he tooke from them that they had gotten. The rest, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, and hanging downe their heads for shame, they went their way, and said nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, prayed them not to incense nor moue Cæsar against the three hundred, but rather to craue of him pardon for them all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there embracing his friends, and taking his leaue of them all, he brought them to their ships. Now for his son, he did not counsell him to go, neither did he thinke it meet to vrge him to forsake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a yong man in his company, of a noble courage, that was determined to follow the inuincible constancie of Cato: who counselled him to take the sea, and to saile away with the rest, because he knew he was Cæsars mortall enemy. Statilius said he would not go. Then Cato turning him vnto Apollonides a Stoick Philosopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripateticke Philosopher, said: You must take this stout yong man, to perswade him to obey vnto necessity. Cato himselfe in the meane time sent away the rest, and did minister iustice vnto thē that required it: spending all that night, & the next day about those matters. Then Lucius Cæsar, the kinsman of Iulius Cæsar the conqueror, being chosen by the three hundred, to go & make sute vnto him for them all, came and prayed Cato to help him to make his oration, which he shold say vnto Cæsar for them all: and as for thee, Cato, said he, I will kisse his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreat him for thee. Nay said Cato, thou shalt not do so. For if I would saue my life by Cæsars grace, I could do it, if I wold but go vnto him: howbeit I will not be bound to a tyrant for iniustice. For it is an iniustice in him to take vpon him, as a Lord and soueraigne to saue a mans life, when himself hath no authority to command. But yet let vs consider if thou wilt, what thou shalt say, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were awhile together considering the matter: and in fine, Lucius Cæsar being ready to depart, Cato recommended his son and friends vnto him, and imbracing him, tooke his leaue of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his son and friends before him, and talking of many matters: among others he charged his sonne in no case to meddle in the affaires of the commonwealth. For, said he, to deale vprightly like Catoes sonne, the corruption of the time and state will not abide it: and contrarily, obseruing the time, thou canst not do like an honest man. Towards euening he went into his bath to wash himselfe, and as he was a bathing, thinking vpon Statilius, he cried out aloud: Well Apollonides, thou hast at length yet perswaded Statilius to go his way, and pulled downe his stout courage he had: and is he gone without bidding vs farewell? How, gone, said Apollonides? Nay his hart is now more stout and couragious then euer it was, notwithstanding all the perswasions we could vse vnto him: for he is determined to tary, & to take such part as thou doest. After he had bathed himselfe, he went to supper, and sate at his meat, as he had alwaies vsed after the battell of PHARSALIA, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed: & he had all his friends, & the chiefe Magistrates of VTICA to supper with him. After supper they fell into graue talke, & matters of Philosophie: till at length they came vnto the strange opinion of the Stoicke Philosophers, which was this: that only the good man is free, & all the euil be slaues. The Peripatetick Philosopher that was present there, was straight against it. But Cato was very earnest against the Peripatetick, & argued the matter a long time, with a vehement speech & contention: insomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to end his life, and to rid himselfe out of all those troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and saw that euery man held their peace, and looked sadly of it: to comfort them againe, and to put the suspition of his death out of their heads: he beganne againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and seemed to be carefull of them, as though he had bene affrayed lest some misfortune were come vnto them vpon the sea, or vnto them that were gone by land, because they passed through deserts, where there was no water to be had.

Now

Now when ſupper was done, and the ſtraungers gone, he walked as his manner was with his friends, and hauing taken order with the Captains of the watch for matters of ſeruice, as the time required: going into his chamber he embraced his ſon and his friends more louingly then he was wont to do, whereby he made them againe ſuſpect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his chamber and layed in his bed, he tooke Platoes dialogues in hand, treating of the ſoule, and read the moſt part of it. Then looking by his beds ſide, and miſſing his ſword (which his ſon had taken from him when he was at ſupper) he called one of the groomes of his chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his ſword away: his man made him no anſwer, and he fell againe to reade his booke. Then a pretie while after, not ſeeming to be importunate, or ouer haſtie of the matter, but as though he would only know what became of it: he willed thē to bring him his ſword againe. They taried long, and he had read ouer all the booke, but yet his ſword was not brought him againe. Whereupon he called for all his men one after another, and very angrily asked them his ſword, and gaue one of them ſuch a blow on the face, that his noſe fell a bleeding, and his hand was all bloudy withall, and cryed out that his ſonne and his ſeruants would deliuer him naked into the hands of his enemy: vntill his ſon and friends at length ranne vnto him, and falling downe on their knees, lamented, and beſought him to be contented. Cato then riſing out of his bed, looked grimly vpon them, and ſaid vnto them: O gods, who euer ſaw me in this taking? Why doth no man by reaſon perſwade me, if they ſee me out of the way: and not to keepe me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doeſt not thou (my ſonne) bind thy fathers hands behind him, that when Cæſar commeth, he may find me in caſe not to defend my ſelfe? I do not deſire my ſword to hurt my ſelfe, for if I had any ſuch mind, I need but hold my breath a litle, or giue but a knocke of my head againſt the wall onely, and diſpatch my ſelfe quickly. When he had ſaid thus, his ſonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his friends alſo, no man remaining with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, vnto whom he ſpake more gently, and reaſoned in this ſort. What, do you thinke to keepe an old man as I am aliue by force? And haue you taried behind but to ſit ſtaring vpon me, and ſay nothing vnto me? If otherwiſe elſe, by reaſon you come to perſwade me, that it ſhall be no ſhame for Cato, diſpairing of the ſafetie of his life, to ſeeke it by the grace and mercie of his enemie: why then do you not now tell me your reaſons to perſwade me, that forſaking all other fancies and determinations which hitherunto we haue holden for good, being on a ſodaine become wiſer by Cæſars meanes, we ſhould be bound the more therefore to giue him thankes? I do not tell you this that I haue determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I liſt) to put the thing in execution I haue determined: but yet I will conſult with you, when I am ſo determined, to heare the reaſons and opinion of your bookes, which your ſelues do vſe in diſcourſe and argument together. Go your way therefore hardily vnto my ſon, and tell him that he muſt not thinke to compell his father vnto that, which he cannot proue good vnto him by reaſon. After this talke, Demetrius and Apollonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his chamber. Then his ſword was brought him by a litle boy. When he had it, he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his ſword was ſharpe and would cut: when he ſaw it was well: O, ſaid he, now I am where I would be, and ſo laying downe the ſword naked by him, he tooke his booke againe in his hand, and read it ouer (as they ſay) twiſe together. Then he ſlept ſo ſoundly after it, that his men which were without his chamber heard him ſnort againe. About midnight he called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his Phiſitian, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his waightieſt affaires of the commonwealth: So he ſent him vnto the hauen, to ſee if all his men that were imbarked were vnder ſaile: and gaue his hand to the Phiſitian to be bound vp, becauſe it was ſwollen with the blow he gaue one of his ſlaues when he hit him on the face. All his ſeruants were glad to heare of that, hoping then that he deſired to liue. Soone after came Butas backe againe from the hauen, and brought him word that all were gone but Craſſus, who ſtayed about ſome buſineſſe he had, and yet that he was going to take ſhip: howbeit that the ſea was very rough, and wind exceeding great. Cato hearing this, ſighed, being ſorie for them that were vpon the ſea: and ſent Butas backe againe to the hauen, to ſee if any man came backe for any matter they had to ſay vnto him. The litle birds began to chirpe, and Cato fell againe in a litle ſlumber. But thereupon Butas returned, and brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen, and there was no ſtirre. Then Cato, bad him go his way, and ſhut too the doore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had meant to haue ſlept out all the reſt of the night. Butas backe was no ſooner turned, but Cato taking his naked ſword in his hand, thruſt it into his breaſt: howbeit the ſwelling of his hand made the blow ſo weake, that it killed him not preſently, but drawing on to his latter end, he fell downe vpon his bed, and made ſuch a noiſe with his fall (ouerthrowing a litle table of Geometrie hard by his bed) that his ſeruants hearing the noiſe, gaue a great ſhreeke for feare. Thereupon his ſonne and his friends ran into the chamber, and found him all of a goare bloud, and the moſt part of his bowels comming out of his bodie, himſelfe being yet aliue and ſeeing them. They were all ſtricken with ſuch ſorrow to behold it, that at the firſt they were ſo amazed, as they could not tell what to ſay to it. His Phiſition comming to him, he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not periſhed, and to ſow vp his wound. But Cato comming to himſelf, thruſt backe the Phiſitian, and tore his bowels with his own hands, and made his wound very great, and immediatly gaue vp the ghoſt. Wherupon the three hundred ROMAINES (in leſſe time then a man would haue thought Catoes owne houſhold ſeruants could haue knowne of his death) were at his doores, and immediatly after all the people of VTICA alſo came thither, and with one voice called Cato their benefactor and ſauiour, and ſaid he only was a freeman, and had an inuincible mind: and this was done, when they heard ſay that Cæſar was not farre from VTICA. Furthermore, neither feare of the preſent danger, nor the deſire to flatter the Conqueror, neither any priuate quarrell amongſt themſelues, could keepe them from honoring Catoes funerals. For ſumptuouſly ſetting out his bodie, and honorably accompanying his funerals as might be, they buried him by the ſea ſide, where at this preſent time is to be ſeene his image, holding a ſword in his hand. After that they made their beſt way to ſaue themſelues and their citie. Now Cæſar being aduertiſed by them that came vnto him, how Cato ſtirred not from VTICA, nor fled not, but ſent all others away, ſauing himſelfe and his ſonne, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing: he could not deuiſe what he meant by it. Therfore eſteeming Cato much, he made haſt with all the ſpeed he could with his army to come thither. But whē he vnderſtood that Cato had ſlain himſelf, writers do report he ſaid thus: O Cato, I enuie thy death, ſith thou haſt enuied mine honour to ſaue thy life. For indeede had Cato bene contented Cæſar ſhould haue ſaued his life, he had not ſo much impaired his own honour, as he had augmented Cæſars glorie. And yet what Cæſar would haue done, men make it doubtfull, ſauing that they coniecture well of Cæſars clemencie. Cato dyed when he was but eight and forty yeares old. For his ſonne, Cæſar neuer did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him that he was very idlely giuen, and laſciuious beſides. For when he lay in CAPPADOCIA, in a noblemans houſe of the kings bloud, called Maphradates, who had a faire woman to his wife: he taried longer there then he might well with honeſtie, whereupon he fell to be a laughing ſtocke to the people, and in mockerie they ſaid, Cato will go to morrow, a thirty daies hence. And further, that Maphradates and Porcius are two good friends, but they haue but one mind: and the reaſon was, becauſe Maphradates wife was called Pſyche, which in the Grecke ſignifieth mind: and Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind: howbeit his famous death did ſtoppe this infamous ſpeech. For he valiantly fighting againſt Auguſtus and Antonius, at the battell of PHILIPPES, for the liberty of his countrie: their army being ouerthrown and fled, he would neither flie nor hide himſelfe, but running in amongſt his enemies, he made them know what he was, by encouraging thoſe of his ſide, which yet did defend themſelues, til he was ſlaine in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnes. Furthermore, Porcia, the daughter of Cato, gaue no place vnto her father, neither for chaſtity, nor greatneſſe of mind. For ſhe being maried vnto Brutus, who ſlue Cæſar, was of the conſpiracie, and ſlue her ſelfe as couragiouſly as became the vertue and nobility of her bloud from whence ſhe came, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius alſo, who had ſaid he would runne Catoes fortune (as we haue told you before) was kept from killing of himſelfe by the Philoſophers, Demetrius and Apollonides. But after that time hauing ſhewed himſelfe very faithfull and ſeruiceable vnto Brutus in all his affaires, he was ſlaine in the field alſo at the battell of PHILIPPES.

AGIS AND CLEOMENES.

TRuly the fable of Ixion was not ill deuiſed againſt ambitious perſons: who imbracing a cloud for the goddeſſe Iuno, begot (as it is ſayd) the CENTAVRI. For euen ſo ambitious men, imbracing glory for the true image of vertue, do neuer any act that is good nor perfect: but being caried away with diuerſe fancies, and following others humors with deſire to pleaſe the people, they may as the heardmen in the tragedy of Sophocles (ſpeaking of their cattell) ſay: The fable of Ixion againſt ambitious perſons.

We waite vpon their beaſts, though we their maiſters be,
And whereſoeuer they become, there alſo follow we.

Such indeed are they compared to, that gouerne common weales after peoples luſt and fancy: who doubtleſſe are as their ſeruants obedient at call, becauſe they onely may enioy the glorious title and name of an officer. For like as in a ſhip the mariners that ſtand in the prowe, do better ſee before them, then the pilots that ſteere the helme in the poope, and yet lookes alwayes backe vnto them to ſee what they commaund: euen ſo, they that gouerne in the commonwealth for honors ſake, are no better then honourable ſlaues of the people, hauing no more but the bare name of a gouernour. But indeed, the perfect good and honeſt man ſhould neuer couet outward glory, but as a meane to bring him to noble attempts, whereby he might procure the better credite of his doings. And for a young man that coueteth honour by vertue, giue him leaue a litle to glory in his well doing: for as Theophraſtus ſayth, vertue buddeth and flouriſheth in youth, and taketh faſt roote by praiſes giuen, as wit and courage groweth in them. But ouermuch praiſe is daungerous in euery perſon, but chiefly in ambitious gouernours. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many deſperate parts: for they will not allow that honour proceeds of vertue, but that honour is vertue it ſelfe. But indeed they ſhould ſay as Phocion did vnto Antipater, that requeſted an vnlawfull matter of him: Thou canſt not, ſayd he, haue Phocion a friend and flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be ſayd vnto the people: you cannot both haue one, a maiſter and a ſeruant, that can commaund and obey together. Or elſe the miſchiefe ſpoken of in the tale of the Dragon muſt needs happen, which was: the taile on a time fel out with the head, and complained, ſaying, it would another while go before, and would not alwayes come behind. The head graunted the taile, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing how to guide the head, and beſides that the head thereby was tormented euery way, being compelled againſt nature to follow that part and member, which could neither heare, nor ſee how to guide it. The like matter haue we ſeene happē vnto many, which in the adminiſtration of the commonwealth, did ſeeke to pleaſe the humors of the multitude. For whē they haue once put their heads vnder their girdles to pleaſe the common people, which without cauſe and reaſon do ſoone rebell: they can by no poſſible meanes afterwards bridle their furie and inſolencie. Now the reaſon that made vs to enter into diſcourſe againſt the ambition and vaine glorie amongst the people: was the consideration I had of their great power, remembring the misfortunes of Tiberius & Caius Gracchi: both of the which comming of a noble house, and hauing bene maruellous well brought vp, and managing also the affaires of the common wealth with a good desire, were notwithstanding in the end cast away: not so much through couetousnesse of glory, as for feare of dishonour, which came also of no base mind. For they hauing receiued great pleasures and frienships of the people, were ashamed to be indebted to them, and therefore earnestly sought to exceed the people in goodwill, by new decrees & deuices, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people also for their parts contended to honor them the more, by how much they striued to shew themselues thankfull. So with like strife on either side, they to gratifie the common people, and the people to honour them, were so vnwares entangled with publike causes, that they could no more follow the common prouerbe, which saith:

Although our deeds dissent from equity,
Yet can we not desist with honesty.

This thou shalt easily find by the declaration of the history. With these we do compare two other popular men, both kings of LACEDÆMON. Agis and Cleomenes. For they as the Gracchi, seeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the iust and honest gouernment againe of the common wealth of LACEDÆMON, which of long time had bene out of vse: did in like manner purchase the hate of the Nobility, which were loth to lose any part of their wonted couetousnesse. Indeed these two LACONIANS were no brethren borne, but yet did both follow one selfe course and forme of gouernement, which had beginning in this sort. After that couetousnesse of gold and siluer crept againe into the city of SPARTA, and with riches, couetousnesse also and misery, and by vse, voluptuousnesse and licentious life: SPARTA then was voide of all honor and goodnesse, and was long time drowned in shame and dishonor, vntill king Agis and Leonidas came to raigne there. Agis was of the house of the Eurytiontides, the sonne of Eudamedas, the sixt of lineall descent after Agesilaus, who had bene the greatest prince of all GRECE in his time. This Agesilaus had a sonne slaine in ITALY by the MESSAPIANS, called Archidamus, before the city of MANDONIVM. Archidamus had issue two sonnes, Agis and Eudamidas that was king, who succeeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater slue before the city of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudamidas: which Eudamidas also begat Agis, whose life we now write of. Leonidas also, the sonne of Cleonymus, was of the other family of the Agiades, the eight of succession after Pausanias, who slue Mardonius, the kings Lieutenant generall of PERSIA, in a battell fought before the city of PLATÆES. This Pausanias had a son called Plistonax, & Plistonax also another, called Pausanias: who flying from SPARTA vnto the city of TEGEA, his eldest son Agesipolis was made king in his fathers roome, who dying without issue, his yōger brother Cleombrotus succeeded him in the kingdome. Cleombrotus had two sons, Agesipolis and Cleomenes: of the which, Agesipolis raigned not long king, and died without issue. Then Cleomenes his brother, who was king after him, had two sons, Acrotatus the elder, that died in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the yonger which suruiued him, & was not king, but one Areus his nephew, the son of Acrotatus. This Areus died before the city of CORINTH: who hauing another Acrotatus to his son, he succeeded him in the kingdome. He also died at a battell before the city of MEGALIPOLIS, and was slaine there by the tyrant Aristodemus, leauing his wife great with child. She being brought to bed after his death of a sonne, whom Leonidas the sonne of Cleonymus taught and brought vp: the child dying very yong, the crowne by his death was cast vpon Leonidas himselfe. Howbeit his manners and conditions neuer liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the commonwealth, and cleane out of order: yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the auncient LACONIAN life: because he had bene long time brought vp in princes houses, and followed also Seleucus court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe of those courts into GRECE, where law and reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not only farre excell Leonidas, in honour and magnanimity of mind: but all other almost also which had raigned in SPARTA from the time of Agesilaus the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty yeares old, & being daintily brought vp with the fineness of two women, his mother Agistrata, and Archidamia his grandmother, which had more gold and siluer, then all the LACEDÆMONIANS else, he began to spurne against these womanish delights and pleasures, in making himselfe faire to be the better beliked, and to be fine and trimme in his apparell, and to cast vpon him a plaine plaine Spaniſh cape, taking pleaſure in the diet, bathes, and manner of the auncient LACONIAN life: and openly boaſted beſides, that he would not deſire to be king, but only for the hope he had to reſtore the auncient LACONIAN life by his authority. Then began the ſtate of LACEDÆMON firſt to be corrupted, and to leaue her auncient diſcipline, when the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing ſubdued the Empire of the ATHENIANS, ſtored themſelues and countrey both, with plenty of gold and ſiluer. But yet reſeruing ſtill the lands left vnto them by ſucceſſion from their fathers, according vnto Lycurgus firſt ordinance and inſtitution, for diuiſion of lands amongſt them: which ordinance, and equalitie being inuiolably kept amongſt them, did yet preſerue the common wealth from defamation of diuerſe other notorious crimes: vntill the time of the authoritie of Epitadeus, one of the Ephores, a ſeditious man, and of proud conditions: who bitterly falling out with his owne ſonne, preferred a law, that euery man might lawfully giue his lands and goods whileſt he liued, or after his death by teſtament, vnto any man whom he liked or thought well of. Thus this man made this law to ſatisfie his anger, and others alſo did confirme it for couetouſneſſe ſake, and ſo ouerthrew a noble ordinance. For the rich men then began to buy lands of numbers, and ſo transferred it from the right and lawfull heires: whereby a few men in ſhort time being made very rich, immediatly after there fell out great pouerty in the city of SPARTA, which made all honeſt ſciences to ceaſe, and brought in thereupon vnlawfull occupations, who enuied them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not aboue ſeuen hundred naturall citizens of SPARTA in all, and of them, not aboue a hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the reſt were poore people in the city, and were of no countenance nor calling, and beſides that, went vnwillingly to the warres againſt their enemies, looking euery day for ſtirre and chaunge in the city. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good act (as indeed it was) to repleniſh the city of SPARTA againe, and to bring in the old equalitie, he moued the matter vnto the citizens. He found the youth (againſt all hope) to giue good eare vnto him, and very well giuen vnto vertue, eaſily chaunging their garments and life, to recouer their liberty againe. But the oldeſt men, which were now euen rotten with couetouſneſſe and corruption, they were afraid to returne againe to the ſtraight ordinances of Lycurgus, as a ſlaue and runnagate from his maiſter, that trembleth when he is brought backe againe vnto him. Therefore they reproued Agis, when he did lament before them their preſent miſerable eſtate, and wiſh alſo for the former auncient honour and true dignitie of SPARTA. Howbeit Lyſander the ſonne of Lybis, and Mandroclidas the ſonne of Ecphanes, and Ageſilaus alſo, greatly commended his noble deſire, and perſwaded him to go forward withall. This Lyſander was of great authority and eſtimation amongſt them in the city, Mandroclidas was alſo very wiſe, and carefull about any matter of counſell, and with his wiſdome and pollicy, very valiant: Ageſilaus in like manner, the kings vnckle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couetous, and yet prickt forward to giue his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his ſonne Hippomedon, who was a noble good ſouldier, and could do very much, by meanes of the loue and good will the young men did beare him. But indeed, the ſecret cauſe that brought Ageſilaus to conſent vnto this practiſe, was the greatneſſe of his debt which he ought, of the which he hoped to be diſcharged by chaunging of the ſtate and common wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he ſought by his meanes to draw his mother alſo vnto the matter, which was Ageſilaus ſiſter. She could do very much by the number of her friends, followers, and debters in the city, by whoſe meanes ſhe ruled the moſt part of the affaires of the city after her owne pleaſure. But the young man Hippomedon making her priuie vnto it, at the firſt ſhe was amazed withall, and bad him hold his peace if he were wiſe, and not meddle in matters vnpoſſible and vnprofitable. But when Ageſilaus had told her what a notable act it would be, and how eaſily it might be brought to paſſe, with maruellous great profit: and that king Agis began alſo to ſtraine her with great intreatie, that ſhe ſhould willingly depart with her goods to win her ſonne honor and glory: who though he could not in mony and riches come to be like vnto other kings (becauſe the ſlaues and factors only of the kings Seleucus and Ptolomy, had more money then all the kings of SPARTA had together that euer raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftineſſe, and noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIANS againe vnto equalitie: that then indeed he ſhould be counted a noble king. Theſe women being ſtirred vp with ambition by theſe perſwaſions of the young man, ſeeing him ſo nobly bent, as if by the gods their minds had ſecretly bene inflamed with the loue of vertue: did preſently alter their minds in ſuch ſort, that they them-

selues did pricke forward Agis, and sent for their friends to pray and intreate them to fauor his enterprise: and furthermore they brought on other women also, knowing that the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer heare and beleeue their wiues, suffering them to vnderstand more of the affaires of the state, then they themselues did of their priuate estate at home. Herein is to be considered, that the most part of the riches of LACEDÆMON was in the hands of the women, and therefore they were against it, not onely becausse thereby they were cut off from their fineneſſe and excesse, in the which being ignorant of the true good indeed, they put all their felicity: but also becausse they saw their honour and authority which they had by their riches, cleane troden vnder foote. Therefore they comming to Leonidas, they did perswade him to reproue Agis, becausse he was elder man than he, and to let that this enterprise went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauor of the rich, but fearing the common people, who desired nothing but alteration, he durst not openly speake against him, but secretly he did the best he could to hinder Agis practise, talking with the Magistrates of the city, and accusing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the rich mens goods vnto the poore, the diuision of their lands, and the abolishing of all debts, for reward to put the tyranny into his hands, & that therby he got him a strong gard vnto himselfe, but not many citizens vnto SPARTA. This notwithstanding, king Agis hauing procured Lysander to be chosen one of the Ephores, he presently preferred his law vnto the councell. The articles whereof were these: That such as were in debt, should be cleared of all their debts, and that the lands also should be deuided into equall parts: so that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the cities of MALEA and SELASIA, there should be foure thousand fiue hundred parts, and without those bounds, there should be in all the rest, fifteene thousand parts, the which should be distributed vnto their neighbours meete to cary weapon: and the rest vnto the naturall SPARTANS. The number of them should be replenished with their neighbors and strangers in like maner, which should be very well brought vp, and be able men besides to serue the commonwealth: all the which afterwards should be deuided into fifteene cõpanies, of the which, some should receiue two hundred, and others foure hundred men, & should liue according to the old ancient institutiõ obserued by their ancestors. This law being preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grew to diuerse opinions vpon it. Whereupon Lysander himselfe assembled the great councell of all the people, & there spake vnto them himselfe, & Mandroclidas, and Agesilaus also, praying them not to suffer the honor of SPARTA to be troden vnder foote, for the vanity of a few: but that they would remember the auncient Oracles of the gods, warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and destruction of the commonwealth: and of the late Oracle also brought vnto them, from the temple of Pasiphaé. The temple and Oracle of Pasiphaé, was famous at the city of THALAMES: and some say, that Pasiphaé was one of the daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Iupiter, and was deliuered of a son called Hammon. Other thinke that it was Cassandra, one of king Priamus daughters that died there, which was surnamed Pasiphaé, becausse she gaue all the aunswers and Oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth, that Daphné the daughter of Amycla, flying from Apollo that would haue rauished her, was turned into a lawrell tree, and honored by Apollo with the gift of prophecy. So, they said that this Oracle of the god commanded them, that the SPARTANS should againe returne vnto their former ancient equality, stablished first by Lycurgus law. When euery man else had spoken, king Agis rising vp, briefly speaking vnto the people, sayd: that he would bestow great contributions for the reformation of this commonwealth, which he was desirous to restore againe. For first of all, he would make common all his arable and pasture he had, and besides that, he would adde too sixe hundred talents in ready money, and so much should his mother, grandmother, kinsmen and friends, all the which were the richest and wealthiest in SPARTA. When the people heard what he sayd, they maruelled much at the noble mind of this young king, and were very glad of it, saying: that for three hundreth yeares space together, the city of SPARTA had not so worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily assayed with all his power he could to resist him, thinking with himselfe, that if king Agis purpose tooke place, he should also be compelled to do as he did, and yet he should haue no thankes, but king Agis: becausse that all the SPARTANS indifferently should be compelled to make their goods in common, but the honor should be his only that first began it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and iust man, or not. Agis answered, that he had bene. Then replied Leonidas, Did you euer see that he had taken away and abolished any debts, or had receiued strangers into the number of the citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily contrarily thought his commonweath vnperfect, if all ſtrangers were not baniſhed the city. Agis againe anſwered him: that he maruelled not that Leonidas being brought vp in a ſtraunge countrey, and alſo maried there in a noble mans houſe, he ſhould be ignorant of Lycurgus lawes, who baniſhing gold and ſiluer out of his city, did therewithall exile debt and lending. And for ſtrangers he hated them that would not conforme themſelues vnto the manners and faſhions of life which he inſtituted, and thoſe they were which he baniſhed: not for any ill will he bare vnto their perſons, but becauſe he feared their maners of life, leaſt that mingling them with the citizens, they ſhould make them run after vanity & couetouſneſſe to be rich. For otherwiſe, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all ſtrangers, were maruellouſly reuerenced and honored in SPARTA in old time, becauſe they did ſing in their writings, the ſelfe ſame things which Lycurgus had eſtabliſhed in his lawes. And thou thy ſelfe alſo doeſt cõmend Ecprepes, being one of the Ephores, becauſe he did cut with a hatchet the two ſtrings which Phrynis the muſitian had added vnto the citherne, more then the ſeuen common ſtrings, and thoſe alſo which did the like vnto Timotheus: and yet thou reproueſt me, becauſe I go about to roote out all exceſſe and pride out of SPARTA, as though thoſe men did not farre off preuent that theſe ſuperfluous ſtrings of the muſicke, delighting the citizens minds too much with their ſongs, ſhould not cauſe them fall vnto ſuch trade and maner of life, as ſhould make the city at diſcord with it ſelfe. After this contention the common people did ſticke vnto king Agis, and the rich men followed Leonidas, praying and perſwading him not to forſake them: and further, they did ſo intreate the Senators, in whom conſiſteth the chiefe authority, to determine and diſgeſt all matters before they be propounded vnto the people, that they ouerthrew the law, by the onely voyce of one man more. Wherefore Lyſander who was yet in office, attempted to accuſe Leonidas by an ancient law, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules ſhould marry with any ſtraunge woman, nor beget children of her: and ſaid further, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould dwell any where, but in SPARTA. When he had inſtructed others to obiect theſe things againſt Leonidas, he with other of his colleagues obſerued a ſigne in the element, the ceremony whereof was in this ſort: Euery ninth yeare, the Ephori chuſing a bright night without moone-light, did ſit downe in ſome open place, and beheld the ſtarres in the element, to ſee if they ſaw any ſtarre ſhoote from one place to another: if they did, then they accuſed their kings that they had offended the gods, and did depriue them of their kingdom, vntill ſome Oracle came from DELPHES or OLYMPVS, to reſtore them againe. Lyſander then declaring that he had ſeene a ſtar flie in the element, did therfore accuſe king Leonidas, and brought forth witneſſes againſt him: how he had maried a woman of ASIA, the which one of king Seleucus Lieutenants had giuen him in mariage, and that he had two children by her: and afterwards being forſaken of his wife that refuſed him, he returned again into his country againſt his will: and ſo had poſſeſſed the kingdom for lacke of a lawfull heire. So following his accuſation in this maner againſt him, he allured Cleombrotus his ſon in law, being alſo of the kings bloud, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being afraid of the ſucceſſe hereof, tooke ſanctuary in the temple of Iuno, ſurnamed Chalceæcos, & his daughter with him, who forſooke her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in perſon, & making default, they depoſed him, & made Cleombrotus king. In the meane time Lyſanders office expired, and the new Ephori which ſucceeded him, did deliuer Leonidas againe, and accuſed Lyſander and Mandroclidas, becauſe againſt the law, they had aboliſhed all debts, and had againe made new diuiſion of lands. When they ſaw they were openly accuſed, they incenſed both the kings, that ioyning together, they ſhould make the Ephores ordinances of no effect: declaring that their authority was onely erected for the diſcord of the two kings, becauſe they ſhould giue their voyces vnto that king that had the beſt iudgement and reaſon, when the other would wilfully withſtand both right and reaſon: and therefore, they two agreeing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controlment of any perſon: and that to reſiſt the kings, was a breaking of the law, ſith that by right the Ephori had no other priuiledge and authority, but to be Iudges and arbitrators betweene them, when there was any cauſe of iarre or controuerſie. Both the kings being caried away by this perſwaſion, went into the market place accompanied with their friends, plucked the Ephores from their ſeats, and put others in their roomes, of the which Ageſilaus was one. Furthermore, they armed a great number of young men, and opening the priſons, did ſet the priſoners at liberty: the which made their aduerſaries afraid of them, doubting ſome great murther would haue followed vpon it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Ageſilaus being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled to the city of TEGEA, and hauing alſo layed men in waite for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it, ſent thither other friends of his in whom he put great confidence, and they did accompany Leonidas, and brought him ſafely vnto the city of TEGEA. Thus their purpoſe taking effect, and no man contrarying them: one man onely Ageſilaus ouerthrew all, and daſhed a noble LACONIAN law by a ſhamefull vice, which was couetouſneſſe. For he being a great landed man, and hauing the beſt lands of any man in the countrey, and owing a great ſumme of money beſides: would neither pay his debts, nor let go his land. Wherefore he perſwaded king Agis, that if he went about to ſtabliſh both together, he ſhould raiſe a great vprore in the city, and withall, if he did firſt win them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting off of debts onely: then that they would eaſily and willingly alſo accept the law of partition of lands: Lyſander was alſo of this opinion: whereby king Agis and he both were deceiued by Ageſilaus ſubtilty. So they commaunded all the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, and bils of debt (which the LACEDÆMONIANS do call Claria) into the market place, and there laying them on a heape together, they did ſet fire on them. When the vſurers and creditors ſaw their writings obligatory on a fire, they departed thence with heruy harts: but Ageſilaus mocking them ſaid, he neuer ſaw a brighter fire in his life. The people then requiring that the lands alſo ſhould be preſently deuided, and the kings likewiſe commanding it: Ageſilaus ſtill interpoſing ſome cauſe of let, delayed time, vntill oportunity ſerued, that king Agis ſhould go to the warres, for that the ACHAIANS their confederates had prayed aide of LACEDÆMON, being bound thereunto by the league confirmed betweene them, becauſe they looked daily that the ÆTOLIANS comming through the countrey of MEGARA, would inuade PELOPONNESVS. Aratus Generall of the ACHAIANS had leuied a great army to withſtand their inuaſion, and had alſo written vnto the Ephores, that they ſhould ſend them aide. Whereupon they preſently ſent king Agis, perceiuing alſo the readineſſe and good will of the ſouldiers which were appointed to go with him: for the moſt of them were young men and needy, who ſeeing themſelues diſcharged of the feare of their debts, and hoping alſo at their returne, that the lands likewiſe ſhould be deuided among them: they went with glad hearts, and were obedient to king Agis. So that the cities where through they paſſed, wondred how they came through PELOPONNESVS, from the one ſide to the other, very quietly, without noiſe or offence to any man. Likewiſe many GRECIANS calling to mind the auncient times, told one another, that it was a noble ſight then to ſee the army of LACEDÆMON, when they were led by Ageſilaus, Lyſander, and Leonidas, famous Captaines: ſith now they ſaw ſo great obedience vnto Agis by his ſouldiers, who was in manner the yongeſt man of all his campe: who alſo glorying to be content with litle, to away with paines, and not to be more coſtly apparelled, and armed then any priuate ſouldier he had: he wanne himſelfe thereby a maruellous loue of the people. Howbeit the rich men liked not this change, and were afraid leaſt Agis ſhould giue other people example to riſe alſo, and to do the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meeting with Aratus by the city of CORINTH, euen as he was conſulting whether he ſhould fight with his enemy, or not: ſhewed himſelfe in his counſell, then no raſh, but a reſolute and valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, and not to ſuffer the warre to come any farther, leauing the entry into PELOPONNESVS free to their enemy: neuertheleſſe, that he would do what Aratus thought good, becauſe he was the elder, and Generall alſo of the ACHAIANS, whom he came not to commaund, but to aide them. But Baton SINOPIAN writeth that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he had not read that which Aratus had written for his excuſe and iuſtification, alleading there that the farmers and husbandmen hauing brought all the corne into their barnes, he thought it better to ſuffer the enemies to come farther into their countrey, rather then to hazard battell, to the loſſe of the whole countrey of PELOPONNESVS, and that therefore he licenced all the confederates to depart and brake vp his army. So king Agis returned home againe, greatly honoured of them that ſerued with him in his iourney, finding the city of SPARTA then in great broile and trouble. For Ageſilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding himſelfe ridde of the feare which before kept him vnder: cared not what iniurie or miſchiefe he did vnto any citizen, ſo he might get money. For amongſt other things, that very yeare he made them pay beyond all reaſon the tallages and taxes due vnto the common wealth for thirteene moneths, adding to the thirteenth moneth aboue the ordinary time of the yeare. Wherefore perceiuing euery man hated him, and being afraid of them he had offended: he kept ſouldiers about him, armed with their ſwords, and ſo came came downe into the market place among them. And for the two kings, he made no account of the one: but of the other that was Agis, he seemed outwardly to make good account, rather for kindreds sake, then for his dignity of a king, and furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next yeare following. Whereupon, his enemies speedily to preuent the danger gathered force together, & openly brought king Leonidas from TEGEA, to restore him againe to his kingdome. The people were glad to see that, because they were angry they had bin mocked in that sort, for that the lands were not deuided according vnto promise. Furthermore Hippomedon was so well beloued for his valiantnesse of euery man, that intreating the people for his father Agesilaus, he saued his life, and got him out of the city. But for the two kings, Agis tooke sanctuary in the temple of Iuno Chalceæcos. And Cleombrotus the other king fled into the temple of Neptune: for it seemed that Leonidas being much more offended with him, did let king Agis alone, and went against him with certaine souldiers armed. Then he sharply taunted him, that being his son in law, he had conspired against him to depriue him of his kingdom, and had driuen him out of his country. But then Cleombrotus not hauing a word to say, sate still, and made him no answer. Whereupon, his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the iniury they did her father, & had left her husband Cleombrotus, that had vsurped the kingdom from him, to serue her father in his aduersity, and while he was in sanctuary tooke part with him also of his misery, and afterwards when he went vnto the city of TEGEA, wore blackes for sorow, being offended with her husband: she contrarily then changing her anger with her husbands fortune and misery, became also an humble suter with him, sitting downe by him, and imbracing him, hauing her two litle sonnes on either side of them. All men wondering, and weeping for pity to see the goodnesse and naturall loue of this Lady, who shewing her mourning apparell, and haire of her head flaring about her eyes, bare headed: she spake in this maner vnto her father. O father mine, this sorowfull garment and countenance is not for pity of Cleombrotus, but hath long remained with me, lamenting sore your former misery and exile: but now, which of the two should I rather chuse, either to continue a mourner in this pitifull state, seeing you againe restored to your kingdome, hauing ouercome your enemies: or else putting on my princely apparell, to see my husband slaine, vnto whom you maried me a maide? who if he cannot moue you to take compassion on him, and to obtaine mercy, by the teares of his wife and children: he shall then abide more bitter paine of his euill counsell, then that which you intend to make him suffer. For he shal see his wife dye before him, whom he loueth more dearly then any thing in the world. Also, with what face can I looke vpon other Ladies, when I could neuer bring my father to pity by any intercession I could make for my husband, neither my husband, intreate him for my father: and that my hap is to be borne, a daughter and wife alwayes most vnfortunate, and despised of mine owne? And for my husband, if he had any reason to do that he did, I then tooke it from him, by taking your part, and protesting against him: and contrarily, your selfe doth giue him honest colour to excuse his fault, when he seeth in you the desire of the kingdome so great, that for the loue thereof, you thinke it lawfull to kill your sons in law, and also not to regard the children he hath gotten, for her sake. Chelonis pitifully complaining in this sort, putting her face vpon Cleombrotus head, cast her swollen and blubbering eyes vpon the standers by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friends, he commaunded Cleombrotus to get him thence and to leaue the citie as an exile: and prayed his daughter for his sake to remaine with him, and not to forsake her father, that did so dearely loue her, as for her sake he had saued her husbands life. This notwithstanding, she would not yeeld to his request, but rising vp with her husband, gaue him one of his sons, and her selfe tooke the other in her armes: and then making her prayer before the altar of the goddesse, she went as a banished woman away with her husband. And truly the example of her vertue was so famous, that if Cleombrotus mind had not bene too much blinded with vaine glory, he had cause to thinke his exile farre more happy, to enioy the loue of so noble a wife as he had, then for the kingdome which he possessed without her. Then Leonidas hauing banished king Cleombrotus out of the city, and remouing the first Ephores, had substituted other in their places: he presently bethought him how he might craftily come by king Agis. First, he perswaded him to come out of the sanctuary, and to gouerne the kingdome safely with him, declaring vnto him that his citizens had forgiuen him all that was past, because they knew he was deceiued, and subtilly circumuented by Agesilaus craft, being a young man, ambitious of honour. Agis would not leaue the sanctuarie for Leonidas cunning perswasion, but mistrusted

all that he ſayd vnto him. Wherefore Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Democharis, and Arceſilaus, did oftentimes go to viſite king Agis, and otherwhile alſo they got him out of the ſanctuary with them vnto the bath, & brought him backe againe into the tẽple, when he had bathed. But Amphares hauing borrowed not long before, certaine rich apparell and plate of Ageſiſtrata, becauſe he would not redeliuer them againe, he determined to betray king Agis, his mother and grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did ſerue Leonidas turne, and prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) againſt Agis. Now therefore, Agis keeping all the reſt of his time within the temple, ſauing when he went vpon occaſion to the bath: they determined to intercept him by the way, and to take him when he was out of the ſanctuary. So they watched him one day when he came and bathed, and came and ſaluted him as their manner was, and ſeemed to accompany him, ſporting, and being merry with him, as with a young man their familiar. But when they came to the turning of a ſtreete that went towards the priſon, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, ſayd vnto him: I arreſt thee Agis, and will bring thee before the Ephores, to giue account of thy doings in the cõmonwealth. Then Democharis, which was a great mighty man caſt his gowne ouer his eares, & pulled him forward: others alſo thruſted him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being neare them to helpe Agis, they got him into priſon. Then came Leonidas incontinently with a great number of ſoldiers that were ſtrangers, & beſet the priſon round about. The Ephores went into the priſon, and ſent vnto ſome of the Senate to come vnto them, whom they knew to be of their mind: then they commanded Agis, as if it had bene iudicially, to giue account of the alteration he had made in the commonwealth. The yong man laughed at their hypocriſie. But Amphares told him that it was no laughing ſport, and that he ſhould pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores ſeeming to deale more fauorably with him, and to ſhew him a way how he might eſcape the condemnation for his fault: asked him if he had not bene intiſ d vnto it by Ageſilaus and Lyſander. Agis aunſwered, that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the ſteps of the ancient Lycurgus, to bring the common wealth vnto the former eſtate of his graue ordinance and inſtitution. Then the ſame Senator asked him again, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The yong man boldly anſwered him, that he would neuer repent him of ſo wiſe and vertuous an enterpriſe, though he ventured his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, & commanded the Sergeants to cary him into the Decade, which was a place in the priſon where they were ſtrangled that were condẽned to die. Democharis perceiuing the Sergeants durſt not lay hold on him, and likewiſe that the ſouldiers which were ſtrangers, did abhor to cõmit ſuch a fact contrary to the law of god and man, to lay violent hands vpon the perſon of a king: he threatned and reuiled them, & dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumor ran ſtraight through the city, that king Agis was taken, and a multitude of people were at the priſon doores with lights and torches. Thither came alſo king Agis mother and grandmother ſhreeking out and praying that the king of SPARTA might yet be heard and iudged by the people. For this cauſe they haſtened his death the ſooner, and were afraid beſides, leaſt the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, ſpied a Sergeant lamenting and weeping for him, vnto whom he ſayd: Good fellow I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am an honeſter man than they that ſo ſhamefully put me to death, & with thoſe words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the priſon into the ſtreet, found Ageſiſtrata there king Agis mother, who ſtraight fell downe at his feete: but he taking her vp againe, in old familiar manner, as being her very friend, told her that they ſhould do king Agis no hurt, and that ſhe might if ſhe would, go and ſee him. Then ſhe prayed, that they would alſo let her mother in with her. Amphares ſayd, with a good will: and ſo put them both into the priſon houſe, and made the doores be ſhut after them. But when they were within, he firſt gaue Archidamia vnto the Sergeants to be put to death, who was a maruellous old woman, and had liued more honourably vnto that age, then any Lady or Matrone beſide her in the citie. She being executed, he commaunded Ageſiſtrata alſo to come in. Who when ſhe ſaw the body of her dead ſon layed on the ground, and her mother alſo hanging on the gallowes: ſhe did her ſelfe helpe the hangman to plucke her downe, and layed her body by her ſonnes. Then hauing couered her in decent maner, ſhe layed her downe on the ground by the corpes of her ſonne Agis, and kiſſing his cheeke, ſayd: Out alas my ſonne, thy great modeſty, goodneſſe, and clemency, brought thee and vs vnto this death.

Then

Then Amphares peeping in at the doore to see what was done, hearing what she sayd, came in withall in a great rage, and sayd: I perceiue that thou hast also bene of counsell with my son, and sithence it is so, thou shalt also follow him. Then she rising also to be strangled, sayd: The gods graunt yet that this may profit SPARTA. This horrible murther being blowne abroad in the city, and the three dead bodies also brought out of prison: the feare though it were great amongst the people, could not keepe them backe from apparant shew of griefe, and manifest hate against Leonidas and Amphares, thinking that there was neuer a more wicked and crueller fact committed in SPARTA, since the DORIANS came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies themselues in battell, would not willingly lay hands vpon the kings of LACEDÆMON, but did forbeare as much as they could possible, both for feare and reuerence they bare vnto their maiesty. For in many great battels and conflicts which the LACEDÆMONIANS had against the GRECIANS, there was neuer any king of LACEDÆMON slaine, before Philips time, but Cleombrotus only, who was slaine with a dart at the battell of LEVCTRES. Some write also that the MESSINIANS hold opinion, that their Aristomenes slue Theopompus: howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS sayd, that he was but hurt, not slaine. But hereof there are diuerse opinions: but it is certaine that Agis was the first king whom the Ephores euer put to death: for that he had layed a plot of a noble deuise, and worthy of SPARTA, being of that age when men do easily pardon them that offend: and was rather to be accused of his friends then of his enemies, because he had saued Leonidas life, and had trusted other men, as the best natured yong man that could be.

The enemies did not willingly kill any king of Lacedæmon.

Now Agis hauing suffered in this sort, Leonidas was not quicke inough to take Archidamus his brother also, for he fled presently. Yet he brought Agis wife out of her house by force, with a litle boy she had by him, and maried her vnto his sonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to marry: fearing least this young Lady should be bestowed elsewhere, being indeed a great heire, and of a rich house, and the daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agiatis, besides that she was the fairest woman at that time in all GRECE, and the vertuousest, and best conditioned. Wherefore for diuerse respects she prayed she might not be forced to it. But now being at length maried with Cleomenes, she euer hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and louing wife vnto her young husband: who immediatly after he was maried vnto her, fell greatly in fancie with her, and for compassions sake (as it seemed) he thanked her for the loue she bare vnto her first husband, and for the louing remembrance she had of him: in so much as he himselfe many times would fall in talke of it, and would be inquisitiue how things had passed, taking great pleasure to heare of Agis wise counsell and purpose. For Cleomenes was as desirous of honour, and had as noble a mind as Agis, and was borne also to temperancie, and moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not that shamefast modesty and lenity, which the other had, but was somewhat more stirring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it great honesty, to bring the citizens (if he could) to be contented to liue after an honest sort: but contrarily, he thought it no dishonestie to bring them vnto good life, by compulsion also. Furthermore the maners of the citizens of SPARTA, giuing themselues ouer to idlenesse and pleasure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the king did suffer the common wealth to be ruled as they listed, so no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did let him alone: in so much as no man regarding the profit of the commonwealth, euery man was for himselfe, and his family. And contrarily it was not lawfull for any man to speake for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperancie, and for the restoring againe of equality of life, the preferment whereof was the onely cause of the late death of Agis. They say also, that Cleomenes being a young stripling: had heard some disputation of Philosophy, when the Philosopher Spherus, of the country of BORYSTHENES came to LACEDÆMON, and louingly stayed there to teach young men and children. He was one of the chiefest scholers of Zenon CITIAN, and delighted (as it seemed) in Cleomenes noble mind, and had a great desire to pricke him forward vnto honour. For as it is reported, that the auncient Leonidas being demaunded what Poet he thought Tyrtæus to be, aunswered he was good to flatter young mens minds: for he set their hearts on fire by his verses, when they began to fight any battell, fearing no daunger, they were so encouraged by them. So the Stoicke discipline is somewhat dangerous, for the stoute and valiant minds, which otherwise doth make desperate: so when they are ioyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, first it lifteth vp his heart, and then maketh him tast the profite thereof. Now Leonidas (the father of Cleomenes) being deceased, and he himselfe also come vnto the crowne finding that the citizens of SPARTA at that time were very dissolute, that the rich men followed their pleasure and profite, taking no care for the common wealth, that the poore men also for very want and need, went with no good life and courage to the warres, neither cared for the bringing vp of their children, and that he himselfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the absolute authority to do what they listed: at his first coming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole state and gouernement of the common wealth. Who hauing a friend called Xenares, that had bene his louer in his youth (which the LACEDÆMONIANS called Empnistæ, as much as inspired) he began to sound his opinion, asking what maner of man king Agis had bene, and by what reason, and whose aduice he had followed in his attempt for the reformation of the common wealth. Xenares at the first did not willingly rehearse these things vnto him, declaring euery thing what had passed. But when he found that Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, and still desired to heare of it: then Xenares sharply and angrily reproued him, and told him he was not wise, nor well aduised, and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont, yet making no man priuy why he abstained from comming to him, but told them that asked him, he knew a cause well inough why. Xenares now hauing thus refused him, and thinking all the rest would do the like: to bring this matter to passe, he tooke this resolution with himselfe. Because he thought he might the rather do it in warre, then in peace, he set the city of SPARTA and the ACHAIANS at variance together: who did themselues giue the first occasion to be complained vpon. For Aratus being the president and chiefe of all the ACHAIANS, had practised a long time to bring all PELOPONNESVS into one bodie: and had therefore onely sustained great troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other way to deliuer them from forraine warres. Now when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion: there remained no more but the ELIANS, the LACEDÆMONIANS, and a few of the ARCADIANS, which were subiect to the LACEDÆMONIANS. When king Leonidas was dead, Aratus began to inuade the ARCADIANS, those specially that bordered vpon the ARGIVES: to proue how the LACEDÆMONIANS would take it, making no account of Cleomenes, being but a young king, and had no experience of warres. Thereupon the Ephori sent Cleomenes vnto ATHÆNIVM (a temple of Minerua hard by the city of BELBINA) with an army to take it: because it was a passage and entry into the countrey of LACONIA, howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the MEGALIPOLITANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, Cleomenes got it, and fortified it. Aratus making no complaint otherwise of the matter, stole out one night with his army to set vpon the TEGEANS, and ORCHOMENIANS, hoping to haue taken those cities by treason. But the traytors that were of his confederacy, their harts failed them when they should haue gone about it: so that Aratus returned, hauing lost his iourney, thinking that this secret attempt of his was not discouered. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his friend, and asked him, whither he had led his army by night. Aratus returned answer againe, that vnderstanding Cleomenes meant to fortifie BELBINA, he went foorth with his army, thinking to haue let him. Cleomenes wrote againe vnto him, and sayd, he did beleeue that which he spake was true: howbeit he earnestly requested him (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertise him why he brought scaling ladders and lights after him. Aratus smiling at this mocke, asked what this young man was. Democritus LACEDÆMONIAN being a banished man out of his countrey answered: If thou hast any thing to do against the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou hadst need make hast, before this young Cockrell haue on his spurres. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the countrey of ARCADIA, with a few horsemen and three hundred footmen onely: the Ephori being afraid of warres, sent for him to returne againe. His backe was no sooner turned, obeying their commaundement: but Aratus suddenly tooke the city of CAPHYES. Thereupon, the Ephori incontinently sent Cleomenes backe againe with his army; who tooke the fort of Methydrium, and burnt the borders of the ARGIVES. The ACHAIANS came against him with an army of twentie thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen led by Aristomachus: Cleomenes met with them by the city of PALANTIVM, and offered battell. But Aratus quaking at the hardinesse of this young man, would not suffer Aristomachus to hazard battell, but went his way derided by the ACHAIANS, and despised by the LACEDÆMONIANS: who in all were not aboue fiue thousand fighting men. Cleomenes courage being now lift vp, and brauely speaking to his citizens: he remembred them of a saying of one of their auncient kings, that the LACEDÆMONIANS neuer enquired what number their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after,

after, the ACHAIANS making warre with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was sent to aide them and met with the army of the ACHAIANS by the mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne: he setting vpon them, gaue them the ouerthrow, slue a great number of them, and tooke many also prisoners, that the rumor ran through GREECE, how Aratus selfe was slain. Cleomenes wisely taking the occasion which this victory gaue him, he went straight to the city of MANTINEA, and taking it vpon a sudden, when no man knew of his comming, he put a strong garrison into it. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hearts failing them, and resisting Cleomenes enterprises, ouer wearying them with warres: he went about to send Archidamus, king Agis brother, being then at MESSINA, vnto whom the kingdome of right belonged by the other house, supposing that he should easily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the authority of the two kings, if both of them ioyned together. Which when the murtherers of king Agis vnderstood, being afraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them, they secretly receiued him into the city, and found the meanes to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him straight to death, whether it was vnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainely testifieth) or else with his priuitie, suffering them to make him away, by perswasion of his friends. But it is a cleare case, the citie was burdened withall, because probable matter fell out that they had compelled Cleomenes to do it. Neuertheless, he holding still his first determination, to alter the state of the common wealth of SPARTA, as soone as he could possible: he so fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he should make warre. He had also wonne many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Cratesiclea, who furnisht him with money, that he lacked not to honour him withall: and further, maried as it is reported (though otherwise she meant not to marry) for her sons sake, vnto one of the wealthiest men of all the city. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wanne a place within the territory of MEGALIPOLIS, called LEVCTRA. The ACHAIANS also being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus: they straight fought a battell by the city selfe, where Cleomenes had the worst on the one side of his armie. Howbeit Aratus would not suffer the ACHAIANS to follow them, because of bogges and quauemires, but sounded the retraite. But Lysiadas a MEGALIPOLITAN being angry withall, caused the horsemen he had about him to follow the chase, who pursued so fiercely, that they came amongst vines, wals, & ditches, where he was driuen to disperse his men, and yet could not get out. Cleomenes perceiuing it, sent the light horsemen of the TARENTINES and CRETANS against him: of whom Lysiadas valiantly fighting was slaine. Then the LACEDÆMONIANS being couragious for this victory, came with great cries, and giuing a fierce charge vpon the ACHAIANS, ouerthrew their whole army, and slue a maruellous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their request suffered them to take vp the dead bodies of their men to burie them. For Lysiadas corpes, he caused it to be brought vnto him, and putting a purple robe vpon it, and a crowne on his head, sent it in this array vnto the very gates of the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. It was that selfe Lysiadas, who giuing ouer the tyranny and gouernement of MEGALIPOLIS, made it a popular state, and free citie, and ioyned it to the ACHAIANS. After this victory, Cleomenes that determined greater matters and attempts, perswaded himselfe that if he might once come to stablish the affaires of the common wealth at SPARTA to his mind, he might then easily ouercome the ACHAIANS: brake with his father in law Megistonus, and told him that it was necessary to take away the authority of the Ephores, and to make diuision of the lands among the SPARTANS, and then being brought to equalitie, to encourage them to recouer the Empire of GREECE againe vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, which their predecessours before them held and enioyed. Megistonus graunting his good will and furtherance, ioyned two or three of his friends more vnto him. It chaunced at that time that one of the Ephores lying in the temple of Pasiphaé, had a maruellous dreame in the night. For he thought he saw but one chaire standing where the Ephori did vse to sit to giue audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, were taken away: and that marueling at it, he heard a voyce out of the temple that sayd, that was the best for SPARTA. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feele him, for that he had heard some inckling of his intent. But when he perswaded himselfe that the other meant good faith, and lyed not vnto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpose, and taking with him vnto the campe all those SPARTANS which he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and tooke the cities of HERÆA and ALSEA, confederates of the ACHAIANS, and victualled

ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the city of MANTINEA. In fine, he ſo wearied and ouerharried the LACEDÆMONIANS by long iourneys, that at length they beſought him he would let them remaine in ARCADIA, to repoſe themſelues there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his ſtraungers which he had hired, returned againe vnto SPARTA, and imparted his intent by the way vnto them he truſted beſt, and marched at his owne eaſe, that he might take the Ephores at ſupper. When he came neare vnto the city, he ſent Euryclidas before, into the hall of the Ephores, as though he brought them newes out of the campe from him. After him, he ſent alſo Therician and Phœbis, and two other that had bene brought vp with him, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a few ſouldiers. Now whileſt Euryclidas was talking with the Ephores, they alſo came in vpon them with their ſwords drawne, and did ſet vpon the Ephores. Ageſilaus was hurt firſt of all, and falling downe, made as though he had bene ſlaine, but by litle and litle he crept out of the hall, and got ſecretly into a chappell conſecrated vnto Feare, the which was wont euer to be kept ſhut, but then by chaunce was left open: when he was come in, he ſhut he doore faſt to him. The other foure of the Ephores were ſlaine preſently, and aboue ten moe beſides, which came to defend them. Furthermore, for them that ſate ſtill and ſtirred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was deſirous to go out of the city: but moreouer, they pardoned Ageſilaus, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Feare. Amongſt the LACEDÆMONIANS in the city of SPARTA, there are not onely temples of feare and death, but alſo of laughter, and of many other ſuch paſſions of the mind. They do worſhip Feare, not as other ſpirits and diuels that are hurtfull: but becauſe they are perſwaded that nothing preſerueth a common wealth better than feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Ariſtotle witneſſeth) when they are created, do by publicke proclamation commaund all the SPARTANS to ſhaue their chinnes, and to obey the law, leaſt they ſhould make them feele the rigour of the law. They brought in the ſhauing of their chins, in my opinion, to inure young men to obey the Magiſtrates euen in trifles. Moreouer it ſeemes that men in old time did eſteeme fortitude to be no taking away of feare, but rather a feare and lothneſſe to incurre ſhame. For commonly thoſe that are moſt afraid to offend the law, are in the field moſt valiant againſt their enemy: and ſhun no perill to winne fame and honeſt reputation. And therefore it was wiſely ſayd of one:

That feare cannot be without ſhamefaſtneſſe.

And ſo Homer in a certaine place made Hellen ſay vnto king Priamus:

Of truth I do confeſſe deare father in law,
You are the man of whom I ſtand in aw,
And reuerence moſt of all that euer I ſaw.

And in another place, ſpeaking of the GRECIAN ſouldiers, he ſayth thus:

For feare of their Captaines they ſpake not a word.

For men do vſe to reuerence them whom they feare. And this was the cauſe why the chappell of Feare was by the hall of the Ephores, hauing in maner a princely and abſolute authority. The next morning Cleomenes baniſhed by trumpet, foure ſcore citizens of SPARTA, and ouerthrew all the chaires of the Ephores but one onely, the which he reſerued for himſelfe to ſit in to giue audience. Then calling the people to counſell, he gaue them an account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had ioyned the Senators with the kings, and how the city had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithſtanding, afterwards the city hauing great warres with the MESSINIANS, the kings being alwayes employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the commonwealth at home, did chuſe certaine of their friends to ſit in iudgement in their ſteads, to determine controuerſies of law: which were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kings miniſters, howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke vpon them abſolute gouernement by themſelues. And, for manifeſt proofe hereof, you ſee that at this preſent time when the Ephori do ſend for the king, the firſt and ſecond time, he refuſeth to come, but the third time he riſeth and goeth vnto them. The firſt man that gaue the Ephores this authority, was Aſteropus, one of the Ephores many yeares after the firſt inſtitution of the kings: and yet if they had gouerned diſcreetly, peraduenture they might haue continued longer. But they licentiouſly abuſing their authority, by ſuppreſſing the lawfull gouernours inſtituted of old time, taking vpon them to baniſh ſome of their kings, and putting other of them alſo to death, without law and iuſtice, and threatning others that deſire desire to restore that noble and former blessed gouernment vnto SPARTA againe: al these things I say, are in no wise to be suffered any longer. And therefore if it had bene possible to haue banished all these plagues of the commonwealth out of SPARTA, brought from forraine nations: (I meane, pleasures, pastimes, money, debts, and vsuries, and others yet more auncient, pouertie and riches) he might then haue esteemed himselfe the happiest king that euer was, if like a good Phisitian he had cured his country in that infection, without griefe or sorrow. But in that he was constrained to begin with bloud, he followed Lycurgus example: who being neither king nor other Magistrate, but a priuate citizen onely, taking vpon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilaus that then raigned, so affraid, that he was driuen to take sanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of a noble nature, and louing the honour of his country, tooke part with Lycurgus, adding to his aduice and counsell, for the alteration of the state of the gouernment of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lycurgus saw it was a hard thing to alter the commonwealth without force & feare: the which he notwithstanding had vsed with as great modestie and discretion as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profite and wealth of LACEDÆMON, giuing all the lands of the countrie also to be equally deuided amongst them, and setting all men cleare that were in debt. And furthermore, that he would make a choice and proofe of the straungers, to make them free citizens of SPARTA, whom he knew to be honest men, therby to defend their citie the better by force of armes: to the end that from hencefoorth we may no more see our country of LACONIA spoiled by the ÆTOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of men to defend themselues against them. Then he began first himselfe to make all his goods common, and after him Megistonus his father in law, and consequently all his other friends. Then he caused the lands also to be deuided, and ordained euery banished man apart, whom he himselfe had exiled, promising that he would receiue them againe into the citie, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the citizens of SPARTA, with the choicest honest men their neighbours, he made foure thousand footmen well armed, and taught them to vse their pikes with both hands, in steade of their darts with one hand, and to carie their targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwards he tooke order for the education of children, and to restore the ancient LACONIAN discipline again: and did all these these things in maner by the helpe of Sphærus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickly set vp againe schoole-houses for children, and also brought them to the old order of diet: and all, but a very few, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institution of life. Then because the name of one king should not offend any man, he made his brother Euclidas king with him. But this was the first time that euer the two kings were of one house but then. Furthermore, vnderstanding that the ACHAIANS and Aratus were of opinion, that he durst not come out of LACEDÆMON, for feare to leaue it in perill of reuolting, because of the late change and alteration in the commonwealth: he thought it an honorable attempt of him, to make his enemies see the readines and goodwill of his army. Thereupon he inuaded the territories of the MEGALIPOLITANS, and brought away a great prey and bootie, after he had done great hurt vnto his enemies. Then hauing taken certaine players and minstrels that came from MESSINA, he set vp a stage within the enemies country, made a game of 40. Minas for the victor, and sate a whole day to looke vpon them, for no pleasure he tooke in the sight of it, but more to despite the enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger then they, to make such a Maygame in their own country, in despite of them. For of all the armies otherwise of the GRECIANS, or kings in all GRECE, there was no army but his onely, that was without players, minstrels, fooles, and iuglers: for his campe only was cleane of such rabble and foolerie, and all the young men fell to some exercise of their bodies, and the old men also to teach them. And if they chaunced to haue any vacant time, then they would pleasantly be one merrie with another, in giuing some pretie fine mocke after the LACONIAN manner. And what profite they got by that kind of exercise, we haue written it at large in Lycurgus life. But of all these things, the king himselfe was their schoolemaister and example, shewing himselfe very temperate of life, and plaine without curiositie, no more then any priuate souldier of all his campe: the which were great helpes vnto him in his enterprises he made in GRECE. For the GRECIANS hauing cause of sute and negotiation with other kings and princes, did not wonder so much at their pomp and riches, as they did abhor and detest their pride and insolencie: so disdainfully they would answer them that had to do with them. But contrarily when they went vnto Cleomenes, who was a king in name and deed as they were, finding no purple robes nor ſtately mantles, nor rich imbrodered beds, nor a Prince to be ſpoken to but by meſſengers, gentlemen vſhers, and ſupplications, and yet with a great ado: and ſeeing him alſo come plainely apparelled vnto them, with a good countenance, and courteouſly anſwering the matters they came for: he thereby did maruellouſly win their hearts and goodwils, that when they returned home, they ſaid he only was the worthie king, that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his diet at his boord, that was very ſtraight and LACONIAN like, keeping onely three boords: and if he chanced to feaſt any Ambaſſadours or other his friends that came to ſee him, he then added too, two other boords, and beſides, made his men ſee that his fare ſhould be amended, not with paſtrie and conſerues, but with more ſtore of meat, and ſome better wine then ordinarie. For he one day reproued one of his friends, that bidding ſtrangers to ſupper, he gaue them nothing but blacke broth, and browne bread only, according to to the LACONIAN manner. Nay, ſaid he, we may not vſe ſtraungers ſo hardly after our manner. The boord being taken vp, another litle table was brought with three feet, whereupon they ſet a bowle of copper full of wine, and two ſiluer cups of a pottle a peece, and certaine other few ſiluer pots beſides: ſo euery man dranke what they liſted, and no man was forced to drinke more then he would. Furthermore, there was no ſport, nor any pleaſant ſong ſung to make the companie merrie, for it needed not. For Cleomenes ſelfe would entertaine them with ſome pretie queſtions or pleaſant tale: wherby, as his talke was not ſeuere and without pleaſure, ſo was it alſo pleaſant without inſolencie. For he was of opinion, that to win men by gifts or mony, as other kings and princes did, was but baſe and cloynelike: but to ſeeke their good wils by curteous meanes and pleaſantneſſe, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought moſt fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his mind, that there was no other difference betwixt a friend and hireling: but that the one is won with money, and the other with ciuilitie and good entertainment. The firſt therefore that receiued king Cleomenes into their city, were the MANTINIANS, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to driue out the garriſon of the ACHAIANS, they yeelded themſelues vnto him. But he referring them to the vſe and gouernement of their owne lawes and libertie, departed from thence the ſame day, and went vnto the citie of TEGEA. Shortly after, he compaſſed about ARCADIA, and came vnto PHERES in ARCADIA, determining one of the two, either to giue the ACHAIANS battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauour with the people, for that he had ſuffered him to ſpoile and deſtroy their country. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, but Aratus did beare all the ſway and authoritie. Then the ACHAIANS comming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the city of DYMES, neare vnto the temple of Hecatombæum: Cleomenes going thither, lay betwixt the city of DYMES that was againſt him, and the campe of his enemies, which men thought a very vnwiſe part of him. Howbeit, valiantly prouoking the ACHAIANS, he procured them to the battell, ouerthrew them, made them flie, and ſlue a great number in the field, and tooke many of them alſo priſoners. Departing from thence, he went and ſet vpon the city of LANGON, and draue the garriſon of the ACHAIANS out of it, and reſtored the citie againe vnto the ELIANS. The ACHAIANS being then in very hard ſtate, Aratus that of cuſtome was wont to be their Generall (or at the leaſt once in two yeares) refuſed now to take the charge, notwithſtanding the ACHAIANS did ſpecially pray and intreate him: the which was an ill act of him, to let another ſteere the rudder, in ſo dangerous a ſtorme and tempeſt. Therefore the ACHAIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Cleomenes to treat peace, vnto whom it ſeemed he gaue a very ſharpe anſwer. After that, he ſent vnto them, and willed them only to reſigne the ſignorie of GREECE vnto him: and that for all other matters he would deale reaſonably with them, and preſently deliuer thē vp their townes and priſoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The ACHAIANS being glad of peace with theſe conditions, wrote vnto Cleomenes that he ſhould come vnto the city of LERNA, where the diet and generall aſſembly ſhould be kept to conſult thereupon. It chanced then that Cleomenes marching thither, being very hote, dranke cold water, and fell on ſuch a bleeding withall, that his voice was taken from him, and he almoſt ſtifled. Wherefore he ſent the ACHAIANS their chiefeſt priſoners home againe, proroging the Parliament till another time, and returned backe to LACEDÆMON. It is ſuppoſed certainly, that this let of his comming to the diet, was the only cauſe of the vtter deſtruction of GREECE: the which otherwiſe was in good way to haue riſen againe, and to haue bene deliuered from the preſent miſeries, and extreame pride and couetouſnes

touſneſſe of the MACEDONIANS. For Aratus, either for that he truſted not Cleomenes, or for that he was affraid of his power, or that he otherwiſe enuied his honour and proſperitie, to ſee him riſen to ſuch incredible greatneſſe in ſo ſhort a time, and thinking it alſo too great ſhame and diſhonour to him, to ſuffer this young man in a moment to depriue him of his great honour and power which he had poſſeſſed ſo long time, by the ſpace of thirtie yeares together, ruling all GREECE: firſt he ſought by force to terrifie the ACHAIANS, and to make them breake off from this peace. But in fine, finding that they litle regarded his threates, and that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affraid of Cleomenes valiantneſſe and courage, whoſe requeſt they thought reaſonable, for that he ſought but to reſtore PELOPONNESVS vnto her former auncient ſtate againe: he fell then into a practiſe farre vnhoneſt for a GRECIAN, very infamous for himſelfe, but moſt diſhonourable for the former noble actes he had done. For he brought Antigonus into GREECE, and in his age filled the country of PELOPONNESVS with MACEDONIANS, whom he himſelfe in his youth had driuen thence, had taken from them the caſtle of CORINTH, and had alwaies bene an enemie of the kings (but ſpecially of Antigonus, of whom before he had ſpoken all the ill he could, as appeareth in his writings, ſaying that he tooke maruellous paines, and did put himſelfe into many daungers, to deliuer the citie of ATHENS from the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS) and yet notwithſtanding he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his countrie onely, but into his owne houſe, yea euen into the Ladies chambers and cloſets: diſdaining that the king of LACEDÆMON, deſcending of the bloud royall of Hercules (who ſetting vp againe the ancient manner of life of his countrie, did temper it as an inſtrument of muſicke out of tune, and brought it to the good, ancient and ſober diſcipline, and DORICAN life inſtituted by Lycurgus) ſhould be called and written king of the SICYONIANS, and of the TRICCÆIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread, & with the plain courſe capes of the LACEDEMONIANS, and that went about to take away riches (which was the chiefeſt matter they did accuſe Cleomenes for) and to prouide for the poore: he went and put himſelfe and all ACHAIA vnto the crowne and diademe, the purple robe, and proude imperious commaundement of the MACEDONIANS, fearing leſt men ſhould thinke that Cleomenes could commaund him. Furthermore his folly was ſuch, that hauing garlands of flowers on his head, he did ſacrifice vnto Antigonus, and ſing ſongs in praiſe of his honor, as if he had bene a god, where he was but a rotten man conſumed away. This that we haue written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, and a worthy GRECIAN) is not ſo much to accuſe him, as to make vs ſee the frailtie and weakneſſe of mans nature: the which, though it haue neuer ſo excellent vertues, cannot yet bring foorth ſuch perfect fruit, but that it hath euer ſome maime and bleminſh. Now when the ACHAIANS were met againe in the citie of ARGOS, to hold the ſeſſion of their parliament before proroged, and Cleomenes alſo being come from TEGEA, to be at that parliament: euery man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before of the chiefeſt articles of the capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by faire words or force would bring the people to grant that he deſired: ſent to let him vnderſtand, that he ſhould but come himſelfe alone into the citie, and for ſafetie of his perſon, they would giue him three hundred hoſtages: or otherwiſe, if he would not leaue his armie, that then they would giue audience without the citie, in the place of exerciſes, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their aunſwer, he told them that they had done him wrong: for they ſhould haue aduertiſed him of it before he had taken his iourney, and not now when he was almoſt hard at their gates, to ſend him backe againe, with a flea in his eare. Thereupon he wrote a letter vnto the Councell of the ACHAIANS, altogether full of complaints againſt Aratus. On the other ſide alſo, Aratus in his Oration to the Councell, inueighed with bitter words againſt Cleomenes. Thereupon Cleomenes departing with ſpeede, ſent a Herauld to proclaime warres againſt the ACHAIANS, not in the citie of ARGOS, but in the citie of ÆGION, (as Aratus writeth) meaning to ſet vpon them being vnprouided. Hereupon all ACHAIA was in an vprore: for diuerſe cities did preſently reuolt againſt the ACHAIANS, becauſe the common people hoped after the diuiſion of lands, and diſcharging of their debts. The Noblemen alſo in many places were offended with Aratus, becauſe he practiſed to bring the MACEDONIANS into the country of PELOPONNESVS. Cleomenes therefore hoping well for all theſe reſpects, brought his armie into ACHAIA, and at his firſt comming tooke the city of PALLENA, and draue out the garriſon of the ACHAIANS: and after that, wan alſo the cities of PHENEVM, and PENTELIVM. Now the ACHAIANS

fearing ſome treaſon in CORINTH and SYCIONE, ſent certaine horſemen out of the city of ARGOS, to keepe thoſe cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the celebration of the feaſt at the games Nemeea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to ARGOS, he ſhould find the city full of people that were come to ſee the feaſts and games, and that aſſailing them vpon the ſodaine, he ſhould put them in a maruellous feare: brought his armie in the night hard to the wals of the citie of ARGOS, and at his firſt comming wan a place they call Aſpis, a very ſtrong place aboue the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The ARGIVES were ſo amazed at it, that no man would take vpon him to defend the citie, but receiued Cleomenes garriſon, and gaue him twenty hoſtages, promiſing thencefoorth to be true confederates vnto the LACEDEMONIANS, vnder his charge and conduct. The which doubtleſſe wan him great fame, and increaſed his power: for that the auncient kings of LACEDÆMON, could neuer before with any pollicie or deuice, win the citie of ARGOS. For king Pyrrhus one of the moſt valianteſt and warlikeſt Princes that euer was, entring the citie of ARGOS by force, could not keepe it, but was ſlaine there, and the moſt part of his armie: whereby euery man wondred greatly at the diligence and counſell of Cleomenes. And where euery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes ſaid that he would follow Solon and Lycurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and diſcharging all debts: they were then clearely perſwaded that he onely was the cauſe and meane of that great change, which they ſaw in the courage of the SPARTANS: who were before ſo weake and out of hart, that they hauing no courage to defend themſelues, the ÆTOLIANS entring LACONIA with an armie, tooke away at one time fiftie thouſand ſlaues. Whereupon an old man of SPARTA pleaſantly ſaid at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleaſure, to rid their country of LACONIA of ſuch a rabble of raſcals. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former auncient diſcipline of Lycurgus, as if Lycurgus ſelfe had bene aliue to haue trained them vnto it: they ſhewed themſelues very valiant, and obedient alſo vnto their Magiſtrates, wherby they recouered againe the commandement of all GREECE, and the countrey alſo of PELOPONNESVS. After Cleomenes had taken the citie of ARGOS, the cities alſo of CLEONES, and PHLIVNTA, did yeeld themſelues vnto him. Aratus in the meane time remained at CORINTH, and there did buſily accuſe them which were ſuſpected to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS. But when newes was brought him that ARGOS was taken, and that he perceiued alſo the citie of CORINTH did leane vnto Cleomenes part, and draue away the ACHAIANS: he then calling the people to counſell in CORINTH, ſecretly ſtale to one of the gates of the citie, and cauſing his horſe to be brought vnto him, tooke his backe, and gallopped for life vnto the city of SICYONE. When the CORINTHIANS heard of it, they tooke their horſebacks alſo, ſtriuing who ſhould be there ſooneſt, and poſted in ſuch haſt vnto Cleomenes at the city of ARGOS, that many of them (as Aratus writeth) killed their horſes by the way: howbeit Cleomenes was very much offended with them, for that they had let him ſcape their hands. But Aratus ſaith further, that Megiſtonus came vnto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great ſumme of money to deliuer him the caſtle of CORINTH, wherein there was a great garriſon of the ACHAIANS. But he anſwered againe, that things were not in his power, but rather that he was ſubiect to their power. Now Cleomenes departing from the city of ARGOS, ouercame the TROEZENIANS, the EPIDAVRIANS, and the HERMIONIANS. After that, he came vnto CORINTH, and preſently intrenched the caſtle there round about, and ſending for Aratus friends and factors, commaunded them to keepe his houſe and goods carefully for him, and ſent Tritymallus MESSINIAN againe vnto him, to pray him to be contented that the caſtle might be kept indifferently betwixt the ACHAIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, promiſing him priuately to double the penſion that king Ptolomy gaue him. But Aratus refuſing it, ſent his ſon vnto Antigonus with other hoſtages, and perſwaded the ACHAIANS to deliuer vp the caſtle of CORINTH into Antigonus hands. Cleomenes vnderſtanding it, entred with his army into the countrie of the SICYONIANS, and deſtroyed it as he went, and tooke Aratus goods and money of the gift of the CORINTHIANS by decree. Now Antigonus in the mean time, being paſſed the mountaine of Gerania with a great power: Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the ISTHMVS or the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, but the waies of the mountaines Onienes, determining to keepe euery one of them againſt the MACEDONIANS, with intent to conſume them rather by time, then to fight a battell with an armie, ſo good ſouldiers, and well trained as they were. Cleomenes following this determination, did put Antigonus to great trouble, becauſe he had not in time prouided for corne: and could not win the paſſage alſo by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with

with such guard and souldiers. Then Antigonus stealing secretly into the hauen of LECHÆVM, he was stoutly repulsed, and lost a number of his men: whereupon Cleomenes and his men being couragions for this victorie, went quietly to supper. Antigonus on the other side fell into dispaire to see himselfe brought by necessitie into such hard tearmes. Wherefore he determined to go to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to passe his armie by sea into the citie of SICYONE, the which required a long time, and great preparation. But the same night there came some of Aratus friends of the ARGIVES, who comming from ARGOS by sea, brought newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practiser of this rebellion, was one Aristoteles, who easily brought the people vnto it, that were already offended with Cleomenes, that had promised to passe a law for the clearing of debts, but performed it not according to their expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thousand fiue hundred men which Antigonus gaue him, went by sea vnto EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit Aristoteles taried not his comming, but taking them of the citie with him, went and besieged the garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS within the castell, being aided by Timoxenus, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiuing aduertisement hereof, about the second watch of the night, sent for Megistonus in hast, and commaunded him in anger speedily to go and aide their men that were in the citie of ARGOS. For it was Megistonus himselfe that promised Cleomenes the fidelitie of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driuing them out of the citie, which he suspected. So sending him away foorthwith with two thousand men, he attended Antigonus, and comforted the CORINTHIANS the best he could: aduertising them that it was but a little mutinie of a few, that chaunced in the citie of ARGOS. Megistonus being come to ARGOS, and slaine in battell, fighting for the LACEDÆMONIANS in garrison there, who (being in great distresse, & scant able to keepe the castell against the enemies) sent sundrie messengers vnto Cleomenes, to pray him to send them immediate aide. Cleomenes then being affraid that the enemies hauing taken ARGOS, would stoppe his way to returne backe into his countrey, who hauing oportunitie safely to spoile LACONIA, and also to besiege the citie selfe of SPARTA, that had but a few men to defend it, he departed with his armie from CORINTH. Immediatly after came Antigonus, and tooke it from him, and put a strong garrison into it. When Cleomenes came before the citie of ARGOS, he scaled the walles, and breaking the vaults and arches of the place called Aspis, entred into the citie, and ioyned with his garrison there, which yet resisted the ACHAIANS: and taking other partes of the same also, assaulted the walles, and cleared the streetes in such sort, that not an enemie durst be seene, for feare of the archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he saw Antigonus a farre off, comming downe the hilles into the valley with his footemen, and that his horsemen also came vpon the spurre into the citie: dispairing then that he could any longer keepe it, he gathered all his men together, and safely going downe by the walles, retired without losse of anie man. So, when in short time he had conquered much, and had almost wonne all within PELOPONNESVS: in shorter space also, he lost all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his campe, some did presently forsake him: others also immediatly after surrendered vp the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes being thus oppressed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the rest of his armie, newes came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, which grieued him as much as the losse of all his conquests: for he was aduertised of the death of his wife Agiatis, whome he loued so dearely, that in the middest of his chiefest prosperitie and victories, he made often iourneys to SPARTA to see her. It could not be but a maruellous griefe vnto Cleomenes, who being a young man, had lost so vertuous and faire a yong Ladie, so dearely beloued of him: and yet he gaue not place vnto his sorow, neither did griefe ouercome his noble courage, but he vsed the selfe same voice, apparell, and countenance that he did before. Then taking order with his priuate captaines about his affaires, and hauing prouided also for the safetie of the THEBANS: he went the next morning by breake of day vnto SPARTA. After he had priuatly lamented the sorrow of his wiues death, with his mother and children, he presently bent his mind againe to publike causes. Now Cleomenes had sent vnto Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, who had promised him aide, but vpon demaund, to haue his mother and children in pledge. So he was a long time before he would for shame make his mother priuie vnto it, and went oftentimes of purpose to let her vnderstand it: but when he came he had not the heart to breake it to her. She first suspecting the thing, asked Cleomenes friends, if her sonne had not somewhat to say vnto her, that he durst not vtter. Whereupon, in fine he gaue the venture, and brake the matter to her. When ſhe heard it, ſhe fell a laughing, and told him: Why, how cometh it to paſſe, that thou haſt kept it thus long, and wouldeſt not tell me? Come, come, ſaid ſhe, put me ſtraight into a ſhip, and ſend me whither thou wilt, that this bodie of mine may do ſome good vnto my countrey, before crooked age conſume my life without profite. Then all things being prepared for their iourney, they went by land, accompanied with the armie, vnto the head of Tænarus: where Crateſiclea being ready to imbarke, ſhe tooke Cleomenes aſide into the temple of Neptune, and embracing and kiſſing him, perceiuing that his heart yearned for ſorrow of her departure, ſhe ſaid vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, let no man ſee for ſhame when we come out of the temple, that we haue wept and diſhonored SPARTA: for that onely is in our power, as for the reſt, as it pleaſeth the gods, ſo let it be. When ſhe had ſpoken theſe words, and faſhioned her countenance againe, ſhe went then to take her ſhip with a litle ſonne of Cleomenes, and commaunded the maiſter of the ſhippe to hoiſe ſaile. Now when ſhe was arriued in ÆGYPT, and vnderſtood that king Ptolomy receiued Ambaſſadours from Antigonus, and were in talke to make peace with him: and hearing alſo that Cleomenes being requeſted by the ACHAIANS to make peace with them, durſt not hearken to it, and end that warre, without king Ptolomyes conſent, and becauſe of his mother: ſhe wrote vnto him, that he ſhould not ſpare to do any thing that ſhould be expedient for the honour of SPARTA, without feare of diſpleaſing Ptolomy, or for regard of an old woman, and a young boy. Such was the noble mind of this worthie Lady in her ſonne Cleomenes aduerſitie. Furthermore, Antigonus hauing taken the city of TEGEA, and ſacked the other cities of ORCHOMENE & MANTINEA, Cleomenes ſeeing himſelf brought to defend the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumiſſe all the ILOTES, (which were the ſlaues of LACEDÆMON) paying fiue Attica Minas a man. With that money he made the ſum of fiue hundred talents, and armed two thouſand of theſe freed ſlaues after the MACEDONIAN faſhion to fight againſt the LEVCASPIDES: (to wit, the white ſhields of Antigonus) and then there fell into his mind a maruellous great enterpriſe, vnlooked for of euery man. The citie of MEGALIPOLIS at that time being as great as SPARTA, & hauing the aide of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand, (whom the ACHAIANS as it ſeemed had brought in, chiefly at the requeſt of the MEGALIPOLITANS) Cleomenes determining to ſacke this city, and knowing that to bring it to paſſe, nothing was more requiſite then celerity, he commaunded his ſouldiers to victuall themſelues for fiue daies, and marching with the choiſe of all his armie towards SELASIA, as though he had meant to haue ſpoiled the ARGIVES, ſodainely turning from thence, he inuaded the countrie of the MEGALIPOLITANS, and ſupping by ROETIVM, went ſtraight by ELICVNTA vnto the city. When he was come neare vnto it, he ſent Panteas before with ſpeede, with two bands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commanded him to take a certaine peece of the wall betweene two towers, which he knew was not kept nor guarded, and he followed him alſo with the reſt of his army comming on faire and ſoftly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the wall without guard or watch which Cleomenes had told him of, but alſo the moſt part of that ſide without defence: he tooke ſome part of the wall at his firſt comming, and manned it, and ouerthrew another peece of it alſo, putting them all to the ſword that did defend it, and then came Cleomenes, and was within the citie with his armie, before the MEGALIPOLITANS knew of his comming. At length, the citizens vnderſtanding that the city was taken, ſome fled in haſt, conueying ſuch light things as came to hand, in ſo great a feare: and the others alſo arming themſelues, ran together to reſiſt the enemies. But though they valiantly fought to repulſe them out of the citie, and yet preuailed not: they gaue the reſt leyſure thereby to flie and ſaue themſelues, ſo that there remained not behind, aboue a thouſand men. For all the reſt were fled with their wiues and children, into the citie of MESSINA. The moſt part of them alſo that fought with the enemies, ſaued themſelues, and very few were taken, the chiefeſt whereof, were Lyſandridas, and Thearidas, the nobleſt perſons that were amongſt the MEGALIPOLITANS: wherefore when the ſouldiers had taken them, they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lyſandridas, when he ſaw Cleomenes a good way off, cryed out aloud vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, this day thou haſt an occaſion offered thee to do a more famous princely act, then that which thou haſt already done, and that will make thy name alſo more glorious. Cleomenes muſing what he would requeſt: Well (quoth he) what is that thou requireſt? One thing I will tell thee beforehand, thou ſhalt not make me reſtore your city to you againe. Yet, quoth Lyſandridas, let me requeſt thus much then, that ye do not deſtroy it, but rather repleniſh it with friends and confederates, derates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that shall you do, giuing the MEGALIPOLITANS their citie againe, and preseruing such a number of people as haue forsaken it. Cleomenes pawsing awhile, answered, it was a hard thing to beleeue that: but yet, quoth he, let honour take place with vs before profite. After that he sent a Herald straight vnto MESSINA vnto them that were fled thither, and told them that he was contented to offer them their citie again, so that they would become good friends and confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, forsaking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopæmen would by no meanes suffer the MEGALIPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor also to leaue their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he meant not to giue them their citie againe, but to take them also with their citie: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lysandridas out of MESSINA, that moued this practise. It was that Philopæmen that afterwards was the chiefest man of the ACHAIANS, and that wanne such fame and honour among the GRECIANS, as we haue particularly declared in his life. This word being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the citie from spoiling vntill that time: he was then so throughly offended, that he gaue the goods in prey to the souldiers, sent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto SPARTA, and defaced the chiefest parts of the citie, and then returned home againe, being afraid of Antigonus and the ACHAIANS. Howbeit they stirred not, because of the parliament that was kept at that time in the city of ÆGIVM, where Aratus being in the pulpit for Orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ayled: he answered them: MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and razed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the sodainnesse of this great losse, straight brake off their parliament and assembly. But Antigonus thinking to aide them, sent presently for all his garrisons, who being long a comming, he willed them to stay where they were, and he himselfe taking a few souldiers with him, went vnto the citie of ARGOS. Therfore the second enterprise of Cleomenes seemeth at the first sight a very rash and desperate attempt: howbeit Polybius writeth, that it was an attempt of great wisedome and pollicie. For Cleomenes vnderstanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in garrisons in diuerse places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the city of ARGOS, with a certaine number of footmen that were strangers: he inuaded the country of the ARGIVES with his army, perswading himselfe, that either Antigonus would for shame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then he should put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES: which indeed came so to passe. The ARGIVES seeing their country spoiled by Cleomenes, were in a maruellous rage, & gathering together at Antigonus lodging, they cryed out vnto him, either to go into the field and fight with the enemie: or else if he were affraid, to resigne his office of Generall of GRECE vnto others that were valianter then himselfe. But Antigonus like a wise and excellent Captaine, thinking it a dishonour to him, rashly to put himselfe in daunger, and his friends also, though he were prouoked with many iniuries and opprobrious words: would not go into the field, but stood constant in his first determination. Then Cleomenes hauing brought his armie hard to the walles of the city of ARGOS, and spoiled and destroyed the country round about: without let or daunger he safely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes being aduertised that Antigonus was come vnto TEGEA, with intent to inuade the countrie of LACONIA: he going another way with his armie (vnwitting to his enemies) they wondred when they saw him in the morning by the city of ARGOS, spoiling their countrie, & cutting down their corn, not with sickles or swords as other do vse, but with long poles in forme of sithes, wherewith the soldiers as they went sporting wise, ouerthrew and spoiled it. But when they came to the place of exercises in the suburbs, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the souldiers going about to haue set it a fire, Cleomenes would not suffer them, and told thē, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honestly done. Now Antigonus presently returned backe againe, being minded first to haue gone directly to the city of ARGOS, but sodainly altering his mind, did campe vpon the top of hils and mountaines: Cleomenes seeming not to be afraid of him, sent Heralds to him to desire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done sacrifice, he would depart his way. Thus mocking Antigonus, after he had sacrificed vnto the goddesse, vnder the temple that was shut vp, he sent his armie vnto PHLIVNTA, and hauing driuen away the garrison out of OLOGVNTA, he came vnto the citie of ORCHOMENE, hauing not onely encouraged his citizens, but gotten euen amongest the enemies themselues, a fame also to be a noble Captaine, and worthie to mannage great affaires. For euery man iudged him to be a skilfull souldier, and a valiant Captaine, that with the power of one only citie, did maintain war against the kingdom of MACEDON, against al the people of PELOPONNESVS, and against the treasure of so great a king: and withall, not only to keep his owne countrie of LACONIA vnfoyled, but farre otherwise to hurt his enemies countries, and to take so many great cities of theirs. But he that said first, that money was the sinew of all things, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the warres. Demades the Oratour sayed on a time, when the ATHENIANS commaunded certaine gallies should be put out of the arsenall into the sea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked money: he that rules the prowe, must first see before him: meaning munition and victuals must be prouided, before the ships be set out. And it is reported also, that the auncient Archidamus, when the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS at the beginning of the warre of PELOPONNESVS required, that they might be sessed at a certaine rate, answered: The charges of war haue no certaine stint. For like as wrestlers that exercise their bodies continually in games, are better able to wrestle, and ouerthrow them with time that haue no strength but onely art and slight: euen so king Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his kingdome did defray the charge of this warre, did wearie and ouercome Cleomenes at the length, because he lacked money both to pay the straungers that serued him, and also to maintaine his owne citizens. For otherwise doubtlesse the time serued his turne well, because the troubles that fell vpon Antigonus in his Realme, did make him to be sent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his absence did spoile and destroy the realme of MACEDON, and specially the ILLYRIANS of the high countrey that came downe then with a great armie: whereupon the MACEDONIANS being spoiled and harried on all sides by them, they sent post vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If these letters had bene brought him but a litle before the battell, as they came afterwards, Antigonus had gone his way, and left the ACHAIANS. But fortune that alwaies striketh the stroke in all weightiest causes, gaue such speed and fauour vnto him: that immediatly after the battell was fought at SELASIA, (where Cleomenes lost his armie and citie) the very messengers arriued that came for Antigonus to come home, the which made the ouerthrow of king Cleomenes so much more lamentable. For if he had delayed battell but two daies longer, when the MACEDONIANS had bene gone, he might haue made what peace he would with the ACHAIANS: but for lacke of money, he was driuen (as Polybius writeth) to giue battell with twentie thousand men, against thirtie thousand: where he shewed himselfe an excellent and skilfull Captaine, and where his citizens also fought like valiant men, and the straungers in like case did shew themselues good souldiers. But his onely ouerthrow was by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footemen. But Phylarchus writeth, that treason was the cause of his ouerthrow. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS which he had in his armie, to steale vpon the wing of his enemies armie, where Euclidas, king Cleomenes brother was, to compasse him in behind, whilest he did set the rest of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got vp vpon some hill to looke about him, to see the countenance of the enemie, and seeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS: he was then affrayed of Antigonus, that he went about some stratageme of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heede of stratagemes and secret ambushes, and commaunded him to looke to the rereward of his armie, and to be very circumspect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, told him that all was cleare in the rereward, and bad him looke to ouerthrow his enemies before him. Cleomenes trusting this report, set forward against Antigonus, and in the end, his citizens of SPARTA which he had about him, gaue such a fierce charge vpon the squadron of the MACEDONIAN footmen, that they draue them backe fiue furlongs off. But in the meane time, Euclidas his brother, in the other wing of his army, being compassed in behind, Cleomenes turning him backe, and seeing the ouerthrow, cryed out aloud: Alas good brother, thou art but slaine, yet thou diest valiantly, and honestly, and thy death shall be a worthie example vnto all posteritie, and shall be sung by the praises of the women of SPARTA. So Euclidas and his men being slaine, the enemies came straight to set vpon Cleomenes wing. Cleomenes then seeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no longer resist the enemie, fled, and saued himselfe. Many of the straungers also that serued him, were slaine at this battell: and of fixe thousand SPARTANS, there were left aliue but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned vnto SPARTA, the citizens comming to see him, he gaue them counsell to yeeld themselues vnto Antigonus the conquerour: and for himselfe, if either aliue or dead he could do any thing for the honour and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly do it. The women of the city alſo, comming vnto them that flying had eſcaped with him, when he ſaw them vnarme the men, and bring them drink to refreſh them with: he alſo went home to his owne houſe. The a maide of the houſe, which he had taken in the city of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had entertained euer ſince the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refreſh him comming hote from the battell: howbeit he would not drinke though he was extreame dry, nor ſit being very wearie, but armed as he was, laid his arme a croſſe vpon a pillar, and leaning his head vpon it, repoſed himſelfe a litle, and caſting in his mind all the waies that were to be thought of, he tooke his friends with him, and went to the hauen of Gythium, and there hauing his ſhippes which he had appointed for the purpoſe, he hoiſſed ſaile, and departed his way. Immediatly after his departure, came Antigonus into the city of SPARTA, and courteouſly intreated the citizens and inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly deſpiſe the ancient honour and dignity of SPARTA: but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernment, when he had ſacrificed to the gods for his victory, he departed frō thence the third day, newes being brought him that the war was very great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous people did ſpoile his cuntrie. Now a diſeaſe tooke him, whereof he died afterwards, which appeared a tiſicke, mixt with a ſore catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his diſeaſe, and bare it out, that fighting for his countrey, and obtaining a famous victorie, with great ſlaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet dye honorably, as indeed he did, by Phylarchus teſtimonie, who ſaith, that with the force of his voice fiercely crying out in the middeſt of his fight, he tare his lungs and lights, worſe then they were before. Yet in the ſchooles it is ſaid, that after he had won the battell, he was ſo ioyfull of it, that crying out, O bleſſed day: he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great feuer took him withall, that he died of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Iſle of CYTHERA, went and caſt anker in another Iland, called ÆGLALIA. Then determining to ſaile ouer to the city of CYRENA, Therycion, one of Cleomenes friends (a man that in wars ſhewed himſelfe very valiant, but a boaſter beſides of his owne doings) tooke Cleomenes aſide, and ſaid thus vnto him: Truly ô king, we haue loſt an honorable occaſion to die in battell, though euery man hath heard vs vaunt and ſay, that Antigonus ſhold neuer ouercome the king of SPARTA aliue, but dead. A ſecond occaſion yet is offered vs to dye, with much leſſe honour and fame notwithſtanding then the firſt. Whither do we ſaile to no purpoſe? Why do we flie the death at hand, and ſeeke it ſo farre off? If it be no ſhame nor diſhonor for the poſteritie and race of Hercules to ſerue the ſucceſſors of Philip and Alexander: let vs ſaue then our labour, and long dangerous ſailing, and go yeeld our ſelues vnto Antigonus, who in likelihood will better vſe vs then Ptolomy, becauſe the MACEDONIANS are far more noble perſons then the ÆGYPTIANS. And if we diſdaine to be commaunded by them which haue ouercome vs in battell, why then will we make him Lord of vs, that hath not ouercome vs: in ſteade of one, to make vs inferiour vnto both, flying Antigonus, and ſeruing king Ptolomy? Can we ſay that we go into ÆGYPT, in reſpect to ſee your mother there? A ioyfull ſight no doubt, when ſhe ſhall ſhew king Ptolomies wiues her ſon, that before was a king, a priſoner and fugitiue now. Were it not better for vs, that hauing yet LACONIA our country in ſight, and our ſwords beſides in our owne hands, to deliuer vs from this great miſery, and ſo doing to excuſe our ſelues with them that are ſlaine at SELASIA for defence of SPARTA: then cowardly loſing our time in ÆGYPT, to enquire whom Antigonus left his Lieutenant and Gouernor in LACEDÆMON? Therycion ending his oration, Cleomenes anſwered him thus: Doeſt thou thinke it a glorie for thee to ſeeke death, which is the eaſieſt matter, and the preſenteſt vnto any man, that can be: and yet, wretch that thou art, thou flyeſt now more cowardly and ſhamefully, then from the battell? For diuerſe valiant men, and farre better then our ſelues, haue often yeelded vnto their enemies, either by ſome misfortune, or compelled by greater number, and multitude of men: but he, ſay I, that ſubmitteth himſelfe vnto paine and miſerie, or to reproach and praiſe of men, he cannot but confeſſe that he is ouercome by his own vnhappineſſe. For when a man will willingly kill himſelfe, he muſt not do it to be rid of paines and labour, but it muſt haue an honourable reſpect and action. For to liue or dye for his owne reſpect, that cannot but be diſhonourable: the which now thou perſwadeſt me vnto, to make me flye this preſent miſerie we are in, without any honour or profite in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we ſhould not yet caſt off the hope, we haue to ſerue our countrey in time to come: but when all hope faileth vs, then we may eaſily make our ſelues away when we

liſt. Thereunto Therycion gaue no anſwer, but aſſoone as he found oportunitie to ſlip frō Cleomenes, he went to the ſea ſide, and ſlue himſelfe. Cleomenes hoiſſing ſaile from the Ile of ÆGIALIA, went into AFRICKE, and was brought by the kings ſeruants vnto the citie of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his firſt comming, gaue Cleomenes no ſpeciall good, but indifferent entertainement: but after that he had ſhewed himſelfe to be of great wiſedome and iudgement, and that Ptolomy ſaw in the ſimplicity of his LACONIAN life he had alſo a noble diſpoſition and courage, nothing degenerating from the princely race and bloud of Hercules, and that he yeelded not to his aduerſitie: he tooke more delight in his company, then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly, that he had made no more account of him before, but had ſuffered him to be ouerthrowne by Antigonus, who through the victory of him, had maruellouſly enlarged his honour and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honor as could be, promiſed that he would ſend him with ſhips and mony into GREECE, and put him againe into his kingdome: and further, gaue him an annuall penſion in the meane time, of foure and twenty talents,, with the which he ſimply and ſoberly entertained him ſelfe and his men about him: and beſtowed all the reſt vpon his countrimen that came out of GREECE into ÆGYPT. But now old king Ptolomy deceaſing before he could performe the promiſe he made vnto Cleomenes, to ſend him into GREECE, the realme falling then into great laſciuiouſneſſe, drunkennes, and into the gouernment of women, his caſe and miſerie was cleane forgotten. For the yong king his ſon was ſo giuen ouer to women and wine, that when he was moſt ſober, and in his beſt wits, he moſt diſpoſed himſelfe to make feaſts and ſacrifices, and to haue the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a ſtage player or iugler, whileſt one Agathoclea his lemman, and her mother, and Oenanthes a baud, did rule all the affaires of the ſtate. But when he came to be king, it appeared he had need of Cleomenes: becauſe he was afraid of his brother Magas, who by his mothers means, was very well eſteemed of among ſoldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, and made him of his priuy Councell, where he deuiſed by practiſe, which way to kill his brother. All other his friends that were of counſell with him, did counſell him to do it: but Cleomenes only vehemently diſſwaded him from it, and told him, that if it were poſſible, rather more brethren ſhould be begotten vnto the king for the ſafetie of his perſon, and for deuiding of the affaires of the kingdome betweene them. Amongeſt the kings familiars that were chiefeſt about him, there was one Soſibius that ſaid vnto Cleomenes: So long as his brother Magas liued, the ſouldiers that be ſtrangers, whom the king entertained, would neuer be true to him. Cleomenes anſwered him, for that matter there was no daunger: for, ſaith he, of thoſe hired ſtrangers, there are three thouſand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knew at the twinckling of an eye would be at his commandement, to come with their armour and weapon where he would appoint them. Theſe words of Cleomenes at that time ſhewed his faith and goodwill he bare vnto the king, and the force he was of beſides. But afterwards, Ptolomies fearefulneſſe increaſing his miſtruſt: (as it commonly hapneth, that they that lacke wit, thinke it the beſt ſafetie to be fearefull of euery wagging of a ſtraw, & to miſtruſt euery man) the remembrance of Cleomenes words made him much ſuſpected of the Courtiers, vnderſtanding that he could do ſo much with the ſoldiers that were ſtrangers: inſomuch as ſome of them ſaid: See (meaning Cleomenes) there is a Lyon amongſt ſheepe. Indeed conſidering his faſhions and behauior, they might well ſay ſo of him: for he would looke through his fingers as though he ſaw nothing, and yet ſaw all what they did. In fine, he required an army and ſhips of the king: and vnderſtanding alſo that Antigonus was dead, and that the ACHAIANS and ÆTOLIANS were at great wars together, and that the affairs of his country did call him home, all PELOPONNESVS being in armes & vprore, he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But neuer a man would giue eare vnto him, & the king alſo heard nothing of it, becauſe he was continually entertained among ladies, with banquets, dancing, and maskes. But Soſibius that ruled all the realme, thought that to keepe Cleomenes againſt his will, were a hard thing, and alſo daungerous: and to let him go alſo, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a ſtirring mind, and one that knew the vices and imperfections of their gouernment: he thought that alſo no ſafe way, ſith no gifts nor preſents that could be offered him, could ſoften him. For as the holy bull (which they call in ÆGYPT, Apis) that is full fed in goodly paſture, doth yet deſire to follow his naturall courſe and liberty, to runne and leape at his pleaſure, and plainely ſheweth that it is a griefe to him to be kept ſtill by the Prieſt: euen ſo the courtly pleaſures did nothing delight Cleomenes, but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

Cleomenes flyeth into Ægypt vnto king Ptolomie.

Cleomenes vertue.

It

It irkt his noble heart to ſit at home in ſlothfull reſt,
When martiall matters were in hand, the which he liked beſt.

Now Cleomenes ſtanding in theſe termes, there arriued in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras MESSINIAN, who maliced Cleomenes in his heart, but yet ſhewed as though he loued him. This Nicagoras on a time had ſold Cleomenes certaine land, but was not payed for it, either becauſe he had no preſent money, or elſe by occaſion of the wars which gaue him no leyſure to make payment. Cleomenes one day by chance walking vpon the ſands, he ſaw Nicagoras landing out of his ſhip, being newly arriued, and knowing him, he curteouſly welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into ÆGYPT. Nicagoras gently ſaluting him againe, told him that he had brought the king excellent horſe of ſeruice. Cleomenes ſmiling, told him, Thou hadſt bene better haue brought him ſome curtiſans and dancers, for they would haue pleaſed the king better. Nicagoras faintly laughed at his anſwer, but within few daies after he did put him in remembrance of the land he ſold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to mony, telling him that he would not haue preſt him for it, but that he had ſuſtained loſſe by merchandiſe. Cleomenes anſwered him, that all his penſion was ſpent he had of the king. Nicagoras being offended with this anſwer, he went and told Soſibius of the mocke Cleomenes gaue the king. Soſibius was glad of this occaſion, but yet deſiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes, he perſwaded Nicagoras to write a letter to the king againſt Cleomenes, as though he had conſpired to take the city of CYRENA, if the king had giuen him ſhips, money, and men of warre. When Nicagoras had written this letter, he tooke ſhippe, and hoiſſed ſaile. Foure daies after his departure, Soſibius brought his letter to the king, as though he had but newly receiued it. The king vpon ſight of it, was ſo offended with Cleomenes, that he gaue preſent order he ſhould be ſhut vp in a great houſe, where he ſhould haue his ordinarie diet allowed him, howbeit that he ſhould keepe his houſe. This grieued Cleomenes much, but yet he was worſe afraid of that which was to come, by this occaſion: Ptolomy the ſon of Chryſermus, one of the kings familiars, who had oftentimes before bene very conuerſant and familiar with Cleomenes, and did franckly talke together in all matters: Cleomenes one day ſent for him, to pray him to come vnto him. Ptolomy came at his requeſt, and familiarly diſcourſing together, went about to diſſwade him from all the ſuſpitions he had, and excuſed the king alſo for that he had done vnto him: ſo taking his leaue he left him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the gate, where he ſharply tooke vp the ſouldiers, ſaying, that they were very negligent and careleſſe in looking to ſuch a fearefull beaſt as he was, and ſo ill to be taken if he once ſcaped their hands. Cleomenes heard what he ſaid, and went into his lodging againe, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very words againe vnto his friends. Then all the SPARTANS conuerting their good hope into anger, determined to be reuenged of the iniurie Ptolomy had done them, and to die like noble SPARTANS not tarying till they ſhould be brought to the ſhambles like fat weathers, to be ſold and killed. For it would be a great ſhame and diſhonor vnto Cleomenes, hauing refuſed to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince and warrier, to tary the kings pleaſure till he had left his drunkenneſſe and dancing, and then to come and put him to death. They being fully reſolued hereof, as you haue heard: king Ptolomy by chance went vnto the city of CANOBVS, and firſt they gaue out in ALEXANDRIA, that the king minded to ſet Cleomenes at liberty. Then Cleomenes friends obſeruing the cuſtome of the kings of ÆGYPT, when they meant to ſet a priſoner at liberty (which was, to ſend the priſoners meat, & preſents before to their ſupper) did ſend vnto him ſuch maner of preſents, and ſo deceiued the ſouldiers that had the keeping of him, ſaying, that they brought thoſe preſents from the king. For Cleomenes himſelfe did ſacrifice vnto the gods, and ſent vnto the ſoldiers that kept him, part of thoſe preſents that were ſent vnto him, and ſupping with his friends that night, made merrie with them, euery man being crowned with garlands. Some ſay, that he made the more haſt to execute his enterpriſe, ſooner then he would haue done, by meanes of one of his men that was priuy vnto his conſpiracy: who went euery night to lie with a woman he kept, and therfore was afraid leſt he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noone, perceiuing the ſouldiers had taken in their cups, and that they were aſleepe: he put on his coate, and vnripping it on the right ſhoulder, went out of the houſe with his ſword drawne in his hand, accompanied with his friends, following him in that ſort, which were thirty in all. Amongeſt them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very liuely out with them at the firſt: but when he ſaw they went faire & ſoftly becauſe of him, he prayed thē to kil him, becauſe they ſhould not hinder their enterprise for a lame man, that could do them no seruice. Notwithstanding, by chance they met with a townes man a horseback, that came hard by their doore, whom they pluckt from his horse and cast Hippotas vpon him: and then ran through the citie, and cryed to the people, Libertie, libertie. Now the people had no other courage in them, but only commended Cleomenes, and wondred at his valiantnesse: but otherwise to follow him, or to further his enterprise, not a man of them had any heart in them. Thus running vp and downe the towne, they met with Ptolomy (the same whom we said before was the son of Chrysermus) as he came out of the Court: whereupon three of them setting on him, slue him presently. There was also another Ptolomy that was Gouernour and Lieutenant of the city of ALEXANDRIA: who hearing a rumour of this stirre, came vnto them in his coach. They went and met him, and first hauing driuen away his guard and soldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his coach, and slue him also. After that they went towards the castle, with intent to set all the prisoners there at liberty to take their part. Howbeit the iaylers that kept them had so strongly locked vp the prison doores, that Cleomenes was repulsed and put by his purpose. Thus wandering vp and downe the citie, no man neither came to ioyne with him, nor to resist him, for euery man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being wearie with going vp and downe, he turned him to his friends, and said vnto them: It is no maruell though women commaund such a cowardly people, that flie in this sort from their liberty. Thereupon he prayed them all to die like men, and like those that were brought vp with him, and that were worthy of the fame of his so noble deeds. Then the first man that made himselfe be slaine, was Hippotas, who died of a wound one of the young men of his companie gaue him with a sword at his request. After him euery man slue themselues, one after another, without any feare at all, sauing Panteas, who was the first man that entred the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. He was a faire young man, and had bene very well brought vp in the LACONIAN discipline, and better then any man of his yeares. Cleomenes did loue him dearely, and commaunded him that when he should see he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill himselfe last of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he searched them one after another with the point of his sword, to see if there were any of them yet left aliue: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongst others, and saw that he did yet knit his brows, he kissed him, and sate downe by him. Then perceiuing that he had yeelded vp the ghost, embracing him when he was dead, he also slue himselfe, and fell vpon him. Thus Cleomenes hauing raigned king of SPARTA sixteene yeares, being the same manner of man we haue described him to be, he ended his daies in this sort as ye heare. Now his death being presently bruted through the city, Cratesiclea his mother, though otherwise she had a noble mind, did notwithstanding a litle forget her greatnes, through the extreame sorrow she felt for the death of her son: and so embracing Cleomenes sons, she fell to bitter lamentation. But the eldest of his sonnes, (no man mistrusting any such matter) found means to get out of her hands, and running vp to the top of the house, cast himselfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and splitted, yet dyed not, but was taken vp crying, and angry with thē, that they would not suffer him to die. This newes being brought to king Ptolomy, he commanded they should first flea Cleomenes, and then hang vp his body, and also, that they should put his children, his mother, and all her women waiting on her to death: among the which was Panteas wife, one of the faireſt and curteousest women in her time. They had not bene long maried before, when these mischiefes lighted vpon them, at what time their loue was then in greatest force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit, shortly after she found the meanes to get her a horse, & some mony, and stale away in the night, and galloped towards the hauen of Tænarus, where finding a ship ready bound for ÆGYPT, she imbarked and went to seeke her husband, with whom she gladly and louingly led her life, forsaking her owne country, to liue in a strange Realme. Now when the Sergeants came to take Cratesiclea to put her to death, Panteas wife led her by the arme, carying vp her traine, and did comfort her, although Cratesiclea otherwise was not afraid to dye, but only asked this fauor, that she might die before her litle children. This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the hangman first slue her children before her eyes, and then her selfe afterwards, who in such great griefe and sorrow, sayed no more but thus: Alas my poore children, what is become of you? And Panteas wife also, being a mightie tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the slaine bodies one after another, and wrapped them vp in such things as she could get, speaking neuer a word, nor shewing ſhewing any ſigne or token of griefe. And in fine, hauing prepared her ſelfe to dye, and plucked off her attire her ſelfe, without ſuffering any other to come neare her, or to ſee her, but the hangman that was appointed to ſtrike off her head: in this ſort ſhe died as conſtantly, as the ſtouteſt man liuing could haue done, and had ſo couered her body, that no man needed after her death to touch her: ſo carefull was ſhe to her end, to keepe her honeſty, which ſhe had alwayes kept in her life, and in her death was mindfull of her honour, wherewith ſhe decked her body in her life time. Thus theſe LACEDÆMONIAN Ladies playing their parts in this pitifull tragedy, contending at the time of death, euen with the courage of the ſlaine SPARTANS their countrey men, which of them ſhould dye moſt conſtantly: left a manifeſt proofe and teſtimony, that fortune hath no power ouer fortitude and courage. Shortly after, thoſe that were appointed to keepe the body of king Cleomenes that hung vpon the croſſe, they ſpied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that couered all his face, in ſo much as no rauening fowle durſt come neare him to eate of it: whereupon the king fell into a ſuperſtitious feare, being afraid that he had offended the gods. Hereupon, the Ladies in his court began to make many ſacrifices of purification, for the clearing of this ſinne: perſwading themſelues, that they had put a man to death beloued of the gods, and that he had ſomething more in him then a man. The ALEXANDRIANS thereupon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers vnto Cleomenes, as vnto a demy god, calling him the ſonne of the gods: vntill that the learned men brought them from that errour, declaring vnto them, that like as of oxen being dead and rotten, there breed bees, and of horſe alſo come waſpes, and of aſſes likewiſe bettels: euen ſo mens bodies, when the marow melteth and gathereth together, do bring foorth Serpents.

TIBERIVS AND CAIVS Gracchi.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you the hiſtory of the liues of theſe two GRECIANS, Agis and Cleomenes aforeſayd: we muſt alſo write the hiſtory of two ROMAINES, the which is no leſſe lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chanced vnto Tiberius and Caius, both of them the ſonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He hauing bene twiſe Conſull, and once Cenſor, and hauing had the honor of two triumphs: had notwithſtanding more honour and fame onely for his valiantneſſe, for the which he was thought worthy to marry with Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, who ouercame Hannibal after the death of his father: though while he liued he was neuer his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a time found two ſnakes in his bed, and that the ſoothſayers and wiſards hauing conſidered the ſignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, & alſo to let them both eſcape, but one onely: aſſuring him that if he killed the male, he ſhould not liue long after: and if he killed the female, that then his wife Cornelia ſhould dye. Tiberius then louing his wife dearly, thinking it meeter for him alſo, that he being the elder of both, and ſhe yet a young woman, ſhould dye before her: he ſlue the male, and let the female eſcape, howbeit he died ſoone after, leauing twelue children aliue, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her houſe and children, led ſuch a chaſt life, was ſo good to her children, and of ſo noble a mind, that euery man thought Tiberius a wiſe man for that he died, and left her behind him. She remaining widow, king Ptolomy made ſute vnto her, and would haue made her his wife and Queene: but ſhe refuſed, and in her widowhood loſt all her children, but one daughter (whom ſhe beſtowed vpon the yonger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whoſe liues we preſently write. Thoſe ſhe ſo carefully brought vp, that they being become more ciuill, and better conditioned, then any other ROMAINES in their time: euery man iudged, that education preuailed more in them then nature. For, as in the fauours and pictures of Caſtor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference diſcerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wreſtling, and the other for running: euen ſo betweene theſe two young brethren, amongſt other the great likeneſſe betweene them, being both happily borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew notwithſtanding great difference in their actions and doings in the common wealth: the which I thinke conuenient to declare, before I proceed any farther. Firſt of all, for the fauour of the face, the looke and mouing of the body, Tiberius was much more mild and tractable, and Caius more hot and earneſt. For the firſt in his orations was very modeſt, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMAINES was the firſt, that in his oration ietted vp and downe the pulpit, and that plucked his gowne ouer his ſhoulders: as they write of Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the firſt of all

Orators that opened his gowne, and clapped his hand on his thigh in his oration. Furthermore, Caius words, and the vehemency of his perſwaſion, were terrible and full of paſſion, but Tiberius words in contrary maner, were mild, moued men more to compaſſion, being very proper, and excellently applied, where Caius words were full of fineneſſe and curioſity. The like difference alſo was betweene them in their fare and diet. For Tiberius alwayes kept a conuenient ordinary: and Caius alſo in reſpect of other ROMAINES, liued very temperately, but in reſpect of his brothers fare, curiouſly and ſuperfluouſly. Inſomuch as Druſus on a time reproued him, becauſe he had bought certaine Dolphins of ſiluer, to the value of a thouſand two hundred and fifty Drachmas for euery pound waight. And now, as touching the maners and naturall diſpoſition of them both agreeing with the diuerſity of their tongues, the one being mild and plauſible, and the other hot and cholericke: in ſo much that otherwhile forgetting himſelfe in his oration, againſt his will he would be very earneſt, and ſtraine his voyce beyond his compaſſe, and ſo with great vncomelineſſe confound his words. Yet finding his owne fault, de deuiſed this remedy. He had a ſeruant called Licinius, a good wiſe man, who with an inſtrument of muſicke he had, by the which they teach men to riſe and fall in their tunes, when he was in his oration, he euer ſtood behind him: and when he perceiued that his maiſters voyce was a litle too loud, and that through choler he exceeded his ordinary ſpeech: he played a ſoft ſtop behind him, at the ſound whereof Caius immediatly fell from his extremity, and eaſily came to himſelfe againe. And here was the diuerſitie betweene them. Otherwiſe, for their hardineſſe againſt their enemies, the iuſtice vnto their tenants, the care and paines in their offices of charge, and alſo their continency againſt voluptuouſneſſe: in all theſe they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nine yeares, by reaſon whereof their ſeuerall authority & doings in the commonwealth fell out at ſundry times. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes why their doings proſpered not, becauſe they had not both authority in one ſelfe time, neither could they ioyne their power together: the which if it had met at one ſelfe time, had bene of great force, and peraduenture inuincible. Wherefore we muſt write particularly of them both, but firſt of all we muſt begin with the elder. He, when he came to mans ſtate, had ſuch a name & eſtimation, that immediatly they made him fellow in the colledge of the Prieſts, which at ROME are called Augures (being thoſe that haue the charge to conſider of ſignes & predictions of things to come) more for his valiantneſſe, then for nobility. The ſame doth Appius Clodius witneſſe vnto vs, one that hath bene both Conſull and Cenſor, and alſo preſident of the Senate, and of greater authority then any man in his time. This Appius at a ſupper when all the Augures were together, after he had ſaluted Tiberius, and made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in mariage. Tiberius was very glad of the offer, and therewithall the mariage was preſently concluded betweene them. Thereupon Appius comming home to his houſe, at the threſhold of his doore he called aloud for his wife, and told her: Antiſtia, I haue beſtowed our daughter Clodia. She wondring at it, O gods ſayd ſhe, & what needed all this haſte? what couldeſt thou haue done more, if thou haddeſt gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her husband? I know that ſome referre this hiſtory vnto Tiberius, father of theſe two men we write of, and vnto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the moſt part of writers agree with that we write at this preſent. And Polybius himſelfe alſo writeth, that after the death of Scipio AFRICAN, his friends being met together, they choſe Tiberius before all the other young men of the city, to marry him vnto Cornelia, being free, and vnpromiſed, or beſtowed vpon any man by her father. Now Tiberius the yonger being in the warres in AFRICKE vnder Scipio the ſecond, who had maried his ſiſter, lying in his tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble gifts of nature, to allure mens hearts to deſire to follow his valiantneſſe. So in a ſhort time he did excell all the young men of his time, as well in obedience, as in the valiantneſſe of his perſon: in ſo much that he was the firſt man that ſcaled the wals of the enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who ſayth that he ſcaled the wals with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterpriſe. So that being preſent, all the campe were in loue with him: and when he was abſent, euery man wiſhed for him againe. After this warre was ended, he was choſen Treaſurer, and it was his chance to go againſt the NVMANTIMES, with Caius Mancinus one of the Conſuls, who was an honeſt man, but yet had the worſt lucke of any Captaine the ROMAINES had. Notwithſtanding, Tiberius wiſdome and valiantneſſe, in this extreme ill lucke of his Captaine, did not onely appeare with great glory to him, but alſo moſt wonderfull, the great obedience and reuerence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did ſo trouble and grieue him, that he could not tell himſelfe

whether he was Captaine, or not. For when he was ouerthrowne in great foughten fields, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The NVMANTINES hearing of it, first tooke his campe, and then ranne after them that fled, and setting vpon the rereward, slue them, and enuironed all his army. So that they were driuen into straight and narrow places, whereout they could by no meanes escape. Thereupon Mancinus dispairing that he could get out by force, he sent a Herauld to the enemies to treate of peace. The NVMANTINES made aunswer, that they would trust no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he should be sent vnto them. They desired that, partly for the loue they bare vnto the vertues of the young man, because there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly also, as remembring his father Tiberius, who making warres in SPAINE, and hauing there subdued many nations, he graunted the NVMANTINES peace, the which he caused the ROMAINES afterwards to confirme and ratifie. Hereupon Tiberius was sent to speake with them, and partly obtaining that he desired, and partly also granting them that they required: he concluded peace with them, whereby assuredly he saued the liues of twenty thousand ROMAINE citizens, besides slaues and other stragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithstanding, the NVMANTINES tooke the spoile of all the goods they found in the ROMAINES campe, among the which they found Tiberius booke of account touching the mony disbursed of the treasure in his charge. Tiberius being maruellous desirous to haue his booke againe, returned backe to NVMANTIA with two or three of his friends onely, though the army of the ROMAINES were gone farre on their way. So comming to the towne, he spake vnto the gouernours of the city, and prayed them to redeliuer him his bookes of account, because his malicious enemies should not accuse him, calling him to account for his doings. The NVMANTINES were very glad of this good hap, and prayed him to come into the towne. He standing still in doubt with himselfe what to do, whether he should go into the towne, or not: the gouernours of the city came to him, and taking him by the hand, prayed he would thinke they were not his enemies, but good friends, and that he would trust them. Whereupon Tiberius thought best to yeeld to their perswasion, being desirous also to haue his bookes againe, and the rather, for feare of offending the NVMANTINES, if he should haue denied and mistrusted them. When he was brought into the city, they prouided his dinner, and were very earnest with him, intreating him to dine with them. Then they gaue him his bookes againe, and offered him moreouer to take what he would of all the spoiles they had gotten in the campe of the ROMAINES. Howbeit of all that, he would take nothing but frankensence, which he vsed, when he did any sacrifice for his countrey: and then taking his leaue of them, with thankes he returned. When he was returned to ROME, all this peace concluded was vtterly misliked, as dishonourable to the maiestie of the Empire of ROME. Yet the parents and friends of them that had serued in this warre, making the greatest part of the people: they gathered about Tiberius, saying that what faults were committed in this seruice, they were to impute it vnto the Consull Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had saued such a number of ROMAINES liues. Notwithstanding, they that were offended with this dishonourable peace, would that therein they should follow the example of their forefathers in the like case. For they sent backe their Captaines naked vnto their enemies, because they were contented the SAMNITES should spoile them of that they had, to escape with life. Moreouer, they did not only send them the Captaines and Consuls, but all those also that bare any office in the field, and had consented vnto that condition: to the end they might lay all the periurie and breach of peace vpon them. Herein therefore did manifestly appeare, the loue and goodwill the people did beare vnto Tiberius: for they gaue order, that the Consull Mancinus should be sent naked, and bound vnto the NVMANTINES, and for Tiberius sake, they pardoned all the rest. I thinke Scipio, who bare great sway at that time in ROME, and was a man of greatest account, did helpe him at that pinch: who notwithstanding was ill thought of, because he did not also saue the Consull Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NVMANTINES, considering it was made by Tiberius his friend and kinsman. But these mislikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friends, and certaine men, which stirred him vp against Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice betweene them, neither followed there any hurt vpon it. And surely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio AFRICAN had bene present, when he passed those things he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the siege of NVMANTIA, when Tiberius vpon this occasion passed these lawes. When the ROMAINES in old time had ouercome any of their

their neighbours, for ranſome they tooke oftentimes a great deale of their land from them, part whereof they ſold by the crier, for the benefit of the commonwealth, and part alſo they reſerued to their ſtate as demeane, which afterwards was let out to farme for a ſmall rent yearely, to the poore citizens that had no lands. Howbeit the rich men inhaunced the rents, and ſo began to thruſt out the poore men. Thereupon was an ordinance made, that no citizen of ROME ſhould haue aboue fiue hundred acres of land. This law for a time did bridle the couetouſneſſe of the rich men, and did eaſe the poore alſo that dwelt in the country, vpon the farmes they had taken vp of the commonwealth, and ſo liued with their owne, or with that their anceſtors had from the beginning. But by proceſſe of time, their rich neighbors, by names of other men, got their farmes ouer their heads, and in the end, the moſt of them were openly ſeene in it in their owne names. Whereupon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, went but with faint courage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp of children. So that in ſhort time, the free men left ITALY, and ſlaues and barbarous people did repleniſh it, whom the rich men made to plough thoſe lands, which they had taken from the ROMAINES. Caius Lælius, one of Scipioes friends, gaue an attempt to reforme this abuſe: but becauſe the chiefeſt of the city were againſt him, fearing it would breake out to ſome vprore, he deſiſted from his purpoſe, and therefore he was called Lælius the wiſe. But Tiberius being choſen Tribune, he did foorthwith preferre the reformation aforeſaid, being allured vnto it (as diuerſe writers report) by Diophanes the Orator, and Bloſsius the Philoſopher: of the which, Diophanes was baniſhed from the city of MITYLENE, and Bloſsius the ITALIAN from the city of CVMES, who was ſcholer and familiar vnto Antipater of TARSVS at ROME, by whom he was honored for certaine works of Philoſophy he dedicated vnto him. And ſome alſo do accuſe their mother Cornelia, who did twit her ſons in the teeth, that the ROMAINES did yet call her Scipioes mother in law, and not the mother of the Gracchi. Other ſay it was Spurius Poſthumius, a cõpanion of Tiberius, & one that contended with him in eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the warres, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputation, and well beloued of euery one: he ſought to excell him by attempting this noble enterpriſe and of ſo great expectation. His owne brother Caius in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the warres of NVMANTIA, paſſing through THVSCAN, he found the countrey in maner vnhabited: and they that did folow the plough, or keepe beaſts, were the moſt of them ſlaues, and barbarous people, come out of a ſtrange countrey. Whereupon euer after it ran in his mind to bring this enterpriſe to paſſe, which brought great troubles to their houſe. But in fine, it was the people onely that moſt ſet his hart on fire to couet honor, and that haſtened his determination: firſt bringing him to it by bils ſet vp on euery wall, in euery porch, and vpon the tombes, praying him by them to cauſe the poore citizens of ROME to haue their lands reſtored, which were belonging to the commonwealth. This notwithſtanding he himſelfe made not the law alone of his owne head, but did it by the counſell and aduice of the chiefeſt men of ROME, for vertue and eſtimation: among the which, Craſſus the high Biſhop was one, and Mutius Scæuola the Lawyer, that then was Conſull, and Appius Clodius his father in law. And truly it ſeemeth, that neuer law was made with greater fauour, then that which he preferred againſt ſo great iniuſtice, and auarice. For thoſe that ſhould haue bene puniſhed for tranſgreſſing the law, and ſhould haue had the lands taken from them by force, which they vniuſtly kept againſt the law of ROME, and that ſhould alſo haue bene amerced for it: he ordained that they ſhould be payed by the commonwealth to the value of the lands, which they held vniuſtly, and ſo ſhould leaue them to the poore citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now, though the reformation eſtabliſhed by this law, was done with ſuch great fauour, the people notwithſtanding were contented, and would forget all that was paſt, ſo that they might haue no more wrong offered them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great poſſeſſions, hated the law for their auarice, and for ſpite and ſelfewill (which would not let them yeeld) they were at deadly food with the Lawyer that had preferred the law, and ſought by all deuice they could to diſſwade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria againe, to diſturbe the common wealth, and to make ſome alteration in the ſtate. But they preuailed not: for Tiberius defending the matter, which of it ſelfe was good and iuſt, with ſuch eloquence as might haue iuſtified an euill cauſe, was inuincible: and no man was able to argue againſt him to confute him, when ſpeaking in the behalfe of the poore citizens of ROME (the people being gathered round about the pulpit for orations) he told them, that the wild beaſts through

ITALY had their dens and caues of abode, and that the men that fought, and were slaine for their country, had nothing else but aire and light, and so were compelled to wander vp and downe with their wiues and children, hauing no resting place nor house to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their souldiers, when they encourage them in battell to fight valiantly for the graues, the temples, their owne houses, and their predecessours. For, sayd he, of such a number of poore citizens as there be, there cannot a man of them shew any auncient house or tombe of their ancestors: because the poore men do go to the warres, and be slaine for the rich mens pleasures & wealth: besides, they falsly call them Lords of the earth, where they haue not a handfull of ground that is theirs. These and such other like words being vttered before all the people with such vehemency and troth, did so moue the common people withall, and put them in such a rage, that there was no aduersary of his able to withstand him. Therefore, leauing to contrary and deny the law by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in Marcus Octauius, colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a graue and wise yong man, and Tiberius very familiar friend. So that the first time they came to him, to oppose him against the confirmation of this law, he prayed them to hold him excused, because Tiberius was his very friend. But in the end, being compelled vnto it through the great number of the rich men that were importunate with him, he did withstand Tiberius law, the which was inough to ouerthrow it. For if any one of the Tribunes speake against it, though all the other passe with it, he ouerthroweth it: because they all can do nothing, if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this first fauorable law, & in a rage preferred another more grateful to the cõmon people, as also more extreme against the rich. In that law he ordained, that whosoeuer had any lands cõtrary to the ancient lawes of ROME, that he should presently depart from them. But thereupon there fell out continuall brawles in the pulpit for orations, against Octauius: in the which, though they were very earnest and vehement one against another, yet there passed no fowle words from them (how hot soeuer they were one with another) that should shame his companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth such a stay and knowledge in a man, not onely in things of pleasure to make him regard his credit, both in word and deed: but in passion and anger also, and in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereupon Tiberius finding that this law among others touched Octauius, because he enioyed a great deale of land that was the commonwealths: he prayed him secretly to contend no more against him, promising him to giue him of his owne, the value of those lands which he should be driuen to forsake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he saw Octauius would not be perswaded, he then preferred a law, that all magistrates and officers should cease their authority, till the law were either past, or reiected, by voyces of the people: and thereupon he set his owne seale vpon the doores of the temple of Saturne, where the coffers of the treasure lay, because the treasurers themselues during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, vpon great penalties to be forfeited by the Prætors or any other magistrate of authority, that should breake this order. Hereupon, all the magistrates fearing this penalty, did leaue to exercise their office for the time. But then the rich men that were of great liuings, chaunged their apparell, and walked very sadly vp and downe the market place, and layed secret waite to take Tiberius, hauing hired men to kill him: which caused Tiberius himselfe, openly before them all, to weare a short dagger vnder his long gowne, properly called in Latine, Dolon. When the day came that this law should be established, Tiberius called the people to giue their voyces: and the rich men on the other side, they tooke away the pots by force, wherein the papers of mens voyces were throwne, so that there was like to fall out great stirre vpon it. For the faction of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of people that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not bene for Manlius and Fuluius, both the which had bene Consuls, who went vnto him, and besought him with the teares in their eyes, and holding vp their hands, that he would let the law alone. Tiberius thereupon, foreseeing the instant danger of some great mischiefe, as also for the reuerence he bare vnto two such noble persons, he stayed a litle, and asked them what they would haue him to do. They made answer, that they were not able to counsell him in a matter of so great waight, but they prayed him notwithstanding, he would be contented to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. Thereupon he graunted them presently. But afterwards perceiuing that the Senate sate vpon it, and had determined nothing, because the rich men were of too great authority: he entred into another deuice that was neither honest nor meete, which was, to depriue Octauius of his Tribuneship,

Marcus Octauius Tribune, did withstand Tiberius lawe.

The modest contention betwixt Tiberius and Octauius.

Tribuneſhip, knowing that otherwiſe he could not poſſibly come to paſſe the law. But before he tooke that courſe, he openly intreated him in the face of the people with courteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to ſtand no more againſt him, and to do the people this pleaſure, which required a matter iuſt and reaſonable, and onely requeſted this ſmall recompence for the great paines they tooke in ſeruice abroad for their countrey. Octauius denied him plainly. Then ſayd Tiberius openly, that both of them being brethren in one ſelfe place and authority, and contrary one to another in a matter of ſo great waight, this contention could not be poſſibly ended, without ciuill warre: and that he could ſee no way to remedy it, vnleſſe one of them two were depoſed from their office. Thereupon he bad Octauius begin firſt with him, and he would riſe from the bench with a good will, and become a priuate man, if the people were ſo contented. Octauius would do nothing in it. Tiberius then replied, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his mind, vpon a better breath and conſideration: and ſo diſmiſſed the aſſembly for that day. The next morning the people being againe aſſembled, Tiberius going vp to his ſeate, attempted againe to perſwade Octauius to leaue off. In fine, finding him ſtill a man vnremoueable, he referred the matter to the voyce of the people, whether they were contented Octauius ſhould be depoſed from his office. Now there were fiue and thirty tribes of the people, of the which ſeuenteen of them had already paſſed their voices againſt Octauius, ſo that there remained but one tribe more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them ſtay for proceeding any further, and prayed Octauius again, imbracing him before all the people, with all the intreatie poſſible: that for ſelfewill ſake he would not ſuffer ſuch an open ſhame to be done vnto him, as to be put out of his office: neither alſo to make him the occaſion and inſtrument of ſo pitifull a deed. They ſay that Octauius at this laſt intreaty was ſomewhat moued and won by his perſwaſions, and that weeping, he ſtayed a long time, and made no anſwer. But when he looked vpon the rich men that ſtood in a great company together, he was aſhamed (I thinke) to haue their ill wils, and rather betooke himſelf to the loſſe of his office, & ſo bad Tiberius do what he would. Thereupon he being depriued by voyces of the people, Tiberius commaunded one of his infranchiſed bondmen to pull him out of the pulpit for Orations: for he vſed his infranchiſed boundmen in ſtead of Sergeants. This made the ſight ſo much more lamentable, to ſee Octauius thus ſhamefully pluckt away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would haue runne vpon him, but the rich men came to reſcue him, and would not ſuffer them to do him further hurt. So Octauius ſaued himſelfe running away alone, after he had bene reſcued thus from the fury of the people. Moreouer, there was a faithfull ſeruant of Octauius, who ſtepping before his maiſter to ſaue him from hurt, had his eies pulled out againſt Tiberius mind, who ranne to the reſcue with all ſpeed when he heard the noiſe. After that, the law Agraria paſſed for diuiſion of lands, and three Commiſſioners were appointed to make inquirie and diſtribution thereof. The Commiſſioners appointed were theſe: Tiberius himſelfe: Appius Clodius his father in law, and Caius Gracchus his brother: who was not at that time in Rome, but in the campe with Scipio African, at the ſiege of the city of Numantia. Thus Tiberius very quietly paſſed ouer theſe matters, and no man durſt withſtand him: and furthermore, he ſubſtituted in Octauius place no man of qualitie, but onely one of his followers, called Mutius. For which cauſe the noble men were ſore offended with him, and fearing the increaſe of his greatneſſe, they being in the Senate houſe did what they could poſſible to do him deſpite and ſhame. For when Tiberius demaunded a tent at the charge of the common wealth, when he ſhould go abroad to make diuiſion of theſe lands, as they vſually graunted vnto others, that many times went in farre meaner commiſſions: they flatly denied him, and through the procurement of P. Naſica (who being a great landed man in his countrey, ſhewed himſelfe in this action his mortall enemy, taking it grieuouſly to be compelled to depart from his land) onely graunted him nine of their oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the people on the other ſide were all in an vprore againſt the rich. In ſo much as one of Tiberius friends being dead vpon the ſudden, vpon whoſe body being dead there appeared very ill ſignes: the common people ranne ſuddenly to his buriall, and cried out that he was poyſoned. And ſo taking vp the Beere whereon his body lay vpon their ſhoulders, they were preſent at the fire of his funerals, where immediatly appeared certaine ſignes to make them ſuſpect, that indeed there was vehement cauſe of preſumption he was poyſoned. For his belly burſt, whereout there iſſued ſuch abundance of corrupt humors, that they put out the firſt fire, and made them fetch another, the which alſo they could not make to burne, vntill that they were compelled to cary the body into ſome other place, where notwithſtanding they had much ado to make it burne. Tiberius ſeeing that, to make the common people mutine the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his ſonnes before them, and beſought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that diſpaired of his health and ſafety. About that time died Attalus, ſurnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to ROME, in the which he made the people of ROME his heire. Wherefore Tiberius, ſtill to increaſe the good will of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediatly, that the ready money that came by the inheritance of this king ſhould be diſtributed among the poore citizens, on whoſe lot it ſhould fall to haue any part of the diuiſion of the lands of the common wealth, to furniſh them towards houſe, and to ſet vp their tillage. Furthermore, he ſayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to do to take any order with them, but that the people were to diſpoſe of them, and that he himſelfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, in ſo much as there was one Pompey a Senator, that ſtanding vp, ſayd: that he was next neighbour vnto Tiberius, and that by reaſon of his neighbourhood he knew that Eudemus PERGAMENIAN had giuen him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne beſides, for a token that he ſhould one day be king of ROME. And Quintus Metellus alſo reproued him, for that his father being Cenſor, the ROMAINES hauing ſupped in the towne, and repairing euery man home to his houſe, they did put out their torches and lights, becauſe men ſeeing them returne, they ſhould not thinke they taried too long in company banquetting: and that in contrary maner, the ſeditious and needy rabble of the common people did light his ſon home, and accompany him all night long vp and downe the towne. At that time there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodneſſe nor honeſty in him, howbeit taken for a great reaſoner, and for a ſubtill queſtioner and anſwerer. He prouoked Tiberius to anſwer him, whether he had not committed a ſhamefull fact to his companion and brother Tribune, to defame him, that by the lawes of ROME ſhould haue bene holy and vntouched. The people tooke this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius alſo comming out, and hauing aſſembled the people, commanded them to bring this Annius before him, that he might be endited in the market place. But he finding himſelfe farre inferiour vnto Tiberius, both in dignity and eloquence, ran to his fine ſubtill queſtions, to take a man at his word: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceed to his accuſation, that he would firſt anſwer him to a queſtion he would aske him. Tiberius bad him ſay what he would. So ſilence being made, Annius asked him: If thou wouldeſt defame me, and offer me iniury, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he ſhould riſe to take my part, and anger thee: wouldeſt thou therefore put him out of his office? It is reported that Tiberius was ſo grauelled with this queſtion, that though he was one of the readieſt ſpeakers, and the boldeſt in his Orations of any man: yet at that time he held his peace, and had no power to ſpeake, and therefore he preſently diſmiſſed the aſſembly. Afterwards, vnderſtanding that of all the things he did, the depoſing of Octauius from his office was thought (not onely of the Nobility, but of the common people alſo) as fowle and wilfull a part as euer he played, for that thereby he had imbaſed, and vtterly ouerthrowne the dignity of the Tribunes, the which was alwayes had in great veneration vntill that preſent time: to excuſe himſelfe therfore, he made an excellent Oration to the people, wherof we wil ſet down ſome ſpecial points, that you may the better diſcerne thereby the force and effect of his eloquence. The Tribuneſhip (ſayd he) indeed was a holy and ſacred thing, as particularly conſecrated to the people, and eſtabliſhed for their benefit and ſafety: where contrariwiſe, if the Tribune do offer the people any wrong, he thereby miniſreth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wils by voyces, beſides that he doth alſo imbaſe his owne authority, leauing to do the thing for the which his authority firſt was giuen him. Or otherwiſe we could not chuſe but ſuffer a Tribune, if it pleaſed him, to ouerthrow the Capitoll, or to ſet fire on the arſenall: and yet notwithſtanding this wicked part, if it were committed, he ſhould be Tribune of the people ſtill, though a lewd Tribune. But when he goeth about to take away the authority and power of the people, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this againſt all reaſon, thinke you, that a Tribune when he liſt, may take a Conſull, and commit him to priſon: and that the people ſhould not withſtand the authoritie of the Tribune, who gaue him the ſame, when he would vſe his authoritie to the preiudice

of the people? for the people are they that do chuſe, both Conſull and Tribune. Furthermore, the kingly dignitie (becauſe in the ſame is contained the abſolute authoritie and power of al other kinds of Magiſtrates and offices together) is conſecrated with verie great and holy ceremonies, darwing very neare vnto the godhead: and yet the people expulſed king Tarquin, becauſe he vſed his authoritie with crueltie: and for the iniurie he offered one man onely, the moſt auncient rule and gouernement, (by the which the foundation of ROME was firſt laid) was vtterly aboliſhed. And who is there in all the citie of ROME to be reckned ſo holy as the Veſtall Nuns, which haue the cuſtodie and keeping of the euerlaſting fire? and yet if any of theſe be taken in fornication, ſhe is buried aliue for her offence: for when they are not holy to the gods, they loſe the libertie they haue, in reſpect of ſeruing the gods. Euen ſo alſo it is vnmeete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, ſhould for the peoples ſake be reuerenced any more: ſeeing that through his owne folly he hath depriued himſelf of that authoritie they gaue him. And if it be ſo that he was choſen Tribune by the moſt part of the tribes of the people: then by greater reaſon is he iuſtly depriued, that by all the whole tribes together is forſaken and depoſed. There is nothing more holy nor inuiolate, then things offered vp vnto the gods: and yet it was neuer ſeene that any man did forbid the people to take them, to remoue & tranſport them from place to place, as they thought good. Euen ſo, they may as lawfully transferre the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offering conſecrated to the gods. Furthermore, it is manifeſt that any Officer or Magiſtrate may lawfully depoſe himſelfe: For, it hath bene often ſeene, that men in office haue depriued themſelues, or otherwiſe haue ſued to be diſcharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. Now his friends perceiuing the threats the rich and noblemen gaue out againſt him, they wiſhed him for the ſafetie of his perſon, to make ſute to be Tribune againe the next yeare. Whereupon he began to flatter the common people againe afreſh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares preſcribed, when euerie citizen of ROME was bound to go to the warres being called, and his name billed. He made it lawfull alſo for men to appeale from ſentence of the Iudges vnto the people, and thruſt in alſo amongſt the Senators (which then had abſolute authoritie to iudge among themſelues) a like number of the ROMAINE Knights, and by this meanes ſought to weaken and imbaſe the authoritie of the Senate, increaſing alſo the power of the people, more of malice then any reaſon, or for any iuſtice or benefite to the common wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voices of the people for the confirmation of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the ſtronger in the aſſembly, becauſe all the people were not yet come together: he fell a quarelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwayes to winne time, and yet in the end brake vp the aſſembly, commaunding them to returne the next morning. There he would be the firſt man in the market place, apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, and looking heauily vpon the matter, praying the people aſſembled to haue compaſſion vpon him, ſaying, that he was afraid leaſt his enemies would come in the night and ouerthrow his houſe to kill him. Thereupon the people were ſo moued withall, that many of them came and brought their tents, and lay about his houſe to watch it. At the breake of the day, the keeper of the chickens, by ſignes of the which they do deuine of things to come, brought them vnto him, and caſt them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of the cage but one onely, and yet with much ado, ſhaking the cage: and when it came out, it would eate no meate, but onely lift vp her left wing, and put forth her leg, and ſo ranne into the cage againe. This ſigne made Tiberius remember another he had had before. He had a maruellous faire helmet and verie rich, which he ware in the warres: vnder it were crept two ſnakes vnwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, becauſe of the ill ſignes of the chickens: notwithſtanding, he went out of his houſe when he heard that the people were aſſembled in the Capitoll, but as he went out, he hit his foote ſuch a blow againſt a ſtone at the threſhold of the doore, that he brake the naile of his great toe, which fell in ſuch a bleeding, that it bled through his ſhooe. Againe, he had not gone far, but he ſaw vpon the top of a houſe on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithſtanding that there paſt a great number of people by, yet a ſtone which one of theſe rauens caſt from them, came and fell hard at Tiberius foote. The fall thereof ſtaid the ſtouteſt man he had about him. But Bloſſius the Philoſopher of CVMES that did accompanie him, told him it were a great ſhame for him, and enough to kill the hearts of all his followers, that Tiberius being the ſonne of Gracchus, and nephew of Scipio the AFRICAN, and the chiefe man beſides of all the peoples ſide, for feare of a rauen, ſhould not obey his citizens that called him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing ſport of it, but would plainely tell the people that this was a tricke of a tyrant that raigned indeed, and that for pride and diſdaine did abuſe the peoples good wils. Furthermore, diuers meſſengers came vnto him, and ſaid that his friends that were in the Capitoll, ſent to pray him to make haſte, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honourably receiued: for the people ſeeing him comming, cried out for ioy to welcome him, and when he was gotten vp to his ſeate, they ſhewed themſelues both carefull and louing towards him, looking warily that none came neare him, but ſuch as they knew well. When Mutius began againe to call the tribes of the people to giue their voices, he could not proceed according to the accuſtomed order in the like caſe, for the great noiſe the hindmoſt people made, thruſting forward, and being driuen backe, and one mingling with another. In the meane time Flauius Flaccus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might ſee him, and when he ſaw that his voice could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a ſigne with his hand that he had ſome matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius ſtraight bad them make a lane through the preaſe. So, with much ado, Flauius came at length vnto him, and told him, that the rich men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Conſull to their wils, determined themſelues to come and kill him, hauing a great number of their friends and bond-men armed for the purpoſe. Tiberius immediatly declared this conſpiracie vnto his friends and followers: who ſtraight girt their long gownes vnto them, and brake the ſergeants iauelins which they caried in their hands to make roome among the people, and tooke the trunchions of the ſame to reſiſt thoſe that would ſet vpon them. The people alſo that ſtood furtheſt off, maruelled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a ſigne to tell them the daunger he was in, laid both his hands on his head, becauſe they could not heare his voice for the great noiſe they made. His enemies ſeeing the ſigne he gaue, ranne preſently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall band or diadeame of the people, and that it was an euident ſigne, becauſe they ſaw him clap his hands vpon his head. This tale troubled all the companie. Whereupon Naſica beſought the Conſull, chiefe of the Senate, to helpe the common-wealth, and to take away this tyrant. The Conſull gently anſwered againe, that he would vſe no force, neither put any citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as alſo he would not receiue Tiberius, nor protect him, if the people by his perſwaſion or commaundement, ſhould commit any act contrarie to the law. Naſica then riſing in anger, Sith the matter is ſo (ſaid he) that the Conſull regardeth not the common-wealth: all you then, that will defend the authoritie of the law, follow me. Thereupon he caſt the skirt of his gowne ouer his head, and went ſtraight to the Capitoll. They that followed him alſo tooke their gownes, and wrapped them about their armes, and laid at as many as they might, to make them giue way: and yet verie few of the people durſt meete with ſuch ſtates as they were to ſtay them, becauſe they were the chiefeſt men of the citie, but euerie man flying from them, they fell one on anothers necke for haſt. They that followed them, had brought from home great leauers and clubs, and as they went, they tooke vp feete of treſtles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowne and broken, running away, and hied them a pace to meete with Tiberius, ſtriking at them that ſtood in their way: ſo that in ſhort ſpace they had diſperſed all the common people, and many were ſlaine flying. Tiberius ſeeing that, betooke him to his legges to ſaue himſelfe; but as he was flying, one tooke him by the gowne and ſtayed him: but he leauing his gowne behind him, ranne in his coate, and running fell vpon them that were downe before. So, as he was riſing vp againe, the firſt man that ſtrake him, and that was plainely ſeene ſtrike him, was of one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publius Saturcius: who gaue him a great rap on the head with the foote of a chaire, and the ſecond blow he had, was giuen him by Lucius Rufus that boaſted of it, as if he had done a notable act. In this tumult, there were ſlaine aboue three hundred men, and were all killed with ſtaues and ſtones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the firſt ſedition among the citizens of Rome, that fell out with murther and bloudſhed, ſince the expulſion of the kings. But for all other former diſſentions (which were no trifles) they were eaſily pacified, either partie giuing place to other: the Senate for feare of the Commoners, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it ſeemeth that Tiberius himſelf would eaſily haue yeelded alſo, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perſwaſion, ſo they had meant good faith, and would haue killed no man: for at that time he had had not in all aboue 3000. men of the people about him. But ſurely it ſeemes this conſpiracie was executed againſt him, more for very ſpite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparant cauſe they preſuppoſed againſt him. For proofe hereof may be alleaged, the barbarous crueltie they vſed to his bodie being dead. For they would not ſuffer his owne brother to haue his bodie to burie it by night, who made earneſt ſute vnto them for it: but they threw him amongſt the other bodies into the riuer, and yet this was not the worſt. For, ſome of his friends they baniſhed without forme of law, and others they put to death which they could meet withal. Among the which they ſlue Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Billius, whom they incloſed in a pipe among ſnakes and ſerpents, and put him to death in this ſort. Bloſius alſo the Philoſopher of CVMES, was brought before the Conſuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confeſſed vnto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commaunded him. When Naſica did aske him, And what if he had commaunded thee to ſet fire on the Capitoll? He made him anſwer, that Tiberius would neuer haue giuen him any ſuch commandement. And when diuers others alſo were ſtill in hand with him about that queſtion: But if he had commaunded thee? I would ſure haue done it, ſaid he: for he would neuer haue commanded me to haue done it, if it had not bin for the commoditie of the people. Thus he ſcaped at that time, and afterwards fled into ASIA vnto Ariſtonicus, whom misfortune hauing ouerthrowne, he ſlue himſelfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that preſent time, did no more withſtand the law Agraria, for diuiſion of the lands of the common wealth, but ſuffered the people to appoint another Commiſſioner for that purpoſe in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Craſſus was choſen, being allied vnto Tiberius, for Caius Gracchus (Tiberius brother) had maried his daughter Licinia. Yet Cornelius Nepos ſaith, that it was not Craſſus daughter Caius maried, but the daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the LVSITANIANS. Howbeit the beſt writers and authoritie, agree with that we write. But whatſoeuer was done, the people were maruellouſly offended with his death, and men might eaſily perceiue, that they looked but for time and oportunitie to be reuenged, and did preſently threaten Naſica to accuſe him. Whereupon the Senate fearing ſome trouble towards him, deuiſed a way (vpon no occaſion) to ſend him into ASIA. For the cõmon people did not diſſemble the malice they bare him when they met him, but were very round with him, and called him tyrant, and murderer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the bloud of the holy Tribune, and within the moſt ſacred Temple of all the citie. So in the end he was inforced to forſake ROME, though by his office he was bound to ſolemnize all the greateſt ſacrifices, becauſe he was then chiefe Biſhop of ROME. Thus, trauelling out of his countrey like a meane man, and troubled in his mind: he died ſhortly after, not farre from the citie of PERGAMVS. Truly it is not greatly to be wondred at, though the people ſo much hated Naſica, conſidering that Scipio the AFRICAN himſelfe (whom the people of ROME for iuſter cauſes had loued better then any man elſe whatſoeuer) was like to haue loſt all the peoples good will they bare him, becauſe that being at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, when news was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this verſe of Homer:

Such end vpon him euer light,
Which in ſuch doings doth delight.

Furthermore, being asked in the aſſembly of the people, by Caius and Fuluius, what he thought of Tiberius death: he anſwered them, that he did not like his doings. After that the people handled him verie churliſhly, and did euer breake off his Oration, which they neuer did before: and he himſelfe alſo would reuile the people euen in the aſſembly. Now Caius Gracchus at the firſt becauſe he feared the enemies of his dead brother, or otherwiſe, for that he ſought meanes to make them more hated of the people: he abſented himſelfe for a time out of the common aſſembly, and kept at home and medled not, as a man contented to liue meanely, without buſying himſelfe in the common wealth: inſomuch as he made men thinke and report both, that he did vtterly miſlike thoſe matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a yong man, and nine yeares yonger then his brother Tiberius, who was not thirtie yeares old when he was ſlaine. But in proceſſe of time, he made his manners and conditions (by litle and litle) appeare, who hated ſloth and curioſitie, and was leaſt of all giuen vnto any couetous mind of getting: for he gaue himſelfe to be eloquent, as preparing him wings afterwards to practiſe in the common-wealth. So that it appeared plainely, that when time came he would not ſtand ſtil and looke on. When one Vettius a friend of his was ſued, he tooke vpon him to defend his cauſe in court. The people that were preſent, and heard him ſpeake, they leaped for ioy to see him: for he had such an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators besides were but children to him. Hereupon the rich men began to be afraid againe, and whispered among themselues, that it behoued them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chaunced so that he was chosen Treasurer, and it was his fortune to go into the Ile of SARDINIA, with the Consull Orestes. His enemies were glad of that, and he himselfe was not sorie for it. For he was a martiall man, and as skilfull in armes as he was else an excellent Orator: but yet he was affraid to come into the pulpit for Orations, and misliked to deale in matters of state, albeit he could not altogether denie the people, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cause therefore he was verie glad of this voyage, that he might absent himselfe for a time out of ROME: though diuers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and desirous of the common peoples good will and fauour, then his brother had bene before him. But indeed he was cleane contrarie: for it appeared that at the first he was drawne rather against his will, then of any speciall desire he had to deale in the common-wealth. Cicero the Orator also saith, that Caius was bent altogether to flie from office in the common-wealth, and to liue quietly as a priuate man. But Tiberius (Caius brother) appeared to him in his sleepe, and calling him by his name, said vnto him: Brother, why doest thou prolong time, for thou canst not possiblie escape? For we were both predestined to one manner of life and death, for procuring the benefite of the people. Now when Caius arriued in SARDINIA, he shewed all the proofes that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the yong men of his age in hardinesse against his enemies, in iustice to his inferiors, and in loue and obedience towards the Consull his Captaine: but in temperance, sobrietie, and in painefulnesse, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chance fell out verie sharpe, and full of sicknesse in SARDINIA: whereupon the Consull sent vnto the cities to helpe his souldiers with some clothes: but the townes sent in post to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegation reasonable, whereupon they wrote to the Consull to find some other meanes to clothe his people. The Consull could make no other shift for them, and so the poore souldiers in the meane time smarted for it. But Caius Gracchus went himselfe vnto the cities and so perswaded them, that they of themselues sent to the ROMAINES campe such things as they lacked. This being caried to ROME, it was thought straight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauour, and indeed it made the Senate also afraid. In the necke of that, there arriued Ambassadors of AFRICKE at ROME, sent from King Micipsa, who told the Senate that the King their maister, for Caius Gracchus sake, had sent their armie corne into SARDINIA. The Senators were so offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadors out of the Senate, and so gaue order that other souldiers should be sent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that Orestes should still remaine Consull there, meaning also to continue Caius their Treasurer. But when he heard of it, he straight tooke sea, and returned to ROME in choller. When men saw Caius returned to ROME vnlooked for, he was reproued for it not onely by his enemies, but by the common people also: who thought his returne verie strange before his Captaine, vnder whom he was Treasurer. He being accused hereof before the Censors, prayed he might be heard. So, answering his accusation, he so turned the peoples minds that heard him, that they all said he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had serued twelue yeares in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeares: and that he had continued Treasurer vnder his Captaine the space of three yeares, where the law gaue him libertie to returne at the end of the yeare. And that he alone of all men else that had bene in the wars, had caried his purse full, and brought it home emptie: where others hauing drunke the wine which they caried thither in vessels, had afterwards brought them home full of gold and siluer. Afterwards they went about to accuse him as accessarie to a conspiracie that was reuealed in the citie of FREGELLES. But hauing cleared all that suspition, and being discharged, he presently made sute to be Tribune: wherin he had all the men of qualitie his sworn enemies. On the other side also he had so great fauor of the common people, that there came men out of all parts of ITALY to be at his election, and that such a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold such a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voices vpon the top of houses. Now the noblemen could no otherwise let the people of their will, nor preuent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, he was onely pronounced the fourth. But when he was once possest officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, because he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of

calamitie offered him: which made him bold to ſpeake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matters ſoeuer he ſpake of, he alwayes fell in talke of that, remembring them what matters had paſſed: and laying before them the examples of their auncеſters: who in old time had made war with the PHALISCES, by the means of one Genutius Tribune of the people, vnto whom they had offered iniurie: who alſo did condemne Caius Veturius to death, becauſe that he onely would not giue a Tribune place, comming through the market place. Where theſe, ſaid he, in your preſence, & before your faces, haue ſlaine my brother Tiberius with ſtaues, & haue dragged his bodie from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie ouer, to throw it into the riuer: and with him alſo haue moſt cruelly ſlaine all his friends they could come by, without any law or iuſtice at all. And yet by an auncient cuſtome of long time obſerued in this citie of ROME, when any man is accuſed of treaſon, and that of dutie he muſt appeare at the time appointed him, they do notwithſtanding in the morning ſend a trumpet to his houſe, to ſummon him to appeare; and moreouer the Iudges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremonie was performed: ſo carefull and reſpectiue were our predeceſſors, where it touched the life of any ROMAINE. Now Caius hauing firſt ſtirred vp the people with theſe perſwaſions (for he had a maruellous loud voice) he preferred two lawes.

Caius Gracchus lawes.

The firſt, that he that had once bene put out of office by the people, ſhould neuer after be capable of any other office.

The ſecond, that if any Conſull had baniſhed any citizen without lawfull accuſation, the ſentence and hearing of the matter ſhould pertaine to the people.

The firſt of theſe two lawes did plainely defame Octauius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people depoſed from the Tribuneſhip. The ſecond alſo touched Popilius, who being Prætor, had baniſhed his brother Tiberius friends: whereupon he ſtaid not the triall, but willingly exiled himſelfe out of ITALIE. And touching the firſt law, Caius himſelfe did afterwards reuoke it, declaring vnto the people that he had ſaued Octauius at the requeſt of his mother Cornelia. The people were verie glad of it, and confirmed it, honouring her no leſſe for reſpect of her ſonnes, then alſo for Scipioes ſake her father. For afterwards they caſt her image in braſſe, and ſet it vp with this inſcription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many common matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, and eloquently pleaded in her behalf, by Caius againſt her aduerſaries. As when he ſaid vnto one of them: How dareſt thou preſume to ſpeake euill of Cornelia, that had Tiberius to her ſonne? And the other partie alſo that ſlaundered her, being ſorely ſuſpected for a Sodomite: And art thou ſo impudent, ſaid he, to ſhew thy face before Cornelia? Haſt thou brought foorth children as ſhe hath done? And yet it is well knowne to all men in ROME, that ſhe being but a woman, hath liued longer without a man, then thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words ſharpe and ſtinging, and many ſuch like are to be gathered out of his writings. Furthermore, he made many other lawes afterwards to increaſe the peoples authoritie, and to imbaſe the Senates greatneſſe.

Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, honoured of the people of Rome.

Other lawes preferred by Caius Gracchus.

The firſt was, for the reſtoring of the Colonies to ROME, in deuiding the lands of the common wealth vnto the poore citizens that ſhould inhabite there.

The other, that they ſhould apparell the ſouldiers at the charge of the common wealth, and that it ſhould not be deducted out of their pay: and alſo, that no citizen ſhould be billed to ſerue in the warres, vnder ſeuenteene yeares of age at the leaſt.

Another law was, for their confederates of ITALIE: that through all ITALIE they ſhould haue as free voices in the election of any Magiſtrate, as the naturall citizens of ROME it ſelfe.

Another ſetting a reaſonable price of the corne that ſhould be diſtributed vnto the poore people.

Another touching iudgement, whereby he did greatly miniſh the authoritie of the Senate. For before, the Senators were onely Iudges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honoured and feared of the people, and the ROMAINE Knights: and now he ioyned three hundred ROMAINE Knights vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it ſo to paſſe, that all matters iudiciall ſhould be equally iudged among thoſe ſixe hundred men. After he had paſſed this law, it is reported he was verie curious in obſeruing all other things, but this one thing ſpecially: that where all other Orators ſpeaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senators ſate, and to that ſide of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrarie maner when he made his Oration, turned him outwards towards the other ſide of the market place, and after that kept it constãtly, and neuer failed. Thus by a litle turning and altering of his look only, he remoued a great matter. For he so transferred all the gouernment of the commonwealth from the Senate, vnto the iudgement of the people: to teach the Orators by his example, that in their orations they should behold the people, not the Senate. Now, the people hauing not onely confirmed the law he made touching the Iudges, but giuen him also full power and authoritie to chuse among the ROMAINE Knights such iudges as he liked of: he found thereby he had absolute power in his owne hands, insomuch as the Senators themselues did aske counsel of him. So did he euer giue good counsell, and did preferre matters meete for their honour. As amongst others, the law he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Vice-prætor had sent out of SPAINE: which was a good and honourable act. He perswaded the Senate that the corne might be sold, and so to send backe againe the money thereof vnto the townes and cities from whence the corne came: and therewithall to punish Fabius for that he made the Emire of ROME hatefull and intollerable vnto the prouinces and subiects of the same. This matter wan him great loue and commendation of all the prouinces subiect to ROME. Furthermore, he made lawes for the restoring of the decayed townes, for mending of high wayes, for building of garners for prouision of corne. And to bring all these things to passe, he himselfe tooke vpon him the onely care and enterprise, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of so great affaires. For, he followed all those things so earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand: insomuch that they who most hated and feared him, wondred most to see his diligence and quicke dispatch in matters. The people also wondred much to behold him onely, seeing alwayes such a number of labourers, artificers, ambassadors, officers, souldiers, and learned men, whom he easily satisfied and dispatched, keeping still his estate, and yet vsing great courtesie and ciuilitie, entertaining euerie one of them priuatly: so that he made his accusers to be found liers, that said he was a stately man and verie cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conuersation and deeds, then he was otherwise in his Orations. But the greatest paines and care he tooke vpon him was, in seeing the high wayes mended, the which he would haue as well done, as profitably done. For he would cast the causies by the line in the softest ground in the fields, and then would paue them with hard stone, and cast a great deale of grauell vpon it, which he caused to be brought thither. When he found any low or waterie places which the riuers had eaten into, he raised them vp, or else made bridges ouer them, with an euen height equall to either side of the causie: so that all his worke caried a goodly leuell withall, euen by the line or plummet, which was a pleasure to behold. Furthermore, he deuided these high wayes by miles, euerie mile containing eight furlongs, and at euerie miles end he set vp a stone for a marke. At either end also of these high wayes thus paued, he set certaine stones of conuenient height, a pretie way asunder, to help the trauellers by to take their horse backs again without any helpe. The people for these things highly praising and extolling him, and being readie to make shew of their loue and good will to him any maner of way: he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make vnto them, the which if it would please to graunt him, he would thinke they did him a maruellous pleasure: and if they denied him also, he cared not much. Then euerie man thought it was the Consulship he meant to aske, and that he would sue to be Tribune and Consull together. But when the day came to chuse the Consuls, euerie man looking attentiuely what he would do: they maruelled when they saw him come downe the field of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his friends, to further his sute for the Consulship. Therein he serued Fannius turne, for he was presently chosen Consull: and Caius Gracchus was the second time chosen Tribune againe, not at his owne sute, but by the good wil of the people. Caius perceiuing that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Consull was but a slack friend vnto him, he began againe to currie fauour with the common people, and to prefer new laws, setting forth the law of the Colonies, that they should send of the poore citizens to replenish the cities of TARENTVM and CAPVA, and that they should graunt all the LATINS the freedome of ROME. The Senate perceiuing his power grew great, and that in the end he would be so strong that they could not withstand him: they deuised a new and strange way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in graunting them things not altogether verie honest. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius called Liuius Drusus, a man nobly borne, and as well brought vp as any other ROMAINE: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferior to the greatest men of estimation in ROME. The chiefest Senators went vnto him, and perswaded him him to take part with them againſt Caius, not to vſe any force or violence againſt the people to withſtand them in any thing, but contrarily to graunt them thoſe things which were more honeſtie for them to deny them with their il wil. Liuius offering to pleaſure the Senate with his authoritie, preferred lawes neither honourable nor profitable to the common-wealth, and were to no other end, but contending with Caius, who ſhould moſt flatter the people of them two, as plaiers do in their common playes, to ſhew the people paſtime. Whereby the Senate ſhewed that they did not ſo much miſlike Caius doings, as for the deſire they had to ouerthrow him and his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the repleniſhing of the two cities, and deſired to ſend the honeſteſt citizens thither: they obiected againſt him that he did corrupt the common people. On the other ſide alſo they fauoured Druſus, who preferred a law that they ſhould repleniſh twelue Colonies, and ſhould ſend to euerie one of them three thouſand of the pooreſt citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poore citizens with an annuall rent for the lands that were deuided vnto them: Liuius in contrarie manner did pleaſe them by disburdening them of that rent and paiment, letting them haue the lands ſcotfree. Furthermore alſo, where Caius did anger the people, becauſe he gaue all the LATINES the freedom of ROME to giue their voices in chuſing of Magiſtrates as freely as the naturall ROMAINES: when Druſus on the other ſide had preferred a law that thenceforth no ROMAINE ſhould whip any ſouldier of the LATINS with rods to the wars, they liked the law, and paſt it. Liuius alſo in euery law he put forth, ſaid in all his orations, that he did it by the counſell of the Senate, who were verie carefull for the profit of the people: and this was al the good he did in his office vnto the commonwealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleaſed with the Senate, and where they did before hate all the noblemen of the Senate, Liuius tooke away that malice, when the people ſaw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the common-wealth, with the conſent and furtherance of the Senate. The onely thing alſo that perſwaded the people to thinke that Druſus meant vprightly, and that he onely reſpected the profit of the common people, was, that he neuer preferred any law for himſelfe, or for his owne benefit. For in the reſtoring of theſe Colonies which he preferred, he alwayes ſent other Commiſſioners, and gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any money himſelfe: where Caius tooke vpon him the charge and care of all things himſelfe, and ſpecially of the greateſt matters. Rubrius alſo another Tribune, hauing preferred a law for the reedifying and repleniſhing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had razed & deſtroyed: it was Caius hap to be appointed one of the Commiſſioners for it: whereupon he took ſhip and ſailed into AFRIKE. Druſus in the meane time taking occaſion of his abſence, did as much as might be to ſeeke the fauour of the common people, and ſpecially by accuſing Fuluius who was one of the beſt friends Caius had, and whom they had alſo choſen Commiſſioner with him for the diuiſion of theſe lands among the citizens whom they ſent to repleniſh theſe Colonies. This Fuluius was a ſeditious man, and therefore maruellouſly hated of the Senate, and withall ſuſpected alſo of them that tooke part with the people, that he ſecretly practiſed to make their confederates of ITALIE to rebell. But yet they had no euident proofe of it to iuſtifie it againſt him, more then that which he himſelfe did verifie, becauſe he ſeemed to be offended with the peace and quietnes they enioyed. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes of Caius ouerthrow, becauſe that Fuluius was partly hated for his ſake. For when Scipio AFRICAN was found dead one morning in his houſe, without any manifeſt cauſe how he ſhould come to his death ſo ſodainly, (ſauing that there appeared certaine blind markes of ſtripes on his bodie that had bene giuen him: as we haue delared at large in his life) the moſt part of the ſuſpition of his death was laid to Fuluius, being his mortall enemie, and becauſe the ſame day they had bene at great words together in the pulpit for Orations. So was Caius Gracchus alſo partly ſupected for it. Howſoeuer it was, ſuch a horrible murther as this, of ſo famous and worthie a man as any was in ROME, was yet notwithſtanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it: becauſe the common people would not ſuffer the accuſation to go forward, fearing leaſt Caius would be found in fault, if the matter ſhould go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in AFRICKE about the reedifying and repleniſhing of the citie of CARTHAGE againe, the which he named IVNONIA: the voice goeth that he had many ill ſignes and tokens appeared vnto him. For the ſtaffe of his enſigne was broken with a vehement blaſt of wind, and with the force of the enſigne bearer that held it faſt on the other ſide. There came a flaw of wind alſo that caried away the ſacrifices vpon the altars and blew them quite out of the circuit which was marked out for the compasse of the citie. Furthermore, the wolues came and tooke away the markes which they had set downe to limit the bounds of their circuite, and caried them quite away. This notwithstanding, Caius hauing dispatched all things in the space of three score and ten daies, he returned incontinently to ROME, vnderstanding that Fuluius was oppressed by Drusus, and that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Hostilius that was all in all for the Nobilitie, and a man of great credite with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Consulship by Caius practise, who caused Fannius to be chosen: he had good hope this yeare to speed, for the great number of friends that furthered his sute. So that if he could obtaine it, he was fully bent to set Caius beside the saddle, and the rather, because his estimation and countenance he was wont to haue among the people, began now to decay, for that they were full of such deuises as his were: because there were diuers others that preferred the like to please the people withall, and yet with the Senates great good will and fauour. So Caius being returned to ROME, he remoued from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house vnder the market place, to shew himselfe thereby the lowlier and more popular, because many of the meaner sort of the people dwelt thereabouts. Then he purposed to go forward with the rest of his lawes, and to make the people to establish them, a great number of people repairing to ROME out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counselled the Consull Fannius to make proclamation, that all those which were no naturall ROMAINES, resident and abiding within the citie selfe of ROME, that they should depart out of ROME. Besides all this there was a strange proclamation made, and neuer seene before: that none of all the friends and confederates of the ROMAINES for certaine daies should come into ROME. But Caius on the other side set vp bils on euery post, accusing the Consul for making so wicked a proclamation: and further, promised the confederates of ROME to aide them, if they would remaine there against the Consuls proclamation. But yet he performed it not: for when he saw one of Fannius sergeants carie a friend of his to prison, he held on his way, and would see nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelihood because he feared his credite with the people, which began to decay, or else because he was loth (as he said) to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which sought it of him. Furthermore, he chaunced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occasion. The people were to see the pastime of the sword-players or fencers at the sharpe, within the verie market place, and there were diuers of the officers that to see the sport, did set vp scaffolds round about, to take money for the standing. Caius commaunded them to take them downe againe, because the poore men might see the sport without any cost. But not a man of them would yeeld to it. Wherefore he staied till the night before the pastime should be, and then he tooke all his labourers he had vnder him, and went and ouerthrew the scaffolds euerie one of them: so that the next morning all the market place was cleare for the common people to see the pastime at their pleasure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruellously, and tooke him for a worthie man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were verie much offended with him, and tooke him for a bold presumptuous man. This seemeth to be the chiefe cause why he was put from his third Tribuneship, where he had the most voices on his side: because his colleagues, to be reuenged of the part he had played them, of malice and spite, made false report of the voices. Howbeit there is no great troth in this. It is true that he was verie angrie with this repulse, and it is reported he spake somewhat too proudly to his enemies, that were merrie with the matter, and laughed him to scorne: that they laughed a SARDONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkely his deedes were intangled. Furthermore, his enemies hauing chosen Opimius Consull, they began immediatly to reuoke diuers of Caius lawes: as among the rest, his doings at CARTHAGE for the re-edifying of that citie, procuring thus all the wayes they could to anger him, because they might haue iust occasion of anger to kill him. Caius notwithstanding did patiently beare it at the first: but afterwards his friends, and specially Fuluius, did incourage him so, that he began againe to gether men to resist the Consull. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, secretly hiring a great number of strangers which she sent vnto ROME, as if they had bin reapers, or haruest men. And this is that she wrote secretly in her letter vnto her son in ciphers. And yet other write to the contrarie, that she was verie angrie he did attempt those things. When the day came that they should proceed to the reuocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitoll. There, when the Consull Opimius had done sacrifice, one of Caius sergeants called Quintus Antyllius, carying the intrailes of the beast sacrificed, said vnto Fuluius, and others of his tribe that were about him: giue place to honeſt men, vile citizens that ye be. Some ſay alſo, that beſides theſe iniurious words, in ſcorne and contempt he held out his naked arme to make them aſhamed: whereupon they ſlue him preſently in the field with great bodkins to write with, which they had purpoſely made for that intent. So the common people were maruellouſly offended for this murther, and the chiefe men of both ſides alſo were diuerſly affected. For Caius was verie ſorie for it, and bitterly reproued them that were about him, ſaying, that they had giuen their enemies the occaſion they looked for, to ſet vpon them. Opimius the Conſull in contrarie manner, taking this occaſion, roſe vpon it, and did ſtirre vp the people to be reuenged. But there fell a ſhowre of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Conſull hauing aſſembled the Senate by breake of day, as he was diſpatching cauſes within, ſome had taken the bodie of Antyllius and laid it naked vpon the beere, and ſo caried it through the market place (as it was agreed vpon before amongſt them) and brought it to the Senate doore: where they began to make great mone and lamentation, Opimius knowing the meaning of it, but yet he diſſembled it, and ſeemed to wonder at it. Whereupon the Senatours went out to ſee what it was, and finding this Beere in the market place, ſome fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cryed out that it was a ſhamefull act, and in no wiſe to be ſuffered. But on the other ſide, this did reuiue the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednes of the ambitious Noblemen: who hauing themſelues before ſlaine Tiberius Gracchus that was Tribune and within the Capitoll it ſelfe, and had alſo caſt his body into the riuer, did now make an honourable ſhew openly in the market place, of the bodie of the Sergeant Antyllius (who though he were wrongfully ſlaine, yet had himſelfe giuen them the cauſe that ſlue him, to do that they did) and all the whole Senate were about the Beere to bewaile his death, and to honor the funerals of a hireling, to make the people alſo kill him, that was only left the protector and defender of the people. After this, they went againe vnto the Capitoll, and there made a decree, whereby they gaue the Conſull Opimius extraordinarie power and authoritie, by abſolute power to prouide for the ſafetie of the commonwealth, to preſerue the citie, and to ſuppreſſe the tyrants. This decree being eſtabliſhed, the Conſull preſently commanded the Senators that were preſent there, to go arme themſelues: and appointed the Romaine Knights, that the next morning betimes euery man ſhould bring two of their men armed with them. Fuluius on the other ſide, he prepared his force againſt them, and aſſembled the common people together. Caius alſo returning from the market place, ſtaid before the image of his father, and looked earneſtly vpon it without euer a word ſpeaking, only he burſt out a weeping, and fetching a great ſigh, went his way. This made the people to pitie him that ſaw him: ſo that they talked among themſelues, that they were but beaſts and cowards at ſuch a ſtraight to forſake ſo worthy a man. Thereupon they went to his houſe, ſtayed there all night and watched before his gate: not as they did that watched with Fuluius, that paſſed away the night in guzling and drinking drunke, crying out, and making noiſe, Fuluius himſelfe being drunke firſt of all, who both ſpake and did many things farre vnmeete for his calling. For they that watched Caius on the other ſide, were very ſorowfull, and made no noiſe, euen as in a common calamitie of their countrey, deuiſing with themſelues what would fall out vpon it, waking and ſleeping one after another by turnes. When the day brake, they with Fuluius did awake him, who ſlept yet ſoundly for the wine he dranke ouer night, and they armed themſelues with the ſpoiles of the Gavles that hung round about his houſe, whom he had ouercome in battell the ſame yeare he was Conſull: and with great cries, and thundering threats they went to take the mount Auentine. But Caius would not arme himſelfe, but went out of his houſe in a long gowne, as if he would haue gone ſimply into the market place according to his wonted maner, ſauing that he caried a ſhort dagger at his girdle vnder his gowne. So as he was going out of his houſe, his wife ſtaid him at the doore, and holding him by the one hand, and a litle child of his in her other hand, ſhe ſaid thus vnto him: Alas Caius, thou doeſt not now go as thou wert wont, a Tribune into the market place to ſpeake to the people, neither to preferre any new lawes: neither doeſt thou go vnto an honeſt warre, that if vnfortunately that ſhould happen to thee that is common to all men, I might yet at the leaſt mourne for thy death with honor. But thou goeſt to put thy ſelfe into bloudie butchers hands, who moſt cruelly haue ſlaine thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goeſt, a naked man vnarmed, intending rather to ſuffer, then to do hurt. Beſides, thy death can bring no benefite to the Commonwealth. For the worſer part hath now the vpper hand, conſidering that ſentence paſſeth by force of ſword. Had thy brother

"haue buried him. But such may be my misfortune, that I may presently go to pray the riuer or "sea to giue me thy bodie, when as thy brothers it shall likewise be throwne into the same. Alas,
"what hope or trust is left vs now in lawes or gods, sithence they haue slaine Tiberius? As Licinia was making this pitifull mone vnto him, Caius faire and softly pulled his hand from her, and left her, giuing her neuer a word, but went on with his friends. But she reaching after him to pull him by the gowne, fell to the ground, and lay flatling there a great while, speaking neuer a word, vntill at length her seruants tooke her vp in a swoune, and caried her so vnto her brother Crassus. Now Fuluius sent his sonne to the Consull with an Herauld his rod to offer peace. Fuluius, by the perswasion of Caius, when all their faction were met: sent his yonger son (which was a pretie faire boy) with an Heraulds rod in his hand for his safetie. This boy humbly presenting his dutie, with the teares in his eyes, before the Consull and Senate, offered them peace.
The most of them that were present thought very well of it. But Opimius made answer, saying, that it became them not to send messengers, thinking with faire words to win the Senate: but it was their dutie to come themselues in person, like subiects and offenders to make their triall, and so to craue pardon, and to seeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commaunded the boy he should not returne againe to them, but with this condition he had prescribed. Caius (as it is reported) was readie to go and cleare himselfe vnto the Senate: but the residue would not suffer him to go. Whereupon Fuluius sent his sonne backe againe vnto them, to speake for them as he had done before. But Opimius that was desirous to fight, caused the boy to be taken, and committed him to safe custody, and then went presently against Fuluius with a great number of footmen well armed, and of CRETAN archers besides: who with their arrowes did more trouble and hurt their enemies, then with any thing else, that within a while they all began to flie. Fuluius on the other side fled into an old hot-house that no bodie made reckening of, and there being found
The death of Fuluius and his eldest sonne. shortly after, they slue him and his eldest sonne. Now for Caius, he fought not at all, but being mad with himselfe, and grieued to see such bloudshed: he got him into the temple of Diana, where he would haue killed himselfe, had not his very good friends Pomponius and Licinius saued him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his sword from him, and counselled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, and holding vp both his hands vnto the goddesse, he besought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude and treason. For the common people (or the most part of them) plainely turned their coates, when they heard proclamation made that all men had pardon granted them
The flight of Caius. that would returne. So Caius fled vpon it, and his enemies followed him so neare, that they ouertooke him vpon the woodden bridge, where two of his friends that were with him staid, to defend him against his pursuers, and bad him in the meane time make shift for himselfe, whilst they fought with them vpon the bridge: and so they did, and kept them that not a man got the bridge of them vntil they were both slaine. Now there was none that fled with Caius, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithstanding, euery man did still encourage and counsell him, as they do men to win a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horse though he often required it, because he saw his enemies so neare vnto him. This notwithstanding, by their defence that were slaine vpon the bridge, he got ground of them so, that he had leysure to creepe into a litle groue of wood which was consecrated to the Furies. There his seruant Philocrates slue him, The faithfulnesse of Caius Gracchus seruant. and then slue himselfe also, and fell dead vpon him. Other write notwithstanding, that both the maister and seruant were ouertaken, and taken aliue: and that his seruant did so straight embrace his maister that none of the enemies could strike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was slaine himselfe. So one of the murtherers strake off Caius Gracchus head to carie to the Consull.
Howbeit one of Opimius friends called Septimuleius, tooke the head from the other by the way, because proclamation was made by trumpet before they fought, that whosoeuer brought the heads of Fuluius and Caius, they should be paid the waight of them in gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius caried Caius head vpon the top of his speare vnto Opimius: whereupon the scales being brought to weigh it, it was found to weigh seuenteene pound weight and two third parts of a pound: because Septimuleius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpen it with this villanie, that he had taken out his braine, and in lieu thereof had filled his scull with Lead. Now the other also that brought Fuluius head, because they were pore men, they had nothing. The bodies of these two men, Caius Gracchus and Fuluius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thousand that were slaine) were all throwne into the riuer,

their

their goods confiscate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Furthermore, they took from Licinia Caius wife, her ioynter: but yet they dealt more cruelly and beastly with the young boy, Fuluius sonne: who had neither lift vp his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but onely came to them to make peace before they fought, whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battell ended they put him to death. But yet that which most of all grieued the people was the temple of Concord, the which Opimius caused to be built: for it appeared that he boasted, and in maner triumphed, that he had slaine so many citizens of ROME. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inscription of the temple these verses:

A furious fact and full of beastly shame
This temple built, that beareth Concords name.

The temple of Concord built by Opimius the Consull.

This Opimius was the first man at ROME, that being Consull, vsurped the absolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or iustice condemned three thousand citizens of ROME, besides Fuluius Flaccus, (who had also bene Consul, and had receiued the honour of triumph) and Caius Gracchus a young man in like case, who in vertue and reputation excelled all the men of his years. This notwithstanding could not keepe Opimius from theeuerie and extortion. For when he was sent ambassador vnto Iugurth king of NVMIDIA, he was bribed with money: and thereupon being accused, he was most shamefully conuicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his daies with this reproch and infamie, hated and mocked of all the people: because at the time of the ouerthrow he dealt beastly with them that fought for his quarrell. But shortly after it appeared to the world how much they lamented the losse of the two brethren of the Gracchi. For they made images and statues of them, and caused them to be set vp in an open and honourable place, consecrating the places where they had bene slaine: and many of them also came and offered to them of their first fruites and flowers, according to the time of the yeare, and went thither to make their prayers on their knees, as vnto the temples of the gods. Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamitie with a noble heart: and as for the chappels which they built and consecrated vnto them in the place where they were slaine, she said no more, but that they had such graues as they had deserued. Afterwards she dwelt continually by the mount of Misene, and neuer chaunged her maner of life. She had many friends, and because she was a noble Ladie, and loued euer to welcome straungers, she kept a very good house, and therefore had alwaies great repaire vnto her, of GRECIANS and learned men: besides, there was no king nor prince but both receiued gifts from her, and sent her again. They that frequented her cõpany delighted maruellously to heare her report the deeds and maner of her fathers life, Scipio AFRICAN: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the acts and death of her two sonnes, Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, without shedding teare, or making any shew of lamentation or griefe, no more then if she had told an historie vnto them that had requested her. Insomuch as some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercome and taken her reason and sense from her to feele any sorow. But indeed they were senselesse to say so, not vnderstanding how that to be nobly borne and vertuously brought vp, doth make men temperatly to disgest sorow: and that fortune oftentimes ouercomes vertue, which regardeth honestie in all respects, but yet with any aduersitie she cannot take away the temperance from them whereby they patiently beare it.

The wisdome of the Gracchi.

NOw that we be come to the end of this hiſtorie, we are to compare the liues of theſe two men the one with the other. Firſt, as touching the two Gracchi: their enemies that moſt hated them, and ſpake the worſt they could of thē, could not deny but that they were the beſt giuen to vertue, and as well taught and brought vp, as any ROMAINES that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they hauing bene very ill brought vp, both for learning and good manners, for lacke whereof the oldeſt men were almoſt ſpoiled: yet did they notwithſtanding make themſelues the firſt maiſters and example of ſobrietie, temperance, and ſimplicitie of life. Furthermore, the two firſt hauing liued in that time, when ROME flouriſhed moſt in honour and vertuous deſires: they were more then aſhamed to forſake the vertues inherited frō their anceſtors. Theſe two laſt alſo being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrary diſpoſition, & finding their country altogether without any order, & infected with diſſolute life: were not therfore any whit the more ſlack in their deſire to do well. Furthermore, the greateſt praiſe they gaue vnto the two Gracchi, was, their abſtinence & integrity from taking of mony all the time they were in office, & dealt in matters of ſtate, euer keeping their hands cleane, and tooke not a penny wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on the other ſide was offended if any man praiſed him: for that he took nothing frō another man: ſeeing that he diſpoſſeſſed himſelfe of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in readie coyne to the value of ſixe hundred talents. Whereby men may eaſily iudge, how grieuous a ſinne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man: ſeeing that he thought it a kind of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruellous great difference in their alterations, and renewing of the ſtate, which they did both preferre. For the acts of the two ROMAINES were to mend high waies and to reedifie and repleniſh decayed townes: and the worthieſt act Tiberius did, was the law Agraria, which he brought in for diuiding of the lands of the commonwealth amongſt the poore citizens. And the beſt act his brother Caius alſo did, was the mingling of the Iudges, adding to the three hundred Senators

three hundred ROMAINE Knights to be indifferent Iudges with them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrarie maner were of opinion, that to reforme small faults, and to redresse them by litle and litle, was (as Plato said) to cut off one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards seuen in the place: and therefore they tooke vpon them a chaunge and innouation, euen at once to root out all the mischiefes of their countrie, (or to speake more truly, to take away the disorder which brought in all vice and mischiefe to the commonwealth) and so to restore the city of SPARTA againe to her former auncient honourable estate. Now this may be said againe for the gouernment of the Gracchi: that the chiefest men of ROME euer were against their purposes. Where, in that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be, and that was the auncient lawes and ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equalitie: the first, instituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alterations of the first, ROME became no greater then it was before. Where, by that which Cleomenes did, all GREECE in short time saw that SPARTA commaunded all the rest of PELOPONNESVS, and fought at that time against those that were of greatest power in all GREECE, for the signiorie thereof. Whereby their onely marke and purpose was, to rid all GREECE from the wars of the GAVLES and ILLYRIANS, and to restore it againe to the honest gouernement of the race and line of Hercules. Their deaths (me thinkes) do shew great difference of their courages. For the Gracchi fighting with their owne citizens, were slaine flying. Of these two also, Agis, because he would put neuer a citizen to death, was slaine in maner voluntarily: and Cleomenes receiuing iniurie stood to his defence, and when he had no oportunitie to do it, he stoutly killed himself. And so may it be said on the other side, that Agis did neuer any noble act of a Captaine or souldier, because he was slaine before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on the other side, may be opposed the scaling of the wals of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first man that at the assault got vp vpon the wall, which was no small exploit: and the peace which he made also at the siege of NVMANTIA, whereby he saued twentie thousand fighting men of the ROMAINES, the which had no meanes otherwise to saue their liues. And Caius also in the selfe same warre, at the siege of NVMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feates of war: so that there is no doubt, but if they had not bene slaine so soone as they were, they might haue bene compared with the excellentest Captaines that euer were in ROME. Againe, touching their doings in ciuill pollicie, it appeareth that Agis dealt more slackly, being abused by Agesilaus: who likewise deceiued the poore citizens of the diuision of the lands which he had promised them. In fine, for lacke of courage, because he was very young, he left the things vndone which he had purposed to haue performed. On the other side, Cleomenes went too roundly to worke to renew the auncient gouernment of the commonwealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much crueltie, whom he might easily haue won, or otherwise by force haue gotten the vpper hand. For it is not the part of a wise Phisitian, nor of a good gouernor of a commonwealth to vse the sword, but in great extremitie, where there is no other helpe nor remedie: and there lacked iudgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for iniurie is euer ioyned with crueltie. The Gracchi on the other side, neither the one nor the other, began to imbrue their hands in the bloud of their citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caius, yet he would neuer defend himselfe: and where it was knowne that he was very valiant in battell with his sword in his hand against the enemie, he shewed himselfe as cold againe in the vprore against his citizens. For he went out of his house vnarmed, and fled when he saw them fight: being more circumspect not to do hurt, then not to suffer any. Therefore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearefull to offend any man. For they were driuen either to yeeld to them that followed them, or else if they stayed, to stand to their defence, because they might keepe themselues from hurt. And where they accuse Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greatest that euer he did, was when he deposed Octauius his colleague from the Tribuneship, and that he himselfe made sute for the second. And as for Caius, they falsly accused him for the death of Antyllius the Sergeant, who indeed was slaine vnknowne to him, and to his great griefe. Where Cleomenes on the other side, although we should forget the murther he committed vpon the Ephores, yet he set slaues at liberty, and ruled the kingdome in maner himselfe alone: but yet for manners sake onely he ioyned his owne brother with him, which was of the self same house. And when he had perswaded Archidamus, (who was next heire to the kingdome of the other royall house) to be bold to returne home from MESSINA vnto SPARTA: he suffered him to be ſlaine, and becauſe he did not reuenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was conſenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other ſide, whoſe example he did counterfeit to follow, becauſe he did willingly reſigne the kingdome vnto his brothers ſon Charilaus, and being afraid alſo, that if the young child ſhould chaunce to miſcarrie, they would ſuſpect him for his death: he exiled himſelfe out of his owne countrie a long time, trauelling vp and downe, and returned not to SPARTA againe, before Charilaus had gotten a ſon to ſucceed him in his kingdom. But we cannot ſet another GRECIAN by Lycurgus comparable vnto him. We haue declared alſo that amongſt Cleomenes deeds, there were many other greater alterations then theſe, and alſo many other breaches of the law. So they that do condemne the manners of the one and the other, ſay, that the two GRECIANS from the beginning had an aſpiring mind to be tyrants, ſtill practiſing warres: whereas the two ROMAINES onely, euen by their moſt mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing elſe, but for an extreame ambition, and did confeſſe that they were too earneſt and vehement aboue their nature, in any ſtrife or contention they had with their aduerſaries, and that they yeelded vnto that choler and paſſion, as vnto ill winds, which brought them to do thoſe things they did in the end. For what more iuſt and honeſt intent could they haue had, then the firſt was: had not the rich men (euen through ſtoutneſſe and authoritie to ouerthrow the lawes) brought them againſt their wils into quarrell: the one to ſaue his life, the other to reuenge his brothers death, who was ſlaine without order, iuſtice, or the authoritie of any Officer? Thus thou mayeſt thy ſelfe ſee the difference that was betwixt the GRECIANS and the ROMAINS: and now to tell you plainely my opinion of both, I thinke that Tiberius was the ſtouteſt of the foure, that the young king Agis offended leaſt, and that for boldneſſe and courage, Caius came nothing neare vnto Cleomenes.

THE LIFE OF Demoſthenes.

True happines conſiſteth in the mind and maners of man, not in any place or country.

HE that made the litle booke of the praiſe of Alcibiades, touching the victorie he wanne at the horſe race of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides as ſome thinke, or any other) my friend Soſius ſaid, that to make a man happie, he muſt of neceſſitie be borne in ſome famous citie. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, doubtleſſe, true happineſſe chiefly conſiſteth in the vertue and qualities of the mind, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous citie: no more then it is for one to be borne of a faire or foule mother. For it were a madneſſe to thinke that the litle village of IVLIDE, being the leaſt part of the Ile of CEO (the whole Iland of it ſelfe being but a ſmal thing) and

and that the Isle of ÆGINA (which is of so small a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might be taken away, because it was but as a straw in the sight of the hauen of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comedians: and not breed an honest, iust, and wise man, and of noble courage. For, as we haue reason to thinke that arts and sciences which were first deuised and inuented to make some things necessarie for mens vse, or otherwise to winne fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in litle poore villages: so are we to iudge also, that vertue, like a strong and fruitfull plant, can take roote, and bring foorth in euery place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chaunce to offend, and liue not as we should: we cannot accuse the meannesse of our countrey where we were borne, but we must iustly accuse our selues. Surely he that hath taken vpon him to put foorth any worke, or to write any historie, into the which he is to thrust many straunge things vnknowne to his countrey, and which are not readie at his hand to be had, but dispersed abrode in diuerse places, and to be gathered out of diuerse bookes and authorities: first of all, he must needes remaine in some great and famous citie throughly inhabited, where men do delight in good and vertuous things, because there are commonly plentie of all sorts of bookes: and that perusing them, and hearing talke also of many things besides, which other Historiographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will carie so much more credit, because men that are aliue may presently speake of them as of their owne knowledge, whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery point, hauing many and diuerse necessarie things contained in it. But I my selfe that dwell in a poore litle towne, and yet do remaine there willingly lest it should become lesse: whilest I was in ITALY, and at ROME, I had no leysure to studie and exercise the Latine tongue, aswell for the great businesse I had then to do, as also to satisfie them that came to learne Philosophie of me: so that euen somwhat too late and now in my latter time, I beganne to take Latine bookes in hand. And thereby (a straunge thing to tell you, but yet true) I learned not, nor vnderstood matters so much by the words, as I came to vnderstand the words, by common experience and knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to know how to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to speake it readily, or to vnderstand the figures, translations, and fine ioyning of the simple wordes one with another, which do beautifie and set foorth the tongue: surely I iudge it to be a maruellous pleasant and sweet thing, but withall it requireth a long and labourſome studie, meet for those that haue better leysure then I haue, and that haue young yeares on their backes to follow such pleasure. Therfore in this present booke, which is the fifth of this worke, where I haue taken vpon me to compare the liues of Noble men one with another: vndertaking to write the liues of Demosthenes and Cicero, we will consider and examine their nature, manners and conditions, by their acts and deedes in the gouernment of the commonwealth, not meaning otherwise to confer their works and writings of eloquence, neither to define which of them two were sharper or sweeter in his Oration. For as the Poet Ion saith:

Expedient for an historiographer to be in a famous city.

Plutarchs country very little.

In this behalfe a man may rightly say,
The Dolphines in their proper soyle do play.

The which Cæcilius litle vnderstanding, being a man very rash in all his doings, hath vnaduisedly written and set foorth in print, a comparison of Demosthenes eloquence with Ciceroes. But if it were an easie matter for euery man to know himselfe, then the gods needed haue giuen vs no commaundement, neither could men haue said that it came from heauen. But for my opinion, me thinks Fortune euen from the beginning hath framed in maner one self mold of Demosthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures fashioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as, both of thē to be ambitious, both of them to loue the liberty of their country, and both of them very fearefull in any danger of wars. And likewise their fortunes seeme to me, to be both much alike. For it is hard to find two Orators againe, that being so meanely borne as they, haue come to be of so great power and authoritie as they two, nor that haue deserued the ill will of kings & noblemen so much as they haue done, nor that haue lost their daughters, nor that haue bene banished their countries, and that haue bene restored again with honor, and that againe haue fled, and haue bene taken againe, nor that haue ended their liues with the libertie of their country. So that it is hard to be iudged, whether Nature haue made them liker in maners, or Fortune in their doings: as if they had both like cunning workmaisters striued one with the other, to whom they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two.

The parentage of Demosthenes

Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was (as Theopompus writeth) one of the chiefe men of the city, and they called him Macharopæus, to wit, a maker of sword blades, because he had a great shop where he kept a number of slaues to forge them. But touching Æschines the Orators report of his mother, who said that she was the daughter of one Gelon, (that fled from ATHENS being accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother: I am not able to say whether it be true, or deuised of malice to do him despite. Howsoeuer it was, it is true that his father died, leauing him but seuen yeares old, and left him reasonable well: for his goods came to litle lesse then the value of fifteene talents. Howbeit his guardians did him great wrong: for they stale a great part of his goods themselues, and did let the rest runne to naught, as hauing litle care of it, for they would not pay his schoolemaisters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learne the liberall sciences which are vsually taught vnto honest mens sons: and to further that want also, he was but a weakling, and very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him go to schoole, neither his maisters also durst keepe him too hard to it, because he was but a sickly child at the first, and very weake. And it is reported also, that the surname of Battalus was giuen him in mockerie by other schoole boyes his companions, because of his weakenesse of bodie. This Battalus (as diuerse men do report) was an effeminate player on the flute, against whom the Poet Antiphanes to mocke him, deuised a litle play. Others also do write of one Battalus, a dissolute Orator, and that wrote lasciuious verses: and it seemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a certaine part of mans body vncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argas (which surname men say was also giuen him) he was so called, either for his rude and beastly manners (because some Poets do call a snake Argas) or else for his manner of speech: which was very vnpleasant to the eare, for Argas is the name of a Poet that made alwaies bawdie and il-fauored songs. But hereof enough as Plato said. Furthermore, the occasion (as it is reported) that moued him to giue himselfe to eloquence, was this. Callistratus the Orator was to defend the cause of one Oropus before the Iudges, & euery man longed greatly for this day of pleading, both for the excellencie of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accusation, which was manifestly knowne to all. Demosthenes hearing his schoolemaisters agree together to go to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his schoolmaster to be so good as to let him go with him. His maister graunted him, & being acquainted with the keepers of the hall doore where this matter was to be pleaded, he so intreated them, that they placed their scholer in a very good place, where being set at his ease, he might both heare and see all that was done and no man could see him. Thereupon when Demosthenes had heard the case pleaded, he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he saw how he was waited vpon home with such a traine of people after him: but yet he wondered more at the force of his great eloquence, that could so turne and conuey all things at his pleasure. Thereupon he left the studie of all other sciences, and all other exercises of wit and body, which other children are brought vp in: and began to labour continually, and to frame himselfe to make orations, with intent one day to be an Orator among the rest. His maister that taught him Rhetoricke was Isæus, notwithstanding that Isocrates also kept a schoole of Rhetoricke at that time: either because that being an orphane he was not able to pay the wages that Isocrates demaunded of his scholers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he found Isæus maner of speech more proper for the vse of the eloquence he desired, because it was more fine and subtil. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithstanding, that he had read certaine bookes, hauing no name of any authour, which declared that Demosthenes had bene Platoes scholer, & that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation and eloquence. And he writeth also of one Ctesibius, who reporteth that Demosthenes had secretly read Isocrates works of Rhetoricke, and also Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Callias SYRACVSAN, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardship, he beganne to put his guardians in sute, and to write Orations and pleas against them: who in contrarie manner did euer vse delayes and excuses, to saue themselues from giuing vp any account vnto him, of his goods and patrimonie left him. And thus, following this exercise (as Thucydides writeth) it prospered so well with him, that in the end he obtained it, but not without great paines and danger: and yet with all that he could do, he could not recouer all that his father left him, by a good deale. So hauing now gotten some boldnes, and being vsed also to speake in open presence, and withall, hauing a feeling and delight of the estimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading: afterwards he attempted to put forward himselfe, and to practise in matters of state. For, as there

goeth a tale of one Laomedon an ORCHOMENIAN, who hauing a grieuous paine in the splene, by aduise of the Phisitions was willed to run long courses to helpe him: and that following their order, he became in the end so lusty and nimble of body, that afterwards he would needs make one to run for games, and indeed grew to be the swiftest runner of all men in his time. Euen so the like chanced vnto Demosthenes. For at the first, beginning to practise Oratory for recouery of his goods, and thereby hauing gotten good skill and knowledge how to pleade: he afterwards tooke vpon him to speake to the people in assemblies, touching the gouernment of the comon wealth, euen as he should haue contended for some game of price, and at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for Orations: notwithstanding that when he first ventured to speake openly, the people made such a noise, that he could scant be heard, & besides they mocked him for his maner of speech that was so straūge, because he vsed so many long confused periods, and his matter he spake of was so intricate with arguments one vpon another, that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very soft voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had also a short breath, the which made that men could not well vnderstand what he meant, for his long periods in his oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at the end of his sentēce. So that at length perceiuing he was thus reiected, he gaue ouer to speake any more before the people, and halfe in despaire withdrew himselfe into the hauen of Piræa. There Eunomus the THESSALIAN being a very old man, found him, and sharply reproued him, and told him, that he did himselfe great wrong, considering, that hauing a maner of speech much like vnto Pericles, he drowned himselfe by his faint heart, because he did not seeke the way to be bold against the noise of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burthen of publicke orations, but suffering it to grow feebler, for lacke of vse and practise. Furthermore, being once againe repulsed & whistled at, as he returned home hanging downe his head for shame, and vtterly discouraged, Satyrus an excellent player of comedies being his familiar friend, followed him, and went and spake with him. Demosthenes made his complaint vnto him, that where he had taken more paines then all the Orators besides, and had almost euen worne himselfe to the bones with study, yet he could by no meanes deuise to please the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bib all day long, and marriners that vnderstood nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with Orations: and on the other side that they made no account of him. Satyrus then answered him, Thou saiest true Demosthenes, but care not for this, I will helpe it straight, and take away the cause of all this: so thou wilt but tell me without booke certaine verses of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereupon Demosthenes presently rehearsed some vnto him, that came into his mind. Satyrus repeating them after him, gaue them quite another grace, with such a pronunciation, comely gesture, and modest countenance becomming the verses, that Demosthenes thought them cleane changed. Whereby perceiuing how much the action (to wit, the comely maner and gesture in his oration) doth giue grace and comelinesse in his pleading: he then thought it but a trifle, and almost nothing to speake of, to exercise to pleade well, vnlesse therewithall he do also study to haue a good pronunciation and gesture. Thereupon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the which was whole euen in my time, and he would daily go downe into it, to fashion his gesture and pronunciation, and also to exercise his voice, and that with such earnest affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three moneths one after another, and did shaue his head of purpose, because he durst not go abroad in that sort, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declaime vpon, and to practise to pleade of the matters he had had in hand before, or else vpon occasion of such talke as he had with them that came to see him, while he kept his house. For they were no sooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, and repeated from the first to the last all matters that had passed betweene him and his friends in talke together, and alleaged also both his owne and their answers. And if peraduenture he had bene at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeate it by himselfe: and would finely couch and conuey it into proper sentences, and thus change and alter euery way any matter that he had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very quicke capacity by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten with extreame labour. And for proofe hereof, they make this probable reason. That they neuer saw Demosthenes make any oration on the sudden, and that oftentimes when he was set in the assembly, the people would call him by his name, to say his opinion touching the matter of counſell then in hand: howbeit that he neuer roſe vpon their call vnleſſe he had firſt ſtudied the matter well he would ſpeake of. So that all the other Orators would many times giue him a taunt for it: as Pytheas among other, that taunting him on a time, told him, his reaſons ſmelled of the lampe. Yea, replied Demoſthenes ſharply againe: ſo is there great difference, Pytheas, betwixt thy labour and mine by lampe-light. And himſelfe alſo ſpeaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told thē plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length all that he would ſpeake, neither did he alſo offer to ſpeake, before he had made briefes of that he would ſpeake. He ſayd furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that he would be carefull before what he would ſay to them. For this preparatiue (quoth he) doth ſhew that he doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary maner alſo, he that paſſeth not how the people take his words, it is a plaine token that he deſpiſeth their authority, and that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vſe force againſt them, rather then reaſon & perſwaſion. But yet further to enlarge the prooſes, that Demoſthenes had no hart to make any oration on the ſudden, they do alleadge this reaſon: That Demades many times roſe vp on the ſudden to maintaine Demoſthenes reaſons, when the people otherwhile did reiect him: and that Demoſthenes on the other ſide, did neuer riſe to make Demades words good, which he had ſpoken in his behalfe. But now might a man aske againe: If Demoſthenes was ſo timorous to ſpeake before the people vpon the ſudden: what meant Æſchines then to ſay, that he was maruellous bold in his words: and how chanceth it, that he riſing vpon the ſudden, did preſently anſwer the Orator Python Bizantine in the field, that was very luſty in ſpeech (and rough like a vehement running ſtreame) againſt the Athenians: and how chanced it that Lamachus Myrrhenian, hauing made an oration in the praiſe of Philip and Alexander kings of Macedon, in the which he ſpake all the ill he could of the Thebans, and of the Olynthians, & when he had read and pronounced it in the open aſſembly of the Olympian games: Demoſthenes vpon the inſtant riſing vp on his feete, declared, as if he had read ſome hiſtory, and pointed as it were with his finger vnto all the whole aſſembly, the notable great ſeruice and worthy deeds the which the Chalcidians had done in former times, for the benefit and honor of Greece? And in contrary maner alſo, what miſchiefe and inconuenience came by meanes of the flatterers that altogether gaue themſelues to curry fauour with the Macedonians? With theſe and ſuch like perſwaſions, Demoſthenes made ſuch ſtirre amongſt the people, that the Orator Lamachus being afraid of the ſudden vprore, did ſecretly conuey himſelfe out of the aſſembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke, Demoſthenes in my opinion faſhioning himſelfe euen from the beginning, to follow Pericles ſteps and example, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not ſo requiſite for him, and that he would counterfeit his grauity and ſober countenance, and to be wiſe, not to ſpeake ouer lightly to euery matter at all aduentures: iudging, that by that maner of wiſedome he came to be great. And like as he would not let ſlip any good occaſion to ſpeake, where it might be for his credite: ſo would he not likewiſe ouer raſhly hazard his credit & reputatiō to the mercy of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vpon the ſudden without premeditation before, do ſhew more boldneſſe and courage, then thoſe which he had written, and ſtudied long before: if we may beleeue the reports of Eratoſthenes, Demetrius Phalerian, and of the other comicall Poets. For Eratoſthenes ſayd, that he would be often caried away with choler and furv. Demetrius alſo ſayth, that ſpeaking one day to the people, he ſware a great oath in rime, as if he had bene poſſeſſed with ſome diuine ſpirit, and ſayd:

By ſea and land, by riuers, ſprings and ponds.

There are alſo certaine comicall Poets that do call him Ropoperperethra, as who would ſay, a great babbler that ſpeaketh all things, that commeth to his tongues end. Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rhetoricke called Antitheton: which is, oppoſition, with ſaying, Sic recepit ſicut cepit, (which ſignifieth, he tooke it as he found it.) In the vſe of this figure Demoſthenes much pleaſed himſelfe, vnleſſe the poet Antiphanes ſpeaketh it of pleaſure, deriding the counſell he gaue the people, not to take the Ile of Halonesvs of king Philip, as of gift: but to receiue it as their owne reſtored. And yet euery body did graunt, that Demades of his owne naturall wit, without art, was inuincible: and that many times ſpeaking vpon the ſudden, he did vtterly ouerthrow Demoſthenes long ſtudied reaſons. And Ariſto of the Ile of Chio, hath written Theophraſtus iudgement of the Orators at that time. Who being asked what maner of Orator he thought Demoſthenes: he anſwered, worthy of this city. Then againe, how he thought thought of Demades: aboue this city, ſaid he. The ſame Philoſopher writeth alſo, that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN (one of thoſe that practiſed at that time in the commonwealth) gaue this ſentence: that Demoſthenes indeed was a great Orator, but Phocions toung had a ſharper vnderſtanding, becauſe in few words, he comprehended much matter. And to this purpoſe, they ſay that Demoſthenes himſelfe ſayd alſo, that as oft as he ſaw Phocion get vp into the pulpit for Orations to ſpeake againſt him, he was wont to ſay to his friends: See, the axe of my words riſeth. And yet it is hard to iudge, whether he ſpake that in reſpect of his toung, or rather for the eſtimation he had gotten, becauſe of his great wiſdome: thinking (as indeed it is true) that one word onely, the twickling of an eye, or a nod of the head, of ſuch a man (that through his worthineſſe is attained to that credite) hath more force to perſwade, then all the fine reaſons and deuices of Rhetorike. But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth, that he heard Demoſthenes himſelfe ſay, being very old, that he did helpe them by theſe meanes. Firſt touching the ſtammering of his toung, which was very fat, & made him that he could not pronounce all ſyllables diſtinctly: he did helpe it by putting of litle pibble ſtones into his mouth, which he found vpon the ſands by the riuers ſide, & ſo pronounced with open mouth the orations he had without booke. And for his ſmall and ſoft voice, he made that louder, by running vp ſteepe & high hils, vttering euen with full breath ſome orations or verſes that he had without booke. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking-glaſſe in his houſe, & euer ſtanding on his feet before it, he would learne & exerciſe himſelfe to pronounce his orations. For proofe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, & prayed his helpe to defend his cauſe, & told him that one had beaten him: & that Demoſthenes ſayd againe vnto him, I do not beleeue this is true thou telleſt me, for ſurely the other did neuer beate thee. The plaintife then thruſting out his voice aloud, ſayd: What, hath he not beaten me? Yes indeed quoth Demoſthenes then: I beleeue it now, for I heare the voice of a man that was beaten indeed. Thus he thought that the ſound of the voice, the pronunciation or geſture in one ſort or other, were things of force to credite or diſcredite that a man ſaith. His countenance when he pleaded before the people, did maruellouſly pleaſe the common ſort: but the noble men & men of vnderſtanding, found it too baſe & meane, as Demetrius Phalerius ſaid, amongſt others. And Hermippus writeth, that one called Æſion, being asked of the ancient Orators, and of thoſe of his time, anſwered: that euery man that had ſeene them, would haue wondred with what honor, reuerence & modeſty, they ſpake vnto the people: howbeit that Demoſthenes orations (whoſoeuer read thē) were too artificiall & vehemēt. And therfore we may eaſily iudge, that the orations Demoſthenes wrote are very ſeuere & ſharpe. This notwithſtanding, otherwhiles he wold giue many pleaſant & witty anſwers vpō the ſudden. As whē Demades one day ſaid vnto him, Demoſthenes wil teach me: after the cōmon prouerbe, the Sow will teach Minerua. He anſwered ſtraight againe: This Minerua not long ſince was in Collitus ſtreet, taken in adultery. A certaine theefe alſo called Chalcus (as much to ſay, as of copper) ſtepping forth to ſay ſomwhat of Demoſthenes late ſitting vp a nights, & that he wrote & ſtudied the moſt part of the night by lamp-light: Indeed, quoth Demoſthenes, I know it grieues thee to ſee my lampe burne all night: and therfore my Lords of ATHENS, me thinkes you ſhould not wonder to ſee ſuch robberies in your city, conſidering we haue theeues of copper, and the wals of our houſes be but of clay. We could tell you of diuers others of his like pleaſant and witty anſwers, but theſe may ſuffice for this preſent: and therefore we will proceed to conſider further of his nature and conditions, by his acts and deeds in the affaires of the common wealth. Now Demoſthenes firſt beginning when he came to deale in the affaires of the ſtate, was in the time of the warre made with the PHOCIANS, as himſelfe reporteth: and as appeareth further in his orations which he made againſt Philip: of the which, the laſt were made after the warre was ended, and the firſt do touch alſo ſome particular doings of the ſame. He made the oration againſt Midias, when he was but 32 yeares old, and was of ſmall countenance and reputation in the commonwealth: the want whereof was the chiefeſt cauſe (as I thinke) that induced him to take money for the iniury he had done him, and to let his action fall againſt him:

He was not of a mild and gentle mind,
But fierce and haſty to reuenge by kind.

But, knowing that it was no ſmall enterpriſe, nor that could take effect by a man of ſo ſmall power and authority as himſelfe, to ouerthrow a man ſo wealthy, ſo befriended, and ſo eloquent as Midias: he therefore yeelded himſelfe vnto thoſe that did ſpeake and intreate for him. Neither do I thinke that the three thousand Drachmas which he receiued, could haue bridled the bitternesse of his nature, if otherwise he had seene any hope or likelihood that he could haue preuailed against him. Now at his first comming vnto the commonwealth, taking a noble matter in hand, to speake against Philip, for the defence and maintenance of the lawes and liberties of the GRECIANS, he behaued himselfe so worthily, that in short space he wan him maruellous fame for his great eloquence and plaine maner of speech. Thereby he was maruellously honored also through all GREECE, & greatly esteemed with the king of PERSIA: & Philip himselfe made more account of him, then of all the Orators in ATHENS, & his greatest foes which were most against him, were driuen to confesse that they had to do with a famous man. For, in the orations which Æschines & Hyperides made to accuse him, they write thus of him. And therfore I maruell what Theopompus meant, when he wrote that Demosthenes had a subtill vnconstant mind, & could not long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters of state. But in cõtrary maner, in my iudgement he continued constant still to the end, in one selfe maner and order, vnto the which he had betaken himselfe at the beginning: and that not only he neuer changed all his life time, but to the contrary he lost his life, because he would be no changeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuse himselfe for that he had oft turned coate in matters of gouernment, said that he went oftentimes against his owne sayings, as matters fell out: but neuer against the benefit of the commonwealth. And Melanopus also, who was euer against Callistratus, hauing his mouth many times stopped with mony, he would vp to the pulpit for orations, and tell the people, that indeed Callistratus, which maintaineth the contrary opinion against me, is my enemy, and yet I yeeld vnto him for this time: for, the benefit of the commonwealth must cary it. And another also, Nicodemus MESSENIAN, who being first of Cassanders side, tooke part afterwards with Demetrius, and then sayd, that he did not speake against himselfe, but that it was meete he should obey his superiors. They cannot detect Demosthenes with the like, that he did euer halt or yeeld, either in word or deed. For he euer continued firme and constant in one mind in his orations. Insomuch that Panætius the Philosopher saith, that the most part of all his orations are grounded vpon this maxime and principle: that for it selfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honest. As, the oration of the crowne, the which he made against Aristocrates: that also which he made for the franches & freedome: and in fine, all his orations against Philip of MACEDON. And in all those he doth not perswade his countrimen to take that which is most pleasant, easiest, or most profitable: but he proueth that oftentimes honesty is to be preferred aboue safety or health. So that, had he in all his orations & doings, ioyned to his honesty, courtesie, and franke speech, valiantnesse in warres, & cleane hands from bribery: he might deseruedly haue bene compared, not with Myrocles, Polyeuctus, Hyperides and such other Orators: but euen with the highest, with Cimon, Thucidides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worst way in gouernment of the commonwealth, because he was suspected that he tooke part with the MACEDONIANS: yet for valiantnesse, wisedome and iustice, he was euer thought as honest a man, as Ephialtes, and Aristides. But Demosthenes on the other side (as Demetrius saith) was no man to trust to for warres, neither had he any power to refuse gifts and bribes. For though he would neuer be corrupted by Philip king of MACEDON, yet he was bribed with gold and siluer that was brought from the cities of SVSA and ECBATANA, and was very ready to praise and commend the deeds of their ancestors, but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honestest man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And besides he did euer speake more boldly and plainly vnto the people then any man else, and would openly contrary their minds, and sharply reproue the ATHENIANS for their faults, as appeareth by his orations. Theopompus also writeth, that the people on a time would haue had him to accuse a man, whom they would needs haue condemned. But he refusing to do it, the people were offended, and did mutine against him. Thereupon he rising vp sayd openly vnto them: My Lords ATHENIANS, I will alwayes counsell you to that which I thinke best for the benefit of the common wealth, although it be against your minds: but falsly to accuse one to satisfie your minds, though you commaund me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did against Antiphon, sheweth plainly, that he was no people-pleaser, and that he did leane more vnto the authority of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the people in an assembly of the city: Demosthenes notwithstanding tooke him and called him againe into the court of the Areopagites, and did not passe for the peoples ill will, but there conuinced him for promising Philip of MACEDON to burne the arsenall of ATHENS:

The time of Demoſthenes comming to practiſe in the affaires of the ſtate.

Diſpleaſure betwixt Demoſthenes, and Midias.

ſo by ſentence of that court he was condemned, and ſuffered for it. He did alſo accuſe the Nun Theorides for many leud parts cõmitted, & amongſt others, for that ſhe taught ſlaues to deceiue their maiſters: & ſo following the matter againſt her to death, ſhe was condemned, and executed. It is thought alſo, that he made the oration Apollodorus ſpake againſt the Prætor Timotheus, & proued thereby that he was a debtor to the commonwealth, and ſo a naughty man: & that he wrote thoſe orations alſo intituled to Formio & Stephanus, for the which he was iuſtly reproued. For Formio pleaded againſt Apollodorus with the oration which Demoſthenes ſelfe had made for him: which was euen alike, as if out of one ſelfe cutlers ſhop he had ſold his enemies ſwords one to kill another: and for his knowne orations, thoſe which he made againſt Androcion, Timocrates and Ariſtocrates: he cauſed them to giue them vnto others, when he had not yet dealt in matters of ſtate. For indeed when he did put them forth, he was not paſſing ſeuen or eight and twentie yeares old. The oration which he made againſt Ariſtogiton, and the other alſo of liberty, againſt Cteſippus the ſon of Chabrias, he ſpake them, as he ſaith himſelfe (or as others write) openly vnto the people, becauſe he intended to marry Chabrias mother. Howbeit he did not, but maried a SAMIAN woman, as Demetrius MAGNESIAN writeth in his book he made, intituled Synonyma, & in that he wrote againſt Æſchines: where he accuſeth him that he dealt falſly when he was Ambaſſador. It is not knowne whether it was recited or not, although Idomeneus writeth, that there lacked but thirty voices only to haue quit Æſchines. But in this me thinkes he ſpake not truly, & doth but cõiecture it by that the one & the other haue ſaid in their Orations againſt the crowne, in the which neither the one nor the other do ſay preciſely, that this accuſation proceeded to iudgement. But let other that liſt decide this doubt. Now before the war began, it was euident inough, to which part Demoſthenes would incline in the commonwealth. For, he would neuer leaue to reproue & withſtand Philips doings. Therfore he being more ſpoken of in Philips court, then any man elſe, he was ſent vnto him the tenth perſon with nine others in ambaſſade. Philip gaue thẽ all audience one after another: howbeit he was more carefull & circumſpect to anſwer Demoſthenes Oration then all the reſt. But otherwiſe out of that place, he did not Demoſthenes ſo much honor, nor gaue him ſo good entertainment, as to his other cõpanions: for Philip ſhewed more kindneſſe, & gaue better countenance vnto Æſchines, & Philocrates, then vnto him. Wherfore when they did highly praiſe Philip, & ſayd that he was a well ſpoken Prince, a faire man, and would drinke freely, and be pleaſant in company: Demoſthenes ſmiled at it, and turned all things to the worſt, ſaying, that thoſe qualities were nothing cõmendable nor meet for a king. For the firſt was a quality meet for a pleader, the ſecond for a woman, and the third for a ſponge. In fine, warres falling out betweene them, becauſe Philip of the one ſide could not liue in peace, and the ATHENIANS on the other ſide were ſtill incenſed and ſtirred vp by Demoſthenes daily Orations, the ATHENIANS firſt ſent into the Ile of EVBOEA (the which by meanes of certaine priuate tyrants that had taken the townes, became ſubiect againe vnto Philip) following a decree Demoſthenes had preferred, & ſo went to expulſe the MACEDONIANS againe. After that alſo he cauſed them to ſend ayd vnto the BIZANTINES, & to the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made war. For he ſo perſwaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto thoſe two nations, and the faults which either of both the cities had cõmitted againſt them in the warres, touching the rebellion of their confederates: & he cauſed them to ſend them aide, which kept them from Philips force & power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto all the great cities of GREECE as Ambaſſadour, he did ſo ſolicite and perſwade them, that he brought them all in maner to be againſt Philip. So that the army which their tribe ſhould find at their common charge, was 15000 footmen, all ſtrangers, and 2000 horſemen, beſides the citizens of euery city which ſhould alſo ſerue in the warres at their charge, and the money alſo leauied for the maintenance of this warre, was very willingly diſburſed. Theophraſtus writeth, that it was at that time their confederates did pray that they would ſet downe a certaine ſumme of money, what euery citie ſhould pay: and that Crobylus an Orator ſhould make anſwer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was infinite. Now all GREECE being in armes, attending what ſhould happen, and all theſe people and cities being vnited in one league together: as the EVBOEIANS, the ATHENIANS, the CORINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEVCADIANS, and thoſe of CORFV: the greateſt matter Demoſthenes had to do, was to perſwade the THEBANS alſo to enter into this league, becauſe their countrey confined and bordered with ATTICA, beſides their force and power was of great importance, for that they caried the fame of all Greece at that time, for the valiantest souldiers. But it was no trifling matter to win the Thebans, and to make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them vnto him by many great pleasures which he had done to them in the warre of the Phocians: besides also that betwixt Athens and Thebes, by reason of vicinity, there fell out daily quarrels and debates, the which with euery litle thing were soone renued. This notwithstanding Philip being proud of the victory he had won by the city of Amphisse, when he came and inuaded the countrey of Elatia, and was entred into Phocide: the Athenians were then so amazed with it, that no man dunst occupy the pulpit for orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole assembly standing in a doubt with great silence, Demosthenes only stept vp, and did againe giue them counsell to seeke to make league and alliance with the Thebans: and so did further encourage the people, & put them in good hope, as he was alwayes wont to do. Then with others he was sent Ambassadour vnto Thebes: and Philip also for his part, sent Ambassadors vnto the Thebans, Amyntas & Clearchus, two gentlemen Macedonians, and with them Daochus, Thessalus and Thracydæus, to answer and withstand the perswasions of the Athenian Ambassadors. Thereupon the Thebans began to aduise themselues for the best, & layed before their eyes the miserable fruits and calamities of warre, their wounds being yet greene and vncured, which they got by the warres of Phocide. Notwithstanding, the great force of Demosthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did so inflame the Thebans courage with desire of honor, that it trode vnder their feete all maner of considerations, and did so rauish them with the loue and desire of honesty: that they cast at their heeles, all feare of danger, all remembrance of pleasures receiued, and all reason perswading the contrary. This act of an Orator was of so great force, that Philip forthwith sent Ambassadors vnto the Grecians, to intreat for peace, and all Greece was vp to see what would become of this stirre. Thus, not onely the Captaines of Athens obeyed Demosthenes, doing all that he commaunded them: but the gouernors also of Thebes, and of all the countrey of Boeotia besides. And the assemblies also of the councell of Thebes were as well gouerned by him, as the assemblies of Athens, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, and hauing alike authority to command both, and not vndeseruedly, as Theopompus saith, but by iust desert. But some fatall destiny, and the reuolution of times had determined the finall end of the liberty of Greece at that time, cleane contrary to his purpose and intent. There were also many celestiall signes that did foreshew and prognosticate what end should ensue thereof. And amongst others, Apolloes Nunne gaue these dreadfull Oracles: and this old prophecy of the Sibyls was commonly sung in euery bodies mouth:

What time the bloudy battell shall be fought at Thermodon,
God graunt I may be farre away, or else (to looke thereon)
Haue Eagles wings to soare aboue, among the cloudes on high:
For there the vanquisht side shall weepe, and Conquerer shall dye.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a litle riuer of our country of Chæronea, which falleth into the riuer of Cephisus: howbeit at this present time there is neuer a riuer nor brooke in all our country, that I know called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that riuer which we call now Hæmon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the temple of Hercules, where the Grecians lay in campe. And it may be, that because it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ranne bloud at the day of the battell, it changed her name and was surnamed Hæmon, because Hæma in the Greeke tongue, signifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithstanding, that this Thermodon was no riuer, but that certaine men setting vp their tent, and trenching it about, found a litle image of stone, whereupon were engrauen these letters, whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who caried an Amazon hurt in his armes, & that for this image of Thermodon, they do sing such another old Oracle as this:

Ye Ernes and Rauens tarry till the field of Thermodon:
There will be store of carkasses of men to feede vpon.

This notwithstanding, it is very hard to tell the troth of these things. But Demosthenes trusting to the valiantnesse and power of the Grecians, and being maruellously incouraged to see such a great number of valiant and resolute men, so willing to fight with the enemy: he bad them be of good courage, and not to buzze about such Oracles, and to giue eare to such prophecies. And furthermore he told them plainely, that he did mistrust the Nunne Pythea did leane vnto vnto Philip, as fauouring him, and did put the THEBANS in mind of their Captaine Epaminondas, and the ATHENIANS of Pericles, and perſwaded them, that thoſe two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that ſuch prophecies were no other, but a fine cloake for cowards, and that taking no heed to them, they did diſpatch their matters according to their owne diſcretion. Vntill this preſent time, Demoſthenes ſhewed himſelfe alwayes an honeſt man. But when it came to the battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valiant act any thing anſwerable to the orations whereby he had perſwaded the people. For he left his ranke, and cowardly caſt away his weapons to runne the lighter, and was not aſhamed at all (as Pythias ſayd) of the words written vpon his ſhield in golden letters, which were, Good fortune. Now Philip hauing won the battell, he was at that preſent ſo ioyfull, that he fell to commit many fond patts. For after he had drunke well with his friends, he went into the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, and there in mockery began to ſing the beginning of the decree which Demoſthenes had preferred (by the which the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed warres againſt him) riſing and falling with his voice, and dancing it in meaſure with his foote:

Demoſthenes the ſonne of Demoſthenes Pæanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to waxe ſober, and leauing his drunkenneſſe, and that he had remembred himſelfe what danger he had bene in: then his haire ſtood bolt vpright vpon his head, conſidering the force and power of ſuch an Orator, that in a peece of a day had inforced him to hazard his Realme and life at a battell. Now Demoſthenes fame was ſo great, that it was caried euen to the great king of PERSIAES court, who wrote vnto his Lieutenants and gouernors, that they ſhould feed Demoſthenes with mony, and ſhould procure to entertaine him aboue all the men in GRECE, as he that could beſt withdraw Philip and trouble him with the warres and tumults of GRECE. And this was afterwards proued by letters found of Demoſthenes himſelfe, the which came to king Alexanders hands in the city of SARDIS, and by other writings alſo of the gouernors and Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA: in the which were named directly the expreſſe ſummes of money which had bene ſent and giuen vnto him. Now the GRECIANS being thus ouerthrowne by battell, the other Orators, aduerſaries vnto Demoſthenes in the commonwealth, began to ſet vpon him, and to prepare to accuſe him. But the people did not onely cleare him of all the accuſations obiected againſt him, but did continue to honor him more then before, and to call him to aſſemblies, as one that loued the honor and benefit of his countrey. So that when the bones of their countrimen which were ſlaine at the battell of CHERONEA, were brought to be openly buried according to the cuſtome: the people gaue him the honor to make the funerall oration in praiſe of the dead, and made no ſhew of ſorow or griefe for the loſſe they had receiued (as Theopompus witneſſeth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary maner ſhewed that they did not repent them in following of his counſell, but did honor him that gaue it. Demoſthenes then did make the funerall oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to the people, he would neuer ſubſcribe any, to preuent the ſiniſter lucke and misfortune of his name, but did paſſe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew couragious againe, ſhortly after that he vnderſtood of the death of Philip, who was ſlaine immediatly after the victory he wan at CHERONEA. And it ſeemeth this was the meaning of the prophecy or Oracle in the two laſt verſes:

The vanquiſhed bewailes his luckleſſe lot,
And he that winnes, with life eſcapeth not.

Now Demoſthenes hearing of Philips death, before the newes were openly knowne, to preuent them, he would put the people againe into a good hope of better lucke to come. Thereupon he went with a chearfull countenance into the aſſembly of the councell, and told them there, that he had a certaine dreame that promiſed great good hap, and that out of hand vnto the ATHENIANS: and immediatly after, the meſſengers arriued and brought certaine newes of king Philips death. Therupon the ATHENIANS made ſacrifices of ioy to the gods for this happy newes, and appointed a crowne vnto Pauſanias that had ſlaine him. Demoſthenes alſo came abroad in his beſt gowne, and crowned with flowers, ſeuen dayes after the death of his daughter, as Æſchines reporteth: who reproueth him for it, and noteth him to be a man hauing litle loue or charitie vnto his owne children. But indeed Æſchines ſelfe deſerueth more blame, to haue ſuch a tender womaniſh heart, as to beleeue, that weeping and lamenting, are ſignes of a gentle and charitable nature, condemning them that with patience and conſtancie do paſſe away ſuch miſ-

fortunes. But now to the ATHENIANS againe. I can neither thinke nor say that they did wisely to shew such open signes of ioy as to weare crownes and garlands vpon their heads, nor also to sacrifice vnto the gods for the death of a Prince, that behaued himselfe so princely and curteously vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For though indeed all cruelty be subiect to the reuenge of the gods, yet is this an act of a vile and base mind, to honor a man while he liued, and to make him free of their city, and now that another hath slaine him, they to be in such an exceeding iolity withall, & to exceed the bounds of modesty so farre, as to rampe in maner with both their feete vpon the dead; and to sing songs of victory, as if they themselues had bene the men that had valiantly slaine him. In contrary maner also, I praise and commend the constancy and courage of Demosthenes, that he leauing the teares and lamentation of his home trouble vnto women, did himselfe in the meane time that he thought was for the benefit of the commonwealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of courage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a commonwealth, neuer to stoupe nor yeeld, but alwayes to be found stable and constant, for the benefite of the common wealth, reiecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in respect of the seruice of his countrey, and to keepe his honour much more carefully, then common players vse to do, when they play the parts of Kings and Princes, whom we see neither weepe nor laugh when they list, though they be on the stage: but when the matter of the play falleth out to giue them iust occasion. But omitting those reasons, if there be no reason (as indeed there is not) to leaue and forsake a man in his sorow and trouble, without giuing him some words of comfort, and rather to deuise some matter to asswage his sorow, and to withdraw his mind from that, to thinke vpon some pleasanter things: euen as they should keepe sore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them greene and darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles and griefes at home, when the common wealth doth well: then to ioyne their priuate griefes with common ioyes, to the end that the better may obscure and take away the worse. But thus farre I digressed from my history, enlarging this matter, because Æschines in his oration touching this matter, did moue the peoples harts too much vnto womanish sorow. But now to the rest. The cities of GREECE being againe stirred vp by Demosthenes, made a new league againe together: and the THEBANS also hauing armed themselues by his practise, did one day set vpon the garrison of MACEDONIANS within their city, and slue many of them. The ATHENIANS prepared also to maintaine warre on the THEBANS behalfe, and Demosthenes was daily at all the assembles of councell, in the pulpit, perswading the people with his orations: and he wrote also into ASIA vnto the king of PERSIAES Lieutenants and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their side, calling him child, and Margites, as much to say, as foole. But after that Alexander hauing set all his things at stay within his Realme, came himselfe in person with his army, and inuaded the country of BOEOTIA: then fell the pride of the ATHENIANS greatly, and Demosthenes also plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length the poore THEBANS being left vnto themselues forsaken of euery man: they were compelled themselues alone to beare the brunt of this warre, and so came their city to vtter ruine and destruction. Thereby the ATHENIANS being in a maruellous feare and perplexity, did suddenly chuse Ambassadors to send vnto this yong king, and Demosthenes chiefly among others: who being afraid of Alexanders fury and wrath, durst not go to him, but returned from mount Cytheron, and gaue vp the Ambassade. But Alexander sent to summone the ATHENIANS, to send vnto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duris both do write: or eight as the most writers and best historiographers do report, which were these: Demosthenes, Polyeuctus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Callisthenes and Charidemus. At which time, they write that Demosthenes told the people of ATHENS, the fable of the Sheepe and Wolues, how that the Wolues came on a time, and willed the Sheepe, if they would haue peace with them, to deliuer them their mastiues that kept them. And so he compared himselfe and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the people, vnto the dogges that keepe the flockes of sheepe, and called Alexander the Wolfe. Moreouer, sayd he, like as you see these corne maisters bringing a sample of their corne in a dish or napkin to shew you, and by that litle do sell all that they haue: so I thinke you will all wonder, that deliuering of vs, you shall also deliuer your selues into the hands of your enemies. Aristobulus of CASSANDRIA reporteth this matter thus. Now the ATHENIANS being in consultation, not knowing how to resolue, Demades hauing taken fiue talents of them whom Alexander demaunded, did offer himselfe, and promised promiſed to go in this Ambaſſage vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them, either becauſe he truſted in the loue the king did beare him, or elſe for that he thought he hoped he ſhould find him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the bloud of beaſts which he had ſlaine. Howſoeuer it happened, he perſwaded the people to ſend him vnto Alexander, whom he ſo handled, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the city of ATHENS. Thereupon Alexander being retired, Demades and his fellows bare all the ſway and authority, and Demoſthenes was vnder foot. Indeed when Agis king of LACEDÆMON, came with his army into the field, he began a litle to rouſe himſelfe, and to lift vp his head: but he ſhrunke collar againe ſoone after, becauſe the ATHENIANS would not riſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who were ouerthrowne, and Agis ſlaine in battell. At that time was the cauſe of the crowne pleaded againſt Cteſiphon, and the plea was written a litle before the battell of CHÆRONEA, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouoſt of ATHENS: howbeit no ſentence was giuen till ten yeares after, when Ariſtophon was Prouoſt. This was ſuch an open iudgement, and ſo famous, as neuer was any, as well for the great fame of the Orators that pleaded in emulation one of the other, as alſo for the worthineſſe of the Iudges that gaue ſentence thereof: who did not leaue Demoſthenes to his enemies, although indeed they were of greater power then he, and were alſo ſupported with the fauour and good will of the MACEDONIANS: but they did notwithſtanding ſo well quit him, that Æſchines had not ſo much as the fifth part of mens voices and opinions on his ſide. Wherefore immediatly after the ſentence giuen, he went out of ATHENS for ſhame, and trauelled into the country of IONIA, and vnto the RHODES, where he did teach Rhetoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders ſeruice, came vnto ATHENS, being to be charged with many foule matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigality: and alſo becauſe he feared Alexanders fury, who was growne ſeuere and cruell vnto his chiefeſt ſeruants. He comming now amongſt the ATHENIANS with ſtore of gold and ſiluer, the Orators being greedy and deſirous of the gold and ſiluer he had brought: began ſtraight to ſpeake for him, and did counſell the people to receiue and protect a poore ſuter that came to them for ſuccour. But Demoſthenes gaue counſell to the contrary, and bad them rather driue him out of the city, and take heed they brought not warres vpon their backes, for a matter that not onely was not neceſſary, but furthermore meerly vniuſt. But within few dayes after, inuentory being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceiuing that Demoſthenes tooke great pleaſure to ſee a cup of the kings, and conſidered very curiouſly the faſhion and workemanſhip vpon it: he gaue it him in his hand, to iudge what it weyed. Demoſthenes peyzing it, wondered at the great waight of it, it was ſo heauy: ſo he asked how many pound waight it weyed. Harpalus ſmiling, anſwered him: It will bring thee twenty talents. So when night was come, he ſent him the cup, with the twenty talents. This Harpalus was a very wiſe man, and found ſtraight by Demoſthenes countenance that he loued money, and could preſently iudge his nature by ſeeing his pleaſant countenance, and his eyes ſtill vpon the cup. So Demoſthenes refuſed not his gift, and being ouercome withall, as if he had receiued a garriſon into his houſe, he tooke Harpalus part. The next morning, he went into the aſſembly of the people, hauing his necke bound vp with wooll and roles. So when they called him by his name to ſtep vp into the pulpit, to ſpeake to the people as he had done before: he made a ſigne with his head, that he had an impediment in his voyce, and that he could not ſpeake. But wiſe men laughing at his fine excuſe, told him it was no ſquinance that had ſtopped his weſill that night, as he would make them beleeue: but it was Harpalus money which he had receiued, that made him in that caſe. Afterwards when the people vnderſtood that he was corrupted, Demoſthenes going about to excuſe himſelfe, they would not abide to heare him: but made a noiſe and exclamation againſt him. Thereupon there roſe vp a pleaſant conceited man, and ſayd: Why my maſters, do ye refuſe to heare a man that hath * ſuch a golden tongue? The people thereupon did immediatly baniſh Harpalus, and fearing leaſt king Alexander would require an account of the gold and ſiluer which the Orators had robbed and pilfered away among them: they made very diligent ſearch and inquirie in euery mans houſe, excepting Callicles houſe, the ſonne of Arrenidas, whoſe houſe they would by no meanes haue ſearched, becauſe he was but newly maried, and had his new ſpouſe in his houſe, as Theopompus writeth. Now Demoſthenes deſiring to ſhew that he was in no fault, preferred a decree that the court of the Areopagites ſhould heare the matter, and puniſh them that were found faultie, and therewithall ſtraight offered himſelfe to be tried. Howbeit he was one of the firſt whom the court condemned in the ſum

of fiftie talents, and for lacke of payment, they put him in prison: where he could not endure long, both for the shame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as also for his sickly body. So he brake prison, partly without the priuity of his keepers, and partly also with their consent: for they were willing he should make a scape. Some do report, that he fled not farre from the city: where it was told him that certaine of his enemies followed him, wherupon he would haue hidden himselfe from them. But they themselues first called him by his name, and comming to him, prayed him to take mony of them, which they had brought him from their houses to helpe him in his banishment: and that therefore they ran after him. Then they did comfort him the best they could, & perswaded him to be of good cheere, and not to dispaire for the misfortune that was come vnto him. This did pierce his heart the more for sorow, that he answered them: Why, would you not haue me be sory for my misfortune, that compelleth me to forsake the city where indeed I haue so courteous enemies, that it is hard for me to find any where so good friends? So he tooke his banishment vnmanly, and remained the most part of his banishment in the city of Ægina, or at the city of Troezen, where oftentimes he would cast his eyes towards the country of Attica, and weepe bitterly. And some haue written certaine words he spake, which shewed no mind of a man of courage, nor were answerable to the noble things he was wont to perswade in his orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of Athens, he looked backe againe, and holding vp his hands to the Castle, sayd in this sort: O Lady Minerua, Lady patroneſſe of this city: why doest thou delight in three so mischieuous beasts: the Owle, the Dragon, & the People? Besides, he perswaded the yong men that came to see him, and that were with him, neuer to meddle in matters of state, assuring them, that if they had offered him two wayes at the first, the one to go into the assembly of the people, to make orations in the pulpit, and the other to be put to death presently, and that he had knowne as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to suffer that medleth with the affaires of the state, the feare, the enuy, the accusations, and troubles in the same: he would rather haue chosen the way to haue suffered death. So, Demosthenes continuing in his exile, king Alexander died, and all Greece vp againe: insomuch as Leosthenes being a man of great valour, had shut vp Antipater in the city of Lamea, and there kept him straightly besieged. Then Pytheas and Callimedon, surnamed Carabos, two Orators, and both of them banished from Athens, they tooke part with Antipater, & went from towne to towne with his Ambassadors and friends, perswading the Grecians not to stirre, neither to take part with the Athenians. But Demosthenes in contrary maner, ioyning with the Ambassadors sent from Athens into euery quarter to solicite the cities of Greece, to seeke to recouer their liberty: he did aide them the best he could, to solicite the Grecians, to take armes with the Athenians, to driue the Macedonians out of Greece. And Phylarchus writeth, that Demosthenes encountered with Pytheas words in an open assembly of the people in a certaine towne of Arcadia. Pytheas hauing spoken before him, had sayd: Like as we presume alwayes that there is some sickneſſe in the house whither we do see Asses milke brought: so must that towne of necessity be sicke, wherein the Ambassadors of Athens do enter. Demosthenes aunswered him againe, turning his comparison against him: That indeed they brought Asses milke, where there was need to recouer health: and euen so, the Ambassadours of Athens were sent to heale and cure them that were sicke. The people at Athens vnderstanding what Demosthenes had done, they so reioyced at it, that presently they gaue order in the field, that his banishment should be reuoked. He that perswaded the decree of his reuocation, was called Dæmon Pæanian, that was his nephew: and thereupon the Athenians sent him a galley to bring him to Athens, from the citie of Ægina. So Demosthenes being arriued at the hauen of Piræa, there was neither gouernor, Priest, nor almost any townes man left in the citie, but went out to the hauen to welcome him home. So that Demetrius Magnesian writeth, that Demosthenes then lifting vp his hands vnto heauen sayd, that he thought himselfe happie for the honour of that iourney, that the returne from his banishment was farre more honourable, then Alcibiades returne in the like case had bene. For Alcibiades was called home by force: and he was sent for with the good will of the citizens. This notwithstanding, he remained still condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people could not dispence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuised a way to deceiue the law: for they had a manner to giue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and set out the Altar of Iupiter sauiour, for the day of the solemnity of the sacrifice, the which they did yearely celebrate vnto him:

him: ſo they gaue him the charge to make this preparation for the ſumme of fifty talents, being the ſumme of the fine aforeſayd wherein he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the good hap of his reſtitution to his country and goods: for the affaires of the GRECIANS were immediatly after brought to vtter ruine. For the battell of CRANON which they loſt, was in the moneth Munychion (to wit, Iuly:) and in the moneth Bœdromion next enſuing (to wit, Auguſt) the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS entred into the fort of Munychia. And in the moneth Pyanepſion (to wit, the October following) Demoſthenes died in this maner. When newes came to ATHENS, that Antipater and Craterus were comming thither with a great army, Demoſthenes and his friends got out of the towne a litle before they entred, the people by Demades perſwaſion, hauing condemned them to dye. So, euery man making ſhift for himſelfe, Antipater ſent ſouldiers after them to take them: and of them Archias was Captaine, ſurnamed Phygadotheras, as much to ſay, as a hunter of the baniſhed men. It is reported that this Archias was borne in the city of THVRIES, and that he had bene ſometimes a common player of tragedies: and that Polus alſo who was borne in the city of ÆGINA, the excellenteſt crafts-maiſter in that faculty of all men) was his ſcholer. Yet Hermippus doth place him amongſt the number of the ſcholers of Lacritus the Orator. And Demetrius alſo writeth, that he had bene at Anaximenes ſchoole. Now this Archias hauing found the Orator Hyperides in the city of ÆGINA, Ariſtonicus MARATHONIAN, & Himeræus the brother of Demetrius the PHALERIAN, which had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Aiax: he tooke them out of the temple by force, and ſent them vnto Antipater, who was at that time in the city of CLEONES, where he did put them all to death: and ſome ſay, that he did cut off Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demoſthenes had taken ſanctuary in the Ile of CALAVRIA, he tooke litle pinnaces, with a certaine number of THRACIAN ſouldiers, & being come thither, he ſought to perſwade Demoſthenes to be contented to go with him vnto Antipater, promiſing him that he ſhould haue no hurt. Demoſthenes had a ſtraunge dreame the night before, and thought that he had played a tragedie contending with Archias, and that he handled himſelfe ſo well, that al the lookers on at the Theater did commend him, and gaue him the honor to be the beſt player: howbeit that otherwiſe, he was not ſo well furniſhed as Archias and his players, and that in all manner of furniture he did farre exceed him. The next morning when Archias came to ſpeake with him, and vſing gentle words vnto him, thinking thereby to win him by faire meanes to leaue the ſanctuary: Demoſthenes looking him full in the face, ſitting ſtill where he was, without remouing, ſayd vnto him: O Archias thou diddeſt neuer perſwade me when thou playedſt a play, neither ſhalt thou now perſwade me, though thou promiſe me. Then Archias began to be angry with him, and to threaten him. O ſayd Demoſthenes, now thou ſpeakeſt in good earneſt, without diſſimulation, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commaunded thee: for before, thou ſpakeſt in the clouds, and farre from thy thought: but I pray thee ſtay a while, till I haue written ſomewhat to my friends. After he had ſayd ſo, he went into the temple as though he would haue diſpatched ſome letters, and did put the end of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his maner was when he did vſe to write any thing, and held the end of the quill in his mouth a prety while together: then he caſt his gowne ouer his head, & layed him downe. Archias ſouldiers ſeeing that, being at the doore of the temple, laughed him to ſcorne (thinking he had done ſo for that he was afraid to dye) calling him coward, and beaſt. Archias alſo comming to him, prayed him to riſe, & began to vſe the former perſwaſions to him, promiſing him that he would make Antipater his friend. Then Demoſthenes feeling the poyſon worke, caſt open his gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, ſayd vnto him: Now when thou wilt, play Creons part, and throw my body to the dogs, without further graue or buriall. For my part, ô god Neptune, I do go out of thy temple being yet aliue, becauſe I will not prophane it with my death: but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, haue not ſpared to defile thy ſanctuary with bloud and cruell murther. Hauing ſpoken theſe words, he prayed them to ſtay him vp by his arme-holes, for his feet began already to faile him, & thinking to go forward, as he paſt by the Altar of Neptune, he fell downe, and giuing one gaſpe, gaue vp the ghoſt. Now touching the poyſon, Ariſto reporteth, that he ſucked and drew it vp into his mouth out of his quill, as we haue ſayd before. But one Pappus (from whom Hermippus hath taken his hiſtorie) writeth, that when he was laid on the ground before the Altar, they found the beginning of a letter which ſaid: Demoſthenes vnto Antipater, but no more. Now his death being thus ſudden, the THRACIAN ſouldiers that were at the temple doore, reported that they ſaw him plucke the poyſon which he put into his mouth, out of a litle cloth he had, thinking to them that it had bene a peece of gold he had ſwallowed downe. Howbeit a maide of the houſe that ſerued him, being examined about it, told him that he had caried it about him a long time for a preſeruatiue for him. Eratoſthenes writeth, that he kept this poyſon in a litle boxe of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many writers alſo that do report his death diuerſly, but to recite them all it were in vaine: ſauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demoſthenes very friend ſaid) who ſayd that he died not ſo ſuddenly by poyſon, but that it was the ſpeciall fauor of the gods (to preſerue him from the cruelty of the MACEDONIANS) that ſo ſuddenly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele ſo litle paine. Demoſthenes died the ſixteenth day of the moneth Pynepſion (to wit, October) on the which day they do celebrate at ATHENS the feaſt of Ceres, called Teſmophoria, which is the dolefulleſt feaſt of all the yeare: on the which day alſo, the women remaine all day long in the temple of the goddeſſe, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honor him according to his deſerts, did caſt his image in braſſe, and made a law beſides, that the oldeſt man of his houſe ſhould for euer be kept within the pallace, at the charge of the commonwealth: and ingraued theſe verſes alſo vpon the baſe of his image:

The time of Demoſthenes death.

The Athenians honoured Demoſthenes after his death.

Hadſt thou Demoſthenes had ſtrength according to thy hart,
The Macedons ſhould not haue wrought the Greckes ſuch woe and ſmart.

For they that thinke that it was Demoſthenes himſelfe that made the verſes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, before he tooke his poyſon: they are greatly deceiued. But yet a little before my firſt comming to ATHENS, there went a report that ſuch a thing happened. A certaine ſouldier being ſent for to come vnto his Captaine, did put ſuch peeces of gold as he had into the hands of Demoſthenes ſtatue, which had both his hands ioyned together: and there grew hard by it a great Plane tree, diuers leaues whereof either blowne off by wind by chance, or elſe put there of purpoſe by the ſouldier, couered ſo this gold, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: vntill ſuch time as the ſouldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereupon this matter running abroad in euery mans mouth, there were diuerſe wiſe men that tooke occaſion of this ſubiect, to make Epigrams in the praiſe of Demoſthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enioy the honor he thought he had newly gotten. For the iuſtice of the gods, reuenger of the death of Demoſthenes, brought him into MACEDON, to receiue iuſt puniſhment by death of thoſe whom he diſhoneſtly flattered: being before growne hatefull to them, and afterwards committed a fault wherby he could not eſcape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did perſwade, and pray * Perdiccas, to make himſelfe king of MACEDON, and to deliuer GREECE from bondage, ſaying that it hung but by a threed, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater. Dinarchus CORINTHIAN accuſed him, that he wrote theſe letters: the which ſo grieuouſly offended Caſſander, that firſt he ſlue his owne ſonne in his armes, & then commanded they ſhould afterwards kil Demades, making him feele then by thoſe miſeries (which are the cruelleſt that can happen vnto man) that traytors betraying their owne countrey do firſt of all betray themſelues. Demoſthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleeue him. Thus, my friend Soſsius, you haue what we can deliuer you, by reading, or report, touching Demoſthenes life and doings.

THE LIFE OF
Marcus Tullius Cicero.

AS touching Ciceroes mother, whose name was Heluia, it is reported she was a Gentlewoman borne, and liued alwaies very honestly: but for his father, the reports of him are diuerse and infinite. For some say that he was borne and brought vp in a Fullers shop: others report that he came of Tullius Actius, who while he liued was honoured among the VOLSCES as king, and made very sharpe and cruell warres with the ROMAINES. But surely it seemes to me, that the first of that name called Cicero, was some famous man, and that for his sake his offspring continued still that surname, and were glad to keepe it, though many men scorned it, because Cicer in English signifieth a cich pease. That Cicero had a thing vpon the tip of his nose, as it had bene a litle wart, much like to a cich pease, whereupon they surnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whose life we write of now, nobly answered certaine of his friends on a time giuing him counsell to chaunge his name, when he first made sute for office, and began to practise in matters of state: that he would endeuour himselfe to make the name of Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Scauri or Catuli. After that, Cicero being made Treasurer in SICILE, he gaue an offering of certaine siluer plate vnto the gods, and at large engraued on it his two first names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his third name, he pleasantly commaunded the workman to cut out the forme and fashion of a cich pease. Thus much they write of his name. Now for his birth, it was said that his mother was brought to bed of him without any paine, the third day of Ianuarie: on which day the Magistrates and Gouernours of ROME do vse at this present, yearely to make solemne prayers and sacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and prosperitie of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurse, that did prognosticate vnto her, she gaue a child sucke, which in time to come should do great good vnto all the ROMAINES. Now though such things may seeme but dreames and fables vnto many, yet Cicero himselfe shortly after prooued this Prophesie true: because that when he came of age to learne, he grew so toward, and wanne such fame among the boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacitie: For thereupon came the other boyes fathers themselues to the schoole to see his face, & to be eye-witnesses of the report that went of him, of his sharp & quicke wit to learne. But others of the rude and baſer ſort of men were offended with their ſonne, becauſe to honour Cicero, they did alwaies put him in the midſt betweene them, as they went in the ſtreets. Cicero indeed had ſuch a naturall wit and vnderſtanding as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the ſtudie of Philoſophie. For he gaue himſelf to all kind of knowledge, and there was no Art nor any of the liberall ſciences that he diſdained: notwithſtanding in his firſt young yeares he was apter, and better diſpoſed to the ſtudie of Poetrie then any other. There is a pretie Poeme of his in verſes of eight ſtaues, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boy. After that, being giuen more earneſtly vnto this ſtudie, he was not only thought the beſt Oratour, but the beſt Poet alſo of all the Romaines in his time: and yet doth the excellencie of his eloquence, and commendation of his tong continue euen to this day, notwithſtanding the great alteration and change of the Latine tongue. But his Poetrie hath loſt the name and eſtimation of it, becauſe there were many after him that became farre more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childiſh ſtudies, he became then Philoes ſcholer, the Academicke Philoſopher, the only ſcholer of all Clitomachus ſcholers, whome the Romaines eſteemed ſo much for his eloquence, and loued more for his gentle behauiour and conuerſation. He gaue himſelfe alſo to be a follower of Mutius Scænola, who at that time was a great man in Rome, and Prince of the Senate, and who did alſo inſtruct Cicero in the lawes of Rome. He did alſo follow Sylla for a time, in the wars of the Marsians. But when he ſaw that the Commonwealth of Rome fell to ciuill wars, and from ciuill wars to a Monarchie: then he returned againe to his booke and contemplatiue life, and frequented the learned men of Greece, and alwaies ſtudied with them, vntill Sylla had gotten the vpper hand, and that he ſaw all the Commonwealth againe at ſome ſtay. About that time, Sylla cauſing the goods of one that was ſaid to be ſlaine, to be ſold by the Crier: (being one of the outlawes and proſcripts, to wit, baniſhed by bils ſet vp on poſtes) Chryſogonus, one of Syllaes freed bondmen, and in great fauour with his maiſter, bought them for the ſumme of two thouſand Drachmes. Therewithall the ſonne and heire of the dead perſon called Roſcius, being maruellouſly offended, he ſhewed that it was too ſhamefull an abuſe: for his fathers goods amounted to the ſumme of two hundred and fiftie talents. Sylla finding himſelfe thus openly touched with publike fraud and deceipt, for the only gratifying of his man: he procured Chryſogonus to accuſe him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Oratour durſt ſpeake in Roſcius behalfe to defend his cauſe, but ſhrunke backe, fearing Syllaes cruelties and ſeueritie. Wherefore poore Roſcius the young man, ſeeing euery man forſake him, had no other refuge but to go to Cicero, whom his friends did counſell and perſwade boldly to take vpon him the defence of Roſcius cauſe: for he ſhould neuer haue a happier occaſion, nor ſo noble a beginning to bring himſelfe into eſtimation, as this. Thereupon Cicero determined to take his cauſe in hand, and did handle it ſo well, that he obtained the thing he ſued for: wherby he wan him great fame and credit. But yet being afraid of Syllaes diſpleaſure, he abſented himſelfe from Rome, and went into Greece, giuing it out that his trauell was for a diſeaſe he had vpon him. Indeed Cicero was dog-leane, a litle eater, and would alſo eate late, becauſe of the great weakneſſe of his ſtomacke: but yet he had a good loud voice, though it was ſomewhat harſh, and lacked grace and comelineſſe. Furthermore, he was ſo earneſt and vehement in his Oration, that he mounted full with his voice into the higheſt tunes: inſomuch that men were affraid it would one day put him in hazard of his life. When he came to Athens, he went to heare Antiochus of the citie of Ascalon, and fell in great liking with his ſweet tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwiſe he miſliked his new opinions in Philoſophie. For Antiochus had then forſaken the opinions of the new Academicke Philoſophers, and the ſect of the Carneades: being moued thereunto, either through the manifeſt proofe of things, or by his certaine iudgement, or (as ſome ſay) for that of an ambition or diſſention againſt the ſcholers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reproued the reſolutions of the Academickes, which he had of long time defended, only to leane for the moſt part to the Stoickes opinions. Howbeit Cicero had moſt affection vnto the Academickes, and did ſtudie that ſect more then all the reſt, of purpoſe, that if he ſaw he were forbidden to practiſe in the commonwealth at Rome, he would then go to Athens (leauing all pleas and affaires of the commonwealth) to beſtow the reſt of his time quietly in the ſtudie of Philoſophie. At length, when he heard newes of Syllaes death, and ſaw that his bodie was growne to good ſtate and health by exerciſe, and that his voice became daily more and more to fill mens eares with a ſweet and pleaſant ſound, and yet was loud enough for the conſtitution of his body: receiuing receiuing letters daily from his friends at ROME, that prayed him to returne home, and moreouer, Antiochus selfe also earnestly perswading him to practise in the commonwealth, he began againe to fall to the studie of Rhetoricke, and to frame himselfe to be eloquent, being a necessarie thing for an Oratour, and did continually exercise himselfe in making Orations vpon any speech or proposition, and so frequented the chiefe Oratours and maisters of eloquence that were at that time. To this end therefore he went into ASIA vnto RHODES, and amongst the Oratours of ASIA he frequented Xenocles ADRAMETTIN, and Dionysius MAGNESIAN, and studied also with Menippus CARIAN: at RHODES he heard Apollonius Molon, and the Philosopher Posidonius. And it is reported also, that Apollonius wanting the Latin toung, he did pray Cicero for exercise sake to declame in Greeke. Cicero was very well contented with it, thinking that thereby his faults should be the better corrected. When he had ended his declamation, all those that were present were amazed to heare him, and euery man praised him one after another. Howbeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did neuer shew any glad countenance: and when he had ended, he stayed a great while and said neuer a word. Cicero misliking withall, Apollonius at length said vnto him: As for me Cicero, I do not onely praise thee, but more then that, I wonder at thee: and yet I am sorie for poore GREECE, to see that learning and eloquence (which were the two onely gifts and honours left vs) are by thee obtained with vs, and caried vnto the ROMAINES. Now Cicero being very well disposed to go with good hope to practise at ROME, he was a litle discouraged by an Oracle that was told him. For inquiring of the god Apollo DELPHIAN, how he might do to winne fame and estimation: the Nunne Pythias answered him he should obtaine it, so that in his doings he would rather follow the disposition of his owne nature, then the opinion of the common people. Wherfore when he came to ROME, at the first he proceeded very warily, and discreetly, and did vnwillingly seek for any Office, and when he did, he was not greatly esteemed: for they commonly called him the GRECIAN, and scholer, which are two words the which the Artificers (and such base Mechanicall people at ROME) haue euer readie at their tongues end. Now he being by nature ambitious of honour, and prickt forward also by the perswasion of his father and friends: in the end he began to pleade, and there obtained not the chiefest place by litle and litle, but so soone as he fell to practise, he was immediatly esteemed aboue all the other Oratours and pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reported notwithstanding, that for his gesture and pronunciation, hauing the selfsame defects of nature at the beginning, which Demosthenes had: to reform them, he carefully studied to counterfeit Roscius, an excellent Comedian, and AEsope also a Player of Tragedies. Of this AEsope men write, that he playing one day Atreus part vpon a stage (who determined with himselfe how he might be reuenged of his brother Thyestes) a seruant by chaunce hauing occasion to runne sodainly by him, he forgetting himselfe, striuing to shew the vehement passion and furie of this king, gaue him such a blow on his head with the scepter in his hand, that he slue him dead in the place. Euen so Ciceroes words were of great force to perswade, by meanes of his grace and pronunciation. For he mocking the Oratours that thrust out their heads, and cried in their orations, was wont to say that they were like to lame men, who were driuen to ride, because they could not go on foote: euen so (said he) they cry out because they cannot speake. Truly pleasant taunts do grace an Oratour, and sheweth a fine wit: but yet Cicero vsed them so commonly, that they were offensiue vnto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious scoffer and spitefull man. He was chosen Treasurer in the time of dearth, when there was great scarcitie of corne at ROME: and the Prouince of SICILE fell to his lot. At his first comming thither, the SICILIANS misliked him very much, because he compelled them to send corne vnto ROME: but after they had found his diligence, iustice, and lenitie, they honoured him aboue any Gouernour that euer was sent from ROME. Now there were diuerse young Gentlemen of ROME of noble houses, who being accused for sundrie faults committed in warres against their honour and martiall discipline, had bene sent backe againe vnto the Prætor of SICILE: for whom Cicero pleaded, and did so excellently defend their cause, that they were pardoned euery man. Thereupon, thinking well of himselfe, when his time was expired, he went to ROME, and by the way there hapned a pretie ieast vnto him. As he passed through the countrey of CAMPANIA (otherwise called the land of labour) he met by chance with one of the chiefest ROMAINS of all his friends. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they said of him at ROME, and what they thought of his doings: imagining that all ROME had bene full of the glorie of his name and deedes. His friend asked him againe: And where hast thou bene Cicero all this while, that we haue not seene thee at Rome? This killed his heart straight, when he saw that the report of his name and doings, entring into the citie of Rome as into an infinite sea, was so suddenly vanished away againe, without any other fame or speech. But after that, when he looked into himselfe, and saw that in reason he tooke an infinit labour in hand to attaine to glorie, wherein he saw no certaine end whereby to attaine vnto it: it cut off a great part of the ambition he had in his head. And yet the great pleasure he tooke to heare his owne praise, and to be ouermuch giuen to desire of honour and estimation: these two things continued with him euen to his dying day, and did eftsoones make him swarue from iustice. Furthermore, when he began throughly to practise in the affaires of the state, he thought it an ill thing that Artificers and crafts men should haue many sorts of instruments and tools without life, to know the names of euery one of them, the places where they should take them, and the vse whereto they should employ them: and that a man of knowledge and qualitie (who doth all things with the helpe and seruice of men) should be slouthfull and careless to learne to know the names of his citizens. Therefore he gaue himselfe to know, not onely mens names of qualitie, but the streets also they dwelt in, what part of the citie soeuer it was: their goodly houses in the countrey, the friends they made of, and the neighbours whom they companied with. So that when he went abroad into Italy, whersoeuer he became, Cicero could shew and name his friends houses. He was not very rich, and yet he had enough to serue his turne: the which made men muse the more at him, and they loued him the better, because he tooke no fee nor gift for his pleading, what cause soeuer he tooke in hand, but then specially, when he defended a matter against Verres. This Verres had bene Prætor of Sicilia, and had committed many lewd parts there, for the which the Sicilians did accuse him. Cicero taking vpon him to defend their cause, made Verres to be condemned, not by pleading, but in maner without pleading, and in this sort. The Prætors being his Iudges, and fauouring Verres, had made so many reiornements and delayes, that they had driuen it off to the last day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then he should not haue time to speake all that he had to say against him, and that thereby nothing should be done and iudged: he rose vp and said, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but onely brought foorth the witnesses before the Iudges, and hauing caused their depositions to be taken, he prayed they would proceed to sentence, according to their euidence giuen on that behalfe. Yet some do report, that Cicero gaue many pleasant taunts and girds, in pleading the accusation of the Sicilians against Verres. The Romaines do call a Bore, Verres. There was one Cæcilius, the son of a freed bondman, who was suspected to hold with the superstition of the Ievves. This Cæcilius would haue put by the Sicilians from following the accusation of Verres, and would haue had the matter of his accusation only referred to him, for the prosecuting of it against him. Cicero scorning his sute, said vnto him: What hath a Ievve to do with a Bore? This Verres had a sonne somwhat aboue twentie yeares of age, who (as the report went) had a very ill name for his beautie. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mocke Cicero, saying, that he was too effeminate: Thy children (said he) are to be reproued of that secretly at home. In this accusation, Hortensius the Oratour durst not directly defend Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to answer for him, for he had a Sphinx of Yuorie giuen him by Verres for his reward. Thereupon Cicero gaue him a pretie nip by the way: but Hortensius not vnderstanding him: said he could no skill of darke speeches. Well, said Cicero, yet hast thou a Sphinx in thy house. In the end Verres being condemned, and a fine set on his head to the value of threescore and fifteene Myriades, Cicero notwithstanding was suspected to be bribed with money for agreeing to cast him in so small a summe. But yet when he came to be Ædilis, the Sicilians to shew themselues thankfull to him, both brought and sent him many presents out of Sicile. Of all that he tooke nothing to his owne vse, but only bestowed their liberality in bringing downe the prices of victuals at Rome. He had a goodly house within the confines of the citie of Arpos, a farme also by Naples, and another about the citie of Pompeii: but all these were no great things. Afterwards he had also the ioynter of his wife Terentia, which amounted to the summe of twelue Myriades, and besides all this, there came to him by inheritance, eleuen Myriades of their Denarij. Thereupon he liued very honestly and soberly, without excesse, with his familiar friends that loued him, both Grecians and Romaines, and would neuer go to supper till after Sunne set, not so much for any great businesse he had, as for the weakenesse of his stomacke. But otherwise he was very curious, and carefull full of his person, and would be rubbed and nointed, and he would vse also to walke a certaine number of turnes by proportion: and so exercising his bodie in that sort, he was neuer sicke, and besides was also very strong and lustie of bodie, able to abide great paines and sorrowes which he fel into afterwards. He gaue his fathers chiefe manſion house to his brother, and went to dwel himselfe in the mount Palatine: because such as came to wait vpon him to do him honor, should not take the paines to go so farre to see him. For he had as many men daily at his gate euery morning, as either Crassus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his estimation among the souldiers, both of them being at that time the chiefest men of Rome. Yea furthermore, Pompeys selfe came vnto Cicero, because his Orations stood him to great purpose, for the increase of his honor and authoritie. Now when Cicero came to make sute to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinarie Iudge) though he had many competitors, and fellow suters with him, yet was he first chosen afore them all: and he did so honestly behaue himselfe in that Office, that they did not so much as once suspect him of briberie or extortion. And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Macer (a man that of himself was of great power, and yet fauoured and supported besides by Crassus) was accused before Cicero of theft and extortion in his Office: but he trusting much to his supposed credit, and to the great sute and labour his friends made for him, went home to his house before sentence pronounced against him, (the Iudges being yet to giue their opinions) and there speedily trimmed his beard, and put a new gowne vpon his backe, as though he had bene sure to haue bene quit of his accusation, and then returned againe into the market place. But Crassus went to meet him, and told him all the Iudges had condemned him. Licinius Macer tooke such a griefe and conceit vpon it, that he went home to his house againe, laid him downe on his bed, and neuer rose after. This iudgement wan Cicero great fame, for they praised him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to see iustice duly executed. Another called also Vatinius, (a bedlem fellow, and one that behaued himselfe very vnreuerently to the Magistrates in his pleading, and besides had a swollen necke) came very arrogantly one day vnto Cicero being in his Prætoriall seat, and asked him a thing which Cicero would not graunt him there, but would thinke of it at better leysure. Thereupon Vatinius told him, that he would not be scrupulous to graunt that, if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, answered him againe: No more haue I (said he) such a swollen necke as thou hast. Towards the end of his Office, two or three daies before his time expired, there was one accused Manilius before him, that he also had robbed the commonwealth. This Manilius was very well beloued of the common people, who were perswaded that he was put in sute, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to despite Pompey with, whose familiar friend he was. So he required certaine dayes to answer the matter he was accused of: but Cicero would giue him no further respite, but to answer it the next day. The people therewith were maruellously offended, because the other Prætors in such like cases, were wont to giue ten daies respite vnto others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Iudges, and also accused him vnto them: he besought Cicero to heare him patiently. Cicero made him answer, that hauing alwaies vsed as much fauour and courtesie as he possibly might by law, vnto those that were accused, he thought he should offer Manilius too great wrong, if he should not do the like to him: wherefore, because he had but one day more to continue Prætor in office, he had purposely giuen him that day to make his answer before him. For he thought that to leaue his accusation to the hearing of an other Prætor, he could not haue bene thought a man that had borne him goodwill, and meant to pleasure him. These wordes did maruellously chaunge the peoples opinion and affection towardes him, and euery man speaking well of him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cause. He willingly graunted them: and comming from the bench, standing at the barre like an Oratour to pleade for him, he made a notable Oration, and spake both boldly and sharpely against the chiefe men of the citie, and those specially that did enuie Pompey. This notwithstanding, when he came to sue to be Consull, he found as great fauour amongst the Nobilitie, as he did with the communalitie. For they did further his sute, for the commonwealths sake, vpon this occasion. The chaunge and alteration of gouernement the which Sylla brought in, was thought straunge at the first among the people: but now men by processe of time being vsed to it, it was throughly established, and no man misliked it. At that time many men practised to subuert the gouernment, not for the benefit of the commonwealth, but to serue their owne couetous minds. For Pompey being then in the East parts, made warres with the kings of Pontvs and Armenia, and had not left sufficient force at Rome to resist

these seditious persons, that sought nothing but rebellion. These men had made Lucius Catiline their Captaine: a desperate man to attempt any great enterprise, subtill and malicious of nature. He was accused before (besides many other vile faults) for deflouring of his owne daughter, and killing his brother: and being afraid to be put in sute for it, he prayed Sylla to put his brother amongst the number of the outlawes (or proscripts) as if he had bene then aliue. These wicked rebels hauing chosen them such a Captaine, were sworne and bound one to another in this maner. They killed a man, and did eate of his flesh together, and had besides corrupted the most part of all the youth. For Catiline their Captaine suffered euery man to take his pleasure, as his youth was inclined vnto: as to banquet, to follow harlots, and gaue them money largely to bestow in these vaine expences. Furthermore, all THVSCAN began to rise, and the most part of GAVLE also, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALIE. The citie of ROME it selfe was also in great daunger of rising, for the inequalitie of the goods of the inhabitants. For the Noblemen and of greatest courage, had spent all their lands in playes and feasts, or in buildings and common works, which they built at their owne charge, to curry fauor with the common people, that they might obtaine the chiefe offices: so that thereby they became very poore, and their goods were in the hands of the meane men and wretches. Thus the state of ROME stood in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might easily haue procured, that durst haue taken vpon him any chaunge or alteration of gouernment, there was then such diuision among them in the state. Catiline notwithstanding, to prouide him of a strong bulwarke to prosecute his intent, came to sue to be Consull, hoping that he shold be chosen with Caius Antonius, a man that of himselfe was apt neither to do any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great strength and aide vnto him that wold attempt any thing. Diuers noble and wise men foreseeing that, did procure Cicero to sue for the Consulship. The people accepted him, and reiected Catiline. Antonius and Cicero thereupon were created Consuls, although that Cicero of al the suters for the Consulship was but onely a Knights son, and not the son of a Senatour of ROME. Now, though the common people vnderstood not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline: yet at the beginning of Ciceros Consulship, there fell out great trouble and contention in the commonwealth. For they of the one side, whom Sylla had by his ordinances deposed from their dignities and offices in ROME (who were no small men, neither few in number) began to creepe into the peoples good will, alleadging many true and iust reasons against the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howbeit spoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any chaunge or alteration in the commonwealth. The Tribunes on the other side preferred lawes and ordinances to further this deuice. They preferred the law to choose the Decemuiri, with soueraigne power and authoritie through all ITALY and SYRIA, and also through all the countries and prouinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of ROME: to sell, and release all the lands belonging to the state of ROME, to accuse any man whom they thought good, to banish any man, to restore the Colonies with people, to take what money they would out of the Treasurie, to leauie men of warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemuiri, there were many men of great accompt that fauoured this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellow Consull with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commissioners: and furthermore, it was thought that he was priuie vnto Catilines conspiracie, and that he misliked it not, because he was so much in debt. And this was it that the Noblemen most feared of all other things. Thereupon Cicero, to prouide first to preuent this daunger, graunted him the Prouince of the Realme of MACEDON: and the Prouince of GAVLE being offered vnto himselfe, he refused it. By this good turne, he wan Antonius like a hired player making him to promise him that he would assist and aide him for the benefite of the commonwealth, and that he would say no more, then he should will him. When he had brought him to this, and had won him to his mind: he then began to be the bolder, and more stoutly to resist them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reproue and inueigh against this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes would haue established. And thereby he did so terrifie the authours thereof, that there was not one man durst speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted once againe to haue it to passe, and appointed the Consuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commanded the Senate to follow him. So he did not only ouerthrow this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes did preferre: but furthermore they were vtterly discouraged discouraged & out of hope to bring any of their matters to passe they intended, he strooke them so dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in ROME made the ROMAINES know, how much eloquence doth grace and beautifie that which is honest, & how inuincible right and iustice are, being eloquently set forth: and also how that a man that will be counted a wise gouernor of a commonweale, should alwayes in his doings rather preferre profit, then to seeke to curry fauor with the common people: yet so to vse his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also vnpleasant. And to proue his sweet and pleasant toung, may be alleadged that which he did in the time of his Consulship, touching the placing of men at the Theater to see the pastimes. For before, the knights of ROME did sit mingled one with another amongst the common people, & tooke their place as they came. The first that made the difference betweene them, was *Marcus Otho, at that time Prætor: who made a law, by the which he appointed seuerall seats for the knights, where they might from thenceforth see the pastimes. The people tooke this grieuously, as a thing done to discountenance them: insomuch that Otho comming afterwards into the Theater, all the common people fell a whistling at him, to shame him withall. The knights also in contrariwise made him roome amongst them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Therewith the people fell a whistling lowder then before, and the knights in like maner to clapping of their hands, and so grew to words one with another: that all the Theater was straight in vprore with it. Cicero vnderstanding it, went thither himselfe, and calling the people to the temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharply reproued them, and there with so perswaded them, that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receiue Otho with clapping of their hands, and contended with the knights which of them should do him greatest honour. But now againe, the rebels of Catilines conspiracy (who were pretily cooled at the first for the feare they stood in) began to be lusty againe, and to gather together, boldly incouraging one another to broach their practise, before Pompey returned, who was sayd to be on the way towards ROME with his army. But besides them, those souldiers that had serued before in the warres vnder Sylla, being dispersed vp and downe ITALIE (but specially the best souldiers among them dwelling in the good townes of THVSCAN) did stirre vp Catiline to hasten the enterprise, perswading themselues that they should once againe haue goods inough at home, to spoile and ransacke at their pleasure. These souldiers hauing one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field vnder Sylla, conspired with Catiline, & came to ROME to assist him in his suite: who purposed once againe to demaund the Consulship, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The gods also did plainly shew by earth-quakes, lightning and thunder, and by vision of spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracy: besides also, there fell out manifest coniectures and proofes by men that came to reueale them, howbeit they had no power sufficient to encounter so noble a man, and of so great power as Catiline was. Cicero therefore deferring the day of election, called Catiline into the Senate, & there did examine him of that which was reported of him. Catiline supposing there were many in the Senate that had goodwils to rebell, and also becausse he would shew himselfe ready vnto them that were of his conspiracy: he gaue Cicero a gentle answer, and sayd thus: What do I offend, said he, if that being two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weake, and throughly rotten, & hath a head: and the other being great, strong, and of power, hauing no head, I do giue it one? meaning vnder this darke answer, to signifie the people and Senate. This answer being made, Cicero, was more afraid then before, insomuch that he put on a brigantine for the safety of his body, & was accompanied with the chiefest men of ROME, & a great number of yong men besides going with him from his house vnto the field of Mars, where the elections were made: and had of purpose left open his iacket lose at the coller, that his brigantine he had on might be seene, thereby to let euery man that saw him, know the danger he was in. Euery man misliked it when they saw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to assaile him. But it so came to passe, that by voices of the people, Catiline was againe reiected from the Consulship, and Syllanus & Murena chosen Consuls. Shortly after this election, the souldiers of THVSCAN being ioyned, which should haue come to Catiline, and the day appointed being at hand to broach their enterprise: about midnight there came three of the chiefest men of ROME to Ciceroes house (Marcus Crassus, Marcus Marcellus, and Scipio Metellus) and knocking at his gate, called his porter, & bad him wake his maister presently, and tell him how they three were at the gate to speake with him, about a matter of importance. At night after supper, Crassus porter brought his maister a packet of letters, deliuered him by a ſtranger vnknowne, which were directed vnto diuerſe perſons, among the which one of them had no name ſubſcribed, but was only directed vnto Craſſus himſelf. The effect of the letter was, that there ſhould be made a great ſlaughter in Rome by Catiline, & therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to ſaue himſelfe. Craſſus hauing read his owne letter, would not open the reſt, but went forthwith vnto Cicero, partly for feare of the danger, & partly alſo to cleare himſelfe of the ſuſpition they had of him for the friendſhip that was betwixt him and Catiline. Cicero counſelling with them what was to be done, the next morning aſſembled the Senate very early, and carying the letters with him, he did deliuer them according to their direction, & commanded they ſhould reade them out aloud. All theſe letters, and euery one of them particularly, did bewray the conſpiracy. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius, a man of authority, and that had bene Prætor, told openly the ſouldiers and men of warre that were leauied in Thvscan. And it is reported alſo, that Manlius was in the field with a great number of ſouldiers about the cities of Thvscan, gaping daily to heare newes of ſome chaunge at Rome. All theſe things being throughly conſidered, a decree paſſed by the Senate, that they ſhould referre the care of the commonwealth vnto the Conſuls, to the end that with abſolute authority they might (as well as they could) prouide for the ſafety and preſeruation thereof. Such manner of decree and authority, was not often ſeene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of preſent feare and daunger. Now Cicero hauing this abſolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, & did himſelfe take vpon him the care and gouernment of all ciuill affaires within Rome. On the day time when he went vp and downe the towne, he had ſuch a troupe of men after him, that when he came through the great market place, he almoſt filled it with his traine that folowed him. Thereupon Catiline would no longer delay time, but reſolued to go himſelfe vnto Manlius where their army lay. But before he departed, he had drawne into his confederacy one Martius, and another called Cethegus, whom he commaunded betimes in the morning to go to Ciceroes houſe with ſhort daggers to kill him, pretending to come to ſalute him, and to giue him a good morow. But there was a noble woman of Rome, called Fuluia, who went ouer night vnto Cicero, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who indeed came the next morning betimes vnto him: & being denied to be let in, he began to chafe and raile before the gate. This made him the more to be ſuſpected. In the end Cicero comming out of his houſe, called the Senate to the temple of Iupiter Stator, (as much to ſay as, Stayer) which ſtandeth at the vpper end of the holy ſtreet as they go to the mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he meant to cleare himſelfe of the ſuſpition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senatour that would ſit downe by him, but they did all riſe from the bench where Catiline had taken his place. And further, when he began to ſpeake, he could haue no audience for the great noiſe they made againſt him. So at length Cicero roſe, and commanded him to auoid out of Rome: ſaying, that there muſt needs be a ſeparation of wals betweene them two, conſidering that the one vſed but words, and the other force of armes. Catiline therupon immediatly departing the citie with three hundred armed men, was no ſooner out of the precinct of the walles, but he made his Sergeants carie axes and bundels of roddes before him, as if he had bene a Conſull lawfully created, and did diſplay his enſignes of warre, and ſo went in this order to ſeeke Manlius. When they were joyned, he had not much leſſe then twentie thouſand men together, with the which he went to practiſe the townes to rebell. Now open warre being thus proclaimed, Antonius, Ciceroes colleague and fellow Conſull, was ſent againſt him to fight with him. In the meane ſpace, Cornelius Lentulus ſurnamed Sura (a man of a noble houſe, but of a wicked diſpoſition, and that for his ill life was put off the Senate) aſſembled all the reſt which were of Catilines conſpiracie, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be afraid of nothing. He was then Prætor the ſecond time, as the manner is when any man comes to recouer againe the dignitie of a Senatour which he had loſt. It is reported that this ſurname of Sura was giuē him vpon this occaſion. He being Treaſurer in Syllaes Dictatorſhip, did fondly waſt & conſume a maruellous ſum of money of the cōmon treaſure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demanding an account of him before the Senat: he careleſly and contemptuouſly ſtepped foorth, ſaying, he could make him no other account, but ſhewed him the calfe of his legge, as children do when they make a fault at tennis. And thereof it came that euer after that they called him Sura, becauſe Sura in Latine ſignifieth the calfe of the legge. Another time alſo being accuſed for a lewde part he had committed, he bribed ſome of the Iudges with money, and being onely quit by two voyces more which he had in his fauour, he ſaid ſaid he had loſt his money he had giuen to one of thoſe two Iudges, becauſe it was enough for him to be cleared by one voice more. This man being of this diſpoſition, was firſt of all incenſed by Catiline, and laſtly marred by certaine wizards and falſe prognoſticators that had mocked him with a vaine hope, ſinging verſes vnto him which they had fained and deuiſed, and falſe prophecies alſo, which they bare him in hand they had taken out of Sybilles bookes of propheſie, which ſaid: that there ſhould raigne three Cornely at ROME, of the which, two had alreadie fulfilled the prophecie, Cinna and Sylla, and for the third, fortune laid it vpon him, and therefore bad him go through withall, and not to dreame it out loſing oportunitie as Catiline had done. Now this Lentulus vndertooke no ſmall enterpriſe, but had an intent with him to kill all the whole Senate, and as many other citizens as they could murther, and to ſet fire of ROME, ſparing none but Pompeys ſonnes, whom they would reſerue for pledges, to make their peace afterwards with Pompey: for the rumor was very great and certaine alſo, that he returned from very great wars and conqueſts which he had made in the Eaſt countries. So they laid a plot to put their treaſon in execution, in one of the nights of Saturnes feaſts. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimſtone, and a great number of armours and weapons into Cethegus houſe. Beſides all this prouiſion, they had appointed a hundred men in an hundred parts of the citie, to the end that fire being raiſed in many places at one time, it ſhould the ſooner runne through the whole citie. Other men alſo were appointed to ſtop the pipes and water conduits which brought water to ROME, and to kill thoſe alſo that came for water to quench the fire. In all this ſtirre, by chaunce there were two Ambaſſadours of the ALLOBROGES, whoſe country at that time did much miſlike of the ROMAINES, and were vnwilling to be ſubiect vnto them. Lentulus thought theſe men very fit inſtruments to cauſe all GAVLE to rebell. Thereupon practiſing with them, he wan them to be of their conſpiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the Councell of their country, and in them did promiſe them freedome. He ſent other letters alſo vnto Catiline, and perſwaded him to proclaime libertie to all bondmen, and to come with all the ſpeed he could to ROME: and ſent with them one Titus of the citie of CROTONA, to carie theſe letters. But all their counſels and purpoſes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feaſts, drinking drunke with light women) were eaſily found out by Cicero: who had a carefull eye vpon them, and very wiſely and diſcreetly ſaw through them. For he had appointed men out of the citie to ſpie their doings, which followed them to ſee what they intended. Furthermore he ſpake ſecretly with ſome he truſted, (the which others alſo tooke to be of the conſpiracie) and knew by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practiſed with the ambaſſadours of the ALLOBROGES, and drawne them into their conſpiracie. At length he watched them one night ſo narrowly, that he tooke the ambaſſadours, and Titus CROTONIAN with the letters he caried, by helpe of the ambaſſadours of the ALLOBROGES, which had ſecretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Cicero aſſembled the Senate in the temple of Concord, and there openly read the letters, and heard the euidence of the witneſſes. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue in euidence, that ſome heard Cethegus ſay that they ſhould kill three Conſuls, and foure Prætors. Piſo a Senator alſo, and that had bene Conſull, told in maner the ſelfe ſame tale. And Caius Sulpitius a Prætor, that was ſent into Cethegus houſe, reported that he had found great ſtore of darts, armor, daggers, and ſwords new made. Laſtly, the Senate hauing promiſed Titus CROTONIAN he ſhould haue no hurt, ſo he would tell what he knew of this conſpiracie, Lentulus thereby was conuinced, and driuen to giue vp his office of Prætor before the Senate, and chaunging his purple gowne, to take another meete for his miſerable ſtate. This being done, Lentulus and his conſorts were committed to ward to the Prætors houſes. Now growing towards euening, the people waiting about the place where the Senate was aſſembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Therupon he was conueyed by all the people vnto a friends houſe of his hard by: for that his owne houſe was occupied by the Ladies of the citie, who were buſie ſolemnely celebrating a ſecret ſacrifice in the honour of the goddeſſe, called of the ROMAINES the Good goddeſſe, and of the GRECIANS Gynæcia, to wit, feminine: vnto her this yearely ſacrifice is done at the Conſuls houſe, by the wife or mother of the Conſull then being, the Veſtall Nunnes being preſent at it. Now Cicero being come into his neighbors houſe, began to bethinke him what courſe he were beſt to take in this matter. For to puniſh the offenders with ſeueritie, according to their deſerts, he was afraid to do it: both becauſe he was of a courteous nature, as alſo for that he would not ſeeme to be glad to haue occaſion to ſhew his abſolute power and authoritie, to puniſh (as he might) with rigour, citizens that were of the nobleſt houſes of the city, and that had beſides many friends. And contrariwiſe alſo, being remiſſe in ſo waighty a matter as this, he was afraid of the daunger that might enſue of their raſhneſſe, miſtruſting that if he ſhould puniſh thē with leſſe then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and deſperate then euer they were: adding moreouer the ſting and ſpite of a new malice vnto their accuſtomed wickedneſſe, beſides that he himſelfe ſhould be thought a coward and timorous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with theſe doubts, there appeared a miracle to the Ladies, doing ſacrifice at home in his houſe. For the fire being thought to be cleane out vpon the Altar where they had ſacrificed, there ſuddenly roſe out of the imbers of the rynds or barkes which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amazed all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Veſtall Nuns willed Terentia (Ciceroes wife) to go ſtraight vnto her husband, & to bid him not to be afraid to execute that boldly which he had conſidered of, for the benefit of the cōmonwealth, and that the goddeſſe had raiſed this great flame, to ſhew him that he ſhould haue great honor by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timorous nor faint harted woman, but very ambitious, & furthermore had gottē more knowledge from her husband of the affaires of the ſtate, then otherwiſe ſhe had acquainted him with her houſewifery in the houſe, as Cicero himſelfe reporteth: ſhe went to make report thereof vnto him, & prayed him to do execution of thoſe men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, & alſo Publius Nigidius, his friend and fellow ſtudent with him in Philoſophy, and whoſe counſell alſo Cicero followed much in the gouernment of the commonwealth. The next morning the matter being propounded to the arbiterment of the Senate, how theſe malefactors ſhould be puniſhed: Syllanus being asked his opinion firſt, ſayd that they ſhould be put in priſon, and from thence to ſuffer execution. Others likewiſe that followed him, were all of that mind, but Caius Cæſar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but a yong man, & began to come forward, but yet ſuch a one, as by his behauior & the hope he had, tooke ſuch a courſe, that afterwards he brought the commonwealth of Rome into an abſolute Monarchie. For at that time, Cicero had vehement ſuſpitions of Cæſar, but no apparant proofe to conuince him. And ſome ſay, that it was brought ſo neare, as he was almoſt conuicted, but yet ſaued himſelfe. Other write to the contrary, that Cicero wittingly diſſembled, that he either heard or knew any ſignes which were told him againſt Cæſar, being afraid indeed of his friends & eſtimation. For it was a cleare caſe, that if they had accuſed Cæſar with the reſt, he vndoubtedly had ſooner ſaued al their liues, then he ſhould haue loſt his owne. Now when Cæſar came to deliuer his opinion touching the puniſhment of theſe priſoners: he ſtood vp and ſayd, that he did not thinke it good to put them to death, but to confiſcate their goods: & as for their perſons, that they ſhould beſtow thē in priſon, ſome in one place, ſome in another, in ſuch cities of Italy as pleaſed Cicero beſt, vntill the warre of Catiline were ended. This ſentence being very mild, and the author thereof maruellous eloquent to make it good: Cicero himſelfe added thereunto a counterpoyſe, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the firſt, and partly alſo the opinion of Cæſar. His friends thinking that Cæſars opinion was the ſafeſt for Cicero, becauſe therby he ſhould deſerue leſſe blame for that he had not put the priſoners to death: they folowed rather the ſecond. Wherupon Syllanus alſo recanted that he had ſpokē, & expounded his opiniō: ſaying, that when he ſpake they ſhold be put to death, he meant nothing ſo, but thought the laſt puniſhment a Senator of Rome could haue, was the priſon. But the firſt that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Luctatius, and after him Cato, who with vehement words enforced Cæſars ſuſpition, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and courage: ſo that euen vpō the inſtant it was decreed by moſt voices, that they ſhould ſuffer death. But Cæſar ſtept vp againe, and ſpake againſt the confiſcation of their goods, miſliking that they ſhould reiect the gentleſt part of his opinion, and that contrariwiſe they ſhould ſticke vnto the ſeuereſt onely: howbeit becauſe the greateſt number preuailed againſt him, he called the Tribunes to aid him, to the end they ſhould withſtand it: but they would giue no eare vnto him. Cicero therupon yeelding of himſelfe, did remit the confiſcation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetch the priſoners: who were not all in one houſe, but euery Prætor had one of them. So he went firſt to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy ſtreete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefeſt men of the city, who compaſſed him round about, and guarded his perſon. The people ſeeing that, quaked and trembled for feare, paſſed by, and ſayd neuer a word: and ſpecially the young men, who thought thought it had bene some solemne mysterie for the health of their countrie, that was so accompanied with the chiefe Magistrate, and the Noblemen of the citie, with terrour and feare. So when he had passed through the market place, and was come to the prison, he deliuered Lentulus into the hands of the hangman, and commaunded him to do execution. Afterwards also Cethegus, and then all the rest one after another, whom he brought to the prison himselfe, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing diuerse of their accomplices in a troupe together in the market place, who knew nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, supposing then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were, thinking thy were yet aliue: he turned vnto them, and spake aloude, They liued. This is a phrase of speech which the ROMAINES vse sometime, when they will finely conuey the hardnesse of the speech, to say he is dead. When night was come, and that he was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did waite vpon him no more with silence as before, but with great cryes of his praise, and clapping of hands in euery place he went, and called him sauiour, and second founder of ROME. Besides all this, at euery mans doore there were linckes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes, as at noone dayes. The very women also did put lights out of the toppes of their houses to do him honour, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long traine of the chiefest men of the citie, (of the which many of them had ended great warres, for the which they had triumphed, and had obtained many famous conquests to the Empire of ROME, both by sea and land) confessing between themselues one to another, that the ROMAINES were greatly bound to many Captaines and Generals of armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches and spoiles, and increase of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thanke Cicero onely, for their health and preseruation, hauing saued them from so great and extreme a daunger. Not for that they thought it so wonderfull an act to haue stricken dead the enterprise of the conspirators, and also to haue punished the offenders by death: but because the conspiracie of Catiline being so great and dangerous an insurrection as euer was any, he had quenched it, and pluckt it vp by the roots, with so small hurt, and without vprore, trouble, or actuall sedition. For the most part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Lentulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently forsooke him: and Catiline himselfe also fighting a battell with them he had about him, against Antonius the other Consull with Cicero, he was slaine in the field, and all his army defeated. This notwithstanding, there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this fact, and meant to make him repent it, hauing for their heads Cæsar, (who was alreadie chosen Prætor for the yeare to come) Metellus and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They so soone as they were chosen Tribunes, would not once suffer Cicero to speake to the people, notwithstanding that he was yet in his Office of Consull for certaine daies. And furthermore, to let him that he should not speake vnto the people, they did set their benches vpon the pulpit for orations, which they call at ROME, Rostra: and would neuer suffer him to set foot in it, but only to resigne his office, and that done, to come downe againe immediatly. He granted thereunto, and went vp to the pulpit vpon that condition. So silence being made him, he made an oth, not like vnto other Consuls othes when they resigne their office in like maner, but strange, and neuer heard of before: swearing, that he had saued the citie of ROME, and preserued all his countrey and the Empire of ROME from vtter ruine and destruction. All the people that were present, confirmed it, and sware the like oth. Wherewithall Cæsar and the other Tribunes his enemies were so offended with him, that they deuised to breed him some new stir and trouble: and amongst others, they made a decree, that Pompey should be sent for with his army to bridle the tyranny of Cicero. Cato (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the cõmonwealth, opposing himself against all their practises, with the like authoritie and power that they had, being a Tribune and brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not onely easily breake all their deuises, but also in a goodly oration he made in a full assembly of the people, he so highly praised and extolled Ciceroes Consulship vnto them, and the things he did in his office, that they gaue him the greatest honours that euer were decreed or graunted vnto any man liuing. For by decree of the people he was called, Father of the countrey, as Cato himselfe had called him in his oration: the which name was neuer giuen to any man, but onely vnto him, and also he bare greater sway in ROME at that time, then any man beside him. This notwithstanding, he made himselfe enuied and misliked of many men, not for any ill act he did, or meant to do: but only because he did too much boast of himselfe. For he neuer was in any assembly of people, Senate, or iudgement, but euery mans head was full still to heare the sound of Catiline and Lentulus brought in for sport, and filling the bookes and workes he compiled besides full of his owne praises: the which made his sweet and pleasant stile, tedious, and troublesome to those that heard him, as though this misfortune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worme of ambition, and extreme couetous desire of honor in his head, yet did he not malice or enuy any others glory, but would very franckly praise excellent men, as well those that had bene before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his writings. They haue written also certaine notable words he spake of some ancient men in old time, as of Aristotle: that he was like a golden flowing riuer: and of Plato, that if Iupiter himselfe would speake, he would speake like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: and of Demosthenes orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: The longest said he. There be diuerse writers also, who to shew that they were great followers of Demosthenes, do folow Ciceroes saying in a certaine Epistle he wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he sayd that Demosthenes slept in some of his Orations: but yet they forget to tell how highly he praised him in that place, and that he calleth the Orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he tooke great paines, and studied more then all the rest) PHILIPPIANS: to follow those which Demosthenes wrote against Philip king of MACEDON. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his time, either in eloquence, or in learning, whose fame he hath not cõmended in writing, or otherwise in honorable speech of him. For he obtained of Cæsar, when he had the Empire of ROME in his hands, that Cratippus the PERIPATETICKE Philosopher was made citizẽ of ROME. Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Areopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great honor & ornament vnto their city. There are extant also of Ciceroes Epistles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his son, willing him to follow Cratippus in his study and knowledge. He wrote another letter also vnto Gorgias the Rhetoritian, and forbad him his sons company: because he vnderstood he intised him to drunkennesse, and to other great dishonesty. Of all his Epistles he wrote in Greeke, there is but that only written in choler, and another which he wrote vnto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, & to taunt him in his letter: because (as it seemed) he was a man of very lewd life and conuersation. But in contrary maner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding himselfe grieued with him, for that he was nigligent in procuring the BYZANTINES to ordaine some publicke honors in his behalfe: that me thinkes proceeded of ouer much ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and onely because he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius cause before the Iudges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his: it is reported that he was so angry with him, that he told him, What Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine accusatiõ, not for thine innocency, but for a mist I cast before the Iudges eyes, that made them they could not discerne the fault? Another time also, hauing openly praised Marcus Crassus in the pulpit, with good audience of the people: shortly after he spake to the contrary all the euill he could of him, in the same place. Why, how now, sayd Crassus didst thou not thy selfe highly praise me in this place, the last day? I cannot deny it, sayd Cicero: but indeed I tooke an ill matter in hand to shew mine eloquence. Another time Crassus chanced to say in an open assembly, that none of all the Crassi of his house had euer liued aboue threescore yeares: and afterwards againe repenting himselfe, he called it in againe, and sayd, Sure I knew not what I did, when I sayd so. Cicero answered him againe: Thou knewest well inough the people were glad to heare it, and therefore thou spakest it to please them. Another time Crassus liking the opinion of the STOICKE Philosophers, that said the wise man was euer rich: Cicero answered him, and bad him consider whether they meant not thereby, that the wise man had all things. Crassus couetousnesse was defamed of euery man. Of Crassus sonnes, one of them did much resemble Actius, and therefore his mother had an ill name by him: one day this sonne of Crassus made an Oration before the Senate, which diuerse of them commended very much. So, Cicero being asked how he liked it: Me thinkes, said he, it is * Actius of Crassus. About this time, Crassus being ready to take his iourney into SYRIA, he desired to haue Cicero his friend, rather then his enemy. Therefore one night making much of him, he told Cicero that he would come and suppe with him. Cicero sayd he should be welcome. Shortly after some of his friends told him of

Vatinius,

Vatinius, how he was desirous to be made friends with him, for he was his enemie. What, quoth Cicero, and will he come to supper too? Thus he vsed Crassus. Now this Vatinius hauing a swolne necke, one day pleading before Cicero, he called him the swolne Orator. Another time when he heard say that he was dead, and then that he was aliue againe: Avengeance on him, said he, that hath lyed so shamefully. Another time when Cæsar had made a law for the deuiding of the lands of CAMPANIA vnto the souldiers: diuerse of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very old man) said, he would neuer graunt it while he liued. Cicero pleasantly answered againe, Alas, tarie a litle, the good old man will not trouble you long. Another time there was one Octauius, supposed to be * an AFRICAN borne: he when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, said that he heard him not: Cicero presently answered him againe, And yet hast thou a hole bored through thine eare. Another time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowne mo men by his witnesse, then he had saued by his eloquence. I graunt, said Cicero, for indeed I haue more faith, then eloquence in me. So was there also a young man that was suspected to haue poisoned his father with a tart, that boasted he would reuile Cicero: I had rather haue that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy tart. Publius Sextius also hauing a matter before the Iudges, entertained Cicero, with other of his Counsellers: but yet he would speake all himselfe, and giue none of the Oratours leaue to say any thing. In the end, when they saw plainely that the Iudges would discharge him, being readie to giue sentence: Cicero said vnto him, Bestirre thee hardily to day, for to morrow Sextius thou shalt be a priuate man. Another, one Publius Cotta, who would faine haue bene thought a wise Lawyer, and yet had litle wit and vnderstanding: Cicero appealed to him as a witnesse in a matter, and being examined, he answered he knew nothing of it. Cicero replyed to him againe: Thou thinkest peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine disputation he had with Cicero, did many times repeate, Who is thy father? Cicero answered him againe: Thy mother hath made this question harder for thee to answer. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as subtill witted and vnconstant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exercise of his office, and went into SYRIA to Pompey vpon no occasion: and as fondly againe he turned thence vpon a sodaine. His schoolemaister Philager also being dead, he buried him very honestly, and set a crow of stone vpon the top of his tombe. Cicero seeing it, told him, Thou hast done very wisely: for thy Maister hath taught thee rather to flie, then to speake. Another time Appius Clodius pleading a matter, said in his preamble, that his friend had earnestly requested him to employ all his knowledge, diligence, and faith vpon this matter. O gods, said Cicero, and hast thou shewed thy selfe so hard hearted to thy friend, to performe nothing of all that he requested thee? Now to vse these fine taunts and girds to his enemies, it was a part of a good Oratour: but so commonly to gird euery man to make the people laugh, that wanne him great ill will of many, as shall appeare by some examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two sonnes in law, who were both banished: Cicero therefore called him Adrastus. Lucius Cotta by chaunce also was Censor at that time, when Cicero sued to be Consul: and following his sute at the day of election, he was a thirst, and was driuen to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friends stood about him, and after he had drunke, he said vnto them: It is well done of ye (said he) to be affraid lest the Censor should be angrie with me because I drinke water: for it was reported the Censor loued wine well. Another time Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three fowle daughters of his with him, he cryed out aloude:

This man hath gotten children in despite of Phœbus.

It was thought in ROME that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and mother, who reading certaine letters one day in the Senate very loude: Cicero said vnto them that were about him, Wonder not at it, quoth he, for this man hath bene a Cryer in his dayes. Faustus, the sonne of Sylla Dictator at ROME, which set vp billes outlawing diuerse ROMAINES, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without daunger where they found them: this man after he had spent the most part of his fathers goods, was so sore in debt, that he was driuen to sell his houshold stuffe, by billes set vp on euery post. Cicero when he saw them, Yea marie, said he, these billes please me better, then those which his father set vp. These taunts and common quippes without purpose, made diuerse men to malice him. The great ill-will that Clodius bare him, beganne vpon this occasion. Clodius was of a noble house, a young man, and very wild and insolent: he being in loue with Pompeia Cæsars wife, found the meanes secretly to get into Cæsars house, apparelled like a young singing wench, because on that day the Ladies of Rome did solemnly celebrate a secret sacrifice in Cæsars house, which is not lawfull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he should not haue bene knowne, becausse he was but a young man without any haire on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongst the other women. He being gotten into this great house by night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it: there was one of Cæsars mothers maydes of her chamber called Aurelia, who seeing him wandring vp and downe the house in this sort, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to answer, he said he sought for Aura, one of Pompeiaes maydes. The maide perceiued straight it was no womans voyce, and therewithall gaue a great shrich, and called the other women, the which did see the gates fast shut, and then sought euery corner vp and downe, so that at length they found him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was straight blowne abroad in the citie, whereupon Cæsar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accused Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the sacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, being one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had euer accompanied him to guard him, if any man would haue offered him iniurie in the busie time of the conspiracie of Catiline. Clodius stoutly denyed the matter he was burdened with, and said that he was not in Rome at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue euidence against him, and deposed, that the selfe same day he came home to his house vnto him, to speake with him about certaine matters. This indeed was true, though it seemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence so much for the truthes sake, as to please his wife Terentia: for she hated Clodius to the death, because of his sister Clodia that would haue maried Cicero, and did secretly practise the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friend, and because he repaired very often to this Clodia that dwelt hard by Cicero, Terentia began to suspect him. Terentia being a cruell woman, and wearing her husbands breeches: allured Cicero to set vpon Clodius in his aduersitie, and to witnesse against him, as many other honest men of the citie also did: Some that he was periured, others that he committed a thousand lewde parts, that he bribed the people with money, that he had enticed and deflowred many women. Lucullus also brought foorth certaine maidens, which deposed that Clodius had deflowred the youngest of his owne sisters, she being in house with him, and maried. And there went a great rumour also, that he knew his two other sisters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and maried vnto king Martius: and the other Clodia, whom Metellus Celer had maried, and whome they commonly called Quadrantaria: because one of her Paramours sent her a purse full of Quadrynes (which are litle peeces of copper money) in stead of siluer. Clodius was slaundered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithstanding, the people were very much offended with them that gaue euidence against him, and accused him. The Iudges being affraid of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his iudgment, for the safetie of their persons: and in the tables where they wrote their sentences, their letters for the most part were confusedly set downe. This notwithstanding, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number: and it was reported also that some of them were close fisted. Catulus therfore meeting with some of them going home, after they had giuen their sentence, told them: Surely ye had good reason to be well guarded for your safetie, for you were afraid your mony should haue bene taken from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero said vnto Clodius, who reproued him that his witnesse was not true he gaue against him: Cleane contrary, quoth Cicero, for fiue and twenty of the Iudges haue beleeued me, being so many that haue condemned thee, and the thirtie would not beleeue thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingred mony. Notwithstanding in this iudgement Cæsar neuer gaue euidence against Clodius: and said moreouer, that he did not thinke his wife had committed any adultery, howbeit that he had put her away, because he would that Cæsars wife should not only be cleane from any dishonestie, but also void of all suspition. Clodius being quit of this accusation and trouble, and hauing also found meanes to be chosen Tribune: he began straight to persecute Cicero, changing all things, and stirring vp all manner of people against him. First he wanne the goodwill of the common people by deuising of new lawes which he preferred for their benefite and commoditie: to both the Consuls he graunted great and large Prouinces: vnto Piso, Macedon, and to Gabinius, Syria. He made also many poore men free Citizens, and had alwaies about him a great number of slaues armed. At that present time there were three notable mē in Rome, which caried caried all the sway: Crassus that shewed himselfe an open enemie vnto Cicero: Pompey the other, made much both of the one and the other: the third was Cæsar, who was prepared for his iourny into GAVLE with an armie. Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knew him no fast friend of his, and that he mistrusted him for matters past in Catilines conspiracy) and prayed him that he might go to the wars with him, as one of his Lieutenants. Cæsar granted him. Thereupon Clodius perceiuing that by this meanes he got him out of the daunger of his office of Tribuneship for that yeare, he made faire weather with him (as though he meant to reconcile himselfe vnto him) and told him that he had cause rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done against him, then of himselfe, and alwaies spake very courteously of him as occasion fell out, and said he did thinke nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a litle grieue him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindnesse by his friend. These sweet words made Cicero no more afraid, so that he gaue vp his Lieutenancie vnto Cæsar, and began againe to plead as he did before. Cæsar took this in such disdaine, that he hardened Clodius the more against him, and besides, made Pompey his enemy. And Cæsar himselfe also said before all the people, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the rest vniustly to death, and contrary to law, without lawfull triall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accused. Therupon Cicero seeing himselfe accused for this fact, he changed his vsuall gowne he wore, and put on a mourning gowne: and so suffering his beard and haire of his head to grow without any combing, he went in this humble manner, and sued to the people. But Clodius was euer about him in euerie place and street he went, hauing a sight of rascals and knaues with him, that shamefully mocked him for that he had chaunged his gowne and countenance in that sort, and oftentimes they cast dirt and stones at him, breaking his talke and requests he made vnto the people. This notwithstanding, all the Knights of ROME did in manner chaunge their gownes with him for company, and of them there were cõmonly 20 thousand yong Gentlemen of noble house which followed him with their haire about their eares, and were suters to the people for him. Furthermore, the Senate assembled to decree that the people should mourne in blackes, as in a common calamity: but the Consuls were against it. And Clodius on the other side was with a band of armed men about the Senate, so that many of the Senatours ranne out of the Senate, crying, and tearing their clothes for sorrow. Howbeit, these men seeing all that, were nothing the more moued with pitie and shame: but either Cicero must needes absent himselfe, or else determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Cicero to intreat Pompey to aide him: but he absented himselfe of purpose out of the citie, becausse he would not be intreated, and lay at one of his houses in the country, neare vnto the citie of ALBA. So he first of all sent Piso his sonne in lawe vnto him to intreate him, and afterwards went himselfe in person to him. But Pompey being told that he was come, had not the hart to suffer him to come to him, to looke him in the face: for he had bene past all shame to haue refused the request of so worthy a man, who had before shewed him such pleasure, and also done and said so many things in his fauour. Howbeit Pompey being the sonne in law of Cæsar, did vnfortunatly (at his request) forsake him at his need, vnto whom he was bound for so many infinite pleasures, as he had receiued of him afore: and therefore when he heard say he came to him: he went out at his back-gate and would not speake with him. So Cicero seeing himselfe betrayed of him, and now hauing no other refuge to whom he might repaire vnto: he put himselfe into the hands of the two Consuls. Of them two, Gabinius was euer cruell, and churlish vnto him. but Piso on the other side spake alwaies very courteously vnto him, and prayed him to absent himselfe for a time, and to giue place a litle to Clodius furie, and patiently to beare the chaunge of the time. For in so doing, he might come againe another time to be the preseruer of his countrey, which was now for his sake in tumult and sedition. Cicero vpon this aunswer of the Consull, consulted with his friends: among the which Lucullus gaue him aduice to tarie, and said that he should be the stronger. But all the rest were of contrarie opinion, and would haue him to get him away with speed: for the people would shortly wish for him againe, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius furie and follie. Cicero liked best to follow this counsell. Whereupon hauing had a statue of Minerua a long time in his house, the which he greatly reuerenced: he caried her himselfe, and gaue her to the Capitoll with this inscription: Vnto Minerua Protectour of ROME. So, his friends hauing giuen him safe conduct, he went out of ROME about midnight, and tooke his way through the countrey of LVKE by land, meaning to go into SICILE. When it was knowne in ROME that he was fled, Clodius did presently banish him by decree of the people, and caused billes of inhibition to be set vp, that no man should secretly receiue him within fiue hundred miles compasse of Italie. Howbeit diuerse men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vsed him with all manner of courtesie possible, they did conduct him besides at his departure, sauing one citie onely in Lvke, called at that time Hipponivm, and now Vibone: where a Sicilian called Vibius, (vnto whom Cicero before had done many pleasures, and specially among others, had made him Maister of the workes in the yeare that he was Consull) would not once receiue him into his house, but promised him he would appoint him a place in the countrey that he might go vnto. And Caius Virgilius also, at that time Prætor and Gouernour of Sicile, who before had shewed himselfe his very great friend: wrote then vnto him, that he should not come neare vnto Sicile. This grieued him to the heart. Thereupon he went directly vnto the citie of Brvndvsivm, and there imbarked to passe ouer the sea vnto Dyrrachivm, and at the first had wind at will: but when he was in the maine sea, the wind turned, and brought him backe againe to the place from whence he came. But after that, he hoisted saile againe, and the report went, that at his arriuall at Dyrrachivm when he tooke land, the earth shooke vnder him, and the sea gaue backe together: whereby the Soothsayers interpreted, that his exile should not be long, because both the one and the other was a token of chaunge. Yet Cicero, notwithstanding that many men came to see him for the goodwill they bare him, and that the cities of Greece contended who should most honour him, he was alwaies sadde, and could not be merie, but cast his eyes still towards Italie, as passioned louers do towards the women they loue: shewing himselfe faint hearted, and tooke this aduersitie more basely, then was looked for of one so well studied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes prayed his friends, not to call him Oratour, but rather Philosopher: saying, that Philosophie was his chiefest profession, and that for his eloquence he did not vse it, but as a necessarie instrument to one that pleadeth in the Commonwealth. But glorie and opinion, hath great power to take mans reason from him, euen like a colour, from the minds of them that are common pleaders in matters of state, and to make them feele the selfe same passions that common people do, by daily frequenting their companie: vnlesse they take great heed of them, and that they come to practise in the Commonwealth with this resolute mind, to haue to do with the like matters that the common people haue, but not to entangle themselues with the like passions and moodes, by the which their matters do rise. Now Clodius was not contented that he had banished Cicero out of Italie, but further, he burnt all his houses in the countrey, and his house also in Rome standing in the market place, of the which he built a Temple of Libertie, and caused his goods to be sold by the Cryer: so that the Cryer was occupied all day long crying the goods to be sold, and no man offered to buy any of them. The chiefest men of the citie beginning to be affrayed of these violent parts, and hauing the common people at his commaundement, whom he had made very bold and insolent: he began to inueigh against Pompey, and spake ill of his doings in the time of his warres, the which euerie man else but himselfe did commend. Pompey then was very angrie with himselfe that he had so forsaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the meanes he could to call him home againe from his banishment. Clodius was against it all he could. The Senate notwithstanding with one full consent ordained, that nothing should be established for the Commonwealth, before Ciceroes banishment were first repealed. Lentulus was at that time Consull, and there grew such an vprore and stirre vpon it, that some of the Tribunes were hurt in the market place, and Quintus Cicero (the brother of Cicero) was slaine and hidden vnder the dead bodies. Then the people began to chaunge their minds. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the first man that durst venture vpon Clodius, and bring him by force to be tryed before the Iudges. Pompey himselfe also hauing gotten a great number of men about him, aswell of the citie of Rome as of other townes adioyning to it, being strongly guarded with them, he came out of his house, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then called the people to giue their voyces for the calling home againe of Cicero. It is reported that the people neuer passed thing with so great goodwill, nor so wholly together, as the returne of Cicero. And the Senate for their parts also, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordained that the cities which had honoured and receiued Cicero in his exile, should be greatly commended: and that his houses which Clodius had ouerthrowne and rased, should be reedified at the charge of the commonwealth. So Cicero returned the sixteenth moneth after his banishment, and the townes and cities he

he came by, ſhewed themſelues ſo ioyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honour him, with ſo great loue and affection, that Ciceroes report thereof afterwards came indeed ſhort of the very truth as it was. For he ſaid, that ITALIE brought him into ROME vpon their ſhoulders. Inſomuch as Craſſus himſelfe, who before his baniſhment was his enemie, went then with very good will vnto him, and became his friend, ſaying: That he did it for the loue of his ſonne, who loued Cicero with all his heart. Now Cicero being returned, he found a time when Clodius was out of the citie, and went with a good companie of his friends vnto the Capitol, and there took away the tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his acts that he had paſſed and done in the time of his Tribuneſhip. Clodius would afterwards haue accuſed Cicero for it: but Cicero aunſwered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, becauſe he was of the PATRICIANS, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuneſhip was voide, and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and ſpake againſt him, not for that he liked of Clodius doings, (but to the contrarie, vtterly miſliked all that he did) but becauſe he thought it out of all reaſon, that the Senate ſhould cancell all thoſe things which he had done and paſſed in his Tribuneſhip, and ſpecially, becauſe amongſt the reſt that was there which he himſelfe had done in the Iſle of CYPRVS, and in the citie of BYZANTIVM. Hereupon there grew ſome ſtrangeneſſe betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithſtanding brake not out to open enmitie: but onely to an abſtinence of their wonted familiaritie, and acceſſe one to another. Shortly after, Milo ſlue Clodius. Milo being accuſed of murther, prayed Cicero to pleade his cauſe. The Senate fearing that this accuſation of Milo, (who was a hardie man, and of qualitie beſides) would moue ſome ſedition and vprore in the citie: they gaue commiſſion to Pompey to ſee iuſtice executed as well in this cauſe, as in other offences, that the citie might be quiet, and iudgement alſo executed with ſafetie. Thereupon Pompey the night before tooke the higheſt places of the market place, by his ſouldiers that were armed, whom he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicero would be affrayed to ſee ſuch a number of harneſt men about him, being no vſuall matter, and that it might peraduenture hinder him to pleade his cauſe well: he prayed him he would come betimes in the morning in his Litter into the market place, and there to ſtay the comming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timorous alſo in pleading. For indeede he neuer beganne to ſpeake, but it was in feare: and when his eloquence was come to the beſt proofe and perfection, he neuer left his trembling and timorouſneſſe. Inſomuch that pleading a caſe for Mutius Murana (accuſed by Cato) ſtriuing to excell Hortenſius, whoſe pleading was very well thought of: he tooke no reſt all night, and what through watching, and the trouble of his mind, he was not very well, ſo that he was not ſo well liked for his pleading as Hortenſius. So, going to defend Miloes cauſe, when he came out of his Litter, and ſawe Pompey ſet aloft as if he had bene in a campe, and the market place compaſſed about with armed men, gliſtering in euery corner: it ſo amated him, that he could ſcant faſhion himſelfe to ſpeake, all the partes of him did ſo quake and tremble, and his voyce could not come to him. But Milo on the other ſide ſtood boldly by him himſelfe, without any feare at all of the iudgement of his cauſe, neither did he let his haire grow, as other men accuſed did: neither did he weare any mourning gowne, the which was (as it ſeemed) one of the chiefeſt cauſes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timorouſneſſe of Cicero came rather of the good will he bare vnto his friends, then of any cowardly mind of himſelfe. He was alſo choſen one of the Prieſts of the Soothſayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of Publius Craſſus the younger, who was ſlaine in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwards, the Prouince of CILICIA being appointed to him, with an armie of twelue thouſand footmen, and two thouſand & fiue hundred horſemen, he tooke the ſea to go thither. So when he was arriued there, he brought CAPPADOCIA againe into the ſubiection and obedience of king Ariobarzanes, according to his commiſſion and commandement giuen by the Senate: moreouer, both there and elſwhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuiſed, in reducing of things to quietneſſe without warres. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIANS were growne ſomewhat ſtout and vnruly, by the ouerthrow the ROMAINES had of the PARTHIANS, and by reaſon of the riſing and rebellion in SYRIA: he brought them vnto reaſon by gentle perſwaſions, and neuer receiued giftes that were ſent him, no not from Kings and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden the Prouinces of the feaſtes and banquets they were wont to make other gouernours before him. On the other ſide alſo, he would euer haue the companie of good and learned men at his

table, and would vſe them well, without curioſitie and exceſſe. He had neuer porter to his gate, nor was ſeene by any man in his bed: for he would alwaies riſe at the breake of day, and would walke or ſtand before his doore. He would courteouſly receiue all them that came to ſalute and viſite him. Further they report of him, that he neuer cauſed man to be beaten with roddes, nor to teare his owne garments. In his anger he neuer reuiled any man, neither did deſpitefully ſet fine vpon any mans head. Finding many things alſo belonging to the Commonwealth, which priuate men had ſtolen and imbeazled to their owne vſe: he reſtored againe vnto the cities, wherby they grew very rich and wealthie: and yet did ſaue their honour and credite that had taken them away, and did them no other hurt, but onely conſtrained them to reſtore that which was the Commonwealths. He made a litle warre alſo, and draue away the theeues that kept about the mountaine Amanus, for the which exploit his ſouldiers called him Imperator, to ſay, chiefe Captain. About that time there was an Orator called Cæcilius, who wrote vnto him from Rome, to pray him to ſend him ſome Leopards or Panthers out of Cilicia, becauſe he would ſhew the people ſome paſtime with them. Cicero boaſting of his doings, wrote to him againe, that there were no more Leopards in Cilicia, but that they were all fled into Caria for anger, that ſeeing all things quiet in Cilicia, they had leyſure now to hunt them. So when he returned towards Rome, from the charge of his gouernment, he came by Rhodes: and ſtayed a few daies at Athens, with great delight, to remember how pleaſantly he liued there before, at what time he ſtudied there. Thither came to him the chiefeſt learned men of the citie, and his friends alſo, with whom he was acquainted at his firſt being there. In fine, hauing receiued all the honourable intertainment in Greece that could be, he returned vnto Rome, where at his arriual he found great factions kindled, the which men ſaw plainly would grow in the end to ciuill warre. Therupon the Senate hauing decreed that he ſhould enter in triumph into the citie: he anſwered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cæſars coach in triumph. So he trauelled very earneſtly betweene Pompey and Cæſar, eftſoones writing vnto Cæſar, and alſo ſpeaking vnto Pompey that was preſent, ſeeking all the meanes he could, to take vp the quarrell and miſliking betwixt them two. But it was ſo impoſſible a matter, that there was no ſpeech of agreement would take place. So Pompey hearing that Cæſar was not farre from Rome, he durſt no longer abide in Rome, but fled with diuers of the greateſt men in Rome. Cicero would not follow him when he fled, and therfore men thought he would take part with Cæſar: but this is certaine, that he was in a maruellous perplexitie, and could not eaſily determine what way to take. Wherupon he wrote in his Epiſtles: What way ſhould I take? Pompey hath the iuſter and honeſter cauſe of warre, but Cæſar can better execute, and prouide for himſelfe and his friends with better ſafetie: ſo that I haue meanes enough to flie, but none to whom I might repaire. In all this ſtirre, there was one of Cæſars friends called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, and told him that Cæſar wiſhed him in any caſe to come to him, and to run with him the hope & fortune he vndertook: but if he excuſed himſelfe by his age, that then he ſhould get him into Greece, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero maruelling that Cæſar wrote not to him himſelfe, anſwered in anger, that he would do nothing vnworthie of his acts all the daies of his life thitherto: and to this effect he wrote in his letters. Now Cæſar being gone into Spaine, Cicero imbarked preſently to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, euery man was very glad of his comming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato ſecretly reproued him for comming vnto Pompey, ſaying: that for himſelfe he had bene without all honeſty at that time to haue forſaken that part the which he had alwaies taken and followed from the beginning of his firſt practiſe in the commonwealth: but for him on the other ſide, that it had bene better for the ſafetie of his country, and chiefly for all his friends, that he had bene a newter to both, and ſo to haue taken things as they had fallen out: and that he had no maner of reaſon nor inſtant cauſe to make him to become Cæſars enemy, and by comming thither to put himſelfe into ſo great perill. Theſe perſwaſions of Cato ouerthrew all Ciceroes purpoſe and determination, beſides that Pompey himſelfe did not employ him in any matter of ſeruice or importance. But hereof himſelfe was more in fault then Pompey, becauſe he confeſſed openly that he did repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he ſcorned and diſdained all Pompeys preparations and counſels, the which indeed made him to be had in iealouſie and ſuſpition. Alſo he would euer be fleering and gibing at thoſe that tooke Pompeys part, though he had no liſt himſelfe to be merrie. He would alſo go vp and downe the campe very ſad and heauie, but yet he would euer haue one ieaſt or other to make men laugh, although they had as litle luſt to be merrie as he: and ſurely, it ſhall do no hurt to call ſome of them to mind in this place. Domitius being verie deſirous to preferre a Gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommend him, he ſaid he was an honeſt, wiſe, and ſober man. Whereto Cicero preſently anſwered: Why doeſt thou not keepe him then to bring vp thy children? Another time when they commended Theophanes LESBIAN, (that was maiſter of all the artificers of the campe) becauſe he had notably comforted the RHODIANS when they had receiued a great loſſe of their nauie: See, ſaid Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to haue a GRECIAN, maiſter of artificers in the campe? When both battels came to ioyne together, and that Cæſar had in manner all the aduantage, and kept them as good as beſieged: Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard ſay all Cæſars friends were mad, and melancholy men. Why, quoth Cicero to him againe: doeſt thou ſay that they do enuie Cæſar? Another called Martius, comming lately out of ITALY, ſaid, that there ranne a rumour in ROME, that Pompey was beſieged. What quoth Cicero to him againe: and didſt thou take ſhip to come and ſee him thy ſelfe, becauſe thou mighteſt beleeue it when thou hadſt ſeene it? Pompey being ouerthrowne, one Nonius ſaid there was yet good hope left, becauſe they had taken ſeuen Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy perſwaſion were not ill, quoth Cicero, ſo we were to fight but with pies or daws. Labienus repoſed all his truſt in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of neceſſitie muſt haue the vpper hand. Yea ſaid Cicero, but for all this goodly ſtratageme of war, we haue not long ſince loſt our whole campe. After the battell of PHARSALIA, where Cicero was not by reaſon of his ſicknes: Pompey being fled, and Cato at that time at DYRRACHIVM, where he had gathered a great number of men of warre, and had alſo prepared a great nauie: he prayed Cicero to take charge of all this armie, as it pertained vnto him, hauing bene Conſull. Cicero did not only refuſe it, but alſo told them he would meddle no more with this warre. But this was inough to haue made him bin ſlaine: for the yonger Pompey and his friends called him traitor, and drew their ſwords vpon him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato ſtepped betweene them and him, and yet had he much ado to ſaue him, and to conuey him ſafely out of the campe. When Cicero came to BRVNDVSIVM, he ſtayed there a certaine time for Cæſars comming, who came but ſlowly, by reaſon of his troubles he had in ASIA, as alſo in ÆGYPT. Howbeit newes was brought at length that Cæſar was arriued at TARENTVM, and that he came by land vnto BRVNDVSIVM: Cicero departed thence to go meete him, not miſtruſting that Cæſar would not pardon him, but rather being aſhamed to come to his enemie being a conquerour, before ſuch a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to do or ſpeake any thing vnſeemely to his calling: for Cæſar ſeeing him comming towards him farre before the reſt that came with him: he lighted from his horſe and imbraced him, and walked a great way a foote with him, ſtill talking with him onely, and euer after he did him great honour and made much of him. Inſomuch as Cicero hauing written a booke in praiſe of Cato: Cæſar on the other ſide wrote another, and praiſed the eloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles, and Theramines. Ciceroes booke was intituled Cato, and Cæſars booke called Anticato, as much to ſay as againſt Cato. They ſay further, that Quintus Ligarius being accuſed to haue bene in the field againſt Cæſar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his cauſe: and that Cæſar ſaid vnto his friends about him, What hurt is it for vs to heare Cicero ſpeake, whom we haue not heard of long time? for otherwiſe Ligarius (in my opinion) ſtandeth alreadie a condemned man, for I know him to be a vile man, and mine enemie. But when Cicero had begun his Oration, he moued Cæſar maruellouſly, he had ſo ſweete a grace, and ſuch force in his words: that it is reported Cæſar chaunged colour often, and ſhewed plainely by his countenance, that there was a maruellous alteration in all the parts of him. For, in the end when the Orator came to touch the battell of PHARSALIA, then was Cæſar ſo troubled, that his bodie ſhooke withall, and beſides, certaine bookes he had fell out of his hands, and he was driuen againſt his will to ſet Ligarius at libertie. Afterwards, when the common-wealth of ROME came to be a kingdome: Cicero leauing to practiſe any more in the ſtate, he gaue himſelfe to reade Philoſophie to the young men that came to heare him: by whoſe acceſſe vnto him (becauſe they were the chiefeſt of the Nobilitie in ROME) he came againe to beare as great ſway and authoritie in ROME as euer he had done before. His ſtudie and endeuour was, to write matters of Philoſophie dialogue wiſe, and to tranſlate out of Greeke into Latine, taking paines to bring all the Greeke words, which are proper vnto Logicke and naturall cauſes, vnto Latine. For he was the firſt man by report, that gaue Latine names vnto theſe Greeke words, which are proper vnto Philoſophers, as, φαντασία, he termed, Viſio. Κατάθεσις, Aſſenſus. Ἐποχή, Aſſenſus cohibitio. Καταλήψις,

Comprehensio. Τὸ ἄτομον, Corpus individuum. Τὸ ἁμερες, Corpus simplex. Τὸ κενον, Vacuum, and many other such like words. But though he were not the first, yet was it he that most did deuise and vse them, and turned some of them by translation, others into proper termes: so that at length they came to be well taken, knowne, and vnderstood of euery man. And for his readinesse in writing of verses, he would vse them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that whensoeuer he took in hand to make any, he would dispatch 500. of them in a night. Now all that time of his recreation and pleasure, he would commonly be at some of his houses in the country, which he had neare vnto THVSCVLVM, from whence he would write vnto his friends, that he led Laertes life: either spoken merily as his maner was, or else pricked forward with ambition, desiring to returne againe to be a practiser in the commonwealth, being weary with the present time and state therof. Howsoeuer it was, he came oftentimes to ROME, onely to see Cæsar to keepe him his friend, and would euer be the first man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, and was alwaies studious to vtter some new matter to praise him and his doings. As that was he said touching the statues of Pompey, the which being ouerthrowne, Cæsar commaunded them to be set vp againe, and so they were. For Cicero said, that by that curtesie in setting vp of Pompeys statues againe, he did establish his own. So Cicero being determined to write all the ROMAINE history, and to mingle with them many of the GRECIANS doings, adding thereunto all the fables and deuises which they do write and report: he was hindred of his purpose against his wil, by many open and priuate troubles that came vpon him at once: whereof notwithstanding he himself was cause of the most of them. For first of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, because she had made but small account of him in all the warres: so that he departed from ROME hauing no necessary thing with him to entertaine him out of his countrie, and yet when he came backe againe into ITALY, she neuer shewed any sparke of loue or good will towards him. For she neuer came to BRVNDVSIVM to him, where he remained a long time: and worse then that, his daughter hauing the heart to take so long a iorney in hand to go to him, she niether gaue her cõpanie to conduct her, nor mony nor other furniture conuenient for her, but so handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to ROME found bare wals in his house and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in debt besides. And these were the honestest causes alleaged for their diuorse. But besides that Terentia denied all these, Cicero himselfe gaue her a good occasion to cleare her selfe, becaus he shortly after maried a yong maiden, being fallen in fancie with her (as Terentia said) for her beautie: or, as Tyro his seruant wrote, for her riches, to the end that with her goods he might pay his debts. For she was very rich, and Cicero also was appointed her gardian, she being left sole heire. Now, becaus he ought a maruellous summe of mony, his parents and friends did counsell him to marry this yong maiden, notwithstanding he was too old for her, becaus that with her goods he might satisfie his creditors. But Antonius speaking of this mariage of Cicero, in his answers and orations he made against the PHILIPPIANS: he doth reproue him for that he put away his wife, with whom he was growne old, being merrie with him by the way for that he had bene an idle man, and neuer went from the smoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroade in the warres in any seruice of his countrey or common wealth. Shortly after that he had maried his second wife, his daughter died in labour of child, in Lentulus house, whose second wife she was, being before maried vnto Piso, who was her first husband. So the Philosophers and learned men came of all sides to comfort him: but he tooke her death so sorowfully, that he put away his second wife, becaus he thought she did reioyce at the death of his daughter. And thus much touching the state and troubles of his house. Now touching the conspiracie against Cæsar, he was not made priuy to it, although he was one of Brutus greatest friends, and that it grieued him to see things in that state they were brought vnto, & albeit also he wished for the time past, as much as any other man did. But indeed the conspirators were afraid of his nature, that lacked hardinesse: and of his age, the which oftentimes maketh the stoutest and most hardiest natures, faint harted and cowardly. Notwithstanding, the conspiracie being executed by Brutus and Cassius, Cæsars friends being gathered together, euery man was afraid that the citie would againe fall into ciuil warres. And Antonius also, who was Consul at that time, did assemble the Senate, and made some speech and motion then to draw things againe vnto quietnes. But Cicero hauing vsed diuers perswasions fit for the time, in the end he moued the Senate to decree (following the example of the ATHENIANS) a generall obliuion of things done against Cæsar, and to assigne vnto Brutus and Cassius some gouernements of prouinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded: for the people of themselues were sorie, when they saw Cæsars bodie brought through the market market place. And when Antonius alſo did ſhew them his gowne all bebloudied, cut, and thruſt through with ſwords: then they were like mad men for anger, and ſought vp and downe the market place if they could meete with any of them that had ſlaine him: and taking firebrands in their hands, they ranne to their houſes to ſet them a fire. But the conſpirators hauing preuented this daunger, ſaued themſelues: and fearing that if they taried at ROME, they ſhould haue many ſuch alarmes, they forſooke the citie. Then Antonius began to looke aloft, and became fearefull to all men, as though he meant to make himſelfe King: but yet moſt of all vnto Cicero aboue all others. For Antonius perceiuing that Cicero began againe to increaſe in credit and authoritie, and knowing that he was Brutus very friend, he did miſlike to ſee him come neare him, and beſides, there was at that time ſome icalouſie betwixt them, for the diuerſitie and difference of their maners and diſpoſitions. Cicero being afraid of this, was firſt of all in mind to go with Dolabella to his Prouince of SYRIA, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Conſuls the next yeare following after Antonius, two noble Citizens, and Ciceroes great friends, Hircius and Panſa: they intreated him not to forſake them, vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouer-great power of Antonius, ſo he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleeuing nor altogether miſtruſting them, forſooke Dolabella, and promiſed Hircius and Panſa, that he would ſpend the ſommer at ATHENS, and that he would returne againe to ROME ſo ſoone as they were entred into their Conſulſhip. With this determination Cicero tooke ſea alone, to go into GRECE. But as it chaunceth oftentimes, there was ſome let that kept him: he could not ſaile, and newes came to him daily from ROME, (as the manner is,) that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authoritie and conſent of the Senate, and that there lacked nothing but his perſon to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his daſtardly feare, returned forthwith to ROME, not being deceiued in his firſt hope. For there came ſuch a number of people out to meete him, that he could do nothing all day long but take them by the hands, and imbrace them, who to honour him, came to meete him at the gate of the citie, as alſo by the way to bring him to his houſe. The next morning Antonius aſſembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refuſed to go, and kept his bed, fayning that he was wearie with his iourny and paines he had taken the day before: but indeed the cauſe why he went not, was, for feare and ſuſpition of an ambuſh that was laid for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his very good friends. Antonius was maruellouſly offended that they did wrongfully accuſe him, for laying any ambuſh for him: and therefore ſent ſouldiers to his houſe, and commanded them to bring him by force, or elſe to ſet his houſe a fire. After that time, Cicero and he were alwaies at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heed of another: vntill that the young Cæſar returning from the citie of APOLLONIA, came as lawfull heire vnto Iulius Cæſar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the ſumme of two thouſand and fiue hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his hands of his fathers goods. Thereupon Philip who had maried the mother of this young Cæſar, and Marcellus, who had alſo maried his ſiſter, went with young Cæſar vnto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero ſhould helpe young Cæſar with the fauour of his authoritie and eloquence, as well towards the Senate, as alſo to the people: and that Cæſar in recompence of his goodwill ſhould ſtand by Cicero, with his money and ſouldiers: for this young Cæſar had many of his fathers old ſouldiers about him, that had ſerued vnder him. Now there was another cauſe that made Cicero glad to imbrace the friendſhip of this young Cæſar, and that was this. Whilſt Pompey and Iulius Cæſar were aliue, and in good caſe, Cicero dreamed one night that the Senators ſons were called into the Capitoll, becauſe Iupiter had appointed to ſhew them him that one day ſhold come to be Lord and king of ROME, and that the ROMAINS being deſirous to ſee who it ſhold be, ran al vnto the temple: and that all the children likewiſe were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntill that ſodainly the doores of the temple were open, and then that all the children roſe one after another, and went and paſſed by the image of Iupiter, who looked vpon them all, and ſent them away diſcontented, ſauing this yong Cæſar, vnto whom he put foorth his hand as he paſſed by, and ſaid: My Lords of ROME, this child is he that ſhall end all your ciuill wars, when he commeth to be Lord of ROME. Some ſay, that Cicero had this viſion in his dreame, and that he caried in good memorie the looke of this child, howbeit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpoſe into the field of Mars, where theſe young boyes did exerciſe themſelues, who, when they came thither, had broken vp from playing, and were going home, and that amongst them he first saw him whom he had dreamed of, & knew him very wel, and musing at him the more, asked him whose sonne he was. The boy answered that he was the sonne of one Octauius (a man otherwise of no great calling) and of Accia, the sister of Iulius Cæsar: who hauing no child, made him his heire by his last will and testament, and left him all his lands and goods. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was very glad to speake to him when he met with him, and that the boy also liked Ciceroes friendship, and making of him: for by good hap the boy was borne the same yeare that Cicero was Consull. And these be the reasons alleaged, why Cicero did fauour this yong Cæsar. But in truth, first of all the great malice he bare vnto Antonius, and secondly his nature that was ambitious of honour, were (in my opinion) the chiefest causes why he became young Cæsars friend: knowing that the force and power of his souldiers, would greatly strengthen his authoritie and countenance in managing the affaires of the state, besides that the yong man could flattter him so well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epistles he wrote vnto Atticus, he sharply reproueth Cicero, saying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this young Cæsar: whereby it appeared, he did not so much seeke for the libertie of Rome, as he did procure himselfe a louing and gentle maister. This notwithstanding, Brutus brought with him Ciceroes son that studied Philosophie at Athens, and gaue him charge of men vnder him, and employed him in great affaires, wherein he shewed himselfe very forward and valiant. Now Ciceroes authoritie and power grew again to be so great in Rome, as euer it was before. For he did what he thought good, and so vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the citie, and sent the two Consuls Hircius and Pansa against him, to fight with him: and caused the Senate also to decree, that yong Cæsar should haue sergeants to carie rods and axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his countrey. After that Antonius had lost the battell, and that both the Consuls were slaine, both the armies came vnto Cæsar. The Senate then being afraid of this young man, that had so great good fortune, they practised by honours and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and so to minish the greatnesse of his power: saying, that their countrey now stood in no neede of force nor feare of defence, sith her enemie Antonius was fled and gone. Cæsar fearing this, sent men secretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls, and that whē they should be in office, he should do and appoint what he thought good, hauing the yong man at his commaundement, who desired no more but the honour onely of the name. Cæsar himselfe confessed afterwards, that being afraid he should haue bene vtterly cast away, to haue bene left alone: he finely serued his turne by Ciceroes ambitiō, hauing perswaded him to require the Consulship, through the helpe and assistance that he would giue him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a yong man, when he was contented to sue for the Consulship in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherefore his friends presently reproued him for it, and shortly after he perceiued he had vndone himselfe, and together also lost the liberty of his country. For this yong man Octauius Cæsar being growne to be very great by his meanes and procurement: when he saw that he had the Consulship vpon him, he forsooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then ioyning his army with theirs, he deuided the Empire of Rome with them, as if it had bene lands left in common betweene them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and vpwards, whom they had appointed to be slaine. But the greatest difficulty and difference that fell out betweene them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius would hearken to no peace betweene them, vnlesse Cicero were slaine first of all: Lepidus was also in the same mind with Antonius: but Cæsar was against them both. Their meeting was by the citie of Bolonia, where they continued three dayes together, they three onely secretly consulting in a place enuironed about with a litle riuer. Some say that Cæsar stucke hard with Cicero the two first daies, but at the third, that he yeelded and forsooke him. The exchaunge they agreed vpon betweene them, was this. Cæsar forsooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus: and Antonius, Lucius Cæsar his vnkle by the mothers side. Such place tooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kindred nor bloud: and to speak more properly, they shewed that no brute or sauage beast is so cruell as man, if with his licentiousnes he haue liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a house of his in the country, by the city of Thvscvlvm, hauing at home with him also his brother Q. Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of these proscriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be slaine: they determined to go to Astyra, a place by the sea side where Cicero had another house, there to take sea, sea, and from thence to go into MACEDON vnto Brutus. For there ranne a rumour that Brutus was very strong, and had a great power. So they caused themselues to be conueyed thither in two Litters, both of them being so weake with sorrow and griefe, that they could not otherwise haue gone their waies. As they were on their way, both their Litters going as neare to each other as they could, they bewailed their miserable estate: but Quintus chiefly, who tooke it most grieuously. For, remembring that he tooke no money with him when he came from his house, and that Cicero his brother also had very litle for himselfe: he thought it best that Cicero should hold on his iourney, whilest he himselfe made an errand home to fetch such things as he lacked, and so to make hast againe to ouertake his brother. They both thought it best so, and then tenderly embracing one another, the teares falling from their eyes, they tooke leaue of each other. Within few daies after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his owne seruants, vnto them that made search for him, he was cruelly slaine, and his sonne with him. But Marcus Tullius Cicero being caried vnto ASTYRA, and there finding a ship readie, imbarked immediatly, and sailed alongst the coast vnto Mount Circe, hauing a good gale of wind. There the Mariners determining foorthwith to make saile againe, he came a shore, either for feare of the sea, or for that he had some hope that Cæsar had not altogether forsaken him: and therewithall returning towards ROME by land, he had gone about an hundred furlongs thence. But then being at a straight how to resolue, and sodainly chaunging his mind: he would needs be caried backe againe to the sea, where he continued all night maruellous sorrowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in mind to go secretly vnto Octauius Cæsars house, and to kill himselfe by the hearth of his chimney, to make the Furies of hell to reuenge his bloud: but being affraid to be intercepted by the way, and cruelly handled, he turned from that determination. Then falling into other vnaduised determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put himselfe againe into his seruants hands, to be conueyed by sea to another place called * CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleasant sommer house, where the North winds, called Etesiæ, do giue a trimme fresh aire in the sommer season. In that place also there is a litle temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the sea side. From thence there came a great shole of crowes, making a maruellous noise, that came flying towards Ciceroes shippe, which rowed vpon the shore side. This shole of crowes came and lighted vpon the yard of their saile, some crying, and some pecking the cords with their billes: so that euery man iudged straight, that this was a signe of ill luck at hand. Cicero notwithstanding this, came a shore and went into his house, and laid him downe to see if he could sleepe. But the most part of these crowes came and lighted vpon the chamber window where he lay, making a wonderfull great noise: and some of them got vnto Ciceroes bed where he lay, the clothes being cast ouer his head, and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their billes pluckt off the clothes that couered his face. His men seeing that, and saying to themselues that they were too vile beastes, if they would tarie to see their maister slaine before their eyes, considering that brute beasts had care to saue his life, seeing him so vnworthily intreated, and that they should not do the best they could to saue his life: partly by intreatie, and partly by force, they put him againe into his Litter to carie him to the sea. But in the meane time came the murderers appointed to kill him, Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Læna, Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand men, whose cause Cicero had once pleaded before the Iudges, when he was accused for the murther of his owne father) hauing souldiers attending vpon them. So Ciceroes gate being shut, they entred the house by force, and missing him, they asked them of the house what was become of him. They answered, they could not tell. Howbeit, there was a yong boy in the house called Philologus, a slaue infranchised by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought vp in the Latine tong, and had taught him the liberall sciences: he told this Herennius, that his seruants caried him in a Litter towards the sea, through darke narrow lanes, shadowed with wood on either side. Popilius the Colonell taking some souldiers with him, ranne about on the out side of the lanes to take him at his coming out of them: and Herennius on the other side entred the lanes. Cicero hearing him coming, commaunded his men to set downe his Litter, and taking his beard in his left hand, as his manner was, he stoutly looked the murtherers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane and wrinckled, for the extreame sorrowes he had taken: diuerse of them that were by, held their hands before their eyes, whilest Herennius did cruelly murther him. So Cicero being threescore and foure yeares of age, thrust his necke out of the Litter, and had his head cut off by Antonius commaundement, and his hands also, which wrote the Orations (called the Philippians) againſt him. For ſo did Cicero call the Orations he wrote againſt him, for the malice he bare him: and do yet continue the ſame name vntill this preſent time. When theſe poore diſmembred members were brought to ROME, Antonius by chaunce was buſily occupied at that time about the election of certaine Officers: who when he heard of them and ſaw them, he cryed out aloud that now all his outlawries and proſcriptions were executed: and thereupon commaunded his head and his hands ſhould ſtraight be ſet vp ouer the pulpit for Orations, in the place called Roſtra. This was a fearefull and horrible ſight vnto the ROMAINES, who thought they ſaw not Ciceroes face, but an image of Antonius life and diſpoſition: who among ſo many wicked deedes as he committed, yet he did one act onely that had ſome ſhew of goodneſſe, which was this. He deliuered Philologus into the hands of Pomponia, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when ſhe had him, beſides other cruell torments ſhe made him abide, ſhe compelled him to cut his owne fleſh off by litle morſels, and to broile them, and then to eate them. Some Hiſtoriographers do thus report it: but Tyro who was a ſlaue infranchiſed by Cicero, made no mention of the treaſon of this Philologus. Howbeit I vnderſtood that Cæſar Auguſtus long time after that, went one day to ſee one of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hand of Ciceroes: and he fearing leſt his Vncle would be angrie to find that booke in his hands, thought to hide it vnder his gowne. Cæſar ſaw it, and tooke it from him, and read the moſt part of it ſtanding, and then deliuered it to the young boy, and ſaid vnto him: He was a wiſe man indeed, my child, and loued his countrey well. After he had ſlaine Antonius, being Conſull, he made Ciceroes ſonne his colleague and fellow Conſull with him, in whoſe time the Senate ordained that the images of Antonius ſhould be throwne downe, and depriued his memorie of all other honours: adding further vnto his decree, that from thencefoorth none of the houſe and familie of the Antonij ſhould euer after beare the chriſten name of Marcus. THE COMPARISON OF Cicero with Demoſthenes.

THis is as much as we could gather by our knowledge touching the notable actes and deedes worthie of memorie, written of Cicero and Demoſthenes. Furthermore, leauing the compariſon aſide of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations: me thinkes I may ſay thus much of them. That Demoſthenes did wholly employ all his wit and learning (naturall or artificiall) vnto the Art of Rhetoricke, and that in force and vertue of eloquence he did excell all the Oratours in his time: and for grauitie and magnificent ſtile, all thoſe alſo that onely write for ſhew or oſtentation: and for ſharpeneſſe and art, all the Sophiſters, and maſters of Rhetoricke. And that Cicero was a man generally learned in all ſciences, and that that had ſtudied diuerſe bookes, as appeareth plainely by the ſundry bookes of Philoſophy of his owne making, written after the maner of the Academicke Philoſophers. Furthermore, they may ſee in his Orations he wrote in certaine cauſes to ſerue him when he pleaded: that he ſought occaſions in his by-talke to ſhew men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phraſes a man may diſcerne ſome ſparke of their maners and conditions. For Demoſthenes phraſe hath no maner of fineneſſe, geſts, nor grace in it, but is altogether graue and harſh, and not only ſmelleth of the lampe, as Pythias ſayd when he mocked him: but ſheweth a great drinker of water, extreame paines, and therewith alſo a ſharpe and ſower nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell from pleaſant taunts, vnto plaine ſcurrility, and turning all his pleadings of matters of importance, to ſport and laughter, hauing a grace in it, many times he did forget the comelineſſe that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Cælius, where he ſayth, It is no maruell if in ſo great abundance of wealth and fineneſſe he giue himſelfe a litle to take his pleaſure: and that it was a folly not to vſe pleaſures lawfull and tollerable, ſith the famouſeſt Philoſophers that euer were, did place the chiefe felicity of man, to be in pleaſure. And it is reported alſo that Marcus Cato hauing accuſed Muræna, Cicero being Conſull, defended his cauſe, and in his Oration pleaſantly girded all the ſect of the Stoicke Philoſophers for Catoes ſake, for the ſtrange opinions they hold, which they call Paradoxes: in ſo much as he made all the people and Iudges alſo fall a laughing a good. And Cato himſelfe alſo ſmiling a litle, ſayd vnto them that ſate by him: What a laughing and mocking Conſull haue we, my Lords? But letting that paſſe, it ſeemeth that Cicero was of a pleaſant and merry nature: for his face ſhewed euer great life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demoſthenes countenance on the other ſide, they might diſcerne a maruellous diligence and care, and a penſiue man, neuer weary with paine: inſomuch that his enemies (as he reporteth himſelfe) called him a peruerſe and froward man. Furthermore, in their writings is diſcerned, that the one ſpeaketh modeſtly in his owne praiſe, ſo as no man can iuſtly be offended with him: and yet not alwayes, but when neceſſity enforceth him for ſome matter of great importance, but otherwiſe very diſcreet and modeſt to ſpeake of himſelfe. Cicero in contrary maner, vſing too often repetition of one ſelfe thing in all his Orations, ſhewed an extreme ambition of glory, when inceſſantly he cried out:

Let ſpeare and ſhield giue place to gowne,
And giue the tongue the laurell crowne.

Yet furthermore, he did not onely praiſe his owne acts and deeds, but the Orations alſo which he had written or pleaded, as if he ſhould haue contended againſt Iſocrates, or Anaximenes, a maiſter that taught Rhetoricke, and not to go about to reforme the people of Rome:

Which were both fierce and ſtout in armes,
And fit to worke their enemies harmes.

For, as it is requiſite for a gouernour of a common wealth to ſeeke authority by his eloquence: ſo, to couet the praiſe of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to begge it, that ſheweth a baſe mind. And therefore in this point we muſt confeſſe that Demoſthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler mind: who declared himſelf, that all his eloquence came only but by practiſe, the which alſo required the fauor of his auditority: & further, he thought thē fooles & mad men (as indeed they be no leſſe) that therefore would make any boaſt of themſelues. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credite and authority in their Orations to the people, and for obtaining that they would propound: inſomuch as Captaines, & they that had armies in their hands, ſtood in need of their eloquence. As Chares, Diopithes, & Leoſthenes, they all were holpen of Demoſthenes: and Pompey, and Octauius Cæſar the young man, of Cicero: as Cæſar himſelfe confeſſeth in his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa, and Mæcenas. But nothing ſheweth a mans nature and condition more (as it is reported, & ſo is it true) then whē one is in authority: for that bewrayeth his humor, and the affections of his mind, and layeth open alſo all his ſecret vices in him. Demoſthenes could neuer deliuer any ſuch proofe of himſelfe, becauſe he neuer bare any office, nor was called forward: for he was not Generall of the army which he himſelfe had prepared againſt king Philip. Cicero on the other ſide being ſent Treaſurer into Cicile, and Proconſull into Cilicia and Cappadocia, in ſuch a time as couetouſneſſe raigned moſt (in ſo much that the Captaines and gouernors whom they ſent to gouerne their prouinces, thinking it villany and daſtardlineſſe to rob, did violently take things by force, at what time alſo to take bribes was reckoned no ſhame, but to handle it diſcreetly, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it)

Ciceroes rare and diuerſe doctrines.

Demoſthenes and Ciceroes manners.

Demoſthenes modeſt in praiſing of himſelf: Cicero too full of oſtentation.

Demoſthenes and Ciceroes cunning in their Orations in the common wealth.

Authority ſheweth mens vertues and vices.

he shewed plainly that he regarded not money, and gaue forth many proofes of his curtesie and goodnesse. Furthermore, Cicero being created Consull by name, but Dictator in deed, hauing absolute power and authority ouer all things to suppresse the rebellion & conspirators of Catiline: he proued Platoes prophecy true, which was: That the cities are safe from danger, when the chiefe Magistrates and Gouernors (by some good diuine fortune) do gouerne with wisedome and iustice. Demosthenes was reproued for his corruption, and selling of his eloquence: because secretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, and another in the selfe same matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduersaries. Further, he was defamed also for receiuing money of the king of PERSIA, and therewithall condemned for the money which he had taken of Harpalus. And though some peraduenture would obiect, that the reports thereof (which are many) do lye: yet they cannot possibly deny this, that Demosthenes had no power to refraine frō looking on the presents which diuerse kings did offer him, praying him to accept them in good part for their sakes: neither was that the part of a man that did take vsury by trafficke on the sea, the extreamest yet of all other. In contrary maner (as we haue sayd before) it is certaine that Cicero being Treasurer, refused the gifts which the SICILIANS offered him, there: & the presents also which the king of the CAPPADOCIANS offered him whilest he was Proconsull in CILICIA, and those especially which his friends pressed vpon him to take of them, being a great sum of money, when he went as a banished man out of ROME. Furthermore, the banishment of the one was infamous to him, because by iudgement he was banished as a theefe. The banishment of the other was for as honourable an act as euer he did, being banished for ridding his countrey of wicked men. And therefore of Demosthenes, there was no speech after he was gone: but for Cicero, all the Senate chaunged their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would passe no decree by their authority, before Ciceroes banishment was reuoked by the people. Indeed Cicero idly passed his time of banishment, and did nothing all the while he was in MACEDON: and one of the chiefest acts that Demosthenes did, in all the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his banishment. For he went into euery city, and did assist the Ambassadors of the GRECIANS, and refused the Ambassadors of the MACEDONIANS. In the which he shewed himselfe a better citizen, then either Themistocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, he fell againe to his old trade which he practised before, and was euer against Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS. Where Lælius in open Senate sharply tooke vp Cicero, for that he sate still and sayd nothing, when that Octauius Cæsar the young man made petition against the law, that he might sue for the Consulship, being so young, that he had neuer a haire on his face. And Brutus selfe also doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he had maintained and nourished, a more grieuous and greater tyranny, then that which they had put downe. And last of all, me thinketh the death of Cicero most pitifull, to see an old man caried vp and downe (with tender loue of his seruants) seeking all the wayes that might be to flie death, which did not long preuent his naturall course: and in the end, old as he was, to see his head so pitifully cut off. Whereas Demosthenes, though he yeelded a litle, intreating him that came to take him: yet for that he had prepared the poyson long before, that he had kept it long, and also vsed it as he did, he cannot but be maruellously commended for it. For sith the god Neptune denied him the benefit of his sanctuary, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he saued himselfe out of the souldiers hands of the tyrant, and also scorned the bloudy cruelty of Antipater.

WHO first likened arts to our ſenſes, ſeemeth to haue reſpected eſpecially that one propertie of them both, in receiuing obiects of contrarie qualitie: for, in the vſe and end of their operation, there is great difference. The ſenſes receiue indifferently, without diſcretion and iudgement, white and blacke, ſweet and ſower, ſoft and hard: for their office is onely to admit their ſeuerall obiects, and to carie and referre the iudgement thereof to the common ſenſe. But arts being the perfection of reaſon, receiue and allow thoſe things onely which make for their operation, regarding and eſchuing the contraries. The one chiefly, and for vſe: the other by the way, and with intent to auoid them. So Phiſicke dealeth with diſeaſes, Muſicke with diſcords, to the end to remoue them, and worke their contraries. And the great Ladies of all other arts, temperance, iuſtice, and wiſedom, do not only conſider honeſtie, vprightnes, and profit: but examine withall, the nature & effects of leudnes, corruption, and damage. And innocencie, which vaunteth her want of experience in vndue practiſes: men call ſimplicitie, and ignorance of things, that be neceſſarie and good to be knowne. And therefore the ancient LACEDÆMONIANS in their ſolemne feaſts forced their ILOTES the bondmen, to ouercharge themſelues with wine: and ſuch they ſhewed them vnto their youth, by the apparant beaſtlineſſe of drunken men, to worke in them an abhorring of ſo lothſome vice. Wherein, although I cannot much praiſe them for humanitie or wiſedome, that corrupt and ſpoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime another: yet (as I hope) it ſhall not be reprehended in me, if amongſt the reſt I put in one or two paire of ſuch, as liuing in great place and account, haue increaſed their fame with infamie. Which in truth, I do not, to pleaſe and draw on the Reader with varietie of report: but as Iſmenias the THEBAN Muſitian ſhewed his ſcholers, both thoſe that ſtrake a cleane ſtroke, with, Do ſo: & ſuch as bungled it, with, Do not ſo: and Antigenidas thought men ſhould like better, and with greater deſire contend for skill, if they heard and diſcerned vntuneable notes: ſo thinke I, we ſhall be the forwarder in reading and following the good, if we know the liues, and ſee the deformitie of the wicked. This treaty cõtaineth the liues of Demetrius, ſurnamed the Fort-gainer, & M. Anthony the Triumuir, and great examples to confirme the ſaying of Plato: That from great minds, both great vertues and great vices do proceed. They were both giuen ouer to women and wine, both valiant and liberall, both ſumptuous and high minded: fortune ſerued them both alike, not onely in the courſe of their liues, in attempting great matters, ſometimes with good, ſometing with il ſucceſſe, in getting and loſing things of great conſequence, ouerthrowing both when they feared not, reſtoring both when they hoped not: But alſo in their end there was no great difference, the one

brought to his death by his mortall enemies, and the others fortune not much vnlike. But now to our hiſtory. Antigonus had two ſonnes by his wife Stratonicè, the daughter of Corræus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip, after his fathers name. Thus farre the moſt writers do agree: howbeit ſome hold opinion, that Demetrius was not the ſonne of Antigonus, but his nephew. But becauſe his father died leauing him a child, and that his mother was ſtraight maried againe vnto Antigonus: thereupon came the report that he was Antigonus ſonne. Howſoeuer it was, Philip, that was not much yõger then Demetrius, died. Now for Demetrius, though he was a very bigge man, he was nothing ſo high as his father, but yet ſo paſſing and wonderfull faire, that no painter could poſſibly draw his picture and counterfeit to his likeneſſe. For they ſaw a ſweet countenance, mixed with a kind of grauety in his face, a feare with courteſie, and an incomparable Princely maieſty accompanied with a liuely ſpirite and youth, and his wit and manners were ſuch, that they were both fearefull, and pleaſant vnto men that frequented him. For as he was moſt pleaſant in company hauing leiſure, and moſt giuen to banquetting, pleaſant life, and more wantonly giuen to follow any luſt & pleaſure, then any king that euer was: yet was he alwaies very carefull and diligent in diſpatching matters of importance. And therfore he maruellouſly commended, and alſo endeuoured to follow Dionyſius (as much to ſay, as Bacchus) aboue all the other gods, as he that had bene a wiſe and valiant Captaine in warre, and that in peace inuented and vſed all the pleaſure that might be. He maruellouſly loued and reuerenced his father, and it ſeemeth that the dutifulneſſe he ſhewed vnto his mother, was more to diſcharge the due obedience and duty of a ſonne, then otherwiſe to entertaine his father, for feare of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for proofe hereof we reade, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went vnto his father Antigonus, giuing audience to certaine Ambaſſadors, & after he had done his duty to him, & kiſſed him: he ſate downe by him euen as he came from hunting, hauing his darts in his hand, which he caried out a hũting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambaſſadors aloud as they went their way, hauing receiued their anſwer: My Lords, ſayd he, you ſhall cary home this report of my ſonne and me, be witneſſes I pray you, how we liue one with another. As meaning to ſhew thereby, that the agreement betwixt the father and the ſonne together, is a great ſafety to the affaires of a king, as alſo a manifeſt proofe of his greatneſſe: ſo iealous is a king to haue a companion, beſides the hate and miſtruſt it ſhould breed. So that the greateſt Prince and moſt ancienteſt of all the ſucceſſours of Alexander, boaſted that he ſtood not in feare of his ſonne, but did ſuffer him to ſit by him, hauing a dart in his hand. So was this houſe onely of all other the MACEDONIAN kings, leaſt defiled with ſuch villany, many ſucceſſions after: and to confeſſe a troth, in all Antigonus race there was not one, but Philip onely, that ſlue his owne ſonne. But we haue many examples of diuerſe other houſes of kings, that haue put their ſonnes, wiues, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinary thing with them to kill them, and neuer ſticke at it. For like as Geometricians would haue men graunt them certaine propoſitions which they ſuppoſe without proofe: euen ſo was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the ſafety of their eſtate. But further, to ſhew you more plainely that Demetrius was of a noble and curteous nature, and that he dearly loued his friends: we may alleadge this example. Mithridates, the ſonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar friend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus court, and neuer practiſed any villany or treaſon to him, neither was he thought ſuch a man: yet Antigonus did ſomewhat ſuſpect him, becauſe of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great field, he ſowed of the ſcrapings of gold, and that of that ſeed, firſt of all came vp goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that ſhortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the ſtraw, and the eares of the wheate cut off, and that he being very angry and ſory for it, ſome told him that Mithridates had cut off theſe golden eares of wheate, & had caried them with him into the Realme of PONT. Antigonus being maruellouſly troubled with this dreame, after he had made his ſonne ſweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue priuie to that he would tell him: he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this yong man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was maruellous ſory for it, and therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont to paſſe the time away with Mithridates, he durſt not by word of mouth vtter that he knew, becauſe of his oath: howbeit, taking him aſide from his other familiars, when they were both together by themſelues, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates looking on him: flie Mithridates,

Antigonus dreame.

Mithridates found ſtraight what he meant, and fled the very ſame night into CAPPADOCIA: and ſhortly after it was his deſtinie to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered many goodly countries, and it was he only that eſtabliſhed the houſe of the kingdome of PONT, the which the ROMAINES afterwards ouerthrew, about the eight ſucceſſion. By theſe examples we may eaſily coniecture the good nature and curteſie of Demetrius. For like as the elements (according to Empedocles opinion) are euer at * ſtrife together, but ſpecially thoſe that are neareſt each to other: euen ſo, though all the ſucceſſors of Alexander were at continuall warres together, yet was it ſooneſt kindled, and moſt cruel betweene them which bordered neareſt vnto each other, and that by being neare neighbors had alwayes occaſion of brawle together, as fel out at that time betweene Antigonus and Ptolomie. This Antigonus lay moſt commonly in the countrie of PHRYGIA: who hauing intelligence that Ptolomie was gone into CYPRVS, and that he ouerranne all SYRIA, winning by force, or faire meanes, all the townes and cities ſubiect vnto them: he ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, being at that time but two and twentie yeares of age, and it was the firſt time that euer he took charge, as generall to his father, in matters of great importance. But he being a yong man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battell with an old ſouldier (trained vp in the diſcipline of warres vnder Alexander the great, and that through him, and in his name, had fought manie great battels) was ſoone ouerthrowne, and his armie put to flight, by the citie of GAZA. At which ouerthrow were ſlaine fiue thouſand men, and almoſt eight thouſand taken: and beſides, Demetrius loſt his tents and pauilions, his gold and ſiluer, and to be ſhort, all his whole cariage. But Ptolomie ſent him all his things againe, and his friends alſo that were taken after the battell, with great courteous words: that he would not fight with them for all things together, but onely for honour and Empire. Demetrius receiuing them at his hands, beſought the gods that he might not long liue a debter vnto Ptolomie for this great courteſie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this ouerthrow like a yong man, though it was his firſt ſouldier-fare: but like an old and wiſe Captaine, that had abidden many ouerthrowes, he vſed great diligence to gather men againe, to make new armors, and to keepe the cities and countries in his hands vnder obedience, and did traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers in armes, whom he had gathered together. Antigonus hauing newes of the ouerthrow of his ſon Demetrius, ſaid no more, but that Ptolomie had ouercome beardleſſe men: and that afterwards he ſhould fight with bearded men. But now, becauſe he would not diſcourage his ſonne altogether, who craued leaue once againe to fight a battell with Ptolomie: he graunted him. So, ſhortly after came Cilles, Ptolomies Generall, with a great puiſſant army, to driue him altogether out of SYRIA: for they made no great account of Demetrius, becauſe he had bene once ouerthrowne before. Howbeit Demetrius ſtale vpon him, gaue him charge on the ſodaine, and made him ſo afraid, that he tooke both the campe and the Generall, with ſeuen thouſand priſoners beſides, and wanne a maruellous treaſure of money: which made him a glad man, not ſo much for the gaine he ſhould haue by it, as for the oportunitie he had thereby to come out of Ptolomies debt, nothing regarding the treaſure nor the honour he had gotten by this victorie, but onely the benefite of this requitall of Ptolomies courteſie towards him. But yet he did nothing of his owne head, before he had written to his father: and then receiuing full graunt and commiſſion from him to diſpoſe of all things as he thought good, he ſent backe Cilles vnto Ptolomie, and all his other friends beſides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifully beſtowed on them. This misfortune and ouerthrow did vtterly put Ptolomie out of all SYRIA, and brought Antigonus alſo from the citie of CELÆNES, for the exceeding ioy he had of this victorie, as alſo for the great deſire he had to ſee his ſonne. After that, he ſent Demetrius into ARABIA, againſt a people called the NABATHÆIANS, to conquer them: but there he was in great danger and diſtreſſe in the deſerts for lacke of water, howbeit he neuer ſhewed any ſigne that he was afraid. Thereby he ſo aſtonied the barbarous people, that he had leiſure inough to retire with ſafetie, and with a great bootie of a thouſand camels, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus (whom Antigonus had driuen from BABYLON) returning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other aid then of himſelfe: and went with a great armie againſt the people and nations confining vpon the INDIES, and the prouinces adioyning vnto mount Caucaſus, to conquer them. Thereupon Demetrius hoping to find MESOPOTAMIA without any guard or defence, ſodainly paſſed ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and came vnlooked for vnto BABYLON, and there diſtreſſed the garriſon of Seleucus, that kept one of the caſtles or citadels of the citie, being two of them: and then putting in ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers to keepe them, he commaunded the reſt of his men to get what they could, and to bring it away with them. After that he marched towards the ſea to returne home, leauing thereby the Realme and kingdome of Seleucus in better ſtate and ſafetie, then it was when he inuaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the countrie from Seleucus, leauing him nothing in it, by ſpoiling and foraging all that was there. At his returne home, newes was brought him that Ptolomie lay at the ſiege of the citie of HALICARNASSVS: whereupon he drew thither with ſpeed to make him raiſe the ſiege, and therby ſaued the citie from him. Now becauſe by this exploit they wan great fame, both of them (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruellous deſire to ſet all GREECE at libertie, the which Ptolomie and Caſſander kept in ſeruitude and bondage. Neuer King tooke in hand a more honourable nor iuſter warre and enterpriſe, then that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in oppreſſing of the barbarous people: he beſtowed it all in reſtoring the GRECIANS to their libertie, and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in conſultation what way to take, to bring their purpoſe and deſire to paſſe, and hauing taken order to begin firſt at ATHENS: one of Antigonus chiefeſt friends about him, told him that he ſhould take the citie, and place a good garriſon there for themſelues, if they could once winne it: for (ſaid he) it will be a good bridge to paſſe further into all GREECE. Antigonus would not hearken to that, but ſaid, that the loue and good will of men was a ſurer bridge, and that the citie of ATHENS was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings ſhine through the world, as a creſſet light, vpon the top of a keepe or watch tower. Thus Demetrius hoiſed ſaile, hauing fiue thouſand ſiluer talents, and a fleete of two hundred and fiftie ſaile, and ſailed towards the citie of ATHENS: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was Gouernour in the behalfe of Caſſander, and kept a ſtrong garriſon there within the hauen and caſtle of MVNICHIA. He had an excellent good wind to further his iourney, ſo that with his good foreſight and ſpeede he made, he arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, the fiue and twentieth day of the moneth Thargelion (now called May) before any man kew of his comming. Now when this fleete was within a kenning of the citie, and leſſe, that they might eaſily ſee them from thence: euery man prepared himſelfe to receiue them, taking them to be Ptolomies ſhips. But in fine, the Captaines and Gouernours vnderſtanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe themſelues: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemies from landing, and to repulſe them, comming ſo ſodainly vpon them. Demetrius hauing found the barre of the hauen open, launched in preſently. Then being come to the view of them all, and ſtanding vpon the hatches of his galley, he made ſignes with his hand that he prayed ſilence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimed aloud by one of his Heraulds, that his father had ſent him in a happie houre to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garriſons, and to reſtore them againe to their auncient libertie and freedome, to enioy their lawes and auncient gouernement of their forefathers. After the proclamation made, all the common people ſtraight threw downe their weapons and targets at their feete, to clap their hands with great ſhouts of ioy: praying him to land, and calling him aloud their Sauiour, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the ſtronger in, although he performed not that he promiſed, and alſo ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him to treate of peace. Demetrius receiued them verie courteouſly, and ſent with them for pledge, one of the deareſt friends his father had, Ariſtodemus MILESIAN. Furthermore, he was not careleſſe of the health and ſafetie of Demetrius PHALERIAN, who by reaſon of the change and alteration of the gouernement of the common-wealth of ATHENS, ſtood more in feare of the people of ATHENS, then of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, cauſed him to be conueyed (according to his deſire) vnto THEBES, with good and ſufficient ſafe conduct. And for Demetrius himſelfe, although he was verie deſirous to ſee the citie, he ſaid he would not come into it, before he had firſt reſtored it vnto her auncient libertie and freedom, and alſo driuen away the garriſon thence: and thereupon he caſt trenches round about the caſtle of MVNYCIA. In the meane ſeaſon becauſe he would not be idle, he hoiſed ſaile, and coaſted toward the citie of MEGARA, within the which Caſſander alſo kept a ſtrong garriſon. Demetrius buſily following theſe matters, was aduertiſed that Crateſipolis, ſurnamed Polyperchon, (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Ladie of paſſing fame and beautie, and lay at that time in the citie of PATRAS, would be glad to ſee him: he leauing his armie within the territorie of the MEGARIANS, took his iorney preſently vnto her, with a few of his lighteſt armed men, and yet he ſtole frō them, and made his tent to be ſet vp a good way frō them, becauſe this Ladie

Ladie might not be seene when she came vnto him. Some of his enemies hauing present intelligence thereof, came and set vpon him before he knew it. Demetrius was so scared, that he had no further leysure, but to cast an ill-fauoured cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising himselfe to flie for life: and scaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie. But though they missed him, they tooke his tent and all his money in it. After that, the citie of MEGARA was taken and won from Cassanders men, where Demetrius souldiers would haue sacked all: howbeit the ATHENIANS made humble intercession for them, that they might not be spoiled. Demetrius thereupon, after that he had driuen out Cassanders garrison, he restored it againe to her former libertie. In doing that he called to mind the Philosopher Stilpo, a famous man in MEGARA, though he liued a quiet and contemplatiue life. He sent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo answered him, they had not: for (quoth he) I saw no man that tooke my learning from me. This notwithstanding, all the slaues of the citie were in manner caried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way said vnto him: Well, Stilpo, I leaue you your citie free. It is true, ô King (quoth he) for thou hast left vs neuer a slaue. Shortly after, he returned again vnto ATHENS, and laid siege to the castell of Munychia, the which he tooke, and draue out the garrison, and afterwards razed it to the ground. After that, through the intreatie and earnest desire of the ATHENIANS, who prayed him to come and refresh himself in their citie: he made his entrie into it, and caused all the people to assemble, and then restored vnto them their ancient lawes and libertie of their countrey, promising them besides, that he would procure his father to send them an hundred and fiftie thousand bushels of wheat, and as much wood and timber as should serue to make them an hundred and fiftie gallies. Thus the ATHENIANS through Demetrius meanes, recouered the Democratia againe, (to wit, their popular gouernement) fifteene yeares after they had lost it, and liued all the time betweene their losse and restitution from the warre called Lamiacus warre, and the battell that was fought by the citie of CRANON, in the state of Oligarchia, to wit, vnder the gouernment of a few gouernors in sight, but in truth a Monarchie or kingdome, because they were vnder the gouernment of one man Demetrius PHALERIAN, that had absolute authority ouer them. But by this meanes they made their sauior and preseruer of their countrie, Demetrius (who seemed to haue obtained such honor and glorie through his goodnes and liberality) hatefull and odious to all men, for the ouer great & vnmeasurable honors which they gaue him. For first of all, they called Antigonus & Demetrius kings, who before that time had alwaies refused the name, and the which, (among all other princely honors & prerogatiues granted) they that had deuided betweene them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durst neuer once presume to chalenge, nor to take vpon them. So vnto them only they gaue the stile and names of the gods sauiours, and tooke away their yearely Maior, whom they called Eponymos, because they did shew the years of old time by the names of them that had bene Maiors. Furthermore, in stead thereof they ordained in the councell of the citie, that there shold yearely be chosen one by voices of the people, whom they should name the Priest of their sauiors, whose name they should write and subscribe in all publike grants and couenants, to shew the yeare: and besides all this, that they should cause their pictures to be drawne in the vaile or holy banner, in the which were set out the images of their gods, the patrons and protectors of their city. And furthermore they did cõsecrate the place where Demetrius first came out of his coach, and there did set vp an altar, and called it Demetrius altar coming out of his coach: & vnto their tribes they added two other, the ANTIGONIDES, and the DEMETRIADES. Their great councell at large which they created yearly of 500. men, was then first of all brought into 600, because euery tribe must needs furnish of themselues, fiftie Councellers. But yet the straungest act, and most new-found inuention of flattery, was that of Stratocles, (being the common flatterer and people-pleaser) who put foorth this decree, by the which it was ordained: That those whom the Commonwealth should send vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, should in stead of ambassadors be called Theori, as much to say, as, Ministers of the sacrifices. For so were they called, whom they sent to DELPHES to Apollo Pythias, or vnto ELIDE, to Iupiter Olympias, at the common and solemne feastes of all GREECE, to do the ordinarie sacrifices and oblations for the health and preseruation of the cities. This Stratocles in all things else was a desperate man, and one that had alwaies led a wicked and dissolute life: and for his shameless boldnesse, he seemed wholly to follow the steps of Cleons foole-hardines, and old insolencie, which (when he liued) he shewed vnto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his houſe called Phylacion. One day ſhe hauing bought for his ſupper, beaſtes heads and neckes commonly eaten, he ſaid vnto her: Why, how now? thou haſt bought me acates which we toſſe like bals, that haue to do in the commonwealth. Another time when the armie of the ATHENIANS was ouerthrowne by ſea, by the Ile of AMORGOS: he would needes preuent the newes of this ouerthrow, and came through the ſtreet of Ceranicus, crowned with garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENSIANS had won the battell: and was alſo the author of a decree whereby they did ſacrifice vnto the gods, to giue them thankes for the victorie: and meate was giuen amongſt euery tribe, in token of common ioy. But ſhortly after the meſſengers arriued, which brought report of the ſhipwracke and ouerthrow. The people were in an vprore withall, and ſent for Stratocles in a maruellous rage. But he with a face of braſſe came vnto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: Well, and what hurt haue I done you, if I haue made you merrie theſe two daies? Such was Stratocles impudencie and raſhneſſe. But, as the Poet Ariſtophanes ſaith:

Stratocles cruell ſaying.

But hoter matters were that time in hand,
Then fire that waſteth both by ſea and land.

For there was another that paſſed Stratocles in knauerie: who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the citie of ATHENS, he ſhould be receiued with all ceremonies and like ſolemnitie, as they vſe in the feaſts of Ceres and Bacchus: and further, that they ſhould giue vnto him that did excell all the reſt in ſumptuouſneſſe and riches at ſuch time as Demetrius made his entry into the citie, ſo much mony out of the common treaſure, as ſhould ſerue to make an image or other offering, which ſhould be conſecrated to the temples in memorie of his liberalitie. And laſt of all, they changed the name of the moneth Munichion (to wit, the moneth of Ianuarie) and called it Demetrion: and the laſt day of the moneth, which they called before the new and old Moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feaſts of Bacchus alſo called then Dionyſia, they preſently named Demetria. But the gods by diuerſe ſignes and tokens ſhewed plainely, that they were offended with theſe chaunges and alterations. For the holy banner in the which (according to the order ſet downe) they had painted the images of Antigonus and Demetrius, with the pictures of Iupiter and Minerua: as they caried it a proceſſion through the ſtreet Ceranicus, it was torne aſunder in the middeſt by a tempeſt of wind. And furthermore, about the altars which were ſet vp in the honor of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of Hemlocke, the which otherwiſe was vnpoſſible to grow there. On the feaſt day alſo of Bacchus, they were compelled to leaue the pompe or proceſſion for that day, it was ſuch an extreame hard froſt out of all ſeaſon: and beſides, there fell ſuch a mil-dew and great froſt vpon it, that not only their vines and oliues were killed with it, but alſo the moſt part of the wheate blades which were newly ſprung vp. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemie of the aforeſaid Stratocles) in one of his Comedies writeth certaine verſes againſt him to this effect:

The moneth of Munychion altered & called Demetrion, for the honour of Demetrius name.

VVonders.

Hemlocke, the vſuall herbe, with the iuice whereof they poiſoned offenders at Athens.

Philippides the Poet.

The party for whoſe wickedneſſe the veile was rent in twaine,
VVhich with the honor due to God did worſhip men moſt vaine,
Is he for whom our budding vines were blaſted with the froſt.
Thoſe things and not our Comedies haue vs ſo dearely coſt.

This Philippides was very well beloued of king Lyſimachus, inſomuch that for his ſake the king had done many pleaſures to the Commonwealth of ATHENS. For he loued him ſo dearely, that as often as he ſawe him, or met with him at the beginning of any warre, or matter of great importance, he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For indeed he did not ſo much eſteeme him for the excellencie of his art, but he was much more to be beloued and eſteemed, for his vertuous and honeſt conditions. He was no troubleſome man, neither was he infected with the fineneſſe of court, as he ſhewed one day when the king made much of him, and giuing him good countenance, ſaid vnto him: What wilt thou haue me giue thee of my things Philippides? Euen what it ſhall pleaſe thee, ô king, ſo it be none of thy ſecrets. Thus much we thought good to ſpeake of him in by-talke, becauſe an honeſt player of Comedies ſhould match with a ſhameleſſe and impudent Oratour of the people. But yet there was another Democlides, of the village of SPHETTVS, that dreamed out a more ſtraunger kind of honor, touching the conſecration of their targets, which they dedicated to the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, that is to ſay, that they ſhould go and aske the oracle of Demetrius. But I will ſhew you the very effect and forme of the lawe as it was ſet downe. In good houre, the people ordaine that he ſhould be choſen one of the

Citizens

Citizens of Athens, which shall go vnto our sauiour: and after that he hath done due sacrifice vnto him, he shall aske Demetrius our sauiour, after what sort the people shall with greatest holinesse and deuotion, without delay, make consecration of their holiest gifts and offerings: and according to the Oracle it shall please him to giue them, the people shall duly execute it. Thus laying vpon Demetrius all these fooliſh mockeries, who besides was no great wise man, they made him a very foole. Demetrius being at that time at leysure in Athens, he maried a widow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and auncient house of Miltiades, and had bene maried before vnto one Opheltas Prince of the Cyrenians, and after his death returned againe to Athens. The Athenians were very glad of this mariage, and thought it the greatest honour that came to their citie, supposing he had done it for their sakes. Howbeit he was soone won to be maried, for he had many wiues, but amongst them all, he loued Phila best, and gaue her most honor and preheminence aboue them all: partly for the respect of her father Antipater, and partly also for that she had bene first maried vnto Craterus, whom the Macedonians loued best when he liued, and most lamented after his death, aboue all the other successours of Alexander. His father I suppose made him to marie her by force, although indeed her yeares was not meete for him: for he was maruellous young, and she very old. And when Demetrius seemed not to be contented withall, his father rowned him softly in the eare with this saying:

Demetrius maried vnto Eurydice at Athens.

Refuse no woman nere so old,
VVhose mariage bringeth store of gold.

Demetrius had many wiues together. Phila Demetrius wife, Antipaters daughter, and Craterus widow.

Wherein he alluded cunningly to these verses of Euripides:

Refuse not to become a thrall,
VVhere lucre may ensue withall.

The iudgement of mariage, & obedience.

But so much did Demetrius honour his wife Phila, and all his other wiues he maried, that he was not ashamed to keepe a number of Curtisans, and other mens wiues besides: so that he onely of all other Kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of lecherie. While these things passed on in this sort, he was commaunded by his father to fight with Ptolomie for the Realme of Cyprvs. So there was no remedie but he must needs obey him, although otherwise he was very sorie to leaue the warre he had begun, to set the Grecians at libertie, the which had bene far more honourable and famous. Howbeit, before he departed from Athens, he sent vnto Cleonides Ptolomies Generall, that kept the cities of Corinth and Sicyone, to offer him money if he would set their cities at libertie. But Cleonides would not be dealt withall that way. Thereupon Demetrius straight way tooke sea, and sayled with all his armie towards Cyprvs, where at his first comming he ouercame Menelaus Ptolomies brother. But shortly after, Ptolomie went thither in person with a great armie both by sea and land, and there passed betwixt them fierce threatnings and proud words to each other. For Ptolomie sent to Demetrius to bid him to depart if he were wise, before all his army came together: which would tread him vnder their feet, and march vpon his bellie, if he taried his comming. Demetrius on the other side sent him word, that he would do him this fauor to let him escape, if he would sweare and promise vnto him to withdraw his garrisons which he had in the cities of Corinth and Sycione. So the expectation of this battell made these two Princes not only very pensiue to fight one with the other, but also all the other Lords, Princes, and Kings: becaufe the successe therof was vncertaine, which of them two should preuaile. But euery man iudged this, that which of thē obtained the victory, he shold not only be Lord of the realme of Cyprvs and Syria, but therewith also of greater power then all the rest. Ptolomy in person with fiftie saile began to row against his enemy Demetrius, and commaunded his brother Menelaus that when he saw them fast grapled in fight together, he should launch out of the hauen of Salamina, and giue charge vpon the rereward of Demetrius ships, to breake their order, with the threescore gallies he had in charge. Demetrius on the other side prepared tenne gallies against these threescore, thinking them enow to choke vp the hauen mouth being but narrow, so that none of the gallies that were within could come out: and furthermore, he dispersed his armie by land vpon the foreland points which reach vnto the sea, and went himselfe into the maine sea with nine score gallies, and gaue such a fierce charge vpon Ptolomie, that he valiantly made him flie. Who when he sawe his armie broken, fled as speedily as he could with eight gallies onely: for all the rest were either broken or sunke in fight, and those eight onely escaped, besides threescore and tenne which were taken, and all their souldiers in them. And as for his cariage, his traine, his friends, his officers, and houshold seruants, his wiues, his gold and ſiluer, his armour, engines of batterie, and all ſuch other warlike furniture and munition as was conueyed aboord his carics & great ſhips riding at anker: of all theſe things nothing eſcaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among thoſe ſpoiles alſo was taken that famous Curtiſan Lamia, who at the firſt had her name only, for her paſſing playing vpon the flute: but after ſhe fell to curtiſan trade, her countenance and credit increaſed the more. So that euen then when her beautie through years fell to decay, and that ſhe found Demetrius much younger then her ſelfe: yet ſhe ſo wan him with her ſweet conuerſation and good grace, that he only liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victory by ſea, Menelaus made no more reſiſtance, but yeelded vp SALAMINA and his ſhips vnto Demetrius, and put into his hands alſo twelue hundred horſemen, and 12. thouſand footmen well armed. This ſo famous and triumphant victory was yet much more beautified, by Demetrius great bounty and goodnes which he ſhewed in giuing his enemies ſlaine in battell honourable funerals, ſetting the priſoners at libertie without ranſom paying, and giuing moreouer twelue hundred complete armors vnto the ATHENIANS. After this, Demetrius ſent Ariſtodemus MILESIAN vnto his father Antigonus, to tell him by word of mouth the newes of this victorie. Ariſtodemus was the greateſt flatterer in all Antigonus court, who deuiſed then (as it ſeemeth to me) to adde vnto this exploit the greateſt flattery poſſible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of the Ile of CYPRVS, he would in no wiſe haue the ſhip he came in to come neare the ſhore, but commanded them to ride at anker, and no man ſo hardy to leaue the ſhip: but he himſelfe got into a litle boat, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in maruellous feare and perplexitie for the ſucceſſe of this battell, as men may eaſily iudge they are which hope after ſo great incertainties. Now when word was brought him that Ariſtodemus was coming to him all alone, then was he worſe troubled then afore, inſomuch that he could ſcant keepe within dores himſelfe, but ſent his ſeruants and friends one after another to meete Ariſtodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him word preſently again how the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on ſtill faire and ſoftly with a ſad countenance, and very demurely, ſpeaking neuer a word. Wherefore Antigonus heart being cold in his belly, he could ſtay no longer, but would himſelf go and meet with Ariſtodemus at the gate, who had a maruellous preſſe of people following of him, beſides thoſe of the court which ranne out to heare his aunſwer. At length when he came neare vnto Antigonus, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cryed out aloud, God ſaue thee, ô king Antigonus: we haue ouercome king Ptolomie in battel by ſea, and haue won the realme of CYPRVS, with ſixteene thouſand and eight hundred priſoners. Then anſwered Antigonus: And God ſaue thee too. Truly Ariſtodemus thou haſt kept vs in a traunce a good while, but to puniſh thee for the paine thou haſt put vs to, thou ſhalt the later receiue the reward of thy good newes. Then was the firſt time that the people with a loud voice called Antigonus & Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus his friends and familiars did at that inſtant put on the royall band or Diademe vpon his head: but for Demetrius, his father ſent it vnto him, and by his letters called him king. They alſo that were in ÆGYPT with Ptolomy, vnderſtanding that, did call and ſalute him by the name of King: becauſe it ſhould not ſeeme that for one ouerthrow receiued, their harts were dead. Thus this ambition by iealouſie & emulation, went from man to man to al Alexanders ſucceſſors. For Lyſimachus then alſo began to weare the Diademe, and likewiſe Seleucus, as often as he ſpake with the GRECIANS: for before that time, he dealt in matters with the barbarous people as a king. But Caſſander, though others wrote themſelues kings, he only ſubſcribed after his wonted maner. Now this was not only an increaſe of a new name, or changing of apparell, but it was ſuch an honor, as it lift vp their hearts, and made them ſtand vpon themſelues: and beſides it ſo framed their maner of life and conuerſation with men, that they grew more proud and ſtately, then euer they were before: like vnto common players of Tragedies, who apparelling themſelues to play their parts vpon the ſtage, do change their gate, their countenance, their voice, their manner of ſitting at the table, and their talke alſo. So that afterwards they grew more cruell in commaunding their ſubiects, when they had once taken away the vizer and diſſimulation of their abſolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought ſuch a wonderfull chaunge in the world. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glorie of the victorie of his ſonne Demetrius, for the conqueſt of CYPRVS: he determined forthwith to ſet vpon Ptolomy. Himſelfe led the armie by land, hauing his ſonne Demetrius ſtill rowing by the ſhore ſide with a great fleet of ſhips. But one of his

his familiars called Medius, being asleepe had a vision one night that told him, what should be the end and successe of this iourney. He thought he saw Antigonus runne with all his armie who should haue the vpper hand, and that at the first he ran with great force and swiftnesse: but that afterwards his strength and breath failed him so much, that when he should returne, he had scant any pulse or breath, and with much ado retired againe. And euen so it chaunced vnto him. For Antigonus by land was eftsoones in great daunger: and Demetrius also by sea was often in hazard to leaue the coast, and by storme and weather to be cast into places, where was neither hauen, creekes, nor harborough for his shippes. And at length, hauing lost a great number of his shippes, he was driuen to returne without any attempt giuen. Now Antigonus was at that time litle lesse then fourescore yeares old, but yet his fat and corpulent bodie was more comberſome to him then his yeares: therefore being growne vnmeete for warres, he vsed his son in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as also skilfull through the experience he had gotten, did wisely gouerne the waightiest matters. His father besides did not passe for his youthfull parts, lauish expences, and common drunkennesse he gaue himselfe vnto. For in time of peace, he was giuen ouer to all these vices: but in time of warre, he was as sober and continent, as any man so borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifestly knowne to be mistresse ouer him, one day when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kisse his father: and that Antigonus smiling vpon him, said: What, how now sonne, doest thou thinke thou art kissing of Lamia? Another time Demetrius was many dayes together drinking and ryoting, and saw not his father: and then to excuse himselfe vnto him, he told him he had gotten a rewme that made him keepe his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard, said Antigonus: but was it of THASOS or CHIOS, that rewme? He spake it, because that in either of those two Islands, there were excellent good wines. Another time Demetrius sent his father word that he was not well: thereupon Antigonus went to see him, and comming thither, he met a faire young boy at his doore. So he went vp to his chamber, and sitting downe by his beddes side, he tooke him by the hand to feele his pulse. Demetrius told him that his feauer had left him but a litle before. I know it well, (said Antigonus) for I met the young boy euen at the doore as I came in. So Antigonus did gently beare with his sonnes faults, in respect of the many other vertues he had. The voyce goeth that the SCYTHIANS, when they are disposed to drinke drunke together, do diuerse times twang the strings of their bowes, as though that would serue to keepe the strength of their courage and hardinesse, which otherwise the pleasantnesse of the wine wold take from thē. But Demetrius gaue himselfe to one thing onely at one selfe time. Sometime to take his pleasure, somtime to deale in matters of waight, and in all extremitie he euer vsed but one of them, & wold neuer mingle the one with the other: and yet this notwithstanding he was no lesse politicke and circumspect to prepare all maner of munition for wars. For as he was a wise Captaine to leade an armie, so was he also very carefull to prouide all things meet for their furniture, and would rather haue too much then too litle. But aboue all, he exceeded in sumptuous building of ships, and framing of all sorts of engines of battery, and specially for the delight he tooke to inuent and deuise them. For he had an excellent naturall wit to deuise such works as are made by wit and hand, and did not bestow his wit and inuention in handi-crafts, in trifling toyes and bables: as many other kings that haue giuen themselues to play on flutes, others to paint and draw, and others also to Turners craft. As Æropus king of MACEDON, who delighted to make fine tables, and prety lamps. And Attalus, surnamed Philometor (to say, louer of his mother) that would plant and set Phisicall herbes, as Helleborum, Lingwort, or Beares foot: Hoscynamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardbaine or Wolfebaine, and Dorycnium: for the which we haue no English word: all these would he set himselfe with his owne hands in the gardens of his owne pallace, and also gather them in time of the yeare, to know the vertue and power of them. Or as Arsaces the kings of PARTHIA, that boasted they could themselues make their arrowes heads, and sharpen them. But the Artificers workes which Demetrius practised, shewed that they came from a King. For his manner of workemanship had a certaine greatnesse in it, the which euen with the subtiltie and fineneſse of his workes, shewed the trimme handling of the workeman: so that they appeared not onely worthie the vnderstanding and riches of a King, but also the forging and making by the hands of a great King. For his friendes did not onely wonder at their greatnesse, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beautie of them. And this is more true then meete to be spoken: the enemies could not but marueil when they sawe his gallies rowing alongſt the coaſt, with fifteene or ſixteene banks of owers: and his engines of batterie which they called Elepolis (as much to ſay, engines to take cities) were a ſpectacle of great admiration vnto thoſe whom he beſieged, as the euents following did throughly witneſſe. For Lyſimachus who of all other kings did malice Demetrius moſt, coming to raiſe the ſiege from the citie of SOLI in CILICIA, the which Demetrius beſieged: he ſent vnto him to pray him to let him ſee his engines of batterie, and his gallies rowing vpon the ſea. Demetrius graunting him, Lyſimachus returned with wonderfull admiration. The RHODIANS alſo hauing long time defended his ſiege, at the laſt made peace with him, and prayed him to leaue ſome one of his engines with them, for a perpetuall teſtimonie and remembrance both of his power, and alſo of their corage and valiantneſſe. The cauſe why Demetrius made warre with the RHODIANS was, becauſe they were confederates with king Ptolomy, he brought againſt their wals the greateſt engine he had, the foote whereof was like a tile, more long then broad, and at the baſe on either ſide it was eight and fortie cubits long, and threeſcore and ſixe high, riſing ſtill narrow euen to the very top: ſo that the vpper parts were narrower then the nether, and within it were many pretie rooms and places conueyed for ſouldiers. The forepart of it was open towards the enemy, and euery roome or partition had windowes out of which they beſtowed all kind of ſhot, becauſe they were full of armed men fighting with all ſorts of weapons. But now, becauſe it was ſo well framed and counterpoiſed, that it gaue no way nor reeld on either ſide, which way ſoeuer they remoued it, but that it ſtood faſt and vpright vpon her foundation, making a terrible noiſe and ſound: that made the worke as wonderfull to behold, as it was a maruellous pleaſure for men to ſee it. In this warre were brought vnto Demetrius two notable armors weighing forty pound a peece, & made by one Zoilus an armorer, who to ſhew the hardnes and goodnes of the temper, ſuffered them to be proued and ſhot at, at ſixeſcore paces, with the engines of their batterie: and albeit the armors were ſhot at and hit, yet were they neuer pierced, and but only a litle race or ſcratch ſeene, as it were of a bodkin or penknife, and had no more hurt. Demetrius alwaies wore one of them in theſe warres, and Alcimus ALBANIAN the other, the ſtrongeſt and valianteſt man he had in all his hoaſt, and that only caryed a complet armour weighing ſixeſcore pound, where all other ſouldiers wore none aboue threeſcore. This Alcimus was ſlaine at RHODES valiantly fighting by the Theater. In this ſiege the RHODIANS did valiantly defend themſelues, that Demetrius could do no act worthy memorie. This notwithſtanding, although he ſaw he could not preuaile, but loſe his time, yet was he the more obſtinatly bent againſt them, to be euen with them: becauſe they had taken a ſhip of his, in the which his wife Phila had ſent vnto him certain hangings of tapeſtrie, linnen, apparell, and letters, and becauſe they had ſent them all vnto Ptolomie, aſſoone as they had taken thē. But therein they did not follow the honeſt curteſie of the ATHENIANS: who hauing intercepted certaine currers of king Philips that made war againſt them, they opened all the letters they caried, & read them, ſauing only his wife Olympiaes letters ſhe ſent him, the which they ſent vnto king Philip ſealed, as they were when they receiued them. Now though this part did much grieue and offend him, yet he could not find in his hart to ſerue them in that ſort, when he might haue done it not long after. For by chance at that time, Protogenes an excellent Painter, borne in CAVNVS, did paint thē the draught of the city of IALYSVS. Demetrius found this table in a houſe in the ſuburbes of the citie, being almoſt ended. The RHODIANS therupon ſending an herald vnto him, to beſeech him to ſpare the defacing of ſo goodly a worke: he returned thē anſwer, that he would rather ſuffer his fathers images to be burnt, then ſo excellent & paſſing a work as that to be loſt, & brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protogenes was 7. yeares drawing of the ſame: and it is ſaid alſo that Apelles himſelfe when he ſaw it, did ſo wonder at it, that his ſpeech failed him, and he ſtood mute a long time, and at laſt ſaid: Surely there is a wonderfull peece of work, and of great labour, yet they want thoſe graces and ornaments whereby thoſe that I paint do reach vnto heauen. This table afterwards being brought to ROME, and hanged vp with others, was in the end burnt by fire. Now as the RHODIANS were deſirous to be ridde of this warre, and that Demetrius alſo was willing to take any honeſt occaſion to do it: the Ambaſſadours of the ATHENIANS came happily to ſerue both their deſires, who made peace betweene them with theſe conditions. That the RHODIANS ſhould be confederates with Antigonus and Demetrius againſt all men, but Ptolomie only. The ATHENIANS ſent for Demetrius, vpon Caſſanders comming to lay ſiege to their citie: whereupon Dmetrius immediatly hoiſſed ſaile towards ATHENS, with three hundred and thirtie gallies, and a great number of men of warre beſides:

ſo that he did not only driue Caſſander out of the prouince of ATTICA, but folowed him euen to the ſtraight of THERMOPYLES, and there ouerthrew him in ſet battell, and receiued the city of HERACLEA, which willingly yeelded vnto him, and 6000 MACEDONIANS that came vnto him to take his part. So in his returne backe, he ſet all the GRECIANS at liberty on this ſide the ſtraight: he made league with the BOEOTIANS, & tooke the city of CENCREES, and the caſtles of PHYLE and PANACTOS, in the fronters and confines of ATTICA, in the which Caſſander had left garriſons to keepe the country in ſubiection: and after he had driuen them out of the country, he rendred the forts again vnto the ATHENIANS. Therfore though it ſeemed the ATHENIANS had before beſtowed to their vttermoſt power al kinds of honors that could be offered him, euery man ſtriuing for life to preferre the ſame: yet they found out new deuices to flatter & pleaſe him. For they ordained that the place behind the temple of Minerua called Parthenon (as who would ſay, the tẽple of the virgin) ſhould be prepared for his houſe to lye in: and they ſayd, that the goddeſſe Minerua did lodge him with her. But to ſay truly, he was too vnchaſt a gueſt, to thinke that a maiden goddeſſe would be content he ſhould lye with her. And yet his father Antigonus perceiuing that they had lodged his ſonne Philip on a time in a houſe, where there were three young women, he ſayd nothing to Philip himſelfe, but before him he ſent for the harbinger, and ſayd vnto him: wilt thou not remoue my ſonne out of this ſtraight lodging, and prouide him of a better? And Demetrius, that ſhould haue reuerenced the goddeſſe Minerua, though for no other reſpect but becauſe he called her his eldeſt ſiſter (for ſo he would ſhe ſhould be called) he defiled all the caſtell where was the temple of theſe holy virgins, with horrible and abhominable inſolencies, both towards yong boyes of honeſt houſes, as alſo vnto yong women of the city. So that this place ſeemed to be moſt pure and holy, at ſuch times as he lay with his common curtiſans, Chryſis, Lamia, Demo, and Anticyra. It ſhall not be greatly for the honor of the city of ATHENS, to tell particularly all the abhominable parts he committed there. But Democles vertue and honeſty deſerueth worthy and condigne rememberance. This Democles was a young boy that had no haire on his face, of whoſe beauty Demetrius being informed by the ſurname he had, as cõmonly called through the city, Democles the faire: he ſought diuerſe wayes to intiſe him, both by faire meanes, large promiſes and gifts, and alſo with threats beſides. But when he ſaw no man could bring him to the bent of his bow, and that the yong boy in the end ſeeing him ſo importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of exerciſe, where other children vſed to recreate themſelues, and that to auoide the common ſtoues, he went to waſh himſelfe in another ſecret ſtoue: Demetrius watching his time and hower of going thither, followed him, and got in to him being alone. The boy ſeeing himſelfe alone, and that he could not reſiſt Demetrius, tooke off the couer of the kettle or cauldron where the water was boiling, and leaping into it, drowned himſelfe. Truly he was vnworthy of ſo lamentable an end, but yet he ſhewed a noble heart, worthy of his beauty and country. But he did not as another called Cleænetus, the ſonne of Cleomedon, who brought letters from Demetrius, directed to the people, whereby through Demetrius interceſſion and requeſt, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained priſoner) was clearly remitted and forgiuen. But by this act, he not onely ſhamed and hiſhonoured himſelfe, but alſo troubled all the city. For the people thereupon releaſed Cleomedon of his fine, but therwith they made a decree that no citizen ſhould thenceforth bring any more letters from Demetrius. But afterward vnderſtanding that Demetrius was maruellouſly offended with this decree: they did not only reuoke their firſt decree, but they did alſo put ſome of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others alſo they baniſhed. And further they made a law, that the people of ATHENS ſhould account all religious to the gods, and iuſt vnto men, whatſoeuer it pleaſed Demetrius to order and appoint. At that time there was one of the chiefeſt men of the city, that ſayd Stratocles was a mad man to preferre ſuch matters. Indeed quoth Demochares ſurnamed LACONIAN, he were a mad man if he were otherwiſe: and he ſpake it, becauſe this Stratocles had many great pleaſures at Demetrius hands for this flattery. Howbeit, Demochares being accuſed and condemned vpon theſe words, he was baniſhed ATHENS. See the ATHENIANS how they vſed themſelues, who ſeemed to be deliuered from the garriſon they had before, and to be reſtored vnto their former liberty and freedome. From thence Demetrius went into PELOPONNESVS, and neuer an enemy of his durſt tary his comming, but all fled before him, and left him their caſtles and townes. Thus Demetrius wanne vnto himſelfe all the countrey called ACTE, and all ARCHADIA, ſauing the city of MANTINEA: and for the ſumme

of an hundreth talents giuen amongſt them: he deliuered the cities of ARGOS, SICYONE, and of CORINTH, from the garriſons that lay amongſt them. About that time fell out the great feaſt of Iuno in ARGOS, called Heræa. Therefore Demetrius, to honour this feaſt with the GRECIANS, maried Deidamia (the daughter of Eacides, king of the MOLOSSIANS, and ſiſter of Pyrrhus) and perſwaded the SICYONIANS to leaue their city, and to come and build in another goodly place neare vnto it, where they now do dwell: and ſo with the place and ſituation, he changed alſo the name of the city. For in ſtead of SICYONE, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a generall aſſembly of the ſtates of GREECE, which was kept in the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, called ISTHMOS, Demetrius was choſen Lieutenant generall of all the GREGIANS, as Philip and Alexander (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not onely compare himſelfe, but thought himſelfe greater then they, becauſe fortune ſmiled on him, and for that he had ſo good ſucceſſe in all his affaires. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the title and name of king from any other kings, neither did euer call himſelfe king of kings, although he had giuen vnto diuerſe of them the name and power of a king: & in contrary maner alſo, Demetrius laughed them to ſcorne which called any other Princes kings but his father and himſelfe. Moreouer he tooke great pleaſure to heare his flatterers, who being at banquets called for wine to drinke to king Demetrius, and then to Seleucus maiſter of the Elephants, to Ptolomy Admiral, to Lyſimachus, keeper of the treaſure, & to Agathocles SILICIAN, gouernor of the Iles. All the kings, but Lyſimachus, laughed at theſe toyes when they were reported to them: but Lyſimachus was very angry, & thought great ſcorne that Demetrius ſhould reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old cuſtome commonly to giue an Eunuch the charge of keeping the treaſure. So Lyſimachus of all other Princes did beare him moſt malice, and becauſe he would finely taunt him for that he euer kept Lamia his curtiſan with him: Vntill this preſent time, ſayd he, I neuer ſaw harlot play in a Tragedy before. Demetrius anſwered him againe, that his harlot was chaſter then Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that time out of PELOPONNESVS, tooke his iourney towards ATHENS, and wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be receiued into the fraternity of the holy myſteries, and that he meant they ſhould ſhew him at one ſelfe time, all that was to be ſeene, euen from the leaſt to the higheſt ſecrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, becauſe they made the brethren of the fraternity ſee them long time after that they had bene firſt receiued into the leſſer ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then, neither was euer heard of before. For theſe ſmaller myſteries, in old time were celebrated in the moneth of Nouember, and the greater in the moneth of Auguſt: and beſide it was not lawfull to celebrate or vſe theſe ceremonies within the ſpace of a yeare one of the other. When theſe letters were openly read, no man durſt ſpeake againſt them, but Pythodorus the Prieſt, who caried the torch lighted when they ſhewed theſe myſteries. Howbeit his words preuailed not, for by the deuice of Stratocles it was enacted at an aſſembly of the city, that the moneth of March in the which they were at that time, ſhould be called and reputed Nouember. And ſo as they could beſt helpe it, by their ordinances of the city they did receiue Demetrius into the fraternity of the myſteries: and afterwards againe, this ſelfe moneth of March which they had tranſlated into Nouember, became ſuddenly Auguſt: and in the ſelfe ſame yeare was celebrated the other ceremonie of theſe great myſteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to ſee the moſt ſtraight and ſecret ceremonies. Therefore Philippides the Poet inueighing againſt the ſacriledge, and impiety of religion prophaned by Stratocles, made theſe verſes of him:

Demetrius maried Deidamia king Pyrrhus ſiſter: and changed the name of the city of Sicyone and called it Demetriade.

Demetrius choſen General of all Grece.

Into one moneth his comming hither
Hath thruſt vp all the yeare together.

Philippides verſes againſt Stratocles the boaſter.

And afterwards becauſe Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Minerua within the caſtell:

Of chaſt Mineruaes holy church he makes a filthy ſtewes,
And in that virgins very ſight his harlots doth abuſe.

But yet of all the inſolent parts done at that time in ATHENS (although many were committed) none of all the reſt grieued the ATHENIANS more, then this did: that Demetrius commaunded them they ſhould preſently furniſh him with two hundred and fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very hard vnto them, both for the ſhortneſſe of the time appointed them, as alſo for the impoſſibility of abating any part of it. When he had ſeene all this maſſe of money layed on a heape before him, he commanded it ſhould be giuen to Lamia, & among his other curtiſans,

to buy them ſope. The ſhame the ATHENIANS receiued by this gift, grieued them more, then the loſſe of their mony: and the words he ſpake to the great contempt of them and their city, did more trouble them, then the payment they made. Some ſay notwithſtanding, that Demetrius did not alone vſe the ATHENIANS thus ſhamefully, but the THESSALIANS alſo in the ſame manner. But paſſing this ouer: Lamia of her ſelfe and through her owne countenance did get a great ſum of money together of diuerſe perſons for one ſupper he made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of ſuch exceeding charge, that Lycæus borne in the Ile of SAMOS, did ſet downe the order thereof in writing. And therefore a certaine Poet no leſſe pleaſantly, then truly, called this Lamia, Elepolis: to wit, an engine to take cities. And Demochares alſo borne in the city of SOLI, called Demetrius a fable, becauſe he had Lamia euer with him: as in the fables which old women tell little children, there is euer lightly a Lamia, as much to ſay, as a witch, or ſorcereſſe. So that the great credite and authority this Lamia had, and the loue which Demetrius bare her: did not onely cauſe his wiues to ſuſpect and enuy him, but made him hated alſo of all his friends and familiars. And therefore certaine gentlemen, whom Demetrius ſent in Ambaſſade vnto king Lyſimachus, he talking familiarly with them, and paſſing the time away, ſhewed them great wounds of the clawes of a Lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them alſo how he was forced to fight with a Lyon, when through king Alexanders fury he was ſhut vp in his den with him: they ſmiling to heare him, told him that the king their maiſter had alſo certaine markes and bitings on his necke, of a wild beaſt called Lamia. And to ſay truly, it was a wonderfull thing, that marying (as he did) his wife Phila ſo much againſt his will, becauſe ſhe was too old for him: how he was ſo rauiſhed with Lamia, and did ſo conſtantly loue her ſo long together, conſidering alſo that ſhe was very old, and paſt the beſt. Therefore Demo, ſurnamed Mania (as much to ſay, the madde woman) pleaſantly aunſwered Demetrius, asking her one night when Lamia had played on the flute all ſupper time, what ſhe thought of Lamia? An old woman, O king, quoth ſhe. Another time when fruite was ſerued in, after the boord was taken vp: Do you ſee ſayd Demetrius, how many prety fine knackes Lamia ſendeth me? My mother, anſwered Demo againe, will ſend you more then theſe, if you pleaſe to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that ſhe ouerthrew Bocchoris iudgement in a matter. In ÆGYPT there was a young man that had a maruellous fancie vnto a famous curtiſan called Thonis: who did aske him ſuch a great ſumme of money to lye with her, that it was vnpoſſible for him to giue it her. At length, this amorous youth being ſo deepe in loue with her, dreamed one night he lay with her, and enioyed her: ſo that for the pleaſure he tooke by his conceipt and imagination, when he awaked, his earneſt loue was ſatisfied. This curtiſan whom he had caſt fancy to, hearing of this his dream, did put him in ſute before the Iudges, to be payed her hier for the pleaſure the young man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the ſumme of her complaint, commaunded the young man to bring before him in ſome veſſell, at a certaine day appointed, as much money as ſhe did aske him to lye with her. Then he bad him to toſſe it too and fro in his hand before the curtiſan, that ſhe might onely haue the ſhadow and ſight of it: for quoth he, imagination and opinion is but but a ſhadow of truth. Lamia ſayd this was no equall iudgement: for ſaith ſhe, the ſhadow onely or the ſight of money, did not ſatisfie the couetouſneſſe of the curtiſan, as the young mans luſt was quenched by his dreame. Thus inough ſpoken of Lamia. But now the misfortunes and geſts of him we preſently write of, do tranſport the hiſtorie, as from a comicall into a tragicall theater, that is to ſay, from pleaſant and light matter, into lamentable and bitter teares. For all the Princes and Kings conſpired generally againſt Antigonus, and ioyned all their force and armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed foorthwith out of GRECE, and came to ioyne with his father, whoſe courage he found more liuely and better giuen to this warre then his yeares required: beſides that Demetrius comming made him the bolder, and did lift vp his heart the more. And yet it ſeemeth to me, that if Antigonus would but haue yeelded vp a few trifling things, or that he either could or would haue bridled his ouer immoderate couetous deſire to raigne: he had both kept for himſelfe all the time of his life, and alſo left after his death vnto his ſonne, the ſupreameſt dignitie and power, aboue all the other kings and ſucceſſours of Alexander. But he was ſo cruell, and ſo raſh of nature, and as inſolent and braue in his doings, as in his words: that thereby he ſtirred vp and brought vpon him as his enemies, many great and mighty Princes. For euen at that preſent time he ſayd, that he would as eaſily diſperſe and ſcatter aſunder that conſpiracy againſt him, as choughs or other little birds comming to pecke vp the corne newly ſowne, are eaſily ſcared away with a ſtone or making any little noiſe. So he caried to the field with him, aboue threeſcore and ten thouſand footmen, ten thouſand horſemen, and threeſcore and fifteene Elephants. His enemies had threeſcore and foure thouſand footmen, and fiue hundreth horſemen more then he, with foure hundreth Elephants, and ſixſcore carts of war. When the two armies were one neare vnto the other, me thinkes he had ſome imagination in his head that changed his hope, but not his courage. For in all other battels and conflicts, hauing cõmonly vſed to looke big on the matter, to haue a lowd high voice, and to vſe braue words, and ſomtime alſo euen in the chiefeſt of all the battell to giue ſome pleaſant mocke or other, ſhewing a certaine truſt he had in himſelfe, and contempt of his enemy: then they ſaw him oftentimes alone and very penſiue, without euer a word to any man. One day he called all his army together, and preſented his ſonne vnto the ſouldiers, recommending him vnto them, as his heire and ſucceſſour, and talked with him alone in his tent. Whereat men maruelled the more, becauſe that he neuer vſed before to impart to any man the ſecrets of his counſell and determination, no not to his owne ſonne, but did all things of himſelfe: and then commanded that thing openly to be done which he had ſecretly purpoſed. For proofe hereof it is ſayd, Demetrius being but a yong man, asked him on a time when the campe ſhould remoue: and that Antigonus in anger anſwered him, art thou afraid thou ſhalt not heare the ſound of the trumpet? Furthermore, there fell out many ill ſignes and tokens that killed their harts. For Demetrius dreamed that Alexander the Great appeared armed vnto him at all peeces, and that he asked him what word or ſignall of battell they were determined to giue at the day of battell, he anſwered that they were determined to giue, Iupiter and Victorie. Then ſayd Alexander, I will go to thine enemies that ſhall receiue me: and afterwards at the very day of the ouerthrow, when all their army were ſet in battell ray: Antigonus comming out of his tent, had ſuch a great fall, that he fell flat on his face to the ground, and hurt himſelfe very ſorely. So when he was taken vp, then lifting vp his hands to heauen, he made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would pleaſe thẽ to grant him victory, or ſudden death without great paine, before he ſhould ſee himſelfe vanquiſhed and his army ouerthrowne. When both battels came to ioyne, and that they fought hand to hand: Demetrius that had the moſt part of the horſemen with him, went & gaue charge vpon Antigonus the ſonne of Seleucus, and fought it ought ſo valiantly on his ſide, that he ouerthrew his enemies, and put them to flight. But too fondly following the chaſe of them that fled, and out of time: he marred all, and was the occaſion of the loſſe of his victory. For when he returned from the chaſe, he could not ioyne againe with their footmen, becauſe the Elephants were betweene both. Then Seleucus perceiuing Antigonus battell was naked of horſemen, he did not preſently ſet vpon them, but turned at one ſide as though he would enuirone them behind, and made them afraid: yet making head as he would charge them, onely to giue them leiſure to come on their ſide as they did. For the moſt part of Antigonus hoaſt did forſake him and yeelded vnto his enemies: the reſt of them fled euery man. And when a great troupe of men together went with great fury to giue charge on that ſide where Antigonus was: one of them that were about him ſayd vnto him: Your grace had need to take heed, for theſe men come to charge vs. He aunſwered againe: but how ſhould they know me? and if they did my ſon Demetrius will come and helpe me. This was his laſt hope, and ſtill he looked euery way, if he could ſee his ſonne comming towards him: till at length he was ſlaine with arrowes, darts and pikes. For of all his friends and ſouldiers, there taried not one man by his body, but Thorax of the city of LARISSA in THESSALY. Now the battell hauing ſuch ſucceſſe as you haue heard. The Kings and Princes that had won ſo noble a victory, as if they had cut a great body into ſundry peeces: they deuided Antigonus kingdom among them, and euery man had his part of all the prouinces and countries which Antigonus kept, adding that vnto their other dominions which they poſſeſſed before. Now Demetrius flying with all poſſible ſpeed that might be, with fiue thouſand footmen, and foure thouſand horſemen, he got to the city of EPHESVS: where euery man miſtruſted, that being needy of money as he was, he would not ſpare the temple of Diana in EPHESVS, but would rifle all the gold and ſiluer in it. And in contrary maner alſo Demetrius being afraid of his ſouldiers, leaſt they would ſpoile it againſt his will, he ſuddenly departed thence, and ſailed towards GREECE, putting his greateſt confidence and affiance in the ATHENIANS, becauſe he had left his wife Deidamia at ATHENS, with ſhips and ſome money, ſuppoſing he could go no whither with better ſafety in his aduerſity, then to ATHENS, of whoſe good wils he thought himſelfe aſſured. Wherefore when Ambaſſadors of the

the ATHENIANS came vnto him, & found him not far from the Iles of CYCLADES, as he sailed with great speed towards ATTICA, & that they had declared vnto him, he should forbeare to come vnto their city, because the people had made an ordinance to suffer no moe kings to come into ATHENS, and that they had sent Deidamia his wife honourably accompanied vnto the city of MEGARA: then was Demetrius for very anger and passion of mind, cleane out of countenance, although vntill that time he had patiently borne his aduersitie, and his heart had neuer failed him. But this nipped him to the heart, when he saw (that contrary to expectation) the ATHENIANS had deceiued and failed him in his greatest need, and that in his aduersitie he found their former friendship counterfeit, and altogether dissembled. Whereby most plainely appeareth, that the most vncertaine and deceiueable proofe of peoples good-wils and cities towards Kings and Princes, are the immeasurable and extreme honours they do vnto them. For sith it is so, that the truth and certaintie of honour proceedeth from the good-will of those that giue it: the feare which the common people commonly stand in of the power of kings, is sufficient cause for them to mistrust that the people do it not with good will and from their hearts, considering that for feare they do the selfe same things, which they will also do for loue. Therefore graue and wise Princes should not passe so much for the images and statues they set vp for them, or the tables or diuine honours they do decree vnto them: as to regard their owne workes and deeds, and weying them truly, so to beleeue and receiue their honours for true, or otherwise to reiect and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they do accept these immeasurable and extreme honours done vnto them: but those sorts chiefly hate them most, that against their wils are forced to do them those honours. Demetrius seeing then how iniuriously the ATHENIANS had vsed him, and at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them: he modestly sent vnto them onely to make his complaints, and to demaund his ships, among the which was that galley of sixteene banckes of owers. The which when he had receiued, he hoised saile immediatly towards the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and there found all things to go against him. For in euerie place where he had left any garrison, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yeelded them vp, or else reuolted, and kept them against him. Therefore leauing Pyrrhus his Lieutenant in GREECE, he tooke sea againe, and sailed towards CHERRONESVS, and there with the mischieues he did, and with the spoiles he got in king Lysimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increase, and to be dreadfull to his enemies. But now for Lysimachus, the other kings made no great account of him, neither did they stirre to giue him aide, because he was nothing inferiour vnto Demetrius: and for that he was of greater power and possessions then themselues, they therefore were the more afraid of him. Shortly after, Seleucus sent vnto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonicé in mariage, notwithstanding that he had a sonne already called Antiochus, by his wife Apama a PERSIAN. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatnesse of his estate and kingdome, was able inough to maintaine many successours after him. And furthermore, he considered with himselfe that he should haue need of Demetrius alliance, because he saw Lysimachus himselfe match with one of Ptolomies daughters, and his sonne Agathocles with his other daughter. Demetrius seeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, presently tooke his daughter with him, and sailed with all his ships directly towards SYRIA. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessity to land sometimes, and specially in CICILIA, the which Plistarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, being giuen him by the other kings for his part and portion of the spoile of Antigonus, after he was ouerthrowne. This Plistarchus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refresh himselfe, but to forrage and spoile, because he would complaine of Seleucus for the alliance he made with their common enemy, without the consent and priuitie of all the other Kings and Princes confederates, he went purposely vnto his brother Cassander. Demetrius hauing intelligence thereof, suddenly inuaded the land, and spoiled as farre as the city of CYNDES, and caried away (which he had leauied) twelue hundred talents, which he found yet left of his fathers treasure: and then with all the speed he could possible he returned to his ships, and hoissed saile. Shortly after, his wife Phila also came vnto him. So Seleucus receiued them all neare vnto the city of OROSSVS, and there their meeting was Princely, without sorow or suspition one of the other. First of all Seleucus did feast Demetrius in his tent, in the middest of his campe: and afterwards Demetrius feasted him againe in his galley, with thirteene banckes of owers.

Thus they passed many dayes together, feasting and reioycing each with other, being vnarmed, and hauing no souldiers to waite vpon them: vntill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and tooke his way with great pompe towards the city of ANTIOCH. Now for Demetrius, he kept the prouince of CILICIA, and sent his wife Phila vnto her brother Cassander, to answer the complaints and accusations of Plistarchus against him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GREECE to come vnto him: who after she had remained with him a few dayes, died of a sickenesse. Afterwards Demetrius comming againe in fauour with Ptolomy, by Seleucus his son in lawes meanes: he maried his daughter Ptolemæide. Hitherunto Seleucus vsed Demetrius very courteously: but afterwards he prayed him to deliuer him CILICIA againe, for a summe of money that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly denied him. Then did Seleucus shew a cruell and tyrannicall couetousnesse: for in anger, and with fierce threats & countenance he asked him the cities of TYRE, and SIDON. But therin me thinks he lacked honesty and ciuility: as though he that had vnder his obedience and subiection all that which lay betwixt the INDIES, & the sea of SYRIA, was in such need and pouerty, that for two cities onely, he should driue his father in law from him, who had sustained so hard and bitter change. But thereby he rightly confirmed Platoes saying: that he that wil be rich indeed, must indeuor himselfe not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his couetousnesse. For he shall neuer be but a begger, and needy, whose couetous desire hath no end. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yeelded not for feare, but prouided to repleniſh the cities with good garrisons to keepe them against him: saying, that though he had bene ouercome ten thousand times more in battell, yet it should neuer sincke into his head that he should be contented, and thinke himselfe happy to buy Seleucus alliance so deare. On the other side, being aduertised that one Lachares hauing spied oportunity when the ATHENIANS were in ciuill wars one against the other, & that he had ouercome them, & did tyrannically vsurpe the gouernment: he then perswaded himselfe that he might easily win it againe, if he came thither vpon the sudden. Thereupon he crossed the seas with a great fleete of ships, without any danger:

Demetrius iourney against the Athenians.

but he had such a great storme and tempest vpon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most part of his ships, and a great number of his men besides. But for himselfe he scaped, & began to make a litle warre with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but lost his time: he sent some of his men to gather a number of his ships againe together, and he himselfe in the meane time went into PELOPONNESVS, to lay siege to the city of MESSINA, where his person was in great danger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blow with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ran through his cheeke. Notwithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subiection againe certaine towns that had rebelled against him. After that, he returned againe into ATTICA, and tooke the cities of ELEVSIN, and of RHAMNVS: and then spoiled all the country, and tooke a ship fraught with corne, and hung vp the merchant that ought it, & the maister of the ship that brought it: thereby to terrifie all other merchants, that they should be afraid to bring any more corne thither, and so to famish the city, by keeping them from all things necessary for their sustenance: and so it happened. For a bushell of salt was sold at ATHENS for * forty siluer Drachmas, & the bushell of wheat for three * hundred Drachmas. In this extreme necessity, the ATHENIANS had but a short ioy for the hundred and fifty galleys they saw neare vnto ÆGINA, the which Ptolomy sent to aide them: for when the souldiers that were in them saw that they brought vnto Demetrius a great number of ships out of PELOPONNESVS, out of CYPRVS, and diuerse other parts, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred saile: they weyed their ankers, & fled presently. Then Lachares forsooke the city, & secretly saued himselfe. Now the ATHENIANS, who before had commanded vpon paine of death, that no man should make any motion to the councell, to treate of any peace with Demetrius:

they did then vpon Lachares flying, presently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campe, and sent Ambassadors vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but because necessity draue them to it. During this so hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderfull and straunge things: but among others, this one is of speciall note. It is reported that the father and the son sitting in their house, voide of all hope of life: there fell a dead rat before them from the top of the house, and that the father and sonne fought who should haue it to eate. Moreouer, that at the selfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained himselfe and his scholers, by giuing them a proportion of beanes euery day, by the which they liued. Thus the city of ATHENS being brought vnto this extremity, Demetrius made his entrie into it, and gaue commaundement to all the citizens, that they ſhould aſſemble euery man within the Theater: where he made them to be compaſſed in with armed ſouldiers, and then placed all his guard armed about the ſtage. Afterwards he came downe himſelfe into the Theater, through high galleries and entries by the which the common players vſed to come to play their parts in tragedies, inſomuch as the ATHENIANS were then worſe afraid then before: howbeit Demetrius preſently pacified their feare, as ſoone as he began to ſpeake vnto them. For he did not faſhion his Oration with a haſty angrie voyce, neither did he vſe any ſharpe or bitter words: but only after he had curteouſly told them their faults & diſcurteſie towards him, he ſaid he forgaue them, and that he would be their friend againe: and furthermore, he cauſed ten millions of buſhels of wheat to be giuen vnto them, & ſtabliſhed ſuch gouernors there, as the people miſliked not of. Then Democles the Orator, ſeeing that the people gaue out great ſhouts of ioy in the praiſe of Demetrius, & that the Orators daily cõtended in the pulpit for Orations, who ſhould exceed other in preferring new honors for Demetrius: he cauſed an order to be made, that the hauens of PIRÆVS and MVNYCHIA ſhould be put into Demetrius hands, to vſe at his pleaſure. This being ſtabliſhed by voices of the people, Demetrius of his own priuate authority did place a great garriſõ within the fort called MVSÆVM, becauſe the people ſhould rebell no more againſt him, nor diuert him from his other enterpriſes. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to ſet vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Archidamus king of LACEDÆMON, came againſt him with a puiſſant army, whom he diſcomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the city of MANTINEA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his army, and made an inrode to the city of SPARTA, where he once againe ouerthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS in ſet battell, tooke 500 of them priſoners, and ſlue 200: in ſo much as euery man thought he might euen then go to SPARTA without any danger to take it, the which had neuer yet bene taken afore by any. But there was neuer king that had ſo often and ſudden changes of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was euer ſo often litle, and then great: ſo ſuddenly downe, and vp againe: ſo weake, and ſtraight ſo ſtrong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great aduerſities when fortune turned ſo contrary againſt him, he was wont to cry out vpon fortune, that which Æſchylus ſpeaketh in a place:

Thou ſeem'ſt to haue begotten me, of purpoſe for to ſhew
Thy force in liſting of me vp, me downe againe to throw.

Now againe when his affaires proſpered ſo well, and that he was likely to recouer a great force and kingdome: newes were brought him, firſt that Lyſimachus had taken all his townes from him, which he held in ASIA: & on the other ſide, that Ptolomy had won from him all the Realme of CYPRVS, the city of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very ſtraightly beſieged. This notwithſtanding, fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archilochus ſpeaketh of, who

Did in the one hand water ſhow,
And in the other fire beſtow.

For taking him away, and (as it were) the city of SPARTA alſo out of his hands by theſe dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to haue wonne it: ſhe preſently offered him hopes of other great and new things, by this occaſion following. After the death of Caſſander, Philip who was the eldeſt of all his other ſonnes, and left his heire and ſucceſſor in the kingdome of MACEDON: he reigned no long time ouer the MACEDONIANS, but deceaſed ſoone after his father was dead. The two other brethren alſo fell at great variance, and warres together: ſo that the one called Antipater, ſlue his owne mother Theſſalonica: and the other named Alexander, called in to aide him Demetrius and Pyrrhus, the one out of the Realme of FPIRVS, and the other out of PELOPONNESVS. Pyrrhus came firſt before Demetrius, and kept a great part of MACEDON for recompence of his paines, comming to aide him at his deſire: ſo that he became a dreadful neighbour vnto Alexander himſelfe, that had ſent for him into his countrey. Furthermore, when he was aduertiſed that Demetrius did preſently vpon the receipt of his letters, ſet forward with all his army to come to aide him, the young Prince Alexander, was twiſe as much more amazed and afraid, for the great eſtate and eſtimation of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithſtanding, and receiued him at a place called DION, and there imbraced and welcomed him. But immediatly after, he told him that his affaires were now in ſo good eſtate, that praiſed be the gods he ſhould not now need his preſence to aide him. After theſe words the one began to miſtruſt the other. So it chanced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feaſt was prepared: there came one to him to tell him of an ambuſh that was layed for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he ſhould thinke to be merry at the banket. But Demetrius was nothing abaſhed at the newes, and onely went a litle ſoftlier, not making ſuch haſt as he did before, and in the meane time ſent to cõmaund his Captaines to arme their men, and to haue them in readineſſe: and willed his gentlemen and all the reſt of his officers that were about him (which were a greater number by many then thoſe of Alexanders ſide) euery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tary there till he roſe from the table. By this meanes the men whom Alexander had appointed to aſſault him, they durſt not, being afraid of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at eaſe at that time to make merry, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleeue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importance: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keepe him company, for that he was driuen of neceſſity to depart from him, and that another time they would meete together, with better leiſure and libertie. Alexander was very glad to ſee that Demetrius went his way out of Macedon not offended, but of his owne good will: whereupon he brought him into Theſſalie, and when they were come to the citie of Larissa, they began againe to feaſt one another, to intrap each other: the which offered Demetrius occaſion to haue Alexander in his hand as he would wiſh himſelfe. For Alexander of purpoſe would not haue his guard about him, fearing leaſt thereby he ſhould teach Demetrius alſo to ſtand vpon his guard. Thus Alexander turned his practiſe for another, vpon himſelfe: for he was determined not to ſuffer Demetrius to ſcape his hands, if he once againe came within daunger. So Alexander being bidden to ſupper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius riſing from the boord in the middeſt of ſupper, Alexander roſe alſo, being afraid of that ſtraunge maner, and followed him foote by foote to the very doore. Then Demetrius ſayd but to his warders at the gate, Kill him that followeth me. With thoſe words he went out of the doores, and Alexander that followed him was ſlaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to reſcue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him ſayd, that Demetrius had preuented them but one day. All that night (as it is no other likely) was full of vprore and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the Macedonians being maruellouſly troubled and afraid of Demetrius great power, when they ſaw that no mã came to aſſaile them, but that Demetrius in contrary manner ſent vnto them to tell them that he would ſpeake with them, and deliuer them reaſon for that he had done: then they all began to be bold againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Now Demetrius needed not to vſe many words, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto him: for, becauſe they hated Antipater as a horrible manqueller and murtherer of his mother, and becauſe they had no better man to preferre, they eaſily choſe Demetrius king of Macedon, and thereupon brought him backe into Macedon, to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom. This change was not miſliked of the other Macedonians that remained at home in their country, for that they yet remembred the trayterous and wicked fact of Caſſander, againſt Alexander the Great: for which cauſe they vtterly hated & deteſted all his iſſue and poſterity. And furthermore, if there were any ſparke of remembrance in their harts, of the bounty and goodneſſe of their grandfather Antipater: Demetrius receiued the fruit and benefit, for his wife Philaes ſake, by whom he had a ſon that ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdom, and was a proper youth, in campe with his father. Demetrius hauing this great good hap and fortune come vnto him, he receiued newes alſo that Ptolomy had not onely raiſed his ſiege from the city of Salamina, where he kept his mother and children ſtraightly beſieged: but further, that he had done them great honor, and beſtowed great gifts vpon them. On the other ſide alſo he was aduertiſed, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene maried vnto Seleucus, was now maried againe vnto Antiochus, the ſonne of the ſayd Seleucus, and how that ſhe was crowned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high prouinces of Asia: and that came to paſſe in this maner. It chanced that this young Prince Antiochus (as loue ouercommeth all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who already had a ſonne by Seleucus his father. She being yong, and paſſing faire, he was ſo rauiſhed with her, that though he proued all the wayes poſſible to maiſter his fury and paſſion that way: yet he was ſtill the weaker. So that in the end, condemning himſelfe to death becauſe he found his deſire abhominable, his paſſion incurable, and his reaſon vtterly ouercome: he reſolued to kill himſelfe by litle and litle, with abſtinence from meate and drinke, and made no other reckoning to remedy his

his griefe, fayning to haue ſome ſecrete inward diſeaſe in his body. Yet could he not ſo finely cloake it, but that Eraſiſtratus the Phyſitian eaſily found his griefe, that loue, not ſickneſſe, was his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Eraſiſtratus being earneſtly bent to find out the party he loued, he ſate by this young Prince all day long in his chamber, and when any faire yong boy or wife came to ſee him, he earneſtly looked Antiochus in the face, and carefully obſerued all the parts of the body, and outward mouings, which do commonly bewray the ſecret paſſions and affections of the mind. So hauing marked him diuerſe times, that whē others came to ſee him, whatſoeuer they were, he ſtill remained in one ſelfe ſtate, and that when Stratonice his mother in law came alone or in company of her husband Seleucus to viſite him, he commonly perceiued thoſe ſignes in him, which Sappho writeth to be in louers (to wit, that his words and ſpeech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes ſtill rowled too & fro, and then a ſudden ſweat would take him, his pulſe would beate faſt & riſe high, & in the end, that after the force and power of his hart had failed him, & ſhewed all theſe ſignes, he became like a man in an extaſie and traunce, and white as a kearcher) he then gathering a true coniecture by theſe ſo manifeſt ſignes and declarations, that it was only Stratonice whom this yong Prince fancied, and the which he forced himſelfe to keepe ſecret to the death: thought that to bewray it to the king it would offend him much, but yet truſting to his great affection & fatherly loue he bare to his ſonne, he ventured one day to tell him, that his ſons ſickneſſe was no other but loue, and withall, that his loue was impoſſible to be enioyed, & therfore that he muſt of neceſſity dye, for it was incurable. Seleucus was cold at the hart to heare theſe news: ſo he asked him, What, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, anſwered the Phyſitian, becauſe he is in loue with my wife. Then replied Seleucus againe, Alas Eraſiſtratus, I haue alwayes loued thee as one of my deareſt friends, and wouldeſt thou not now do me this pleaſure, to let my ſon marry thy wife, ſith thou knoweſt it well that I haue no moe ſons but he, and that I ſee he is but caſt away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not do it your ſelfe, ſayd Eraſiſtratus, if he were in loue with Stratonice. O, ſayd Seleucus to him againe, that it were the will of the gods, ſome god or man could turne his loue that way: for mine owne part, I would not onely leaue him the thing he loued, but I would giue my kingdome alſo to ſaue his life. Then Eraſiſtratus ſeeing that the king ſpake theſe words from his hart, & with abundance of teares: he tooke him by the right hand, & told him plainly, your grace needeth not Eraſiſtratus helpe in this. For being father, husband, and king, your ſelfe alſo may onely be the Phyſitian, to cure your ſons diſeaſe. When Seleucus heard that, he called an aſſembly of the people, and declared before them all that he was determined to crowne his ſon Antiochus king of the high prouinces of Asia, & Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was perſwaded that his ſon (who had alwayes ſhewed himſelfe obedient to his fathers will) would not diſobey him in this mariage. And as for Stratonice, if ſhe miſliked this mariage, & would not conſent vnto it becauſe it was no common matter: then he prayed that his friends would perſwade her ſhe ſhould thinke all good and comely that ſhould pleaſe the king: & withall that concerned the generall benefit of the realme and commonwealth. Hereupon Antiochus and Stratonice were maried together. But now to returne againe to the hiſtory of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the kingdom of Macedon & Theſſaly by this means as you haue heard, & did moreouer poſſeſſe the beſt part of Peloponnesvs, & on this ſide the ſtraight, the cities of Megara, and Athens. Furthermore he led his army againſt the Boeotians, who were at the firſt willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of Sparta was come into the city of Thebes with his army, the Boeotians encouraged by the faire words & allurement of one Piſis, borne in the city of Thespis, who at that time bare all the ſway & chiefe authority amongſt them: they gaue vp their treaty of peace they had begun with Demetrius & determined to make war. Thereupon Demetrius went to beſiege the city of Thebes, & layd his engines of battery vnto it: in ſo much as Cleonymus for feare, ſtale ſecretly out of the city. Thereupon the Thebans being alſo afraid, yeelded themſelues vnto Demetrius mercy: who putting great garriſons into the cities, and hauing leauied a great ſumme of money of the prouince, left them Hieronymus the hiſtoriographer, his Lieutenant and gonernor there. So it appeared that he vſed them very courteouſly, and did them many pleaſures, and ſpecially vnto Piſis. For when he had taken him priſoner, he did him no hurt, but receiued him verie courteouſly, and vſed him well: and furthermore, he made him Polemarchus (to wit, campe-maiſter) in the city of Thespis. Shortly after theſe things were thus brought to paſſe, king Lyſimachus by chance was taken by another barbarous

Prince called Dromichetes. Therupon, Demetrius, to take ſuch a noble occaſion offered him, went with a great army to inuade the country of THRACIA, ſuppoſing he ſhould find no man to withſtand him, but that he might conquer it at his pleaſure. Howbeit, ſo ſoone as Demetrius backe was turned, the BOEOTIANS reuolted againe from him, and therwithall newes was brought him, that Lyſimachus was deliuered out of priſon. Then he returned backe with all ſpeed, maruellouſly offended with the BOEOTIANS, whom he found already diſcomfited in battell by his ſon Antigonus, and went againe to lay ſiege to the city of THEBES, being the chiefe city of all that prouince of BOEOTIA. But at that preſent time, Pyrrhus came and forraged all THESSALY, and entred euen to the ſtraight of THERMOPILES. Therefore Demetrius was conſtrained to leaue his ſonne to continue the ſiege at THEBES, whileſt he himſelfe went againſt Pyrrhus, who ſuddenly returned againe into his Realme. So Demetrius left 10000 footmen, & a 1000 horſmen in THESSALY to defend the country, and returned with the reſt of his army to win THEBES. Thereupon he brought his great engine of battery called Elepolis, againſt the wall, as you haue heard before, the which was thruſt forward by litle and litle, with great labor, by reaſon of the waight and heauineſſe of it: ſo that it could ſcant be driuē forward two furlongs in two moneths. But the BOEOTIANS and the THEBANS did valiantly defend themſelues: & Demetrius of a malicious mind and deſire of reuenge (more oftner then needfull, or to any purpoſe) compelled his men to go to the aſſault, and to hazard themſelues: ſo that there were daily a great number of them ſlaine. Antigonus his ſon perceiuing it: Alas, ſayd he, why do we thus ſuffer our men to be ſlaine and caſt away to no purpoſe? Wherfore Demetrius angrily anſwered him againe: What needeſt thou to care? Is there any * corne to be diſtributed to thoſe that are dead? But notwithſtanding, becauſe men ſhould not thinke he ſtill meant to put others in danger, & durſt not venture himſelfe: he fought with them, till at length he was ſhot through the necke with a ſharpe arrow-head, that was ſhot at him from the wall. Wherewithall he fell very ſicke, but yet raiſed not his ſiege, nor remoued his campe, but tooke the city of THEBES againe by aſſault: the which being not long before againe repleniſhed with people, was in ten yeares ſpace twiſe won and taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a maruellous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his comming into THEBES: ſo that they looked to haue receiued the extremeſt puniſhment the vanquiſhed could haue, through the iuſt wrath and anger of the conquerour. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirteene of them to death, and baniſhed ſome, he pardoned all the reſt. About that time fell out the celebration of the feaſt called Pythia, in the honor of Apollo: and becauſe the ÆTOLIANS kept all the high wayes to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES in the which of old time they did vſe to celebrate thoſe ſports aforeſayd: he cauſed them to be kept and ſolemnized at ATHENS, as in a place where this god in reaſon ſhould be beſt honored & reuerenced, becauſe he was patron of the city, & for that the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into MACEDON, & knowing that it was againſt his nature to liue idly, & in peace, & ſeeing on the other ſide alſo that the MACEDONIANS did him more ſeruice, and were more obedient to him in wars, and that in time of peace they grew ſeditious, full of vanity and quarrell: he went to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, & after he had ſpoiled & deſtroyed their country, he left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his army. Demetrius himſelfe went in the meane time with the reſt of his army againſt Pyrrhus: & Pyrrhus alſo againſt him, but they miſſed of meeting each with other. Wherupon Demetrius paſſed further vnto the Realme of EPIRVS, the which he ſpoiled and forraged. Pyrrhus on the other ſide went on ſo far that he met with Pantauchus, Demetrius Lieutnant, with whō he fought a battell, & came to the ſword with him: ſo that he did both hurt him, and was alſo hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the vpper hand, he put Pantauchus to flight, and ſlue a great number of his men, & tooke 5000 priſoners: the which was the chiefe ouerthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus wanne not the MACEDONIANS ill will ſo much for the miſchieues and hurts he had done vnto thē, as he got himſelfe great fame & renowne with thē, becauſe himſelfe alone had with his own hands done all the noble exploits of war in that iourny: for the which, he was afterwards had in great eſtimation among the MACEDONIANS. Now many of them began to ſay, that he was the only king of all others, in whom the liuely image of the hardines & valiantneſſe of Alexander the Great was to be ſeene: & that all the reſt (but ſpecially Demetrius) did but counterfeit his grauity & Princely countenance, like players vpon a ſtage, that would counterfeit his coūtenance & geſture. And to ſay truly, there was much fineneſſe & curioſity about Demetrius, to make him a playing ſtocke in common playes. For ſome ſay, that he did not onely weare

a great hat with his diademe vpon his head, and was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but also that he did vse to weare certaine wollen shooes on his feete died in purple colour, not wouen, but fashioned together like a felt, & guilt vpon it. And furthermore, he had long before caused a cloake to be made of a maruellous rich and sumptuous peece of worke. For vpon it was drawne the figure of the world, with starres & circles of heauen, the which was not throughly finished by the change of his fortune. But there was neuer king of MACEDON after him that durst weare it: albeit there were many proud and arrogant kings that succeeded him. Now the MACEDONIANS were not onely sory, and offended to see such things, as they were not wont to be acquainted withall: but they much more misliked his curious maner of life, & specially because he was ill to come to, and worse to be spoken with. For he gaue no audience, or if he did, he was very rough, & would sharply take them vp that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS two yeares, and would giue them no answer: & yet made as though he loued them better, then any other people of GREECE. Another time also he was offended, because the LACEDÆMONIANS had sent but one man only Ambassador vnto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him. And so did the Ambassador of the LACEDÆMONIANS answer him very gallantly, after the LACONIAN maner. For whē Demetrius asked him, how chanceth it that the LACEDÆMONIANS do send but one man vnto me? No more but one, said he, ô king, vnto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly & popular like, then he was wont to do: whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the easilier speake with him, and that he would more curteously heare their complaints. Therupon many came, and put vp their humble supplications and bils of petition vnto him. He receiued them, and put them vp in the lap of his cloake. The poore suters were glad of that, and waited vpon him at his heeles, hoping they should quickly be dispatched: but when he was vpon the bridge of the riuer of Axius, he opened his cloake, and cast them all into the riuer. This went to the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, who then thought they were no more gouerned by a king, but oppressed by a tyrant: and it grieued them so much the more, because they did yet remember (either for that they had seene themselues, or otherwise heard their forefathers say) how courteous king Philip was in all such matters, and how that one day as he passed through the street, a poore old woman pluckt him by the gowne, and eftsoones humbly besought him to heare her, but he aunswered her he was not then at leisure. Whereupon the poore womā plainly cried out to him, Leaue then to be king. This word so netled him, and he tooke such a conceit of it, that he returned presently to his pallace, and setting all other matters apart, did nothing else many daies but gaue himselfe to heare all sutes, & began with this poore old woman. For truly nothing becometh a Prince better, then to minister iustice: for Mars (as Timotheus saith) signifieth force, and is a tyrant: but iustice and law, according to Pindarus, is Queene of all the world. Moreouer, the wise Poet Homer saith not that Princes and Kings haue receiued the custody of engines, and of munition, neither also strong and mighty ships of Iupiter, to keepe them to destroy townes withall: but with them to maintaine law & iustice. And therefore he calleth not the cruell and bloudy king, but the iust & mercifull Prince, Iupiters friend and scholer. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title cōtrary to Iupiter, whom they called Polieus, or Poliouchos, signifying protector and preseruer of cities: and that he was called Poliorcetes, a Fort-gainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, and vice preferred for vertue: because he could not discerne the truth from falshood, which turned his iniustice to glory, & iniquity to honor. But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great and dangerous sickenesse in the city of PELLA, during which time he almost lost all MACEDON, by a sudden inuasion Pyrrhus made, who in maner rode it all ouer, and came as farre as the city of EDESSA. Howbeit so soone as he recouered health againe, he easily draue him out, and afterwards made peace with him, because he would not fighting with him (whom he should haue daily at his doores still skirmishing sometime here, sometime there) lose the oportunity, and weaken himselfe to bring that to passe which he had determined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recouer all the Realmes his father had: and besides, the preparation he made was no lesse sufficient then the purpose of such an imagination required. For he had leauied and assembled an army of foure score and eighteene thousand footmen: and vnto them he had also well neare 12000 horsemen, & had besides gotten aboue 500 ships together, which were built part in the hauen of PIRÆVS, part at CORINTH, part in the city of CHALCIS, and part about PELLA. He himselfe in person went through their worke-houses, and shewed the artificers how they should make them, and did helpe to deuiſe them: ſo that euery man wondred not only at his infinite preparation, but at the greatneſſe and ſumptuouſneſſe of his works. For at that time there was no man liuing that euer ſaw a galley of fiftéene or ſixteene bankes of oares. But this is true, that afterwards Ptolomy, ſurnamed Philopator, built a galley of forty bankes of oares, the which was 280 cubites long, and from the keele in height to the top of the poope, 48 cubites: and to looke to the tackle and guide her, did require 400 mariners, and 4000 water men to row her, and beſides all that, ſhe could yet cary aboue the hatches, wel-neare 3000 fighting men. Howbeit this galley neuer ſerued to other purpoſe but for ſhew, and was like to a houſe that neuer ſtirred: and it was neuer remoued out of the place where it was built but with maruellous ado, and great danger, more to make men wonder at it, then for any ſeruice or commodity it could be imployed vnto. But now the beauty of Demetrius ſhips did nothing hinder their ſwiftneſſe & goodneſſe for fight, neither did the hugeneſſe of their building take away the vſe of them, but their ſwiftneſſe and nimbleneſſe deſerued more commendation, then their ſumptuouſneſſe and ſtatelineſſe. Thus as this great power and preparation was in hand, being ſuch as neuer king before (ſince the time of Alexander the Great) had aſſembled a greater to inuade Asia: theſe three kings, Ptolomy, Seleucus, and Lyſimachus, did all ioyne together againſt him. And afterwards alſo, they ſent Ambaſſadours vnto Pyrrhus in the name of them all, to draw him to their ſide, alluring him to come into Macedon, perſwading him not to repoſe any truſt in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make account of it as a good and ſure peace: for, they ſayd that Demetrius did not giue him pledge that he would neuer make warre with him, but rather firſt tooke oportunity himſelfe to make warre with whom he thought good. Pyrrhus conſidering ſo much, and finding their words true, there roſe a ſharpe and cruell warre on euery ſide againſt Demetrius, who tracted him, and ſtayed yet to begin. For at one ſelfe time, Ptolomie with a great fleete of ſhips came downe into Greece, and made all Greece reuolt from him: and Lyſimachus alſo on Thraciaes ſide, and Pyrrhus vpon the borders of Epirvs, confining with the Realme of Macedon, they entred with a great army, and ſpoiled and ſacked all as they went. Therupon Demetrius leauing his ſonne Antigonus in Greece, he returned with all poſſible ſpeed into Macedon, to go firſt againſt Lyſimachus. But as he was preparing to go againſt him, newes were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the city of Berrhoea. This newes being blowne abroad amongſt the Macedonians, all Demetrius doings were turned topſie turney. For all his campe was ſtraight full of teares and complaints, and his men began openly to ſhew their anger againſt him, ſpeaking all the ill they could of him, ſo that they would tary no longer, but euery one prayed leaue to depart, pretending to looke to their buſineſſe at home, but in truth to go and yeeld themſelues vnto Lyſimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it beſt for him to get him as farre from Lyſimachus as he could, and to bend all his army againſt Pyrrhus: becauſe the other was their countrey man, and familiarly knowne among the moſt of them, for that they had ſerued together vnder Alexander the Great, and that as he thought, the Macedonians would not preferre Pyrrhus a ſtranger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him: for as ſoone as Pyrrhus had pitched his campe hard by him, the Macedonians that had euer loued valiantneſſe, and had of ancient time eſteemed him worthier to be king, that was the beſt ſouldier and valianteſt in the field, and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency and curteſie he had ſhewed to the priſoners he had taken: they hauing had good will of long time ſought but good occaſion to forſake Demetrius, and to yeeld themſelues vnto Pyrrhus, or to any other Prince whatſoeuer he were. Then they ſecretly began to ſteale away one after another, by ſmall companies at the firſt: but afterwards there roſe ſuch a generall tumult againſt him throughout all the campe, that ſome of them were ſo deſperate to go into his tent to bid him flie, and ſaue himſelfe, becauſe the Macedonians were too weary with fighting for his curioſitie. And yet Demetrius found theſe words more gentle, and modeſt, in reſpect of the vile and cruell words which others gaue him. So he went into his tent, & caſt a blacke cloake about his face, in ſtead of his rich and ſtately cloake he was wont to were: not like vnto a king, but like a common player when the play is done, and then ſecretly ſtale away. When this was knowne in the campe, many of his ſouldiers ran to his tent to rifle it, and euery man tooke ſuch hold of it to haue his part, that they tare it in peeces, and drew their ſwords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus comming in the middeſt of the tumult, pacified this ſtirre, and preſently without blow giuen, wanne all Demetrius campe: and afterwards he deuided the Realme of Macedon with Lyſimachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly raigned the ſpace of ſeuen yeares. Now

Ptolomie wilded firſt galley of forty bankes of oares

Three kings, Seleucus, Ptolomy, and Lyſimachus conſpired againſt Demetrius.

Demetrius army forſaketh him, and goeth to Pyrrhus.

Demetrius being thus miserably ouerthrowne, and turned out of his realme, he fled vnto the citie of CASSANDRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruellous heauily, and could not abide to see him againe a priuate man, driuen out of his kingdome, and the most miserable king that euer was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, and detesting the fortune of her husband: she being more constant in calamitie then in prosperitie, killed her selfe with poison she tooke. Demetrius went from thence into GREECE, purposing to gather together the rest of his shipwrackes: and there assembled all his Captaines and friends that he had. So it seemeth to me, the comparison Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the Tragedies of Sophocles, in these verses:

Phila. Demetrius wife poysoneth her self.

My state doth turne continually about on Fortunes wheele, VVhose double dealing diuerse times inforc't I am to feele:
Resembling right the Moone, whose face abideth at no stay
Two nights together, but doth chaunge in shape from day to day:
At first she riseth small with hornes. And as in age she growes, VVith fuller cheekes and brighter light a greater face she showes.
And when she commeth to the full, and shineth faire and bright,
Among the goodly glistering stars the goodliest in the night:
She fades and fals away againe, and runnes a counterpace, Vntill she haue foregone the light and figure of her face.

Demetrius straunge fortune.

This comparison might (I say) much better be applyed vnto Demetrius fortune, to his rising and falling, & to his ouerthrow and reliefe again. For when euery man thought his force and power vtterly ouerthrowne, then began he to rise againe by repaire of souldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and straight reuiued him with good hope. This was the first time that he was euer seene meanely apparelled, like a priuate man vp and downe the country, without some shew or tokens of a king. And there was one that seeing him in this estate at THEBES, pleasantly applyed these verses of Eurypides vnto him:

Of god immortall, now become a mortall wight:
Ismenus bankes and Dirces streames he haunteth in our sight.

Demetrius miserie from Princely happinesse.

Now when he began to haue some hope againe, and was (as it were) entred into the great high way of kings, and had gotten souldiers about him, which made a bodie and shew of royall power: he restored the THEBANS their libertie and gouernment againe. But the ATHENIANS once more reuolted from him, and did reuoke the dignitie and Priesthood of Diphilus, who had bene that yeare created Priest of the sauiours, in stead of the Gouernour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we haue told you before: and made a law, that from thencefoorth the auncient and common Gouernours of their citie should be restored againe to their auncient maner: and they sent also into MACEDON vnto king Pyrrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whom they saw begin to rise againe) then for any hope they had he would come and helpe them: Howbeit Demetrius came against them with great furie, and did straightly besiege the citie of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS sent Crates the Philosopher to him, (a man of great estimation & authoritie,) who so handled him, partly by intreatie, and partly also through his wife perswasions and counsels he gaue him for his profit: that Demetrius presently raised his siege. Wherefore, after he had gathered together so many shippes as were left him, and had imbarked twelue thousand footemen, and a small number of horsemen: he presently tooke sea, and sailed towards ASIA, meaning to take the Prouinces of CARIA and LYDIA from Lysimachus, and to make them to rebell against him. There Euridice, sister to his wife Phila, receiued him by the citie of MILETVM, hauing with her one of Ptolomies daughters and hers, called Ptolemaide, the which had bene afore affianced to him by Seleucus meanes. So he maried Ptolemaide there, with the good will and consent of her mother Euridice. After his mariage he presently went into the field againe, and did set forwards to winne some cities, whereof many willingly receiued him, and others he tooke by force. Amongst them he tooke the citie of SARDIS, whither came diuerse Captaines vnto him of king Lysimachus, who yeelded themselues, and brought him a great number of men and much money besides. But Demetrius receiuing aduertisement that Agathocles, Lysimachus sonne, followed him with a great armie: he went thence into PHRYGIA, making account, and also hoping, that if he could win ARMENIA, he might easily make MEDIA rebell, and then that he would see if he could conquer the high Prouinces of ASIA, where he might haue many places of refuge, if fortune turned againſt him. Agathocles followed him very neare, and yet skirmiſhing diuerſe times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howbeit Agathocles did cut off his victuals from him euery way, and kept him at ſuch a ſtreight, that his men durſt no more ſtray from the campe to forrage: wherefore they ſuſtained great want of victuals, and then began his men to be affraid, and to miſtruſt that he would make them follow him into ARMENIA and MEDIA. The famine daily increaſed more and more in his armie, and it chaunced beſides, that miſſing his way, and failing to gage the foord well as he paſſed ouer the riuer of Lycus, the fury and force of the riuer caried his men downe the ſtreame, and drowned a great number of them: and yet notwithſtanding theſe great troubles, they mocked him beſides. For one wrote at the entrie and comming in to his tent, the firſt verſe of the Tragedie of Oedipus COLONIAN, written by Sophocles, changing onely ſome word:

Demetrius troubles in Aſia.

Thou impe of old and blind Antigonus,
To what a point haſt thou now caried vs?

But in the end, the plague began alſo in the middeſt of this famine (a common thing, and almoſt a matter of neceſſitie it ſhould be ſo) becauſe that men being driuen to need and neceſſitie, do frame themſelues to eate all that comes to hand: whereupon he was driuen to bring backe thoſe few men that remained, hauing loſt of all ſorts (good and bad) not ſo few as eight thouſand fully told. When he came into the Prouince of TARSVS, he commaunded his men in no caſe to meddle with any thing, becauſe the countrey was ſubiect vnto king Seleucus, whom he would in no wiſe diſpleaſe. But when he ſaw it was impoſſible to ſtay his men being now brought to ſuch extremitie and need, and that Agathocles had bard vp the ſtreights and paſſages of mount Taurus againſt him: he wrote a letter vnto Seleucus, firſt declaring his miſerable ſtate and hard fortune: and then preſenting his humble petition and requeſt vnto him, prayed him to take pitie vpon his friend, whom ſpitefull fortune had throwne into ſuch miſerie and calamitie, that could not but moue his greateſt enemies to haue compaſſion of him. Theſe letters ſomewhat ſoftened Seleucus heart, in ſomuch that he wrote to his Gouernours and Lieutenants of thoſe parts, to furniſh Demetrius perſon with all things needful for a Princes houſe, and victuals ſufficient to maintaine his men. But one Patrocles, a graue wiſe man accounted, and Seleucus faithfull friend alſo, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius ſouldiers, was not the greateſt fault he made therein, and moſt to be accounted of: but that he did not wiſely looke into his affaires, to ſuffer Demetrius to remaine in his countrey, conſidering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to entetpriſe any matters of great importance, and now he was brought to ſuch diſpaire and extremitie, that he had framed his men which were but rancke cowards (contrarie to their nature) to be moſt deſperate and hardie in greateſt daungers. Seleucus being moued with theſe perſwaſions, preſently tooke his iourney into CILICIA with a great armie. Demetrius being aſtonied with this ſodaine chaunge, and dreading ſo great an armie, got him to the ſtrongeſt places of mount Taurus. Then he ſent vnto Seleucus, firſt of all to pray him to ſuffer him to conquer certaine barbarous people thereabouts, who liued according to their owne lawes, and neuer had king: to the end that he might yet there with ſafetie end the reſt of his life and exile, ſtaying at length in ſome place where he might be ſafe. Secondly, if that liked him not, then that it would yet pleaſe him to victuall his men for the winter time onely, in the ſame place where they were, and not to be ſo hard hearted vnto him as to driue him thence, lacking all needfull things, and ſo to put him into the mouth of his moſt cruel and mortall enemies. But Seleucus miſtruſting his demaunds, ſent vnto him that he ſhould winter if he thought good, two moneths, but no more, in the countrey of CATAONIA, ſo he gaue him the chiefeſt of his friends for hoſtages: howbeit in the meane time he ſtopped vp all the wayes and paſſages going from thence into SYRIA. Demetrius now ſeeing himſelfe kept in of all ſides, like a beaſt to be taken in the toyle: he was driuen to truſt to his owne ſtrength. Thereupon he ouerran the countrey thereabouts, and as often as it was his chaunce to haue any skirmiſh or conflict with Seleucus, he had euer the better of him: and ſometime alſo when they draue the armed cartes with ſithes againſt him, he ouercame them, and put the reſt to flight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the paſſages to keepe him that he ſhould not go into SYRIA, and ſo kept them himſelfe. In fine, finding his mens hearts lift vp againe, and pretily encouraged: his heart alſo grew ſo bigge, that he determined to fight a battell with Seleucus, and to ſet all at ſixe and ſeuen. So that Seleucus was at a ſtraight with himſelfe, and wiſt not what to do. For he had returned backe the ayde which Lysimachus sent vnto him, because he was afraid of him, and mistrusted him. On the other side also he durst not fight with Demetrius alone, being afraid to venture himselfe with a desperate man: and also mistrusting much his vnconstant fortune, the which hauing brought him to great extremitie, raised him vp againe to great prosperitie. But in the meane space Demetrius fell into a great sickenesse, the which brought his bodie very weake and low, and had almost vtterly ouerthrowne his affaires. For his souldiers, some of them yeelded themselues to his enemies, and others stale away without leaue, and went where they listed. Afterwards when he had hardly recouered his health, and within fortie daies space was pretily growne to strength againe: with those few souldiers that remained with him, he seemed to his enemies, that he would go and inuade CILICIA: but then suddenly in the night without sounding any trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went another way, and hauing passed ouer mount Amanus, he spoiled all the countrey vnder it, as farre as the region of CYRRESTICA. But Seleucus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereupon Demetrius sodainly armed his men, and went out by night to assault Seleucus, and to take him sleeping when he mistrusted nothing. So that Seleucus knew nothing of his stealing on him but late enough, vntil that certaine traitors of Demetrius campe that fled before, went quickly to aduertise him finding him asleepe, and brought him newes of the danger he was in. Then Seleucus in a maze and feare withall, got vp, and sounded the alarme: and as he was putting on his hose and making him readie, he cryed out, (speaking to his friends and familiars about him) We haue now a cruel and dangerous beast to deale with. Demetrius on the other side perceiuing by the great stir and noise he heard in the enemies campe, that his enterprise was discouered: he retired againe with speed, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleucus went and offered him battell. Demetrius prepared himselfe to ioyne with him, and hauing giuen one of his faithfull friends the leading of one of the wings of his armie, himselfe led the other, and ouerthrew some of his enemies on his side. But Seleucus in the midst of the battell lighted from his horse, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, and went to the first rankes of his armie, to make himselfe knowne vnto Demetrius men: perswading them to yeeld themselues vnto him, and to acknowledge in the end, that he had so long time deferred to giue them battell, rather to saue them, then to spare Demetrius. Demetrius souldiers hearing him say so, they did him humble reuerence, and acknowledging him for their king, they all yeelded vnto him. Demetrius hauing sundry times before proued so many changes and ouerthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to escape this last also, and to passe it ouer, he fled vnto the gates Amanides, which are certain straights of the mount Amanus. There he found certaine litle thicke groues, where he determined to stay all night with certaine gentlemen of his house, and a few other of his houshold seruants and officers which had followed him: meaning, if he could possible, to take his way towards the city of CAVNVS, to go to that sea coast, hoping to heare of his ships there. But when it was told him he had no victuals nor prouision left onely to serue him that day: he began then to deuise some other way. At length one of his familiar friends Sosigenes came vnto him, that had foure hundred peeces of gold about him in his girdle. So hoping that with the same money he might flie to the sea, they tooke their way by night directly to the toppe of the mountaine. But when they perceiued that the enemies kept watch there, and that there were great store of fires hard by them: they then despaired to passe any farther, lest they should be seene. So they returned to the selfe same place from whence they came, not all of them, for some of them fled: neither had they that remained also any life in them, as before. So one amongst the rest tooke vpon him to say, that there was no other way to scape, but to put Demetrius into Seleucus hands. Demetrius therwithall drew out his sword and would haue slaine himselfe: but his friends about him would not suffer him, but perswaded him to yeeld himselfe vnto Seleucus. Thereupon he sent vnto Seleucus, to tell him that he yeelded himselfe vnto him. Seleucus was so ioyfull of the newes, that he said it was not Demetrius good fortune that saued him, but his owne: who besides many other happie good turnes she had done him, gaue him yet so honorable occasion and good hap, as to make the world to know his clemencie and courtesie. Thereupon immediatly he called for his Officers of houshold, and commaunded them to set vp his richest pauilion, & to prepare all things meet to receiue him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Seleucus court, who sometime had bene very familiar with Demetrius: him Seleucus sent immediatly vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good cheare, and not to be affraid to come vnto the king his maister, for he should find him his very good friend.

So soone as the kings pleasure was knowne, a few of his Courtiers went at the first to meet him: but afterwards, euery man striued who should go meete him first, because they were all in hope that he should presently be much made of, and grow in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitie into enuie, and gaue occasion also to Demetrius enemies and spitefull men, to turne the kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and daungers, saying, that certainely so soone as the souldiers saw him, there would grow great stirre and chaunge in their campe. And therefore, shortly after that Appollonides was come vnto Demetrius, being glad to bring him these good newes, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good newes from Seleucus, and that Demetrius himself after so great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to haue yeelded his bodie into his enemies hands) chaunged his mind at that time, and began then to grow bold, and to haue good hope to recouer his state againe: behold, there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Pausanias, accompanied with a thousand footmen and horsemen in all, who compassed in Demetrius with them, and made the rest depart that were come vnto him before, hauing charge giuen him not to bring him to the Court, but to conuey him into CHERRONESVS of SYRIA, whither he was brought, and euer after had a strong garrison about him to keepe him. But otherwise, Seleucus sent him officers, money, and all things else meet for a Princes house: and his ordinarie fare was so delicate, that he could wish for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of libertie and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his horse in, and also pleasant walkes, and goodly arbours to walke or sit in, and fine parkes full of beasts where he might hunt: moreouer, the king suffered his owne household seruants that followed him when he fled, to remaine with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came some one or other vnto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that so soone as Antiochus and Stratonice were come, they would make some good agreement and peace betweene them. Demetrius remaining in this estate, wrote vnto his sonne Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieutenants which he had at CORINTH and ATHENS, that they should giue no credite to any letters written in his name, though his seale were to them: but that they should keepe the townes they had in charge for his sonne Antigonus, and all the rest of his forces, as if he himselfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captiuitie of his father, he maruellous grieuously tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for sorrow, and wrote vnto all the other kings, but vnto Seleucus specially, beseeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, and that he was readie to yeeld vp all that he kept, to haue his fathers libertie. The like request did many cities make vnto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lysimachus: who promised Seleucus a great summe of money to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus, who of long time had no great fancie to Lysimachus, but rather vtterly despised him: did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked request he made vnto him. Wherefore he still delayed time, because he would haue Demetrius deliuered by his sonne Antiochus and Stratonices meanes, for that Demetrius should be bound to them for his deliuerie, and for euer should acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently tooke his hard fortune, so did he daily more and more forget the miserie he was in. For first of all, he gaue himselfe to riding and hunting, as farre as the place gaue him libertie. Then by litle and litle he grew to be very grosse, and to giue ouer such pastimes, and therwithall he fell vnto drunkennesse and dicing: so that in that sort he passed away the most part of his time (as it should seeme) either to auoide the grieuous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was sober: or else vnder colour of drunkennes and eating, to shadow the thoughts he had: or else finding in himselfe that it was that manner of life he had long desired, and that through his vaine ambition and folly till that time he could neuer attaine vnto, greatly turmoyling and troubling himselfe and others, supposing to find in warres, by sea and land, the felicitie and delight which he had found in ease and idlenesse, when he neither thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better end can euill and vnaduised kings and princes looke for, of all their troubles, daungers, and warres? who indeed deceiue themselues greatly, not onely for that they follow their pleasure and delights as their chiefest felicitie, in stead of vertue and honest life: but also, because that in truth they cannot be merry and take their pleasure as they would. So Demetrius after he had bene shut vp in CHERRONESVS three yeares together, by ease, grossenesse, and drunkennes, fell sicke of a disease wherof he died, when he was foure and fiftie yeares old. Therfore was Seleucus greatly blamed, and he himselfe also did much repent him that he so suspected him.

him as he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes courteſie, a barbarous man borne in THRACIA, who had ſo royally and courteouſly intreated Lyſimachus, whom he had taken priſoner in the warres. But yet there was ſome tragicall pompe in the order of his funerall. For his ſon Antigonus vnderſtanding that they brought him the aſhes of his bodie, he took ſea with all his ſhips, and went to meete them, to reciue them in the Iſles: and when he had receiued them, he ſet vp the funerall pot of gold (in the which were his embers) vpon the poope of his Admirall galley. So all the cities and townes whereby they paſſed or harboured, ſome of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others alſo ſent a number of men thither in mourning apparell, to accompany and honour the conuoy, to the very ſolemnitie of his funerals. In this ſort ſailed all the whole fleet towards the citie of CORINTH, the pot being plainely ſeene farre off, ſtanding on the top of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged with purple, and ouer it, the Diademe or royall band, and about it, alſo were goodly young men armed, which were as Penſioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famouſeſt Muſitian in that time, being ſet hard by it, played a ſweet and lamentable ſong on the flute, wherewithall the oares keeping ſtroke and meaſure, the ſound did meete with a gallant grace, as in a conuoy where the mourners do knocke their breaſts at the foot of euery verſe. But that which moſt made the people of CORINTH to weepe and lament, which ran to the peere, and all alongſt the ſhore ſide to ſee it: was Antigonus, whom they ſaw all beblubbered with teares, apparelled as a mourner in blackes. Now after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and noſegayes, and caſt them vpon the funerall pot, and had ſolemnized all the honours poſſible for the funerals at CORINTH: Antigonus caried away the pot to burie it in the citie of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the name of Demetrius that was dead, and was a new citie, that had bene repleniſhed with people, and built of litle townes which are about IOLCOS. Demetrius left two children by his firſt wife Phila, to wit, Antigonus and Stratonice: and two other ſonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one ſurnamed the leane, of a woman of ILLYRIA, and the other, king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemæide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who liued in ÆGYPT. And it is reported alſo, that he had another ſonne called Corrhæbus, by his wife Euridice, and that his poſteritie raigned by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, vntill the time of Perſeus: who was the laſt king of MACEDON, whom the ROMAINES ouercame by Paulus Æmylius, and wan all the realme of MACEDON vnto the Empire of ROME. THE LIFE OF
Marcus Antonius

ANTONIVS grandfather was that famous Orator whom Marius ſlue becauſe he tooke Syllaes part. His father was another Antonius ſurnamed * CRETAN, who was not ſo famous, nor bare any great ſway in the commonwealth: howbeit otherwiſe he was an honeſt man, and of a very good nature, and ſpecially very liberall in giuing, as appeareth by an act he did. He was not very wealthie, and therefore his wife would not let him vſe his liberalitie and franke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to pray him to helpe him to ſome money, hauing great need: Antonius by chaunce had no money to giue him, but he commaunded one of his men to bring him ſome water in a ſiluer baſin, and after he had brought it him, he waſhed his beard as though he meant to haue ſhauen it, and then found an arrant for his man to ſend him out, and gaue his friend the ſiluer baſin, and bad him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great ſtirre in the houſe among the ſeruants, ſeeking out of this ſiluer baſin. Inſomuch as Antonius ſeeing his wife maruellouſly offended for it, and that ſhe would examine all her ſeruants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it: at length he confeſſed he had giuen it away, and prayed her to be contented. His wife was Iulia, of the noble houſe and family of Iulius Cæſar: who for her vertue and chaſtitie, was to be compared with the nobleſt Ladie of her time. Marcus Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being maried after her firſt husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus and others, for that he was of Catilines conſpiracie againſt the Commonwealth. And this ſeemeth to be the originall cauſe and beginning of the cruell and mortall hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius ſelfe ſaith, that he would neuer giue him the bodie of his father in law to burie him, before his mother went firſt to intreate Ciceroes wife: the which vndoubtedly was a flat lie. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them, whom he executed by lawe. Now Antonius being a faire young man, and in the prime of his youth: he fell acquainted with Curio, whoſe friendſhip and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a diſſolute man, giuen ouer to all luſt and inſolencie, who to haue Antonius the better at his commandement, trained him on into great follies, and vaine expences vpon women, in rioting and banquetting. So that in ſhort time, he brought Antonius into a maruellous great debt, and too great for one of his yeares, to wit, of two hundred and fiftie talents, for all which ſumme Curio was his ſuretie. His father hearing of it, did put his ſonne from him, and forbad him his houſe.

Then

Then he fell in with Clodius, one of the desperatest and most wicked Tribunes at that time in Rome. Him he followed for a time in his desperate attempts, who bred great stirre and mischiefe in Rome: but at length he forsooke him, being weary of his rashnesse and folly, or else for that he was afraid of them that were bent against Clodius. Thereupon he left Italie, and went into Greece, and there bestowed the most part of his time, sometime in wars, and otherwhile in the study of eloquence. He vsed a maner of phrase in his speech, called Asiatike, which caried the best grace and estimation at that time, and was much like to his manners & life: for it was full of ostentation, fooliſh brauery, and vaine ambition. After he had remained there some time, Gabinius Proconsull going into Syria, perswaded him to go with him, Antonius told him he would not go as a priuate man: wherefore Gabinius gaue him charge of his horsemen, and so tooke him with him. So, first of all he sent him against Aristobulus, who had made the Ievves to rebell, and was the first man himselfe that got vp to the wall of a castell of his, and so draue Aristobulus out of all his holds: and with those few men he had with him, he ouercame all the Ievves in set battell, which were many against one, and put all of them almost to the sword, and furthermore, tooke Aristobulus himselfe prisoner with his sonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of Ægypt, that had bene driuen out of his country, went vnto Gabinius to intreat him to go with his army with him into Ægypt, to put him againe into his kingdome: and promised him if he would go with him, ten thousand talents. The most part of the Captaines thought it not best to go thither, and Gabinius himselfe made it dainty to enter into this warre: although the couetousnesse of these 10000 talents stucke sorely with him. But Antonius that sought but for oportunity and good occasion to attempt great enterprises, and that desired also to gratifie Ptolomies request: he went about to perswade Gabinius to go this voyage. Now they were more afraid of the way they should go, to come to the city of Pelvsivm, then they feared any danger of the warre besides: because they were to passe through deepe sands and desert places, where was no fresh water to be had all the marishes through, which are called the marishes Serbonides, which the Ægyptians call the exhalations or fume, by the which the gyant Typhon breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the ouerflowing of the red sea, which breaketh out vnder the ground in that place, where it is deuided in the narrowest place from the sea on this side. So Antonius was sent before into Ægypt with his horsemen, who did not onely winne that passage, but also tooke the city of Pelvsivm (which is a great city) with all the souldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it safe for all the rest of the armie, and the hope of the victory also certaine for his Captaine. Now did the enemies themselues feele the fruits of Antonius courtesie, and the desire he had to winne honour: for when Ptolomy (after he had entred into the city of Pelvsivm) for the malice he bare vnto the citie, would haue put all the Ægyptians in it to the sword, Antonius withstood him, and by no meanes would suffer him to do it. And in all other great battels and skirmishes which they fought, being many in number, Antonius did many noble acts of a valiant and wise Captaine: but specially in one battell, where he compassed in the enemies behind, giuing them the victory that fought in front, whereby he afterwards had such honorable reward, as his valiantnesse deserued. So was his great curtesie also much commended of all, the which he shewed vnto Archelaus: for hauing bene his very friend, he made warre with him against his will while he liued: but after his death he sought for his body, and gaue it honorable buriall. For these respects he wan himselfe great fame of them of Alexandria, and he was also thought a worthy man of all the souldiers in the Romains campe. But besides all this, he had a noble presence, and shewed a countenance of one of a noble house: he had a goodly thicke beard, a broad forehead, crooked nosed, and there appeared such a manly looke in his countenance, as is commonly seene in Hercules pictures, stamped or grauen in mettall. Now it had bene a speech of old time, that the family of the Antonij were descended from one Anton, the sonne of Hercules, whereof the family tooke name. This opinion did Antonius seeke to confirme in all his doings: not only resembling him in the likenesse of his body, as we haue sayd before, but also in the wearing of his garments. For when he would openly shew himselfe abroad before many people, he would alwayes weare his cassocke girt downe low vpon his hippes, with a great sword hanging by his side, and vpon that, some ill fauoured cloake. Furthermore, things that seeme intollerable in other men, as to boast commonly, to iest with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with euery body, to sit with the souldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them souldierlike, it is incredible what wonderfull loue it wanne him amongst them. And furthermore, being giuen to loue: that made him the more desired, and by that meanes be brought many to loue him. For he would further euery mans loue, and also would not be angry that men should merily tell him of those he loued. But besides all this, that which most procured his rising and aduancement, was his liberality, who gaue all to the souldiers, and kept nothing for himselfe: and when he was growne to great credite, then was his authority and power also very great, the which notwithstanding himselfe did ouerthrow, by a thousand other faults he had. In this place I will shew you one example onely of his wonderfull liberality. He commanded one day his cofferer that kept his money, to giue a friend of his fiue and twenty Myriades: which the Romains call in their tongue, Decies. His cofferer maruelling at it, and being angry withall in his mind, brought him all this money in a heape together, to shew him what a marueilous masse of money it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: the cofferer aunswered him, it was the money he willed him to giue vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiuing the spite of his man, I thought, sayd he, that Decies had bene a greater summe of money then it is, for this is but a trifle: and therefore he gaue his friend as much more another time, but that was afterwards. Now the Romains maintaining two factions at Rome at that time, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate, did ioyne with Pompey being then in Rome: and the contrary side taking part with the people, sent for Cæsar to aide them, who made wars in Gavle. Then Curio Antonius friend, that had chaunged his garments, and at that time tooke part with Cæsar, whose enemy he had bene before: he wanne Antonius, and so handled the matter, partly through the great credite and sway he bare amongst the people, by reason of his eloquent toung: and partly also by his exceeding expence of money he made which Cæsar gaue him: that Antonius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtherance to Cæsars practises. For so soone as Antonius became Tribune, he did oppose himselfe against those things which the Consull Marcellus preferred (who ordained that certaine legions which had bin already leauied and billed, should be giuen vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commission and authority to leauie others vnto them) and set downe an order, that the souldiers which were already leauied and assembled, should be sent into Syria, for a new supply vnto Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that time against the Parthians. And further, gaue a prohibition that Pompey should leauy no more men, and also that the souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not suffer Cæsars letters to be receiued, and openly read in the Senate: Antonius hauing power and warrant by his person, through the holinesse of his Tribuneship, did reade them openly, and made diuerse men chaunge their minds: for it appeared to them that Cæsar by his letters required no vnreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of consideration vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey or Cæsar, should leaue their armie: there were few of the Senators that thought it meete Pompey should leaue his army, but they all in manner commaunded Cæsar to do it. Then Antonius rising vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cæsar both, should leaue their armies. Thereupon all the Senators iointly together gaue their whole consent, and with a great cry commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. But the Consuls would not allow of that. Therefore Cæsars friends preferred other reasonable demaunds and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Consuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made grieuous curses against him. After that, he tooke a slaues gowne, and speedily fled to Cæsar, with Quintus Cassius, in a hired coach. When they came to Cæsar, they cried out with open mouth, that all went hand ouer head at Rome: for the Tribunes of the people might not speake their minds, and were driuen away in great daunger of their liues, as many as stood with law and iustice. Hereupon Cæsar incontinently went into Italie with his army, which made Cicero say in his Philippides: That as Hellen was cause of the warre of Troy, so was Antonius the author of the ciuill warres, which indeed was a starke lye. For Cæsar was not so fickle headed, nor so easily caried away with anger, that he would so suddenly haue gone and made war with the country, vpon the sight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled to him in miserable apparell, and in a hired coach: had he not long before determined it with himselfe. But sith indeed Cæsar looked of long time but for some colour, this came as he wished, and gaue him iust occasion of warre. But to say truly, nothing else moued him to make warre with all the world as he did, but one selfe cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him: to wit, an insatiable desire to raigne, with a senseleſſe couetouſneſſe to be the beſt man in the world, the which he could not come vnto, before he had firſt put downe Pompey, and vtterly ouerthrowne him. Now after that Cæſar had gotten ROME at his commandement, & had driuen Pompey out of ITALY, he purpoſed firſt to go into SPAINE, againſt the legions Pompey had there: and in the meane time to make prouiſion for ſhips and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his abſence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor, gouernor of ROME: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gaue him charge of all the ſouldiers, & of ITALY. Then was Antonius ſtraight maruelliouſly cõmended and beloued of the ſouldiers, becauſe he commonly exerciſed himſelfe among them, and would oftentimes eate and drinke with them, & alſo be liberall vnto them, according to his ability. But then in contrary maner, he purchaſed diuerſe other mens euill wils, becauſe that through negligence he would not do them iuſtice that were iniured, & dealt very churliſhly with them that had any ſute vnto him: and beſides all this, he had an ill name to intiſe mens wiues. To conclude, Cæſars friends that gouerned vnder him, were cauſe why they hated Cæſars gouernement (which indeed in reſpect of himſelfe was no leſſe then a tyranny) by reaſon of the great inſolencies and outragious parts that were committed: amongſt whom Antonius, that was of greateſt power, and that alſo committed greateſt faults, deſerued moſt blame. But Cæſar notwithſtanding, when he returned from the wars of SPAINE, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp againſt him: but contrarily, becauſe he found him a hardy man, and a valiant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefeſt affaires, and was no whit deceiued in his opinion of him. So he paſſed ouer the IONIAN ſea vnto BRVNDVSIVM, being but ſlenderly accompanied, & ſent vnto Antonius and Gabinius, that they ſhould imbarke their men as ſoone as they could, and paſſe them ouer into MACEDON. Gabinius was afraid to take the ſea, becauſe it was very rough, and in the winter time: and therfore fetched a great compaſſe about by land. But Antonius fearing ſome danger might come vnto Cæſar, becauſe he was compaſſed in with a great number of enemies: firſt of all he draue away Libo, who rode at anker with a great army, before the hauen of BRVNDVSIVM. For he manned out ſuch a number of pinnaces, barkes, and other ſmall boats about euery one of his galleys, that he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into ſhips 20000 footmen, and 800 horſemen, and with this army he hoiſed ſaile. When the enemies ſaw him, they made out to follow him: but the ſea roſe ſo high, that the billowes put backe their galleys that they could not come neare him, and ſo he ſcaped that danger. But withall he fell vpon the rockes with his whole fleete, where the ſea wrought very high: ſo that he was out of all hope to ſaue himſelfe. Yet by good fortune, ſuddenly the wind turned South-weſt, and blew from the gulfe, driuing the waues of the riuer into the maine ſea. Thus Antonius looſing from the land, and ſailing with ſafety at his pleaſure, ſoone after he ſaw all the coaſts full of ſhipwrackes. For the force and boyſterouſneſſe of the wind, did caſt away the galleys that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and ſplitted, and diuerſe alſo caſt away, and Antonius tooke a great number of them priſoners, with a great ſumme of money alſo. Beſides all theſe, he tooke the city of LYSSVS, and brought Cæſar a great ſupply of men, and made him couragious, comming at a pinch with ſo great a power to him. Now there were diuerſe hot skirmiſhes and encounters, in the which Antonius fought ſo valiantly, that he caried the praiſe from them all: but ſpecially at two ſeuerall times, when Cæſars men turned their backes, and fled for life. For he ſtepped before them, and compelled them to returne againe to fight: ſo that the victory fell on Cæſars ſide. For this cauſe he had the ſecond place in the campe among the ſouldiers, and they ſpake of no other man vnto Cæſar, but of him: who ſhewed plainely what opinion he had of him, when at the laſt battell of PHARSALIA (which indeed was the laſt triall of all, to giue the conquerour the whole Empire of the world) he himſelfe did leade the right wing of his army, and gaue Antonius the leading of the left wing, as the valianteſt man and skilfulleſt ſouldier of all thoſe he had about him. After Cæſar had won the victory, and that he was created Dictator, he followed Pompey ſteppe by ſteppe: howbeit before he named Antonius Generall of the horſemen, and ſent him to ROME. The Generall of the horſemen is the ſecond office of dignitie, when the Dictator is in the city: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefeſt man, and almoſt the onely man that remaineth, and all the other officers and magiſtrates are put downe, after there is a Dictator choſen. Notwithſtanding, Dolabella being at that time Tribune, and a young man deſirous of change and innouation: he preferred a law which the ROMAINES call Nouas tabulas (as much to ſay, as a cutting off and cancelling of all obligations and ſpecialties, and were called New tables, becauſe they were driuen then to make bookes of daily receipt and expence) and perſwaded Antonius his friend (who alſo gaped for a good occaſion to pleaſe and gratifie the common people) to aide him to paſſe this law. But Trebellius and Aſinius diſſwaded from it all they could poſſible. So by good hap it chanced that Antonius miſtruſted Dolabella for keeping of his wife, and tooke ſuch a conceipt of it, that he thruſt his wife out of his houſe being his coſin germane, and the daughter of C. Antonius, who was Conſull with Cicero: and ioyning with Aſinius, he reſiſted Dolabella, and fought with him. Dolabella had gotten the market place where the people do aſſemble in councell, and had filled it full of armed men, intending to haue this law of the new tables to paſſe by force. Antonius by cõmandement of the Senate, who had giuen him authority to leauy men & to vſe force againſt Dolabella: he went againſt him, and fought ſo valiantly, that men were ſlaine on both ſides. But by this meanes, he got the ill will of the common people, and on the other ſide, the noble men (as Cicero ſaith) did not onely miſlike him, but alſo hate him for his naughty life: for they did abhor his banq uets and drunken feaſts he made at vnſeaſonable times, and his extreme waſtfull expences vpon vaine light huſwiues, and then in the day time he would ſleepe or walke out his drunkenneſſe, thinking to weare away the fume of the abundance of wine which he had taken ouer night. In his houſe they did nothing but feaſt, daunce, and maske: and himſelfe paſſed away the time in hearing of fooliſh playes, and in marying theſe players, tumblers, geſters, and ſuch ſort of people. As for proofe hereof it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his geſters, he dranke wine ſo luſtily all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people aſſembled in councell, who had ſent for him: he being queſie ſtomached with his ſurfeit he had taken, was compelled to ley vp all before them, and one of his friends held him his gowne in ſtead of a baſin. He had another pleaſant player called Sergius, that was one of the chiefeſt men about him, and a woman alſo called Cytheride, of the ſame profeſſion, whom he loued dearly: he caried her vp and downe in a litter vnto all the townes he went, and had as many men waiting vpon her litter (ſhe being but a player) as were attending vpon his owne mother. It grieued honeſt men alſo very much, to ſee that when he went into the country, he caried with him a great number of cupbords full of ſiluer and gold plate, openly in the face of the world, as it had bene the pompe or ſhew of ſome triumph: and that eſtſoones in the middeſt of his iourny, he would ſet vp his hals and tents hard by ſome greene groue or pleaſant riuer, & there his cookes ſhould prepare him a ſumptuous dinner. And furthermore, Lyons were harneſſed in traſes to draw his carts: and beſides alſo, in honeſt mens houſes in the cities where he came, he would haue common harlots, curtiſans, and theſe tumbling gillots lodged. Now it grieued men much, to ſee that Cæſar ſhould be out of ITALY following of his enemies, to end this great war, with ſuch great perill & danger, and that others in the meane time abuſing his name and authority, ſhould commit ſuch inſolent and outragious parts vnto their citizens. This me thinkes was the cauſe that made the conſpiracy againſt Cæſar increaſe more and more, and layed the reynes of the bridle vpon the ſouldiers neckes, whereby they durſt more boldly commit many extortions, cruelties and robberies. And therefore Cæſar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, and being created Conſull the third time, he tooke not Antonius, but choſe Lepidus, his colleague and fellow Conſull. Afterwards when Pompeys houſe was put to open ſale, Antonius bought it: but when they asked him money for it, he made it very ſtrange, and was offended with them, and writeth himſelfe that he would not go with Cæſar into the warres of AFRICKE, becauſe he was not well recompenced for the ſeruice he had done him before. Yet Cæſar did ſomewhat bridle his madneſſe and inſolency, not ſuffering him to paſſe his faults ſo lightly away, making as though he ſaw them not. And therefore he left his diſſolute maner of life, and maried Fuluia that was Clodius widow, a woman not ſo baſely minded to ſpend her time in ſpinning and houſewiuery, and was not contented to maiſter her husband at home, but would alſo rule him in his office abroad, and commaunded him, that commaunded legions and great armies: ſo that Cleopatra was to giue Fuluia thankes for that ſhe had taught Antonius this obedience to women, that learned ſo well to be at their commaundement. Now, becauſe Fuluia was ſomewhat ſower and crooked of condition, Antonius deuiſed to make her pleaſanter, and ſomewhat better diſpoſed: and therefore he would play her many prety youthfull parts, to make her merry. As he did once, when Cæſar returned the laſt time of all conquerour out of SPAINE, euery man went out to meete him: and ſo did Antonius with the reſt. But on the ſudden there ranne a rumour through ITALY, that Cæſar was dead, and that his enemies came againe with a great armie. Thereupon he returned with ſpeed to

Rome, and tooke one of his mens gownes, and ſo apparelled came home to his houſe in a darke night, ſaying that he had brought Fuluia letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her muffled as he was, for being knowne: but ſhe taking the matter heauily, asked him if Antonius were well. Antonius gaue her the letters, and ſayd neuer a word. So when ſhe had opened the letters, and began to reade them: Antonius ramped of her necke, and kiſſed her. We haue told you this tale for examples ſake onely, and ſo could we alſo tell you of many ſuch like as theſe. Now when Cæſar was returned from his laſt warre in Spaine, all the chiefeſt nobility of the city, rode many dayes iourny from Rome to meet him, where Cæſar made maruellous much of Antonius, aboue al the mẽ that came vnto him. For he alwaies tooke him into his coach with him, throughout all Italy: and behind him, Brutus Albinus & Octauius, the ſon of his Neece, who afterwards was called Cæſar, and became Emperor of Rome long time after. So Cæſar being afterwards choſen Conſull the fift time, he immediatly choſe Antonius his colleague and companion: and deſired by depoſing himſelfe of his Conſulſhip, to make Dolabella Conſull in his roome, and had already moued it to the Senate. But Antonius did ſtoutly withſtand it, and openly reuiled Dolabella in the Senate: and Dolabella alſo ſpared him as litle. Thereupon Cæſar being aſhamed of the matter, he let it alone. Another time alſo when Cæſar attempted againe to ſubſtitute Dolabella Conſull in his place, Antonius cried out, that the ſignes of the birds were againſt it: ſo that at lẽgth Cæſar was compelled to giue him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was maruellouſly offended with him. Now in truth, Cæſar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cæſar anſwered one that did accuſe Antonius and Dolabella vnto him for ſome matter of conſpiracy: Tuſh ſayd he, they be not thoſe fat fellowes and fine combed men that I feare, but I miſtruſt rather theſe pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Caſsius, who afterwards conſpired his death, and ſlue him. Antonius vnwares afterwards, gaue Cæſars enemies iuſt occaſion & colour to do as they did: as you ſhall heare. The Romaines, by chance celebrated the feaſt called Lupercalia, & Cæſar being apparelled in his triumphing robe, was ſet in the Tribune where they vſe to make their Orations to the people, and from thence did behold the ſport of the runners. The maner of this running was this. On that day there are many yong men of noble houſe, and thoſe ſpecially that be chiefe officers for that yeare: who running naked vp & downe the city annointed with the oile of oliue, for pleaſure do ſtrike them they meet in their way, with white leather thongs they haue in their hands. Antonius being one among the reſt that was to run, leauing the ancient ceremonies and old cuſtomes of that ſolemnity: he ran to the Tribune where Cæſar was ſet, and caried a laurell crowne in his hand, hauing a royall band or diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the ancient marke and token of a king. When he was come to Cæſar, he made his fellow runners with him lift him vp, and ſo he did put this laurel crowne vpon his head, ſignifying therby that he had deſerued to be king. But Cæſar making as though he refuſed it, turned away his head. The people were ſo reioyced at it, that they al clapped their hands for ioy. Antonius againe did put it on his head: Cæſar againe refuſed it, and thus they were ſtriuing off & on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this laurel crown vnto him, a few of his followers reioyced at it: and as oft alſo as Cæſar refuſed it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they ſuffered all things ſubiects ſhould do by commandement of their kings: and yet they could not abide the name of a king, deteſting it as the vtter deſtructiõ of their liberty. Cæſar in a rage roſe out of his ſeate, and plucking downe the coller of his gowne from his necke, he ſhewed it naked, bidding any man ſtrike off his head that would. This laurell crowne was afterwards put vpon the head of one of Cæſars ſtatues or images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt off. The people liked his doing therein ſo well, that they waited on him home to his houſe, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cæſar did turne them out of their offices for it. This was a good incoragement for Brutus and Caſsius to conſpire his death, who fell into a cõſort with their truſtieſt friends, to execute their enterpriſe: but yet ſtood doubtfull whether they ſhould make Antonius priuy to it, or not. All the reſt liked of it, ſauing Trebonius only. He told thẽ, that when they rode to meet Cæſar at his returne out of Spaine, Antonius & he alwayes keeping company, and lying together by the way, he felt his mind a far off: but Antonius finding his meaning, would hearken no more vnto it, and yet notwithſtanding neuer made Cæſar acquainted with this talke, but had faithfully kept it to himſelf. After that they cõſulted whether they ſhould kill Antonius with Cæſar. But Brutus would in no wiſe conſent to it, ſaying: that ventring on ſuch an enterpriſe as that, for the maintenance of law & iuſtice, it ought to be cleare from all villany.

Conſultation about the murther of Antonius with Cæſar.

Yet they fearing Antonius power, & the authority of his office, appointed certaine of the conspiracy, that when Cæsar were gone into the Senate, & while others should execute their enterprise, they should keepe Antonius in a talk out of the Senate-house. Euen as they had deuised these matters, so were they executed: and Cæsar was slaine in the middest of the Senate. Antonius being put in a feare withall, cast a slaues gowne vpon him, & hid himselfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the murtherers slue no man else, & that they went only into the Capitoll: he sent his son vnto them for a pledge, and bad them boldly come downe vpon his word. The selfe same day he did bid Cassius to supper, and Lepidus also bad Brutus. The next morning the Senate was assembled, and Antonius himselfe preferred a law, that all things past should be forgotten, and that they should appoint prouinces, vnto Cassius & Brutus: the which the Senate confirmed, & further ordained, that they should cancell none of Cæsars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more praised, & better esteemed, then euer man was: because it seemed to euery man that he had cut off all occasion of ciuill wars, & that he had shewed himselfe a maruellous wise gouernour of the commonwealth, for the appeasing of these matters of so great waight and importance. But now, the opinion he conceiued of himselfe after he had a litle felt the good will of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make himselfe the chiefest man if he might ouercome Brutus: did easily make him alter his first mind. And therefore when Cæsars body was brought to the place where it should be buried, he made a funerall Oration in cõmendation of Cæsar, according to the ancient custome of praising noble men at their funerals. When he saw that the people were very glad and desirous also to heare Cæsar spoken of, & his praises vttered: he mingled his Oration with lamentable words, & by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their harts & affections vnto pity and compassion. In fine to conclude his Oration, he vnfolded before the whole assembly the bloudy garments of the dead, thrust through in many places with their swords, & called the malefactors, cruell and cursed murtherers. With these words he put the people into such a fury, that they presently tooke Cæsars body, and burnt it in the market place, with such tables & fourmes as they could get together. Then when the fire was kindled, they tooke firebrands, and ranne to the murtherers houses to set them on fire, & to make them come out to fight. Brutus therfore and his accomplices, for safety of their persons were driuen to flie the city. Then came all Cæsars friends vnto Antonius, & specially his wife Calpurnia putting her trust in him, she brought the most part of her mony into his house, which amounted to the sum of 4000 talents, & furthermore brought him all Cæsars bookes and writings, in the which were his memorials of all that he had done & ordained. Antonius did daily mingle with them such as he thought good, and by that means he created new officers, made new Senators, called home some that were banished, & deliuered those that were prisoners: and then he sayd that all those things were so appointed and ordained by Cæsar. Therefore the Romaines mocking them that were so moued, they called them Charonites: because that when they were ouercome, they had no other helpe but to say, that thus they were found in Cæsars memorials, who had failed in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled absolutely also in all other matters, because he was Consull, and Caius one of his brethren Prætor, and Lucius the other, Tribune. Now things remaining in this state at Rome, Octauius Cæsar the yonger came to Rome, who was the son of Iulius Cæsars Neece, as you haue heard before, and was left his lawfull heire by will, remaining at the time of the death of his great Vnkle that was slaine, in the city of Apollonia. This yong man at his first arriuall went to salute Antonius, as one of his late dead father Cæsars friends, who by his last will and testament had made him his heire: and withall, he was presently in hand with him for mony and other things which were left of trust in his hands, because Cæsar had by will bequeathed vnto the people of Rome, threescore and fifteene siluer Drachmaes to be giuen to euery man, the which he as heire stood charged withall. Antonius at the first made no reckoning of him, because he was very yong: and sayd he lacked wit, and good friends to aduise him, if he looked to take such a charge in hand, as to vndertake to be Cæsars heire. But when Antonius saw that he could not shake him off with those words, and that he was still in hand with him for his fathers goods, but specially for the readie money: then he spake and did what he could against him. And first of all, it was he that did keepe him from being Tribune of the people: and also when Octauius Cæsar began to meddle with the dedicating of the chaire of gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honour Cæsar with: he threatned to send him to prison, and moreouer desisted not to put the people in an vprore. This young Cæsar seeing his doings, went vnto Cicero, and others, which were

Antonius enemies, and by them crept into fauour with the Senate: and he himſelfe ſought the peoples good will euery manner of way, gathering together the old ſouldiers of the late deceaſed Cæſar, which were diſperſed in diuerſe cities and colonies. Antonius being affraid of it, talked with Octauius in the Capitoll, and became his friend. But the very ſame night Antonius had a ſtrange dreame, who thought that lightning fell vpon him, and burnt his right hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cæſar lay in waite to kill him. Cæſar cleared himſelfe vnto him, and told him there was no ſuch matter: but he could not make Antonius beleeue the contrarie. Whereupon they became further enemies then euer they were: inſomuch that both of them made friends of either ſide to gather together all the old ſouldiers through ITALIE, that were diſperſed in diuerſe townes: and made them large promiſes, and ſought alſo to win the legions on their ſide, which were alreadie in armes. Cicero on the other ſide being at that time the chiefeſt man of authoritie and eſtimation in the city, he ſtirred vp all men againſt Antonius: ſo that in the end he made the Senate pronounce him an enemy to his country, and appointed young Cæſar Sergeants to cary axes before him, and ſuch other ſigns as were incident to the dignity of a Conſull or Prætor: and moreouer, ſent Hircius and Panſa, then Conſuls, to driue Antonius out of ITALY. Theſe two Conſuls together with Cæſar, who alſo had an armie, went againſt Antonius that beſieged the citie of MODENA, and there ouerthrew him in battell: but both the Conſuls were ſlaine there. Antonius flying vpon this ouerthrow, fell into great miſery all at once: but the chiefeſt want of all other, & that pinched him moſt, was famine. Howbeit he was of ſuch a ſtrong nature, that by patience he would ouercome any aduerſity, and the heauier fortune lay vpon him, the more conſtant ſhewed he himſelf. Euery man that feeleth want or aduerſity, knoweth by vertue and diſcretion what he ſhould do: but when indeed they are ouerlaid with extremity, & be ſore oppreſſed, few haue the harts to follow that which they praiſe & commend, and much leſſe to auoid that they reproue and miſlike: but rather to the contrary, they yeeld to their accuſtomed eaſie life: and through faint hart, & lacke of courage, do change their firſt mind and purpoſe. And therfore it was a wonderfull example to the ſouldiers, to ſee Antonius that was brought vp in all fineneſſe & ſuperfluity, ſo eaſily to drink puddle water, and to eate wild fruits & roots: and moreouer it is reported, that euen as they paſſed the Alpes, they did eate the barkes of trees, and ſuch beaſts as neuer man taſted of their fleſh before. Now their intent was to ioyne with the legions that were on the other ſide of the mountains, vnder Lepidus charge: whom Antonius tooke to be his friend, becauſe he had holpen him to many things at Cæſars hand, through his means. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he ſaw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter himſelfe, and to go vnto Lepidus. Since the ouerthrow he had at MODENA, he ſuffered his beard to grow at length and neuer clipt it, that it was maruellous long, & the haire of his head alſo without combing: and beſides all this, he went in a mourning gown, and after this ſort came hard to the trenches of Lepidus camp. Then he began to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and many of them their hearts yerned for pity to ſee him ſo poorely arrayed, and ſome alſo through his words began to pity him: inſomuch that Lepidus began to be affraid, and therefore commaunded all the trumpets to ſound together to ſtop the ſouldiers eares, that they ſhould not hearken to Antonius. This notwithſtanding, the ſouldiers tooke the more pitie of him, and ſpake ſecretly with him by Clodius and Lælius meanes, whom they ſent vnto him diſguiſed in womens apparell, and gaue him counſell that he ſhould not be affraid to enter into their campe, for there were a great number of ſouldiers that would receiue him, and kill Lepidus, if he would ſay the word. Antonius wold not ſuffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his army to wade a foord, at a litle riuer that ranne betweene them: and himſelfe was the formoſt man that tooke the riuer to get ouer, ſeeing a number of Lepidus campe that gaue him their hands, plucked vp the ſtakes, and layed flat the bancke of their trench to let him in to their camp. When he was come into their campe, and that he had all the army at his commandement: he vſed Lepidus very courteouſly, imbraced him, and called him father: and though indeed Antonius did all, and ruled the whole army, yet he alway gaue Lepidus the name and honor of the Captaine. Munatius Plancus, lying alſo in campe hard by with an army: vnderſtanding the report of Antonius curteſie, he alſo came and ioyned with him. Thus Antonius being a foot againe, and growne of great power, repaſſed ouer the Alpes, leading into ITALIE with him ſeuenteene legions, and ten thouſand horſemen, beſides ſixe legions he left in garriſon among the GAVLES, vnder the charge of one Varius, a companion of his that would

drinke luſtily with him, and therefore in mockerie was ſurnamed Cotylon, to wit, a bibber. So Octauius Cæſar would not leane to Cicero, when he ſaw that his whole trauell and indeuor was only to reſtore the commonwealth to her former libertie. Therefore he ſent certaine of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends againe: and thereupon all three met together, (to wit, Cæſar, Antonius, and Lepidus) in an Iland enuironed round about with a litle riuer, and there remained three daies together. Now as touching all other matters, they were eaſily agreed, and did deuide all the Empire of Rome betweene them, as if it had bene their owne inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for euery one of them would kill their enemies, and ſaue their kinſemen and friends. Yet at length, giuing place to their greedie deſire to be reuenged of their enemies, they ſpurned all reuerence of bloud, and holineſſe of friendſhip at their feet. For Cæſar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius alſo forſooke Lucius Cæſar, who was his Vncle by his mother: and both of them together ſuffered Lepidus to kill his owne brother Paulus. Yet ſome writers affirme, that Cæſar and Antonius requeſted Paulus might be ſlaine, and that Lepidus was contented with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnaturall, and crueller chaunge then this was. For thus changing murther for murther, they did aſwell kill thoſe whom they did forſake and leaue vnto others, as thoſe alſo which others left vnto them to kill: but ſo much more was their wickednes and crueltie great vnto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, and hauing no cauſe to hate them. After this plot was agreed vpon betweene them: the ſoldiers that were thereabouts, would haue this friendſhip and league betwixt them confirmed by mariage, and that Cæſar ſhould marie Claudia, the daughter of Fuluia and Antonius wife. This mariage alſo being agreed vpon, they condemned 300. of the chiefeſt citizens of Rome, to be put to death by proſcription. And Antonius alſo commanded thē to whom he had giuen commiſſion to kill Cicero, that they ſhould ſtrike off his head and right hand, with the which he had written the inuectiue Orations (called Philippides) againſt Antonius. So when the murtherers brought him Ciceroes head and hand cut off, he beheld them a long time with great ioy, and laughed hartily, and that oftentimes for the great ioy he felt. Then when he had taken his pleaſure of the ſight of them, he cauſed them to be ſet vp in an open place, ouer the pulpit for Orations, (where when he was aliue, he had often ſpoken to the people) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not blemiſhed his owne fortune, ſhewing himſelf (to his great ſhame and infamie) a cruell man, and vnworthy the office and authority he bare. His vncle Lucius Cæſar alſo, as they ſought for him to kill him, & followed him hard, fled vnto his ſiſter. The murderers coming thither, forcing to breake into her chamber, ſhe ſtood at her chamber doore with her armes abrode, crying out ſtill: You ſhall not kill Lucius Cæſar, before you firſt kill me, that bare your Captaine in my wombe. By this meanes ſhe ſaued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of theſe Triumuiri grew odious and hatefull to the Romaines, for diuers reſpects: but they moſt blamed Antonius, becauſe he being elder then Cæſar, & of more power and force then Lepidus, gaue himſelfe againe to his former riot & exceſſe, when he left to deale in the affaires of the cōmonwealth. But ſetting aſide the ill name he had for his inſolencie, he was yet much more hated in reſpect of the houſe he dwelt in, the which was the houſe of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperance, modeſtie, and ciuill life, as for his three triumphs. For it grieued them to ſee the gates cōmonly ſhut againſt the Captains, Magiſtrates of the city, and alſo Ambaſſadors of ſtrange nations which were ſometimes thruſt from the gate with violence: and that the houſe within was full of tumblers, anticke dauncers, iuglers, players, ieſters, and drunkards, quaffing and guzling, and that on them he beſtowed the moſt part of his mony he got by all kind of poſſible extortions, bribery and pollicie. For they did not only ſell by the cryer the goods of thoſe whom they had outlawed and appointed to murder, ſlanderouſly deceiued the poore widowes and yong orphanes, & alſo raiſed all kind of impoſts, ſubſidies and taxes: but vnderſtanding alſo that the holy veſtall Nuns had certain goods and mony put in their cuſtody to keep, both of mens in the city, and thoſe alſo that were abroad: they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octauius Cæſar perceiuing that no mony would ſerue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the mony between them, and ſo did they alſo deuide the armie, for them both to go into Macedon to make warre againſt Brutus and Caſſius: and in the meane time they left the gouernement of the citie of Rome vnto Lepidus. When they had paſſed ouer the ſeas, and that they began to make warre, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius againſt Caſſius, and Cæſar againſt Brutus: Cæſar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the vpper hand, and did all. For at the firſt battell

Cæſar was ouerthrowne by Brutus, and loſt his campe, and very hardly ſaued himſelfe by flying from them that followed him. Howbeit he writeth himſelfe in his Commentaries, that he fled before the charge was giuen, becauſe of a dreame one of his friends had. Antonius on the other ſide ouerthrew Caſſius in battell, though ſome write that he was not there himſelfe at the battell, but that he came after the ouerthrow, whileſt his men had the enemies in chaſe. So Caſſius at his earneſt requeſt was ſlaine by a faithfull ſeruant of his owne called Pindarus, whom he had infranchiſed: becauſe he knew not in time that Brutus had ouercome Cæſar. Shortly after they fought another battell againe, in the which Brutus was ouerthrowne, who afterwards alſo ſlue himſelfe. Thus Antonius had the chiefeſt glorie of all this victorie, ſpecially becauſe Cæſar was ſicke at that time. Antonius hauing found Brutus bodie after this battell, blaming him much for the murther of his brother Caius, whom he had put to death in MACEDON for reuenge of Ciceroes cruel death, and yet laying the fault more in Hortenſius then in him: he made Hortenſius to be ſlaine on his brothers tombe. Furthermore he caſt his coate armor (which was wonderfull rich and ſumptuous) vpon Brutus bodie, and gaue commaundement to one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, to defray the charge of his buriall. But afterwards Antonius hearing that his infranchiſed bondman had not burnt his coat-armour with his bodie, becauſe it was very rich, and woorth a great ſum of money, and that he had alſo kept backe much of the readie money appointed for his funerall and tombe: he alſo put him to death. After that, Cæſar was conueyed to ROME, and it was thought he would not liue long, nor eſcape the ſickneſſe he had. Antonius on the other ſide went towards the Eaſt prouinces and regions to leauie money: and firſt of all he went into GREECE, and caried an infinite number of ſoldiers with him. Now, becauſe euery ſouldier was promiſed fiue thouſand ſiluer Drachmas, he was driuen of neceſſitie to impoſe extreme tallages and taxations. At his firſt comming into GREECE, he was not hard nor bitter vnto the GRECIANS, but gaue himſelfe onely to heare wiſe men diſpute, to ſee playes, and alſo to note the ceremonies and ſacrifices of GREECE, miniſtring iuſtice to euery man, and it pleaſed him maruellouſly to heare them call him Philellen, (as much to ſay, A louer of the GRECIANS) and ſpecially the ATHENIANS, to whom he did many great pleaſures. Wherfore the MEGARIANS, to exceed the ATHENIANS, thinking to ſhew Antonius a goodly ſight: they prayed him to come and ſee their Senat houſe and councell hall. Antonius went thither to ſee it. So whē he had ſeene it at his pleaſure, they asked him: My Lord, how like you our hall? Me thinkes (quoth he) it is litle, old, and readie to fall downe. Furthermore he tooke meaſure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promiſed the Senate to finiſh it. But when he was once come into ASIA, hauing left Lucius Cenſorinus Gouernor in GREECE, and that he had felt the riches and pleaſures of the Eaſt parts, aud that Princes, great Lords, and Kings, came to wait at his gate for his coming out, and that Queenes and Princeſſes to excell one another, gaue him very rich preſents, and came to ſee him, curiouſly ſetting forth themſelues, and vſing all art that might be to ſhew their beautie, to win his fauour the more: (Cæſar in the meane ſpace turmoiling his wits and bodie in ciuill wars at home, Antonius liuing merily and quietly abroad (he eaſily fell againe to his old licentious life. For ſtraight, one Anaxenor a player of the citherne, Xoutus a player of the flute, Metrodorus a tumbler, and ſuch a rabble of minſtrels and fit miniſters for the pleaſures of ASIA, (who in fineneſſe and flatterie paſſed all the other plagues he brought with him out of ITALIE) all theſe flocked in his court, and bare the whole ſway: and after that, all went awry. For euery one gaue themſelues to riot and exceſſe, when they ſaw he delighted in it: and all ASIA was like to the citie Sophocles ſpeaketh of in one of his Tragedies:

For in the citie of EPHESVS, women attired as they go in the feaſts and ſacrifice of Bacchus, came out to meete him with ſuch ſolemnities and ceremonies, as are then vſed: with men and children diſguiſed like Fawnes and Satyres. Moreouer, the citie was full of Iuie, and darts wreathed about with Iuie, pſalterions, flutes and howboyes, and in their ſongs they called him Bacchus, father of mirth, courteous and gentle: and ſo was he vnto ſome, but to the moſt part of men, cruell and extreame. For he robbed Noblemen and Gentlemen of their goods, to giue it vnto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged mens goods liuing, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houſes by force. As he gaue a citizens houſe of MAGNESIA vnto a cooke, becauſe (as it is reported) he dreſſed him a fine ſupper. In the end he doubled the taxation, and impoſed a ſecond vpon ASIA. But then Hybræas the Orator ſent from the eſtates of ASIA, to tel him the ſtare of their countrie, boldly said vnto him: If thou wilt haue power to lay two tributes in one yeare vpon vs, thou shouldest also haue power to giue vs two Sommers, two Autumnes, and two Haruests. This was gallantly and pleasantly spoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleased him well to heare it: but afterwards amplifying his speech, he spake more boldly, and to better purpose: Asia hath payed the two hundred thousand talents. If all this money be not come to thy coffers, then aske account of them that leauied it: but if thou haue receiued it, and nothing be left of it, then are we vtterly vndone. Hybræas words netled Antonius roundly. For he vnderstood not of the thefts and robberies his officers committed by his authoritie, in his treasure and affairs: not so much becausse he was careless, as for that he ouer simply trusted his men in al things.

For he was a plaine man, without subtiltie, and therfore ouer late found out the foule faults they committed against him: but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainly confesse it vnto them whom his officers had done iniurie vnto by countenance of his authority. He had a noble mind, as well to punish offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet he did exceed more in giuing, then in punishing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly vsed, mocking and flouting of euery man, that was remedied by it selfe: for a man might as boldly exchange a mocke with him, and he was as well contented to be mocked, as to mocke others: but yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that those which told him so plainly, and truly in mirth: would neuer flatter him in good earnest in any matter of weight. But thus he was easily abused by the praises they gaue him, not finding how these flatterers mingled their flatterie, vnder this familiar and plaine maner of speech vnto him, as a fine deuise to make difference of meats with sharpe and tart sauce, and also to keepe him by this franck iesting & bourding with him at the table, that their common flatterie should not be troublesome vnto him, as men do easily mislike to haue too much of one thing: & that they handled him finely thereby, when they would giue him place in any matter of waight, and follow his counsell, that it might not appeare to him they did it so much to please him, but becausse they were ignorant, and vnderstood not so much as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the last and extreamest mischiefe of all other (to wit, the loue of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and stir vp many vices yet hidden in him, and were neuer seene to any: and if any sparke of goodnesse or hope of rising were left him, Cleopatra quenched it straight, and made it worse then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make war with the Parthians, sent to commaund Cleopatra to appeare personally before him when he came into Cilicia, to answer vnto such accusations as were laid against her, being this: that she had aided Cassius and Brutus in their warre against him. The messenger sent vnto Cleopatra to make this summons vnto her, was called Dellius: who when he had throughly considered her beautie, the excellent grace and sweetnesse of her toung, he nothing mistrusted that Antonius would do any hurt to so noble a Lady, but rather assured himself, that within few daies she should be in great fauour with him. Therupon he did her great honor, and perswaded her to come into Cilicia, as honourably furnished as she could possible, and bad her not to be affraid at all of Antonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that she had euer seene. Cleopatra on the other side beleeuing Dellius words, and guessing by the former accesse and credit she had with Iulius Cæsar, and C. Pompey (the son of Pompey the Great) only for her beauty: she began to haue good hope that she might more easily win Antonius. For Cæsar & Pompey knew her when she was but a yong thing, & knew not then what the world meant: but now she went to Antonius at the age when a womans beauty is at the prime, and she also of best iudgment. So she furnished her selfe with a world of gifts, store of gold and siluer, and of riches and other sumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough she might bring frō so great a house, and from so wealthy and rich a realme as Ægypt was. But yet she caried nothing with her wherin she trusted more then in her selfe, and in the charmes and inchauntment of her passing beautie and grace. Therfore when she was sent vnto by diuerse letters, both from Antonius himselfe, and also from his friends, she made so light of it, and mocked Antonius so much, that she disdained to set forward otherwise, but to take her barge in the riuer of Cydnus, the poope whereof was of gold, the sailes of purple, and the oares of siluer, which kept stroke in rowing after the sound of the musicke of flutes, howboyes, cithernes, vials, and such other instruments as they played vpon in the barge. And now for the person of her selfe: she was layed vnder a pauilion of cloth of gold of tissue, apparelled and attired like the goddesse Venus, commonly drawne in picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretie faire boyes apparelled as Painters do set foorth god Cupid, with litle fans in their hands, with the which they fanned wind vpon her. Her Ladies and Gentlewomen alſo, the faireſt of them were apparelled like the Nimphes Nereides (which are the Myrmaides of the waters) and like the Graces, ſome ſtearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull paſſing ſweet ſauour of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes ſide, peſtered with innumerable multitudes of people. Some of them followed the barge all alongſt the riuer ſide: others alſo ran out of the citie to ſee her coming in. So that in the end, there ranne ſuch multitudes of people one after another to ſee her, that Antonius was left poſt alone in the market place, in his Imperiall ſeate to giue audience: and there went a rumour in the peoples mouths, that the goddeſſe Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius ſent to inuite her to ſupper to him. But ſhe ſent him word againe, he ſhould do better rather to come and ſuppe with her. Antonius therefore to ſhew himſelfe courteous vnto her at her arriuall, was contented to obey her, and went to ſupper to her: where he found ſuch paſſing ſumptuous fare, that no tongue can expreſſe it. But amongſt all other things, he moſt wondered at the infinit number of lights and torches hanged on the toppe of the houſe, giuing light in euery place, ſo artificially ſet and ordered by deuiſes, ſome round, ſome ſquare: that it was the rareſt thing to behold that eye could diſcerne, or that euer bookes could mention. The next night, Antonius feaſting her, contended to paſſe her in magnificence and fineneſſe: but ſhe ouercame him in both. So that he himſelfe began to ſcorne the groſſe ſeruice of his houſe, in reſpect of Cleopatraes ſumptuouſneſſe and fineneſſe. And when Cleopatra found Antonius ieaſts and ſlents to be but groſſe, and ſouldier like, in plaine maner: ſhe gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him throughly. Now her beautie (as it is reported) was not ſo paſſing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet ſuch, as vpon preſent view did enamour men with her: but ſo ſweet was her companie and conuerſation, that a man could not poſſibly but be taken. And beſides her beautie, the good grace ſhe had to talke and diſcourſe, her curteous nature that tempered her words and deeds, was a ſpur that pricked to the quicke. Furthermore, beſides all theſe, her voice and words were maruellous pleaſant: for her tong was an inſtrument of muſick to diuers ſports and paſtimes, the which ſhe eaſily turned to any language that pleaſed her. She ſpake vnto few barbarous people by interpreter, but made them anſwer her ſelf, or at the leaſt the moſt part of them: as the Æthiopians, the Arabians, the Troglodytes, the Hebrevves, the Syrians, the Medes, and the Parthians, and to many others alſo, whoſe languages ſhe had learned. Whereas diuers of her progenitours, the kings of Ægypt, could ſcarce learne the Ægyptian toung onely, and many of them forgot to ſpeake the Macedonian. Now Antonius was ſo rauiſhed with the loue of Cleopara, that though his wife Fuluia had great wars, and much ado with Cæſar for his affaires, and that the army of the Parthians (the which the kings Lieutenants had giuen to the onely leading of Labienus) was now aſſembled in Mesopotamia, readie to inuade Syria: yet (as though all this had nothing touched him) he yeelded himſelfe to go with Cleopatra into Alexandria, where he ſpent and loſt in childiſh ſports (as a man might ſay) and idle paſtimes, the moſt precious thing a man can ſpend, (as Antiphon ſaith) and that is, Time. For they made an order betweene them, which they called Amimetobion, (as much to ſay, No life comparable and matchable with it) one feaſting each other by turnes, and in coſt, exceeding all meaſure and reaſon. And for proofe hereof, I haue heard my grandfather Lampryas report, that one Philotas a Phiſitian, borne in the city of Amphiſſa, told him, that he was at that preſent time in Alexandria, and ſtudied Phiſick: and that hauing acquaintance with one of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius houſe, (being a yong man deſirous to ſee things) to ſhew him the wonderfull ſumptuous charge and preparation of one only ſupper. When he was in the kitchin, and ſaw a world of diuerſities of meats, and amongſt others, eight wild bores roſted whole: he began to wonder at it, and ſaid: Sure you haue great number of gueſts to ſupper. The cooke fell a laughing, and anſwered him: No (quoth he) not many gueſtes, nor aboue twelue in all: but yet all that is boiled or roaſted muſt be ſerued in whole, or elſe it would be marred ſtraight: for Antonius peraduenture will ſup preſently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath drunke well to day, or elſe hath had ſome other great matters in hand: and therefore we do not dreſſe one ſupper onely, but many ſuppers, becauſe we are vncertaine of the houre he will ſuppe in. Philotas the Phiſitian told my grandfather this tale, and ſaid moreouer, that it was his chaunce ſhortly after to ſerue the eldeſt ſonne of the ſaid Antonius, whom he had by his wife Fuluia: and that he sate commonly at his table with his other friends, when he did not dine nor suppe with his father. It chaunced one day there came a Phisitian that was so full of wordes, that he made euery man wearie of him at the boord: but Philotas to stoppe his mouth, put out this subtill proposition to him: It is good in some sort to let a man drinke cold water that hath an ague: But euery man that hath an ague, hath it in some sort: Ergo, it is good for euery man that hath an ague to drink cold water. The Phisitian was so grauelled and amated withall, that he had not a word more to say. Yong Antonius burst out into such a laughing at him, and was so glad of it, that he said vnto him: Philotas, take all that, I giue it thee: shewing him his cupboord full of plate, with great pottes of gold and siluer. Philotas thanked him, and told him he thought himselfe greatly bound to him for this liberalitie, but he would neuer haue thought that he had had power to haue giuen so many things, and of so great value. But much more he maruelled, when shortly after one of young Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him set his marke and stampe vpon them, and to locke them vp. Philotas returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reproued if he tooke them. Then the young Gentleman Antonius said vnto him: Alas poore man, why doest thou make it nice to take them? knowest thou not that it is the son of Antonius that giues them thee, and is able to do it? if thou wilt not beleeue me, take rather the readie money they come to: because my father peraduenture may aske for some of the plate, for the anticke and excellent workmanship of them. This I haue heard my grandfather tell oftentimes. But now againe to Cleopatra. Plato writeth that there are foure kinds of flatterie: but Cleopatra deuided it into many kinds. For she (were it in sport, or in matters of earnest) still deuised sundrie new delights to haue Antonius at commaundement, neuer leauing him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her sight. For she would play at dice with him, drinke with him, and hunt commonly with him, and also be with him when he went to any exercise or actiuitie of bodie. And sometime also, when he would go vp and downe the citie disguised like a slaue in the night, and would peere into poore mens windowes and their shops, and scold and braule with them within the house, Cleopatra would be also in a chamber maides array, and amble vp and downe the streets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mocks and blowes. Now, though most men misliked this maner, yet the Alexandrians were commonly glad of this iolitie, and liked it well, saying very gallantly and wisely: that Antonius shewed them a comicall face, to wit, a merie countenance: and the Romaines a tragicall face, to say, a grimme looke. But to recken vp all the foolish sports they made, reuelling in this sort, it were too fond a part of me, and therefore I will onely tell you one among the rest. On a time he went to angle for fish, and when he could take none, he was as angrie as could be, because Cleopatra stood by. Wherefore he secretly commaunded the fishermen, that when he cast in his line, they should straight diue vnder the water, and put a fish on his hooke which they had taken before: and so snatched vp his angling rod, and brought vp fish twise or thrise. Cleopatra found it straight, yet she seemed not to see it, but wondred at his excellent fishing: but when she was alone by her selfe among her own people, she told them how it was, and bad thē the next morning to be on the water to see the fishing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fisher boates to see this fishing. Antonius then threw in his line, and Cleopatra straight commaunded one of her men to diue vnder water before Antonius men, and to put some old salt-fish vpon his bait, like vnto those that are brought out of the countrey of Pont. When he had hung the fish on his hooke, Antonius thinking he had taken a fish indeed, snatched vp his line presently. Then they all fell a laughing. Cleopatra laughing also, said vnto him: Leaue vs (my Lord) Ægyptians (which dwell in the countrey of Pharvs and Canobvs) your angling rod: this is not thy profession, thou must hunt after conquering of realmes and countries. Now Antonius delighting in these fond and childish pastimes, very ill newes were brought him from two places. The first from Rome, that his brother Lucius and Fuluia his wife, fell out first betweene themselues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cæsar, and had brought all to nought, that they were both driuen to flie out of Italie. The second newes, as bad as the first: that Labienus conquered all Asia with the armie of the Parthians, from the riuer of Euphrates, and from Syria, vnto the countries of Lydia and Ionia. Then beganne Antonius with much ado, a litle to rouze himselfe, as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe sleepe, and as a man may say, comming out of a great drunkennesse. So, first of all he bent himselfe against the Parthians, and went as farre as the countrey of Phoenicia: but there he receiued lamētable letters from his wife Fuluia. Wherupon he straight returned ned towards ITALIE, with two hundred saile: and as he went, tooke vp his friends by the way that fled out of ITALIE to come to him. By them he was informed, that his wife Fuluia was the only cause of this war: who being of a peeuish, crooked, & troblesome nature, had purposely raised this vprore in ITALIE, in hope therby to withdraw him from Cleopatra. But by good fortune, his wife Fuluia going to meete with Antonius sickened by the way, and died in the citie of SICYONE: and therefore Octauius Cæsar and he were the easilier made friends together. For when Antonius landed in ITALIE, and that men saw Cæsar asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the other side laid all the fault and burden on his wife Fuluia: the friends of both parties would not suffer them to vnrippe any old matters, and to proue or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the first procurer of this war, fearing to make matters worse betweene them: but they made them friends together, and deuided the Empire of ROME betweene them, making the sea Ionium the bounds of their diuision. For they gaue all the Prouinces Eastward vnto Antonius: and the countries Westward vnto Cæsar, and left AFRICKE vnto Lepidus: and made a lawe, that they three one after another should make their friends Consuls, when they would not be themselues. This seemed to be a sound counsell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a straighter bond, which fortune offered thus. There was Octauia the eldest sister of Cæsar, not by one mother, for she came of Ancharia, and Cæsar himselfe afterwards of Accia. It is reported, that he dearely loued his sister Octauia, for indeed she was a noble Ladie, and left the widow of her first husband Caius Marcellus, who died not long before: and it seemed also that Antonius had bene widower euer since the death of his wife Fuluia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, neither did he confesse that he had her as his wife: and so with reason he did defend the loue he bare vnto this ÆGYPTIAN Cleopatra. Therupon euery man did set forward this mariage, hoping therby that this Ladie Octauia, hauing an excellent grace, wisedome and honestie, ioyned vnto so rare a beautie, that when she were with Antonius (he louing her as so worthie a Ladie deserueth) she should be a good meane to keepe good loue and amitie betwixt her brother and him. So when Cæsar and he had made the match between them, they both went to ROME about this mariage, although it was against the law, that a widowe should be maried within ten moneths after her husbands death. Howbeit the Senate dispensed with the law, and so the mariage proceeded accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in SICILIA, and so made many an inrode into ITALIE with a great number of pinnaces and other pyrates shippes, of the which were Captaines two notable pyrates, Menas and Menecrates, who so scoured all the sea thereabouts, that none durst peepe out with a saile. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had dealt very friendly with Antonius, for he had curteously receiued his mother, when she fled out of ITALY with Fuluia: and therefore they thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three together by the mount of Misena, vpon a hill that runneth farre into the sea: Pompey hauing his shippes riding hard by at anker, and Antonius and Cæsar their armies vpon the shore side, directly ouer against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should haue SICILE and SARDINIA, with this condition, that he should ridde the sea of all theeues and pirates, and make it safe for passengers, and withall, that he should send a certaine of wheat to ROME: one of them did feast another, and drew cuts who should begin. It was Pompeius chaunce to inuite them first. Wherupon Antonius asked him: And where shall we sup? There, said Pompey, and shewed him his Admirall gallie which had sixe banckes of oares: That (said he) is my fathers house they haue left me. He spake it to taunt Antonius, because he had his fathers house, that was Pompey the Great. So he cast ankers enow into the sea, to make his galley fast, and then built a bridge of wood to conuey them to his galley, from the head of mount Misena: and there he welcommed them, and made them great cheare. Now in the midst of the feast, when they fell to be merie with Antonius loue vnto Cleopatra: Menas the pirate came to Pompey, and whispering in his eare, said vnto him: Shall I cut the cables of the ankers, & make thee Lord not only of SICILE & SARDINIA, but of the whole Empire of ROME besides? Pompey hauing pawsed awhile vpon it, at length answered him: Thou shouldst haue done it, and neuer haue told it me, but now we must content vs with that we haue: as for my selfe, I was neuer taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted a traitor. The other two also did likewise feast him in their campe, & then he returned into SICILE. Antonius after this agreement made, sent Ventidius before into ASIA to stay the PARTHIANS, & to keepe them they shold come no further: and he himselfe in the meane time, to gratific Cæsar, was contented to be chosen Iulius Cæsars priest & sacrificer, and so they ioyntly together dispatched all great matters concerning the ſtate of the Empire. But in all other maner of ſports and exerciſes, wherein they paſſed the time away the one with the other: Antonius was euer inferior vnto Cæſar, and alway loſt, which grieued him much. With Antonius there was a Soothſayer or Aſtronomer of Ægypt, that could caſt a figure, and iudge of mens natiuities, to tell them what ſhould happen to them. He, either to pleaſe Cleopatra, or elſe for that he found it ſo by his art, told Antonius plainely, that his fortune (which of it ſelfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether blemiſhed and obſcured by Cæſars fortune: and therefore he counſelled him vtterly to leaue his company, and to get him as far from him as he could. For thy Demon, ſaid he, (that is to ſay, the good angell and ſpirit that keepeth thee) is affraid of his: and being couragious & high when he is alone, becommeth fearefull and timorous when he cometh neare vnto the other. Howſoeuer it was, the euents enſuing proued the Ægyptians words true: for it is ſaid, that as often as they two drew cuts for paſtime, who ſhold haue any thing, or whether they plaid at dice, Antonius alway loſt. Oftentimes when they were diſpoſed to ſee cock-fight, or quails that were taught to fight one with another: Cæſars cockes or quailes did euer ouercome. The which ſpited Antonius in his mind, although he made no outward ſhew of it: and therfore he beleeued the Ægyptian the better. In fine, he recommended the affaires of his houſe vnto Cæſar, and went out of Italy with Octauia his wife, whō he caried into Greece, after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying al the winter at Athens, newes came vnto him of the victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the Parthians in battell, in the which alſo were ſlaine Labienus and Pharnabates, the chiefeſt Captaine king Orodes had. For theſe good newes he feaſted all Athens, & kept open houſe for all the Grecians, and many games of price were plaid at Athens, of the which he himſelf would be iudge. Wherfore leauing his guard, his axes, and tokens of his Empire at his houſe, he came into the ſhew place or liſts (where theſe games were plaid) in a long gown and ſlipppers after the Grecian faſhion, and they caried tipſtaues before him, as Martials men do carie before the Iudges to make place: and he himſelfe in perſon was a ſtickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After that, preparing to go to the wars, he made him a garland of the holy Oliue, and caried a veſſell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepſydra, becauſe of an Oracle he had receiued that ſo commanded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus (Orodes ſon king of Parthia) in a battell fought in the country of Cyrrestica, he being come againe with a great army to inuade Syria: at which battell was ſlaine a great number of the Parthians, and among them Pacorus, the kings owne ſonne. This noble exploit as famous as euer any was, was a full reuenge to the Romaines, of the ſhame and loſſe they had receiued before by the death of Marcus Craſſus: and he made the Parthians flie, and glad to keepe themſelues within the confines and territories of Mesopotamia & Media, after they had thriſe together bene ouercome in ſeuerall battels. Howbeit Ventidius durſt not vndertake to follow them any farther, fearing leſt he ſhold haue gotten Antonius diſpleaſure by it. Notwithſtanding, he led his army againſt them that had rebelled, & conquered them againe: amongſt whom he beſieged Antiochus, king of Commagena, who offered him to giue a thouſand talents to be pardoned his rebellió, and promiſed euer after to be at Antonius commandement. But Ventidius made him anſwer, that he ſhould ſend vnto Antonius, who was not farre off, and would not ſuffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exploit ſhould paſſe in his name, and that they ſhould not thinke he did any thing but by his Lieutenant Ventidius. The ſiege grew very long, becauſe they that were in the towne, ſeeing they could not be receiued vpon no reaſonable compoſition, determined valiantly to defend themſelues to the laſt man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet receiued great ſhame, repenting him much that he tooke not their firſt offer. And yet at the laſt he was glad to make truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred talents for compoſition. Thus after he had ſet order for the ſtate and affaires of Syria, he returned againe to Athens: and hauing giuen Ventidius ſuch honours as he deſerued, he ſent him to Rome, to triumph for the Parthians. Ventidius was the onely man that euer triumphed of the Parthians vntill this preſent day, a meane man borne, and of no noble houſe or family: who onely came to that he attained vnto, through Antonius friendſhip, the which deliuered him happie occaſion to atchieue to great matters. And yet to ſay truly, he did ſo well quit himſelfe in all his enterpriſes, that he confirmed that which was ſpoken of Antonius and Cæſar: to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made warre by their Lieutenants, then by themſelues. For Soſſius one of Antonius Lieutenants in Syria, did notable good ſeruice: and Canidius whom

whom he had alſo left his Lieutenant in the borders of ARMENIA, did conquer it all. So did he alſo ouercome the kings of the IBERIANS and ALBANIANS, and went on with his conqueſts vnto mount Caucaſus. By theſe conqueſts, the fame of Antonius power increaſed more and more, and grew dreadfull vnto all the barbarous nations. But Antonius notwithſtanding, grew to be maruellouſly offended with Cæſar, vpon certaine reports that had bene brought vnto him: and ſo tooke ſea to go towards ITALY with three hundred ſaile. And becauſe thoſe of BRVNDVSIVM would not receiue his armie into their hauen, he went farther vnto TARENTVM. There his wife Octauia that came out of GRECE with him, beſought him to ſend her vnto her brother, the which he did. Octauia at that time was great with child, and moreouer had a ſecond daughter by him, and yet ſhe put her ſelfe in iourny, and met with her brother Octauius Cæſar by the way, who brought his two chiefe friends, Mæcenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them aſide, and with all the inſtance ſhe could poſſible, intreated them they would not ſuffer her that was the happieſt woman of the world, to become now the moſt wretched and vnfortunateſt creature of all other. For now, ſaid ſhe, euery mans eyes do gaze on me, that am the ſiſter of one of the Emperours, and wife of the other. And if the worſt counſell take place, (which the gods forbid) and that they grow to warres: for your ſelues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the goddes haue aſſigned the victorie or ouerthrowe. But for me, on which ſide ſoeuer victorie fall, my ſtate can be but moſt miſerable ſtill. Theſe wordes of Octauia ſo ſoftened Cæſars heart, that he went quickly vnto TARENTVM. But it was a noble ſight for them that were preſent, to ſee ſo great an armie by land not to ſtirre, and ſo many ſhippes a floate in the roade, quietly and ſafe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindneſſe of friends, louingly embracing one another. Firſt, Antonius feaſted Cæſar, which he graunted vnto for his ſiſters ſake. Afterwards they agreed together, that Cæſar ſhould giue Antonius two legions to go againſt the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius ſhould let Cæſar haue an hundred gallies armed with brazen ſpurres at the prooes. Beſides all this, Octauia obtained of her husband, twentie Brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her huſband, a thouſand armed men. After they had taken leaue of each other, Cæſar, went immediatly to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to get SICILIA into his hands. Antonius alſo leauing his wife Octauia and litle children begotten of her, with Cæſar, and his other children which he had by Fuluia: he went directly into ASIA. Then beganne this peſtilent plague and miſchiefe of Cleopatraes loue (which had ſlept a long time, and ſeemed to haue bene vtterly forgotten, and that Antonius had giuen place to better counſell) againe to kindle, and to be in force, ſo ſoone as Antonius came neare vnto SYRIA. And in the end, the horſe of the mind, as Plato tearmeth it, that is ſo hard of raine (I meane the vnreined luſt of concupiſcence) did put out of Antonius head, al honeſt and commendable thoughts: for he ſent Fonteius Capito to bring Cleopatra into SYRIA: vnto whom, to welcome her, he gaue no trifling things: but vnto that ſhe had already, he added the Prouinces of PHOENICIA, thoſe of the nethermoſt SYRIA, the Ile of CYPRVS, and a great part of CILICIA, and that countrie of IVRY, where the true balme is, and that part of ARABIA where the NABATHEIANS do dwell, which ſtretcheth out towards the Ocean. Theſe great gifts much miſliked the ROMAINES. But now, though Antonius did eaſily giue away great ſeigniories, realmes, and mightie nations vnto ſome priuate men, and that alſo he tooke from other kings their lawfull realmes: (as from Antigonus king of the IEVVES, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had ſuffered like death) yet all this did not ſo much offend the ROMAINES, as the vnmeaſurable honours which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggrauate their malice and ill will towards him, becauſe that Cleopatra hauing brought him two twinnes, a ſonne and a daughter, he named his ſonne Alexander, and his daughter Cleopatra, and gaue them to their ſurnames, the Sunne to the one, and the Moone to the other. This notwithſtanding, he that could finely cloke his ſhamefull deedes with fine words, ſaid, that the greatneſſe and magnificence of the Empire of ROME appeared moſt, not where the ROMAINS took, but where they gaue much: and Nobilitie was multipiled amongſt men, by the poſterity of Kings, when they left of their ſeed in diuers places: and that by this means his firſt anceſtor was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his line and poſterity, in the wombe of one onely woman, fearing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinances of men touching the procreation of children: but that he gaue it vnto nature, and eſtabliſhed the foundation of many noble races and families in diuerſe places. Now when Phraortes had ſlaine his father Orodes, and poſſeſſed the kingdome: many Gentlemen of PARTHIA forſooke him, and fled from him. Amongſt them was Moneſes

a Nobleman, and of great authoritie among his countrimen, who came vnto Antonius, that receiued him, and compared his fortune vnto Themistocles, & his owne riches and magnificence, vnto the kings of PERSIA. For he gaue Moneses 3. cities, LARISSA, ARETHVSA, & HIERAPOLIS, which was called before BOMBICE. Howbeit the king of PARTHIA shortly after called him home again, vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to steale vpon Phraortes vnprouided. For he sent vnto him, and told him that they would remaine good friends, & haue peace together, so he would but onely redeliuer the standards and ensignes of the ROMAINES, (which the PARTHIANS had won in the battell where M. Crassus was slain) and the men also that remained yet prisoners of this ouerthrow. In the meane time he sent Cleopatra backe into ÆGYPT and tooke his way towards ARABIA and ARMENIA, and there tooke a generall muster of all his army he had together, & of the kings his confederates that were come by his commandement to aide him, being a maruellous number: of the which the chiefest was Artauasdes, king of ARMENIA, who did furnish him with 6000. horsmen, and 7000. footmen. There were also of the ROMAINES about threescore thousand footmen, and of horsemen (SPANIARDS and GAVLS reckened for ROMANES) to the number of 10000. and of other nations thirty thousand men, reckening together the horsmen & light armed footmen. This so great and puissant army (which made the INDIANS quake for feare, dwelling about the countrie of the BACTRIANS, and all ASIA also to tremble) serued him to no purpose, and all for the loue he bare to Cleopatra. For the earnest great desire he had to lie all winter with her, made him begin this warre out of due time, and for hast to put all in hazard: being so rauished and enchanted with the sweet poison of her loue, that he had no other thought but of her, and how he might quickly returne againe, more then how he might ouercome his enemies. For first of all, where he should haue wintered in ARMENIA to refresh his men, wearied with the long iourney they had made, hauing come eight thousand furlongs; and then at the beginning of the Spring to go and inuade MEDIA, before the PARTHIANS should stir out of their houses and garrisons: he could tarie no longer, but led them forthwith vnto the prouince of ATROPATENE, leauing ARMENIA on the left hand, and forraged all the countrie. Furthermore, making all the hast he could, he left behind him engines of battery which were caried with him in three hundred carts, (among the which also there was a ram fourescore foot long) being things most necessarie for him, and the which he could not get againe for money, if they were once lost or marred. For the high prouinces of ASIA haue no trees growing of such height and length, neither strong nor straight enough to make such like engines of batterie. This notwithstanding, he left them all behind him, as a hinderance to bring his matters and intent speedily to passe: and left a certaine number of men to keepe them, and gaue them in charge vnto one Tatianus. Then he went to besiege the city of PHRAATA, being the chiefest & greatest citie the king of MEDIA had, where his wife and children were. Then he straight found out his own fault, and the want of his artillery he left behind him, by the work he had in hand: for he was faine for lack of a breach (where his men might come to the sword with their enemies that defended the wall) to force a mount of earth hard to the wals of the citie, the which by litle and litle with great labor, rose to some height. In the meane time king Phraortes came down with a great army: who vnderstanding that Antonius had left his engines of battery behind him, he sent a great nũber of horsemen before, which enuironed Tatianus with all his cariage and slue him, and ten thousand men he had with him. After this, the barbarous people tooke these engines of batterie and burnt them, and got many prisoners, amongst whom they tooke also king Polemon. This discomfiture maruellously troubled all Antonius army, to receiue so great an ouerthrow (beyond their expectation) at the beginning of their iourny: insomuch that Artabazus, king of the ARMENIANS, dispairing of the good successe of the ROMAINES: departed with his men, notwithstanding that he was himselfe the first procurer of this war and iourny. On the other side the PARTHIANS came couragiously vnto Antonius campe, who lay at the siege of their chiefest city, and cruelly reuiled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens hearts would faile them: he tooke ten legions, with three cohorts or ensignes of the Prætors, (which are companies appointed for the guard of the Generall) and all his horsemen, and caried them out to forrage, hoping thereby he should easily allure the PARTHIANS to fight a battell. But when he had marched about a daies iourney from his campe, he saw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to giue him the onset, and to skirmish with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he set out his signall of battell, and yet caused his tents and fardels to be trussed vp, as though he meant not to fight, but onely to leade his men backe againe. Then he marched before the armie of the barbarous people, the which was martiald like a creſſant or halfe Moone: and commaunded his horſemen, that as ſoone as they thought the legions were neare enough vnto their enemies to ſet vpon the voward, that then they ſhould ſet ſpurres to their horſes, and begin the charge. The PARTHIANS ſtanding in battell ray, beholding the countenance of the ROMAINES as they marched: they appeared to be ſouldiers indeede, to ſee them march in ſo good array as was poſſible. For in their march, they kept their rankes a litle ſpace one from an other, not ſtragling out of order, and ſhaking their pikes, ſpeaking neuer a word. But ſo ſoone as the alarme was giuen, the horſemen ſodainely turned head vpon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the firſt receiued their charge couragiouſly, for they were ioyned nearer then within an arrowes ſhoote. But when the legions alſo came to ioyne with them, ſhouting out aloude, and ratling of their armours: the PARTHIANS horſes and themſelues were ſo affraid and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the ROMAINS could come to the ſword with them. Then Antonius followed them hard in chaſe, being in great good hope by this conflict to haue brought to end, al or the moſt part of this war. But after that his footmen had chaſed them fiftie furlongs off, and the horſemen alſo thriſe as far, they found in all but thirtie priſoners taken, and about foureſcore men only ſlaine: which did much diſcourage them, when they conſidered with themſelues, that obtaining the victorie, they had ſlaine ſo few of their enemies: and when they were ouercome, they loſt ſo many of their men, as they had done at the ouerthrow when the cariage was taken. The next morning Antonius armie truſſed vp their cariage, and marched backe towards their campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the firſt a few of the PARTHIANS: then going further, they met a few moe. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, and troubled them on euery ſide, as freſhly and couragiouſly, as if they had not bene ouerthrowne: ſo that the ROMAINS very hardly got to their camp with ſafetie. The MEDES on the other ſide, that were beſieged in their chief city of PHRAATA, made a ſally out vpon them that kept the mount, which they had forced and caſt againſt the wall of the city, and draue thē for feare from the mount they kept. Antonius was ſo offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he deuided his men by ten legions, and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lot fell: and to the other nine, he cauſed them to haue barley giuen them in ſtead of wheate. Thus this warre fell out troubleſome vnto both parties, and the end thereof much more fearefull. For Antonius could looke for no other of his ſide but famine: becauſe he could forrage no more, nor fetch in any victuals, without great loſſe of his men. Phraortes on the other ſide, he knew well enough, that he could bring the PARTHIANS to any thing elſe, but to lie in campe abroad in the winter. Therfore he was affraid, that if the ROMAINES continued their ſiege all winter long, and made war with him ſtill: that his men wold forſake him, and ſpecially becauſe the time of the yeare went away apace, and the aire waxed cloudie and cold, in the equinoctiall Autumne. Thereupon he called to mind this deuiſe. He gaue the chiefeſt of his Gentlemen of the PARTHIANS charge, that when they met the ROMAINES out of their campe, going to forrage, or to water their horſe, or for ſome other prouiſiō: that they ſhould not diſtreſſe them too much, but ſhould ſuffer them to carie ſomewhat away, and greatly commend their valiantnes and hardineſſe, for the which their king did eſteeme thē the more, and not without cauſe. After theſe firſt baits and allurements, they began by litle and litle to come nearer vnto thē, and to talke with them a horſebacke, greatly blaming Antonius ſelfwill, that did not giue their king Phraortes occaſion to make a good peace, who deſired nothing more, then to ſaue the liues of ſo goodly a companie of valiant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greateſt and moſt dreadful enemies he could haue, to wit, winter and famine, the which they ſhould hardly away withal, though the PARTHIANS did the beſt they could to aide and accompany thē. Theſe words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a litle plyant, for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he would not ſend vnto the king of PARTHIA, before they had firſt asked theſe barbarous people that ſpake ſo courteouſly vnto his men, whether they ſpake it of themſelues, or that they were their maſters words. When they told them the king himſelfe ſaid ſo, and did perſwade them further not to feare or miſtruſt them: then Antonius ſent ſome of his friends vnto the king, to make demand for the deliuerie of the enſignes and priſoners he had of the ROMAINES, ſince the ouerthrow of Craſſus: to the end it ſhould not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they ſhould thinke he were glad that he might only ſcape with safetie out of the danger he was in. The king of PARTHIA answered him: that for the ensignes and prisoners he demanded, he should not breake his head about it: notwithstanding, that if he would presently depart without delay, he might depart in peaceable manner, and without danger. Wherefore Antonius after he had giuen his men some time to trusse vp their cariage, he raised his campe, and tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very gallant to entertaine his souldiers and men of war, and that he could passingly well do it, as well, or better then any Captaine in his time: yet being ashamed for respects, he would not speake vnto them at his remouing, but willed Domitius Ænobarbus to do it. Many of them tooke this in very ill part, and thought that he did it in disdaine of them: but the most part of them presently vnderstood the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therfore they thought it their duties to cary the like respect vnto their Captaine, that their Captaine did vnto them: and so they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the same way he came, being a plaine barren countrey without wood. But there came a souldier to him, borne in the countrey of the MARDIANS, who by oft frequenting the PARTHIANS of long time, knew their fashions very well, and had also shewed himselfe very true & faithfull to the ROMAINES, in the battell where Antonius engines of battery & cariage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counsel him to beware how he went that way, & to make his army a prey, being heauily armed, vnto so great a number of horsmen, all archers in the open field, where they should haue nothing to let thē, to compasse him round about: & that this was Phraortes fetch, to offer him so friendly conditions & curteous words to make him raise his siege, that he might afterwards meet him as he wold, in the plaines: howbeit, that he would guide him (if he thought good) another way on the right hand, through woods & mountains, a far nearer way, and where he shold find great plenty of al things needfull for his armie. Antonius hearing what he said, called his counsell together to consult vpon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to giue them cause to thinke he mistrusted them: and on the other side also he would gladly shorten his way, and passe by places well inhabited, where he might be prouided of all things necessarie: therfore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promised. The MARDIAN gaue himselfe to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his army into the countrey of ARMENIA. So he guided the armie thus bound, two daies together, without any trouble or sight of enemy. But the third day, Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, and trusting therein, suffered the soldiers to march in disorder as euery man listed. The MARDIAN perceiuing that the dams of a riuer were newly broken vp, which they should haue passed ouer, & that the riuer had ouerflowne the bankes & drowned all the way they should haue gone: he guessed straight that the PARTHIANS had done it, & had thus broken it open, to stay the ROMAINES for getting too far before them. Therupon he bad Antonius look to himselfe, & told him that his enemies were not far from thence. Antonius hauing set his men in order, as he was placing of his archers and slingmen to resist the enemies, & to driue thē back: they descried the PARTHIANS that wheeled round about the army to compasse them in on euery side, & to breake their ranks, and their light armed men gaue charge vpon them. So after they had hurt many of the ROMAINS with their arrowes, and that they themselues were also hurt by them with their darts & plummets of lead: they retired a litle, and then came againe and gaue charge: vntill that the horsmen of the GAVLES turned their horses, and fiercely galloped towards them, that they dispersed them so, as all that day they gathered no more together. Thereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not only strengthen the rereward of his armie, but both the flankes also with darts and sling-men, and made his armie march in a square battell: commaunding the horsemen, that when the enemies should come to assaile them, they should driue them backe, but not follow them too farre. Thus the PARTHIANS foure dayes after, seeing they did no more hurt to the ROMAINES, then they also receiued of them: they were not so hote vpon them, as they were commaunded, but excusing themselues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fift day, Flauius Gallus, a valiant man of his hands, that had charge in the armie, came vnto Antonius to pray him to let him haue some mo of his light armed men thē were already in the rereward, and some of the horsemen that were in the voward, hoping thereby to do some notable exploit. Antonius graunting them vnto him, when the enemies came according to their manner to set vpon the taile of the armie, and to skirmish with them: Flauius couragiously made them retire, but not as they were wont to do before, to retire and ioyne presently with their armie, for he ouer rashly thrust thrust in among them to fight it out at the sword. The Captains that had the leading of the rereward, seeing Flauius stray too far from the army, they sent vnto him to will him to retire, but he would not hearken to it. And it is reported also, that Titius himselfe the Treasurer, tooke the ensignes, & did what he could to make the ensigne-bearers returne backe, reuiling Flauius Gallus, because that through his folly and desperatnesse he caused many honest & valiant men to be both hurt and slaine to no purpose. Gallus also fell out with him, and commanded his men to stay. Wherfore Titius returned againe into the army, and Gallus still ouerthrowing and driuing the enemies backe whom he met in the voward, he was not ware that he was compassed in. Then seeing himselfe enuironed on all sides, he sent vnto the army, that they should come & aide him: but there the Captaines that led the legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great estimation about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For where they should haue made head with the whole army vpon the PARTHIANS, they sent him ayd by small companies: and when they were slaine, they sent him others also. So that by their beastlinesse and lacke of consideration, they had like to haue made all the army flye, if Antonius himselfe had not come from the front of the battell with the third legion, the which came through the middest of thē that fled, vntill they came to front the enemies, and that they staied them frō chasing any farther. Howbeit at this last conflict there were slaine no lesse then 3000 men, and 5000 besides brought sore hurt into the campe, and amongst them also Flauius Gallus, whose body was shot through in foure places, whereof he died. Antonius went to the tents to visit and comfort the sicke and wounded, and for pities sake he could not refraine from weeping: and they also shewing him the best countenance they could, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be dressed, and not to trouble himselfe for them, most reuerently calling him their Emperor and Captaine: & that for themselues, they were whole and safe, so that he had his health. For indeed to say truly, there was not at that time any Emperor or Captaine that had so great and puissant an army as his together, both for lusty youths and courage of the souldiers, as also for their patience to away with so great pains & trouble. Furthermore, the obedience & reuerence they shewed vnto their Captaine, with a marueilous earnest loue and good will, was so great, and all were indifferently (as well great as small, the noble men, as meane men, the Captaines as souldiers) so earnestly bent to esteeme Antonius good will and fauor, aboue their owne life and safety, that in this point of martiall discipline, the ancient ROMAINES could not haue done any more. But diuerse things were cause thereof, as we haue told you before: Antonius nobility and ancient house, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality and magnificence, and his familiarity to sport and to be merry in company: but specially the care he tooke at that time to helpe, visite, and lament those that were sicke and wounded, seeing euery man to haue that which was meet for him: that was of such force & effect, as it made them that were sicke and wounded to loue him better, & were more desirous to do him seruice, then those that were whole and sound. This victory so incouraged the enemies (who otherwise were weary to follow Antonius any farther) that all night long they kept the fields, & houered about the ROMAINS camp, thinking that they would presently flie, and then that they should take the spoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of day, there were gathered together a far greater number of the PARTHIANS thē they were before. For the rumor was, that there were not much fewer then 40000 horse, because their king sent thither euen the very guard about his person, as vnto a most certaine and assured victory, that they might be partners of the spoile and booty they hoped to haue had: for as touching the king himselfe, he was neuer in any conflict or battel. Then Antonius desirous to speake to his souldiers, called for a blacke gowne, to appeare the more pitifull to thē: but his friends did disswade him from it. Therfore he put on his coate armor, & being so apparelled, made an Oration to his army: in the which he highly cōmended thē that had ouercome & driuen backe their enemies, & greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backes. So that those which had ouercome, prayed him to be of good cheare: the other also to cleare themselues, willingly offered to take the lot of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwise, to receiue what kind of punishment it should please him to lay vpon them, so that he would forget any more to mislike, or to be offended with them. Antonius seeing that, did lift vp his hands to heauen, and made his prayer to the gods, that if in exchange of his former victories, they wold now send him some bitter aduersity: then that all might light on himselfe alone, and that they would giue the victorie to the rest of his army. The next morning, they gaue better order on euerie side of the armie, and so marched forward: so that when the PARTHIANS thought to returne againe to assaile them, they came farre short of the reckoning. For where they thought to come, not to fight, but to spoile and make hauocke of all: when they came neare them, they were sore hurt with their slings and darts, and such other iauelins as the ROMAINES darted at them, & the PARTHIANS found them as rough and desperate in fight, as if they had bene fresh men they had dealt withall. Wherupon their harts began againe to faile them. But yet when the ROMAINS came to go down any steepe hils or mountaines, then they would set on them with their arrows, because the ROMAINES could go downe but faire and softly. But then againe, the souldiers of the legion that caried great shields, returned backe, and inclosed them that were naked or light armed, in the middest amongst them, and did kneele of one knee on the ground, & so set downe their shields before them: and they of the second ranke also couered them of the first ranke, and the third also couered the second, and so from ranke to ranke all were couered. Insomuch that this manner of couering and shading themselues with shields, was deuised after the fashion of laying tiles vpon houses, and to sight was like the degrees of a Theater, and is a most strong defence and bulwarke against all arrowes and shot that falleth vpon it. When the PARTHIANS saw this countenance of the ROMAINE souldiers of the legion, which kneeled on the ground in that sort vpon one knee, supposing that they had bene wearied with trauell: they layed downe their bowes, and tooke their speares and launces, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the ROMAINS suddenly rose vpon their feet, and with the darts that they threw from them, they slue the formost, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next dayes that followed. But by meanes of these dangers and lets, Antonius army could win no way in a day, by reason whereof they suffered great famine: for they could haue but litle corne, and yet were they driuen daily to fight for it; and besides that, they had no instruments to grind it, to make bread of it. For the most part of them had bene left behind, because the beasts that caried them were either dead, or else imployed to cary them that were sore and wounded. For the famine was so extreme great, that the eight part of a bushell of wheat was sold for fifty Drachmaes, and they sold barley bread by the waight of siluer. In the end, they were compelled to liue of hearbs and rootes, but they found few of them that men do commonly eate of, and were inforced to tast of them that were neuer eaten before: among the which, there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits. For he that had once eaten of it, his memory was gone from him, and knew no manner of thing, but only busied himselfe in digging and hurling of stones from one place to another, as though it had bin a matter of great waight, and to be done with all possible speed. All the campe ouer, men were busily stooping to the ground, digging and carying of stones from one place to another: but at the last, they cast vp a great deale of choler, and died suddenly, because they lacked wine, which was the only soueraigne remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Antonius seeing such a number of his men dye daily, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, neither would suffer them to be at rest: he oftentimes cried out sighing, and sayd: O ten thousand! He had the valiantnesse of 10000 GRECIANS, in such admiration, whom Xenophon brought away after the ouerthrow of Cyrus: because they had come a farther iourney from BABYLON, and had also fought against much moe enemies many times told, then themselues, and yet came home with safety. The PARTHIANS therefore seeing that they could not breake the good order of the army of the ROMAINS, & contrarily that they themselues were oftentimes put to flight, and welfauoredly beaten: they fell againe to their old crafty subtilties. For when they found any of the ROMAINS scattered from the army to go forrage, to seeke some corne, or other victuals, they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, & shewed them their bowes vnbent, saying, that themselues also did returne home to their country as they did, and that they would follow them no farther, howbeit that they should yet haue certaine MEDES that would follow them a dayes iourney or two, to keepe them that they should do no hurt to the villages from the high-wayes, and so holding them with this talke, they gently took their leaue of them, and bad them farewell, so that the ROMAINES began againe to thinke themselues safe. Antonius also vnderstanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine country, because also they should find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take his course, there came into his hoast one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies campe, who was cosin vnto Monaxes that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whom he had giuen three cities. When he came to Antonius campe, he prayed them to bring him one that could speake the PARTHIAN, or SYRIAN tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a familiar of Antonius, was brought

brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and ſayd, that Monexes had ſent him to Antonius, to requite the honour and curteſie he had ſhewed vnto him. After he had vſed this ceremonious ſpeech, he asked Alexander if he ſaw thoſe high mountaines a far off, which he pointed vnto with his finger. Alexander anſwered he did. The PARTHIANS (ſaid he) do lye in ambuſh at the foot of thoſe mountaines, vnder the which lieth a goodly plaine champion country: and they thinke that you being deceiued with their crafty ſubtill words, will leaue the way of the mountaines, and turne into the plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painfull, and you ſhall abide great thirſt, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way, let him aſſure himſelfe to runne the ſame fortune that Marcus Craſſus did. So Mithridates hauing ſayd, he departed. Antonius was maruellouſly troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, and therefore called for his friends, to heare what they would ſay to it. The MARDIAN alſo that was their guide, being asked his opinion, anſwered: that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had ſayd. For, ſayd he, admit that there were no ambuſh of enemies in the valley, yet is it a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountaine way, though it be ſtony and painefull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole daies trauelling without any water. So Antonius changing his firſt mind and determination, remoued that night, and tooke the mountaine way, commaunding euery man to prouide himſelfe of water. But the moſt part of them lacking veſſels to cary water in, ſome were driuen to fill their ſalets & murrians with water, and others alſo filled goates skinnes to cary water in. Now they marching forward, word was brought vnto the PARTHIANS that they were remoued: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they preſently followed them the ſelfe ſame night, ſo that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the ROMAINS, who were ſo lame and wearied with going, and lacke of ſleepe, that they were euen done. For beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundred and forty furlongs; and further, to ſee their enemies ſo ſuddenly at their backes, that made them vtterly diſpaire: but moſt of all, the fighting with them increaſed their thirſt, becauſe they were forced to fight as they marched, to driue their enemies backe, yet creeping on ſtill. The vaward of the army by chance met with a riuer that was very cleare and cold water, but it was ſalt and venimous to drinke: for ſtraight it did gnaw the guts of thoſe that had drunke it, and made them maruellous dry, and put them into a terrible ach and pricking. And notwithſtanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thruſt them backe that would haue kept them from drinking, and ſo dranke. But Antonius going vp and downe amongſt them, prayed them to take a litle patience for a while, for hard by there was another riuer that the water was excellent good to drinke, and that from thenceforth the way was ſo ſtony and ill for horſemen, that the enemies could follow them no further. So he cauſed the retraite to be ſounded to call them backe that fought, and commanded the tents to be ſet vp, that the ſouldiers might yet haue ſhadow to refreſh them with. So when the tents were ſet vp, and the PARTHIANS alſo retired according to their manner: the gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like manner againe brought vnto him for interpreter. Then Mithridates aduiſed him, that after the army had repoſed a litle, the ROMAINES ſhould remoue forthwith, and with all poſſible ſpeed get to the riuer: becauſe the PARTHIANS would go no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the report thereof vnto Antonius, who gaue him a great deale of gold plate to beſtow vpon Mithridates. Mithridates tooke as much of him as he could well cary away in his gowne, and ſo departed with ſpeed. So Antonius raiſed his campe being yet day light, & cauſed all his army to march, and the PARTHIANS neuer troubled any of them by the way: but amongſt themſelues it was as ill and dreadfull a night as euer they had. For there were villaines of their owne company, who cut their fellowes throats for the mony they had, and beſides that, robbed the ſumpters and cariage of ſuch money as they caried: and at length, they ſet vpon Antonius ſlaues that draue his owne ſumpters and cariage, they brake goodly tables and rich plate in peeces, and deuided it among themſelues. Thereupon all the campe was ſtraight in tumult and vprore: for the reſidue of them were afraid it had bene the PARTHIANS that had giuen them this alarme, and had put all the army out of order. Inſomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his ſlaues infranchiſed that was of his guard, and made him giue him his faith that he would thruſt his ſword through him when he would bid him, and cut off his head, becauſe he might not be taken aliue of his enemies, nor knowne when he were dead. This grieued his friends to the heart, that they burſt

out a weeping for ſorow. The MARDIAN alſo did comfort him, and aſſured him that the riuer he ſought for was hard by, & that he did geſſe it by a ſweet moyſt wind that breathed vpon thē, and by the aire which they found freſher then they were wont, and alſo, for that they fetched their wind more at liberty: & moreouer, becauſe that ſince they did ſet forward he thought they were neare their iourneys end, not lacking much of day. On the other ſide alſo, Antonius was enformed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetouſneſſe and villany of certaine of his ſouldiers. Therefore Antonius to ſet his army againe in order, and to pacifie this vprore, ſounded the trumpet that euery man ſhould lodge. Now day began to breake, & the army to fall againe into good order, and all the hurly burly to ceaſe, when the PARTHIANS drew neare, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his army. Thereupon the ſignall of battell was giuen to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer themſelues as they had done before with their ſhields, with the which they receiued and defended the force of the PARTHIANS arrowes, who neuer durſt any more come to handy ſtrokes with them: and thus they that were in the voward, went downe by litle and litle, till at length they ſpied the riuer. There Antonius placed his armed men vpon the ſands to receiue and driue backe the enemies, and firſt of all, got ouer his men that were ſicke and hurt, and afterwards all the reſt. And thoſe alſo that were left to reſiſt the enemies, had leiſure inough to drinke ſafely, and at their pleaſure. For when the PARTHIANS ſaw the riuer, they vnbent their bowes, and bad the ROMAINES paſſe ouer without any feare, and greatly commended their valiantneſſe. When they had all paſſed ouer the riuer at their eaſe, they tooke a litle breath, and ſo marched forward againe not greatly truſting the PARTHIANS. The ſixth day after this laſt battell, they came to the riuer of Araxes, which deuideth the countrey of ARMENIA from MEDIA: the which appeared vnto them very dangerous to paſſe, for the depth & ſwiftneſſe of the ſtreame. And furthermore, there ran a rumor through the campe, that the PARTHIANS lay in ambuſh there abouts, and that they would come and ſet vpon them whileſt they were troubled in paſſing ouer the riuer. But now, after they were all come ſafely ouer without any danger, and that they had gotten to the other ſide, into the prouince of ARMENIA: then they worſhipped that land, as if it had bene the firſt land they had ſeene after a long and dangerous voyage by ſea, being now arriued in a ſafe and happy hauen: and the teares ran downe their cheekes, and euery man imbraced each other for the great ioy they had. But now, keeping the fields in this fruitfull countrey ſo plentifull of all things, after ſo great a famine and want of all things: they ſo crammed themſelues with ſuch plenty of victuals, that many of them were caſt into fluxes & dropſies. There Antonius muſtring his whole army, found that he had loſt 20000 footmen, and 4000 horſemen, which had not all bene ſlaine by their enemies: for the moſt part of them died of ſickneſſe, making ſeuen and twenty dayes iourney, comming from the city of PHRAATA into ARMENIA, and hauing ouercome the PARTHIANS in eighteene ſeuerall battels. But theſe victories were not throughly performed nor accompliſhed, becauſe they followed no long chaſe: and thereby it eaſily appeared, that Artabazus king of ARMENIA, had kept Antonius from ending this warre. For if the ſixteene thouſand horſemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had bene at theſe battels, conſidering that they were armed and apparelled much after the PARTHIAN manner, and acquainted alſo with their fight: when the ROMAINES had put them to flight that fought a battell with them, and that theſe ARMENIANS had followed the chaſe of them that fled, they had not gathered themſelues againe in force, neither durſt they alſo haue returned to fight with them ſo often, after they had bene ſo many times ouerthrowne. Therefore, all thoſe that were of any credite and countenance in the army, did perſwade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this ARMENIAN king: but Antonius wiſely diſſembling his anger, he told him not of his trecherie, nor gaue him the worſe countenance, nor did him leſſe honour then he did before: becauſe he knew his army was weake, & lacked things neceſſary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into ARMENIA with a great army, and ſo with faire words, and ſweet promiſes of meſſengers, he allured Artabazus to come to him: whom he then kept priſoner, and led in triumph in the city of ALEXANDRIA. This greatly offended the ROMAINES, and made them much to miſlike it: when they ſaw that for Cleopatraes ſake he depriued his countrey of her due honor and glory, onely to gratifie the ÆGYPTIANS. But this was a prety while after. Howbeit then, the great haſt he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, cauſed him to put his men to ſo great paines, forcing them to lye in the field all winter long when it ſnew vnreaſonably, that by the way he loſt eight thouſand of his men, men,& ſo came downe to the ſea ſide with a ſmall company,vnto a certaine place called BLANCBOVRG: which ſtandeth betwixt the cities of BERYTVS and SIDON, and there taried for Cleopatra. And becauſe ſhe taried longer then he would haue had her, he pined away for loue and ſorrow: ſo that he was at ſuch a ſtraight,that he wiſt not what to do,and therfore to weare it out,he gaue himſelfe to quaffing and feaſting. But he was ſo drowned with the loue of her,that he could not abide to ſit at the table till the feaſt was ended: but many times while others banquetted, he ran to the ſea ſide to ſee if ſhe were comming. At length ſhe came,and brought with her a world of apparell and money to giue vnto the ſouldiers. But ſome ſay notwithſtanding, that ſhe brought apparell but no money,and that ſhe tooke of Antonius money,and cauſed it to be giuen amongſt the ſouldiers in her owne name,as if ſhe had giuen it them, In the meane time it chanced,that the king of the MEDES, and Phraortes king of the PARTHIANS,fell at great warres together,the which began (as it is reported) for the ſpoiles of the ROMAINES: and grew to be ſo hot betweene them,that the king of MEDES was no leſſe afraid,then alſo in danger to loſe his whole Realme. Thereupon he ſent vnto Antonius,to pray him to come and make warre with the PARTHIANS,promiſing him that he would aid him to his vttermoſt power. This put Antonius againe in good comfort, conſidering that vnlooked for, the only thing he lacked (which made him he could not ouercome the PARTHIANS,meaning that he had not brought horſmen,and men with darts and ſlings inough) was offered him in that ſort: that he did him more pleaſure to accept it, then it was pleaſure to the other to offer it. Hereupon, after he had ſpoken with the king of MEDES at the riuer of Araxes,he prepared himſelfe once more to go through ARMENIA, and to make more cruell warre with the PARTHIANS, then he had done before. Now whileſt Antonius was buſie in this preparation,Octauia his wife,whō he had left at ROME,would needs take ſea to come vnto him. Her brother Octauius Cæſar was willing vnto it,not for his reſpect at all (as moſt authors do report) as for that he might haue an honeſt colour to make warre with Antonius if he did miſuſe her, and not eſteeme of her as ſhe ought to be. But when ſhe was come to ATHENS, ſhe receiued letters from Antonius, willing her to ſtay there vntill his comming, & did aduertiſe her of his iourny and determination. The which though it grieued her much,and that ſhe knew it was but an excuſe: yet by her letters to him of anſwer,ſhe asked him whether he would haue thoſe things ſent vnto him which ſhe had brought him, bring great ſtore of apparell for ſouldiers,a great number of horſe,ſummes of mony and gifts, to beſtow on his friends and Captaines he had about him: and beſides all thoſe, ſhe had 2000 ſouldiers choſen men, all well armed like vnto the Prætors bands. When Niger, one of Antonius friends whom he had ſent vnto ATHENS, had brought theſe newes from his wife Octauia, & withall did greatly praiſe her, as ſhe was worthy,and well deſerued: Cleopatra knowing that Octauia would haue Antonius from her,and fearing alſo that if with her vertue and honeſt behauiour (beſides the great power of her brother Cæſar) ſhe did adde thereunto her modeſt kind loue to pleaſe her husband, that ſhe would then be too ſtrong for her, and in the end win him away: ſhe ſubtilly ſeemed to languiſh for the loue of Antonius, pining her body for lacke of meate. Furthermore, ſhe euery way ſo framed her countenance, that when Antonius came to ſee her, ſhe caſt her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauiſhed for ioy. Straight againe when he went from her, ſhe fell a weeping and blubbering, looking rufully of the matter, and ſtill found the meanes that Antonius ſhould oftentimes find her weeping: and then when he came ſuddenly vpon her, ſhe made as though ſhe dried her eyes, and turned her face away, as if ſhe were vnwilling that he ſhould ſee her weepe. All theſe tricks ſhe vſed. Antonius being in readineſſe to go into SYRIA, to ſpeake with the king of MEDES. Then the flatterers that furthered Cleopatraes mind, blamed Antonius, and told him that he was a hard natured man, and that he had ſmall loue in him, that would ſee a poore Ladie in ſuch torment for his ſake, whoſe life depended onely vpon him alone. For, Octauia, ſayd they, that was maried vnto him as it were of neceſſity, becauſe her brother Cæſars affaires ſo required it, hath the honour to be called Antonius lawfull ſpouſe and wife: and Cleopatra, being borne a Queene of ſo many thouſands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman, and yet that ſhe diſdained not ſo to be called,if it might pleaſe him ſhe might enioy his company, & liue with him: but if he once leaue her, that then it is vnpoſſible ſhe ſhould liue. To be ſhort, by theſe their flatteries and inticements, they ſo wrought Antonius effeminate mind, that fearing leaſt ſhe would make her ſelfe away: he returned againe vnto ALEXANDRIA, and referred the king of MEDES to the next yeare following, although he receiued newes that the PARTHIANS at that time were at ciuill warres among themselues. This notwithstanding, he went afterwards and made peace with him. For he maried his daughter which was very yong, vnto one of the sons that Cleopatra had by him: and then returned being fully bent to make warre with Cæsar. When Octauia was returned to Rome from Athens, Cæsar commanded her to go out of Antonius house, and to dwell by her selfe, because he had abused her. Octauia answered him againe, that she would not forsake her husbands house, and that if he had no other occasion to make warre with him, she prayed him then to take no thought for her: for sayd she, it were too shamefull a thing, that two so famous Captaines should bring in ciuill warres among the Romains, the one for the loue of a woman, and the other for the iealousie betwixt one another. Now as she spake the word, so did she also performe the deed: for she kept still in Antonius house, as if he had bene there, and very honestly, and honourably kept his children, not those onely she had by him, but the other which her husband had by Fuluia. Furthermore, when Antonius sent any of his men to Rome, to sue for any office in the commonwealth: she receiued thē very curteously, & so vsed her selfe vnto her brother, that she obtained the things she requested. Howbeit thereby, thinking no hurt, she did Antonius great hurt. For her honest loue and regard to her husband, made euery man hate him, when they saw he did so vnkindly vse so noble a Lady: but yet the greatest cause of their malice vnto him, was for the diuision of lands he made amongst his children in the city of Alexandria. And to confesse a troth, it was too arrogant and insolent a part, and done (as a man would say) in diriſion and contempt of the Romaines. For he assembled all the people in the shew place, where yong men do exercise themselues, and there vpon a high tribunall silucred, he set two chaires of gold, the one for himselfe, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chaires for his children: then he openly published before the assembly, that first of all he did establish Cleopatra Queene of Ægypt, of Cyprvs, of Lydia, and of the lower Syria, and at that time also, Cæsarion king of the same Realmes. This Cæsarion was supposed to be the son of Iulius Cæsar, who had left Cleopatra great with child. Secondly, he called the sons he had by her, the kings of kings, and gaue Alexander for his portion, Armenia, Media, and Parthia, when he had conquered the country: and vnto Ptolomy for his portion, Phenicia, Syria, and Cilicia. And therewithall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the fashion of the Medes with a high coppe-tanke hat on his head, narrow in the top, as the kings of the Medes and Armenians do vse to weare them: & Ptolomy apparelled in a cloake after the Macedonian maner, with slippers on his feet, and a broad hat, with a royall band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attire of the ancient kings and successors of Alexander the Great. So after his sons had done their humble duties, and kissed their father and mother: presently a company of Armenian souldiers set there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of Macedonians the other. Now for Cleopatra, she did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times else when she came abroad) the apparell of the goddesse Isis, and so gaue audience vnto all her subiects, as a new Isis. Octauius Cæsar reporting all these things vnto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole people and assembly in Rome: he thereby stirred vp all the Romaines against him. Antonius on the other side sent to Rome likewise to accuse him, and the chiefest points of his accusations he charged him with, were these. First, that hauing spoiled Sextus Pompeius in Sicile, he did not giue him his part of the Ile. Secondly, that he did detaine in his hands the ships he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, that hauing put Lepidus their companion and triumuirate out of his part of the Empire, and hauing depriued him of all honors: he retained for himselfe the lands and reuenewes thereof, which had bene assigned vnto him for his part. And last of all, that he had in manner deuided all Italy amongst his owne souldiers, and had left no part of it for his souldiers. Octauius Cæsar aunswerered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had in deed deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, because he did ouer cruelly vse his authority. And secondly, for the conquests he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius should haue his part of them, so that he would likewise let him haue his part of Armenia. And thirdly, that for his souldiers, they should seeke for nothing in Italie, because they possessed Media and Parthia, the which prouinces they had added to the Empire of Rome, valiantly fighting with their Emperour and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in Armenia, commaunded Canidius to go presently to the sea side with his sixteene legions he had: and he himselfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the citie of Ephesvs, and there gathered together his galleys and ships out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great ships of

of burthen: and of thoſe Cleopatra furniſhed him with two hundred, and twenty thouſand talents beſides, and prouiſion of victuals alſo to maintaine all the whole army in this warre. So Antonius, through the perſwaſion of Domitius, commanded Cleopatra to returne againe into Ægypt, and there to vnderſtand the ſucceſſe of this warre. But Cleopatra, fearing leaſt Antonius ſhould againe be made friends with Octauius Cæſar, by the meanes of his wife Octauia; ſhe ſo plied Canidius with money, and filled his purſe, that he became her ſpoke-man vnto Antonius, and told him there was no reaſon to ſend her from this warre, who defraied ſo great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, becauſe thereby the Ægyptians would then be vtterly diſcouraged, which were the chiefeſt ſtrength of the army by ſea: conſidering that he could ſee no king of all the kings their confederates, that Cleopatra was inferiour vnto, either for wiſedome or iudgement, ſeeing that long before ſhe had wiſely gouerned ſo great a Realme as Ægypt; and beſides that ſhe had bene ſo long acquainted with him, by whom ſhe had learned to manage great affaires. Theſe faire perſwaſions wan him: for it was predeſtined that the gouernement of all the world ſhould fall into Octauius Cæſars hands. Thus, all their forces being ioyned together, they hoiſed ſaile towards the Ile of Samos, and there gaue themſelues to feaſts and ſolace. For as all the Kings, Princes, and communalties, people, and cities from Syria, vnto the mariſhes Mæotides, & from the Armenians to the Illyrians were ſent vnto, to ſend and bring all munition and warlike preparation they could: euen ſo all players, minſtrels, tumblers, fooles, and ieſters, were commaunded to aſſemble in the Ile of Samos. So that, where in manner all the world in euerie place was full of lamentations, ſighes, and teares: onely in this Ile of Samos there was nothing for many dayes ſpace, but ſinging and piping, and all the Theater full of theſe common players, minſtrels, and ſinging-men. Beſides all this, euerie citie ſent an oxe thither to ſacrifice, & kings did ſtriue one with another who ſhould make the nobleſt feaſts, & giue the richeſt gifts. So that euery man ſayd, What can they do more for ioy of victory, if they winne the battell; when they make alreadie ſuch ſumptuous feaſts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done, he gaue the whole rabble of theſe minſtrels, and ſuch kind of people, the city of Priene to keepe them withall, during this warre. Then he went vnto the city of Athens, and there gaue himſelfe againe to ſee playes and paſtimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the otherſide, being iealous of the honours which Octauia had receiued in this citie, where indeed ſhe was maruellouſly honoured and beloued of the Athenians; to winne the peoples goodwill alſo at Athens, ſhe gaue them great gifts: and they likewiſe gaue her many great honors, and appointed certaine Ambaſſadours to cary the decree to her houſe, among the which Antonius was one, who (as a citizen of Athens) reported the matter vnto her, and made an Oration in the behalfe of the citie. Afterwards he ſent to Rome to put his wife Octauia out of his houſe, who (as it is reported) went out of his houſe with all Antonius children, ſauing the eldeſt of them he had by Fuluia, who was with his father: bewailing and lamenting her curſed hap that had brought her to this, that ſhe was accompted one of the chiefeſt cauſes of this ciuill war. The Romaines did pity her, but much more Antonius, and thoſe ſpecially that had ſeene Cleopatra: who neither excelled Octauia in beautie, nor yet in young yeares. Octauius Cæſar vnderſtanding the ſudden and wonderfull great preparation of Antonius, he was not a litle aſtonied at it (fearing he ſhould be driuen to fight that ſommer) becauſe he wanted many things, and the great and grieuous exactions of money did ſore oppreſſe the people. For all manner of men elſe, were driuen to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenew: but the Libertines (to wit, thoſe whoſe fathers or other predeceſſours had ſometime bene bond-men) were ceſſed to pay the eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereupon, there aroſe a wonderfull exclamation and great vprore all Italie ouer: ſo that among the greateſt faults that euer Antonius committed, they blamed him moſt, for that he delayed to giue Cæſar battell. For he gaue Cæſar leiſure to make his preparations, and alſo to appeaſe the complaints of the people. When ſuch a great ſumme of money was demanded of them, they grudged at it, and grew to mutiny vpon it: but when they had once payed it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancus (two of Antonius chiefeſt friends and that had bene both of them Conſuls) for the great iniuries Cleopatra did them, becauſe they hindred all they could, that ſhe ſhould not come to this warre: they went and yeelded themſelues vnto Cæſar, and told him where the teſtament was that Antonius had made, knowing perfectly what was in it. The will was in the cuſtody of the Veſtall Nunnes: of whom Cæſar demanded it. They anſwered him, that they would not giue

it him: but if he would go and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereupon Cæsar went thither, and hauing read it first to himselfe, he noted certaine places worthy of reproch: so assembling all the Senate, he read it before them all. Whereupon diuerse were maruellously offended, and thought it a strange matter, that he being aliue, should be punished forthat he had appointed by his will to be done after his death. Cæsar chiefly tooke hold of this, that he ordained touching his buriall: for he willed that his body, though he died at ROME, should be brought in funerall pompe through the middest of the market place, and that it should be sent into ALEXANDRIA vnto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among diuerse other faults wherewith Antonius was to be charged, for Cleopatraes sake: Caluisius, one of Cæsars friends reproued him because he had frankly giuen Cleopatra all the Libraries of the royall city of PERGAMVM, in the which she had aboue two hundred thousand seuerall bookes. Againe also, that being on a time set at the table, he suddenly rose from the boord and trode vpon Cleopatraes foote, which was a signe giuen betweene them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffered the EPHESIANS in his presence to call Cleopatra, their soueraigne Lady. That diuerse times sitting in his tribunall and chaire of state, giuing audience to all Kings and Princes: he had receiued loue letters from Cleopatra, written in tables of Onyx or Christall, & that he had read them, sitting in his Imperiall seat. That one day when Furnius, a man of great account, & the eloquentest man of all the ROMAINS, pleaded a matter before him: Cleopatra by chaunce comming through the market place in her litter, where Furnius was a pleading: Antonius straight rose out of his seat, and left his audience to follow her litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Caluius deuised the most part of al these accusatiõs of his own head. Neuertheless they that loued Antonius were intercessors to the people for him, and amongst them they sent one Geminius vnto Antonius, to pray him he would take heed, that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemy to the people of ROME. This Geminius being arriued in GREECE, made Cleopatra iealous straight of his comming: because she surmised that he came not but to speake for Octauia. Therefore she spared not to taunt him al supper time, & moreouer to spite him the more, she made him to be set lowest of all at the boord: the which he tooke patiently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius. Now Antonius commaunding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither: he answered, That it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morow morning fasting: but drunke or fasting, howsoeuer it were, he was sure of one thing, that all would not go well on his side, vnlesse Cleopatra were sent backe into ÆGYPT. Antonius tooke these words in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other side answered him, Thou doest well Geminius, sayd she, to tel the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within few dayes after, Geminius stale away, & fled to ROME. The flatterers also to please Cleopatra, did make her driue many other of Antonius faithfull seruants & friends from him, who could not abide the iniuries done vnto thẽ: among the which these two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Historiographer: who wrote that he fled, because her Physitian Glaucus told him, that Cleopatra had set some secretly to kill him. Furthermore, he had Cleopatraes displeasure, because he sayd one night at supper, that they made them drinke sower wine, where Sarmentus at ROME dranke good wine of FALERNA. This Sarmentus was a pleasant yong boy, such as the Lords of ROME are wont to haue about them to make them passtime, which they call their ioyes, and he was Octauius Cæsars boy. Now after that Cæsar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaimed open warre against Cleopatra, and made the people to abolish the power and Empire of Antonius, because he had before giuen it vp vnto a woman. And Cæsar sayd furthermore, that Antonius was not maister of himselfe, but that Cleopatra had brought him beside himselfe, by her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make warre with them, should be Mardian the Eunuch, Photinus, and Iras (a woman of Cleopatraes bed-chamber, that frizeled her haire, and dressed her head) and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre, as it is reported, many signes and wonders fell out. First of all, the citie of PISAVRVM which was made a Colonie to ROME, and replenished with people by Antonius, standing vpon the shoare side, of the sea Adriaticke, was by a terrible earth-quake sunke into the ground. One of the images of stone which was set vp in the honour of Antonius, in the citie of ALBA, did sweate many dayes together: and though some wiped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the citie of PATRAS whilest Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the city of ATHENS also, in a place where the warre of the Giants against the gods, is set out in Imagerie:

the ſtatue of Bacchus with a terrible wind, was throwne downe in the Theater. It was ſayd, that Antonius came of the race of Hercules (as you haue heard before) and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus, and therfore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the ſame bluſtering ſtorme of wind, ouerthrew the great monſtrous images at ATHENS, that were made in the honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named & intituled, The Antonians: and yet they did hurt none of the other images, which were many beſides. The Admirall galley of Cleopatra, was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a maruellous ill ſigne: Swallowes had bred vnder the poope of her ſhip, and there came others after them that draue away the firſt, and plucked downe their neaſts. Now when all things were ready, and that they drew neare to fight, it was found, that Antonius had no leſſe then 500 good ſhips of war, among which there were many gallies that had eight and ten banks of oares, the which were ſumptuouſly furniſhed, not ſo meet for fight, as for triumph: an hundreth thouſand footmen, and 12000 horſmen, and had with him to aid him theſe kings and ſubiects following: Bocchus king of LYBIA, Tarcondemus king of high SILICIA, Archelaus king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Mithridates king of COMAGENA, & Adallas king of THRACIA. All which were there euery man in perſon. The reſidue that were abſent ſent their armies: as Polemon king of PONT, Manchus king of ARABIA, Herodes king of IVRY; and furthermore, Amyntas king of LYCAONIA & of the GALATIANS: and beſides al theſe, he had al the aid the king of MEDES ſent vnto him. Now for Cæſar, he had 250 ſhips warre, 80000 footmen, and well neare as many horſemen as his enemy Antonius. Antonius for his part, had all vnder his dominion from ARMENIA, & the riuer of Euphrates, vnto the ſea IONIVM & ILLYRICVM. Octauius Cæſar had alſo for his part, all that which was in our HEMISPHERE, or halfe part of the world, from ILLYRIA, vnto the Ocean ſea vpon the Weſt: then all from the Ocean, vnto mare Siculum: and from AFRICKE, all that which is againſt ITALY; as GAVLE, and SPAINE. Furthermore, all from the prouince of CYRENIA, to ÆTHIOPIA, was ſubiect vnto Antonius. Now Antonius was made ſo ſubiect to a womans will, that though he was a great deale the ſtronger by land, yet for Cleopatraes ſake he would needs haue this battell tried by ſea: though he ſaw before his eyes, that for lacke of water-men, his Captaines did preſt by force all ſorts of men out of GRECE, that they could take vp in the field, as trauellers, muletters, reapers, harueſt-men, and young boyes, and yet could they not ſufficiently furniſh his galleys: ſo that the moſt part of them were empty, and could ſcant row, becauſe they lacked water-men enough. But on the contrary ſide Cæſars ſhips were not built for pompe, high and great, onely for a fight and brauery, but they were light of yarage: armed and furniſhed with water-men as many as they needed, and had them all in readineſſe, in the hauens of TARENTVM, and BRVNDVSIVM. So Octauius Cæſar ſent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his armie into ITALIE: and that for his owne part he would giue him ſafe harbour, to land without any trouble, and that he would withdraw his army from the ſea, as farre as one horſe could runne, vntill he had put his army aſhore, and had lodged his men. Antonius on the other ſide brauely ſent him word againe, and chalenged the combat of him, man for man, though he were the elder: and that if he refuſed him ſo, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of PHARSALIA, as Iulius Cæſar, and Pompey had done before. Now whileſt Antonius rode at anker, lying idly in harbour at the head of ACTIVM, in the place where the citie of NICOPOLIS ſtandeth at this preſent: Cæſar had quickly paſſed the ſea Ionium, and taken a place called TORYNE, before Antonius vnderſtood that he had taken ſhip. Then began his men to be afraid, becauſe his army by land was left behind. But Cleopatra making light of it; And what danger I pray you, ſayd ſhe, if Cæſar keepe at *TORYNE? The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with full force of oares in battell againſt him, Antonius was afraid, that if they came to ioyne, they would take and cary away his ſhips that had no men of warre in them. So he armed all his water-men, and ſet them in order of battell vpon the fore-caſtell of their ſhips, and then liſt vp all his rankes of oares towards the element, as well on the one ſide as on the other, with the prooes againſt the enemies, at the entrie and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of ACTIVM: and ſo kept them in order of battell, as if they had bene armed and furniſhed with water-men and ſouldiers. Thus Octauius Cæſar being finely deceiued by this ſtratageme, retired preſently, and therewithall Antonius very wiſely and ſuddenly did cut him off from freſh water. For vnderſtanding that the places where Octauius Cæſar landed, had very litle ſtore of water, and yet very bad: he ſhut them in with ſtrong ditches and trenches he caſt, to keepe them from ſailing out at their pleasure, and so to go seeke water farther off. Furthermore, he dealt very friendly and courteously with Domitius, and against Cleopatraes mind. For, he being sicke of an agew when he went and tooke a litle boate to go vnto Cæsars campe, Antonius was very sory for it, but yet he sent after him all his cariage, traine, and men: and the same Domitius, as though he gaue him to vnderstand that he repented his open treason, died immediatly after. There were certaine kings also that forsooke him, and turned on Cæsars side: as Amyntas and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his fleete and nauie that was vnfortunate in all things, and vnready for seruice, compelled him to change his mind, and to hazard battell by land. And Canidius also, who had charge of his armie by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination: he turned him cleane contrarie, and counselled him to send Cleopatra backe againe, and himselfe to retire into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the GETES, promised him to aide him with a great power: and that it should be no shame nor dishonour to him to let Cæsar haue the sea, because himselfe and his men both had bene well practised and exercised in battels by sea, in the warre of SICILIA against Sextus Pompeius: but rather that he should do against all reason (he hauing so great skill and experience of battels by land as he had) if he should not imploy the force and valiantnesse of so many lusty armed footemen as he had readie, but would weaken his armie by deuiding them into ships. But now, notwithstanding all these good perswasions, Cleopatra forced him to put all to the hazard of battell by sea: considering with her selfe how she might flie and prouide for her safety, not to helpe him to winne the victorie, but to flie more easily after the battell lost. Betwixt Antonius campe and his fleete of ships, there was a great high point of firme land that ranne a good way into the sea, the which Antonius vsed often for a walke, without mistrust of feare or danger. One of Cæsars men perceiued it, and told his maister that he would laugh, if they could take vp Antonius in the middest of his walke: Thereupon Cæsar sent some of his men to lye in ambush for him, and they missed not much of taking him (for they tooke him that came before him) because they discouered too soone, and so Antonius scaped verie hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by sea, he set all the other ships on fire, but threescore ships of ÆGYPT, and reserued onely the best and greatest galleys, from three bankes, vnto ten bankes of oares. Into them he put two and twenty thousand fighting men, with two thousand darters and slingers. Now as he was setting his men in order of battell, there was a Captaine, a valiant man, that had serued Antonius in many battels and conflicts, and had all his bodie hacked and cut: who, as Antonius passed by him, cried out vnto him, and sayd: O noble Emperour, how commeth it to passe that you trust to these vile brittle ships? What, do you mistrust these wounds of mine, and this sword? let the ÆGYPTIANS and PHOENICIANS fight by sea, and set vs on the maine land, where we vse to conquer, or to be slaine on our feete. Antonius passed by him and sayd neuer a word, but onely beckned to him with his hand and head, as though he willed him to be of good courage, although indeed he had no great courage himselfe. For when the maisters of the galleys and pilots would haue let their sailes alone, he made them clap them on, saying to colour the matter withall, that not one of his enemies should scape. All that day, and the three dayes following, the sea rose so high and was so boisterous, that the battell was put off. The fift day the storme ceased, and the sea calmed againe, and then they rowed with force of oares in battell one against the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola; and Cælius the left; and Marcus Octauius, and Marcus Insteius the midst. Octauius Cæsar on the other side, had placed Agrippa in the left wing of his armie, and had kept the right wing for himselfe. For the armies by land, Canidius was Generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Cæsars side: who kept their men in battell ray the one before the other, vpon the sea side, without stirring one against the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaines: Antonius being in a swift pinnace, was caried vp and downe by force of oares through his army, and spake to his people to encourage them to fight valiantly, as if they were on maine land, because of the steadinesse and heauinesse of their ships: and commaunded the pilots and maisters of the galleys, that they should not stirre, none otherwise then if they were at anker, and so to receiue the first charge of their enemies, and that they should not go out of the straight of the gulfe. Cæsar betimes in the morning going out of his tent, to see his ships throughout: met a man by chaunce that draue an Asse before him. Cæsar asked the man what his name was. The poore man told him that his name was Eutychus, to say Fortunate: and his Asses name Nicon, to say Conquerour. Therefore Cæsar after he had wonne the battell, setting out the market place with the ſpurres of the galleys he had taken, for a ſigne of his victory: he cauſed alſo the man & his Aſſe to be ſet vp in braſſe. When he had viſited the order of his army throughout, he tooke a litle pinnace, and went to the right wing, and wondred when he ſaw his enemies lie ſtil in the ſtraight, & ſtirred not. For decerning them a farre off, men would haue thought they had bene ſhips riding at anker: and a good while he was ſo perſwaded. So, he kept his galleys eight furlongs from his enemies. About noone there aroſe a litle gale of wind from the ſea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with tarying ſo long, and truſting to the greatneſſe and height of their ſhips, as if they had bene inuincible: they began to march forward with their left wing. Cæſar ſeeing that, was a glad man and began a litle to giue backe from the right wing, to allure them to come farther out of the ſtraight and gulfe, to the end that he might with his light ſhips well manned with water-men, turne and enuirone the galleys of the enemies, the which were heauy of yarage, both for their bigneſſe, as alſo for lacke of water-men to row them. When the skirmiſh began, and that they came to ioyne, there was no great hurt at the firſt meeting, neither did the ſhips vehemently hit one againſt the other, as they do commonly in fight by ſea. For on the one ſide, Antonius ſhips for their heauineſſe, could not haue the ſtrength and ſwiftneſſe to make their blowes of any force: and Cæſars ſhips on the other ſide tooke great heed, not to ruſh and ſhocke with the forecaſtels of Antonius ſhips, whoſe prowes were armed with great braſen ſpurres. Furthermore they durſt not flancke them, becauſe their points were eaſily broken, which way ſo euer they came to ſet vpon his ſhips, that were made of great maine ſquare peeces of timber, bound together with great yron pins: ſo that the battell was much like vnto a battell by land, or to ſpeake more properly to the aſſault of a city. For there were alwayes three or foure of Cæſars ſhips about one of Antonius ſhips, and the ſouldiers fought with their pikes, halbards and darts, and threw pots and darts with fire. Antonius ſhips on the other ſide beſtowed among them, with their crosbowes and engines of battery, great ſtore of ſhot from their high towers of wood that were vpon their ſhips. Now Publicola ſeeing Agrippa put foorth his left wing of Cæſars armie, to compaſſe in Antonius ſhips that fought: he was driuen alſo to looſe off to haue more roome, and to go a litle at one ſide, to put thoſe farther off that were afraid, and in the middeſt of the battell: for they were ſore diſtreſſed by Antonius. Howbeit the battell was yet of euen hand, and the victory doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when ſuddenly they ſaw the three ſcore ſhips of Cleopatra buſily about their yard-maſts, and hoiſing ſaile to flye. So they fled through the middeſt of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great ſhips, and did maruellouſly diſorder the other ſhips. For the enemies themſelues wondred much to ſee them ſaile in that ſort, with full ſaile towards PELOPONNESVS. There Antonius ſhewed plainely, that he had not onely loſt the courage and heart of an Emperour, but alſo of a valiant man, and that he was not his owne man (prouing that true which an old man ſpake in mirth, That the ſoule of a louer liued in another body, and not in his owne;) he was ſo caried away with the vaine loue of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, and that ſhe could not haue remoued without mouing of him alſo. For when he ſaw Cleopatraes ſhip vnder ſaile, he forgot, forſooke, and betrayed them that fought for him, and imbarked vpon a galley with fiue bankes of oares, to follow her that had already begun to ouerthrow him, and would in the end be his vtter deſtruction. When ſhe knew his galley a farre off, ſhe lift vp a ſigne in the poope of her ſhip, and ſo Antonius comming to it, was pluckt vp where Cleopatra was: howbeit he ſaw her not at his firſt comming, nor ſhe him, but went and ſate downe alone in the prow of his ſhip, and ſayd neuer a word, clapping his head betweene both his hands. In the meane time, came certaine light brigantines of Cæſars, that followed him hard. So Antonius ſtraight turned the prow of his ſhip, & preſently put the reſt to flight: ſauing one Eurycles a LACEDÆMONIAN, that followed him neare, and preſſed vpon him with great courage, ſhaking a dart in his hand ouer the prow as though he would haue throwne it vnto Antonius. Antonius ſeeing him, came to the fore-caſtell of his ſhip and asked him what he was that durſt follow Antonius ſo neare? I am anſwered he, Eurycles the ſon of Lachares: who through Cæſars good fortune ſeeketh to reuenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of fellony, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durſt not venture vpon Antonius ſhip, but ſet vpon the other Admirall galley (for there were two:) and fell vpon him with ſuch a blow of his braſen ſpurre, that was ſo heauy and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loden with very rich ſtuffe and cariage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he returned againe to his place, & ſate downe, ſpeaking neuer a word as he did before: and ſo liued three dayes alone, without ſpeaking to any man. But when he arriued at the head of Tænarus, there Cleopatraes women firſt brought Antonius and Cleopatra to ſpeake together, and afterwards to ſup and lie together. Then began there againe a great number of merchants ſhips to gather about them, and ſome of their friends that had eſcaped from this ouerthrow: who brought newes, that his army by ſea was ouerthrowne, but that they thought the army by land was yet whole. Then Antonius ſent vnto Canidius, to returne with his army into Asia by Macedon. Now for himſelfe, he determined to croſſe ouer into Africke, and tooke one of his carects or hulkes loden with gold and ſiluer, and other rich cariage, & gaue it vnto his friends: cõmanding them to depart, and ſeeke to ſaue themſelues. They anſwered him weeping, that they would neither do it, nor yet forſake him. Then Antonius very courteouſly and louingly did comfort them, & prayed them to depart: and wrote vnto Theophilus gouernour of Corinth, that he would ſee them ſafe, and helpe to hide them in ſome ſecret place, vntill they had made their way and peace with Cæſar. This Theophilus was the father of Hypparchus, who was had in great eſtimation about Antonius. He was the firſt of all his infranchiſed bondmen that reuolted from him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and afterwards went and dwelt at Corinth. And thus it ſtood with Antonius. Now for his army by ſea, that fought before the head or foreland of Actium: they held out a long time, and nothing troubled them more, then a great boyſterous wind that roſe full in the prowes of their ſhips, & yet with much ado, his nauie was at length ouerthrowne, fiue houres within night. There were not ſlaine aboue fiue thouſand men: but yet there were three hundreth ſhips taken, as Octauius Cæſar writeth himſelfe in his Commentaries. Many plainely ſaw Antonius flie, and yet could very hardly beleeue it, that he that had nineteene legions whole by land, and twelue thouſand horſemen vpon the ſea ſide, would ſo haue forſaken them, and haue fled ſo cowardly: as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one and the other fortune, and that he had not bene throughly acquainted with the diuerſe changes and fortunes of battels. And yet his ſouldiers ſtill wiſhed for him, and euer hoped that he would come by ſome meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they ſhewed themſelues ſo valiant and faithfull vnto him, that after they certainely knew he was fled, they kept themſelues whole together ſeuen dayes. In the end Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forſaking his campe, when they ſaw themſelues thus deſtitute of their heads and leaders, they yeelded themſelues vnto the ſtronger. This done, Cæſar ſailed towards Athens, and there made peace with the Grecians, and deuided the reſt of the corne that was taken vp for Antonius army, vnto the townes and cities of Greece, the which had bene brought to extreame miſery and pouerty, cleane without mony, ſlaues, horſe, & other beaſts of cariage. So that my grandfather Nicarchus told, that all the citizens of our city of Chæronea (not one excepted) were driuen themſelues to cary a certaine meaſure of corne on their ſhoulders to the ſea ſide, that lieth directly ouer againſt the Ile of Anticyra, & yet were they driuen thither with whips. They caried it thus but once: for the ſecond time that they were charged againe to make the like cariage, all the corne being ready to be caried, newes came that Antonius had loſt the battell, and ſo ſcaped our poore city. For Antonius ſouldiers and deputies fled immediatly, & the citizens deuided the corne amongſt them. Antonius being arriued in Lybia, he ſent Cleopatra before into Ægypt from the city of Parætonium: & he himſelfe remained very ſolitary, hauing only two of his friends with him, with whom he wandred vp and downe, both of them Orators, the one Ariſtocrates a Grecian, & the other Lucilius a Romaine: of whom we haue written in another place, that at the battell where Brutus was ouerthrowne, by the city of Philippes, he came and willingly put himſelf into the hands of thoſe that followed Brutus, ſaying that it was he: becauſe Brutus in the meane time might haue liberty to ſaue himſelfe. And afterwards, becauſe Antonius ſaued his life, he ſtill remained with him: and was very faithfull & friendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had truſted with the gouernment of Lybia, and vnto whom he had giuen the charge of his army there, had yeelded vnto Cæſar: he was ſo made withall, that he would haue ſlaine himſelfe for anger, had not his friends about him withſtood him, & kept him from it. So he went vnto Alexandria, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderfull enterpriſe, and of great attempt. Betwixt the red ſea, and the ſea betweene the lands that point vpon the coaſt of Ægypt, there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the ſeas, and ſeparateth Africke from Asia: the which ſtraight is ſo narow at the end where the two ſeas are naroweſt, that it is not aboue three hundreth furlongs ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her ſhips ſhips out of the one ſea, and to hale them ouer the ſtraight into the other ſea: that when her ſhips were come into the gulfe of ARABIA, ſhe might then carie all her gold and ſiluer away, and ſo with a great companie of men go and dwell in ſome place about the Ocean ſea, farre from the ſea Mediterraneum, to ſcape the daunger and bondage of this warre. But now, becauſe the ARABIANS dwelling about the citie of PETRA, did burne the firſt ſhippes that were brought to land, and that Antonius thought, that his armie by land which he left at ACTIVM was yet whole: ſhe left off her enterpriſe, and determined to keepe all the ports and paſſages of her realme. Antonius, he forſooke the citie and companie of his friends, and built him a houſe in the ſea, by the Ile of PHAROS, vpon certain forced mounts which he cauſed to be caſt into the ſea, & dwelt there, as a man that baniſhed himſelf from all mens companie: ſaying that he would leade Timons life, becauſe he had the like wrong offered him, that was before offered vnto Timon: and that for the vnthankfulneſſe of thoſe he had done good vnto, and whom he tooke to be his friends, he was angrie with all men, and would truſt no man. This Timon was a citizen of ATHENS, that liued about the warre of PELOPONNESVS, as appeareth by Plato and Ariſtophanes comedies: in the which they mocked him, calling him a viper and malicious man vnto mankind, to ſhun all other mens companies, but the companie of young Alcibiades, a bold and inſolent youth, whom he would greatly feaſt and make much of, and kiſſed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cauſe what he meant to make ſo much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon anſwered him, I do it, ſaid he, becauſe I know that one day he ſhall do great miſchiefe vnto the ATHENIANS. This Timon ſomtimes would haue Apemantus in his companie, becauſe he was much like of his nature and conditions, and alſo followed him in manner of life. On a time when they ſolemnly celebrated the feaſts called Choæ at ATHENS, (to wit, the feaſts of the dead where they make ſprinklings and ſacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feaſted together by themſelues, Apemantus ſaid vnto the other: O here is a trim banquet Timon. Timon anſwered againe: Yea, ſaid he, ſo thou wert not here. It is reported of him alſo, that this Timon on a time (the people being aſſembled in the market place about diſpatch of ſome affaires) got vp into the pulpit for Orations, where the Oratours commonly vſe to ſpeake vnto the people: and ſilence being made, euery man liſtening to heare what he would ſay, becauſe it was a wonder to ſee him in that place: at length he began to ſpeake in this manner: My Lords of ATHENS, I haue a litle yard at my houſe where there groweth a figge tree, on the which many citizens haue hanged themſelues: and becauſe I meane to make ſome building on the place, I thought good to let you all vnderſtand it, that before the figge tree be cut downe, if any of you be deſperate; you may there in time go hang your ſelues. He died in the citie of HALES, and was buried vpon the ſea ſide. Now it chaunced ſo, that the ſea getting in, it compaſſed his tombe round about, that no man could come to it: and vpon the ſame was written this Epitaph:

Antonius followeth the life and example of Timon Miſanthropos the Athenian. Plato and Ariſtophanes teſtimony of Timon Miſanthropos, what he was.

Here lyes a wretched corſe, of wretched ſoule bereft:
Seeke not my name: a plague conſume you wicked wretches left.

The Epitaph of Timon Miſanthropus.

It is reported that Timon himſelfe, when he liued, made this Epitaph: for that which is commonly rehearſed, was not his, but made by the Poet Callimachus:

Here lye I Timon, who alive all liuing men did hate:
Paſſe by, and curſe thy fill: but paſſe, and ſtay not here thy gate.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this litle ſhall ſuffice at this preſent. But now to returne to Antonius againe. Canidius himſelfe came to bring him newes, that he had loſt all his armie by land at ACTIVM: on the other ſide he was aduertiſed alſo, that Herodes king of IVRIE, who had alſo certaine legions and bands with him, was reuolted vnto Cæſar, and all the other kings in like maner: ſo that, ſauing thoſe that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithſtanding did nothing trouble him: and it ſeemed that he was contented to forgo all his hope, and ſo to be rid of all his care and troubles. Thereupon he left his ſolitarie houſe he had built by the ſea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra receiued him into her royall pallace. He was no ſooner come thither, but he ſtraight ſet all the citie on rioting & banquetting againe, and himſelfe to liberalitie and gifts. He cauſed the ſonne of Iulius Cæſar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according to the manner of the ROMAINES) amongſt the number of young men: and gaue Antyllus, his eldeſt ſon he had by Fuluia, the mans gowne, the which was a plaine gowne without gard or embroderie, of purple. For theſe things, there was kept great feaſting, bacquetting & dancing in ALEXANDRIA many daies together. Indeed they did break their firſt order they had

ſet downe, which they called Amimetobion, (as much to ſay, No life comparable) and did ſet vp another, which they called Synapothanumenon, (ſignifying the order and agreement of thoſe that will die together) the which in exceeding ſumptuouſneſſe and coſt was not inferiour to the firſt. For their friends made themſelues to be inrolled in this order of thoſe that would die together, and ſo made great feaſts one to another: for euery man when it came to his turne, feaſted their whole company and fraternitie. Cleopatra in the meane time was very carefull in gathering all ſorts of poiſons together, to deſtroy men. Now to make proofe of thoſe poiſons which made men die with leaſt paine, ſhe tried it vpon condemned men in priſon. For when ſhe ſawe the poiſons that were ſodaine and vehement, & brought ſpeedie death with grieuous torments: and in contrarie manner, that ſuch as were more mild and gentle, had not that quicke ſpeede and force to make one die ſodainely: ſhe afterwards went about to proue the ſtinging of ſnakes and adders, and made ſome to be applyed vnto men in her ſight, ſome in one ſort, ſome in another. So when ſhe had daily made diuerſe and ſundrie proofes, ſhe found none of them all ſhe had proued ſo fit, as the biting of an Aſpicke: the which cauſeth only a heauineſſe of the head, without ſwouning or complaining, and bringeth a great deſire alſo to ſleepe, with a litle ſweat in the face; and ſo by litle and litle taketh away the ſenſes and vitall powers, no liuing creature perceiuing that the patients feele any paine. For they are ſo ſorie when any bodie awaketh them, and taketh them vp: as thoſe that being taken out of a ſound ſleepe, are very heauie and deſirous to ſleepe. This notwithſtanding, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Octauius Cæſar in Asia, Cleopatra requeſting the realme of Ægypt for their children, and Antonius praying that he might be ſuffered to liue at Athens like a priuate man, if Cæſar would not let him remaine in Ægypt. And becauſe they had no other men of eſtimation about them, for that ſome were fled, and thoſe that remained, they did not greatly truſt them: they were inforced to ſend Euphronius the ſchoolemiaſter of their children. For Alexas Laodician, who was brought into Antonius houſe and fauour by meanes of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credite with him, then any other Grecian (for that he had euer bene one of Cleopatraes miniſters to win Antonius, and to ouerthrow all his good determinations to vſe his wife Octauia well:) him Antonius had ſent vnto Herodes king of Ivrie, hoping ſtill to keepe him his friend, that he ſhould not reuolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he ſhould haue kept Herodes from reuolting from him, he perſwaded him to turne to Cæſar: and truſting king Herodes, he preſumed to come in Cæſars preſence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleaſure: for he was preſently taken priſoner, and ſent in chains to his owne country, and there by Cæſars commaundement put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cæſar wold not grant vnto Antonius requeſts: but for Cleopatra, he made her anſwer, that he would deny her nothing reaſonable, ſo that ſhe would either put Antonius to death, or driue him out of her country. Therwithall he ſent Thyreus one of his men vnto her, a very wiſe and diſcreet man: who bringing letters of credite from a young Lord vnto a noble Ladie, and that beſides greatly liked her beautie, might eaſily by his eloquence haue perſwaded her. He was longer in talke with her then any man elſe was, and the Queene her ſelfe alſo did him great honour: inſomuch as he made Antonius iealous of him. Whereupon Antonius cauſed him to be taken and well fauouredly whipped, and ſo ſent him vnto Cæſar: and bad him tell him that he made him angrie with him, becauſe he ſhewed himſelfe proud and diſdainefull towards him; and now ſpecially, when he was eaſie to be angred, by reaſon of his preſent miſerie. To be ſhort, if this miſlike thee (ſaid he) thou haſt Hipparchus one of my infranchiſed bondmen with thee: hang him if thou wilt, or whippe him at thy pleaſure, that we may crie quittance. From henceforth Cleopatra, to cleare her ſelfe of the ſuſpition he had of her, made more of him then euer ſhe did. For firſt of all, where ſhe did ſolemnize the day of her birth very meanely and ſparingly, fit for her preſent misfortune: ſhe now in contrary maner did keepe it with ſuch ſolemnitie, that ſhe exceeded all meaſure of ſumptuouſnes and magnificence: ſo that the gueſts that were bidden to the feaſts, and came poore, went away rich. Now things paſſing thus, Agrippa by diuers letters ſent one after another vnto Cæſar, prayed him to returne to Rome, becauſe the affaires there did of neceſſity require his perſon & preſence. Therupon he did defer the war till the next yeare following: but when winter was done, he returned again through Syria by the coaſt of Africk, to make warre againſt Antonius, and his other Captains. When the citie of Pelvsivm was taken, there ran a rumour in the citie, that Seleucus, (by Cleopatraes conſent) had ſurrendred the ſame. But to cleare her Antonius and Cleopatra ſend Ambaſſadours vnto Octauius Cæſar.

Peluſium was yeelded vp to Octauius Cæſar.

her ſelfe that ſhe did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus wife and children vnto Antonius, to be reuenged of them at his pleaſure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many ſumptuous tombes and monuments, as well for excellencie of workemanſhip, as for height and greatneſſe of building, ioyning hard to the temple of Iſis. Thither ſhe cauſed to be brought all the treaſure and precious things ſhe had of the auncient Kings her predeceſſours: as gold, ſiluer, emeralds, pearles, ebonie, yuorie, and cynamon, and beſides all that, a maruellous number of torches, faggots, and flaxe. So Octauius Cæſar being affraid to loſe ſuch a treaſure and maſſe of riches, and that this woman for ſpite would ſet it a fire, and burne it euery whit: he alwaies ſent ſome one or other vnto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whileſt he in the meane time drew neare the citie with his armie. So Cæſar came and pitched his camp hard by the citie, in the place where they runne and mannage their horſes. Antonius made a ſallie vpon him, and fought very valiantly, ſo that he draue Cæſars horſemen backe, fighting with his men euen into their campe. Then he came againe to the pallace, greatly boaſting of this victorie, and ſweetly kiſſed Cleopatra, armed as he was when he came from the fight, recommending one of his men of armes vnto her, that had valiantly fought in this skirmiſh. Cleopatra to reward his manlineſſe, gaue him an armor and head peece of cleane gold: howbeit the man at armes when he had receiued this rich gift, ſtale away by night, and went to Cæſar. Antonius ſent againe to challenge Cæſar, to fight with him hand to hand. Cæſar anſwered him, That he had many other wayes to die then ſo. Then Antonius ſeeing there was no way more honorable for him to die, then fighting valiantly: he determined to ſet vp his reſt, both by ſea and land. So being at ſupper (as it is reported) he commaunded his Officers and houſhold ſeruants that waited on him at his boord, that they ſhould fill his cuppes full, and make as much of him as they could: for ſaid he, you know not whether you ſhall do ſo much for me to morrow or not, or whether you ſhall ſerue another maiſter: and it may be you ſhall ſee me no more, but a dead bodie. This notwithſtanding, perceiuing that his friends and men fell a weeping to heare him ſay ſo: to ſalue that he had ſpoken, he added this more vnto it, that he would not leade them to battell, where he thought not rather ſafely to returne with victorie, then valiantly to die with honour. Furthermore, the ſelfe ſame night within a litle of midnight, when all the citie was quiet, full of feare, and ſorrow, thinking what would be the iſſue and end of this warre: it is ſaid, that ſodainly they heard a maruellous ſweet harmonie of ſundry ſorts of inſtruments of muſicke, with the crie of a multitude of people, as they had bene dauncing, and had ſung as they vſe in Bacchus feaſtes, with mouings and turnings after the manner of the Satyres: and it ſeemed, that this daunce went through the citie vnto the gate that opened to the enemies, and that all the troupe that made this noiſe they heard, went out of the citie at that gate. Now, ſuch as in reaſon ſought the depth of the interpretation of this wonder, thought that it was the god vnto whom Antonius bare ſingular deuotion to counterfeit and reſemble him, that did forſake them. The next morning by breake of day, he went to ſet thoſe few footemen he had in order vpon the hils adioyning vnto the citie: and there he ſtood to behold his gallies which departed from the hauen, and rowed againſt the gallies of his enemies, and ſo ſtood ſtill, looking what exploit his ſoldiers in them would do. But when by force of rowing they were come neare vnto them, they firſt ſaluted Cæſars men; and then Cæſars men reſaluted them alſo, and of two armies made but one: and then did all together row toward the citie. When Antonius ſaw that his men did forſake him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and that his footemen were broken and ouerthrowne: he then fled into the citie, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him vnto them, with whom he had made warre for her ſake. Then ſhe being affraid of his furie, fled into the tombe which ſhe had cauſed to be made, and there ſhe locked the doores vnto her, & ſhut all the ſprings of the lockes with great bolts, and in the meane time ſent vnto Antonius to tell him, that ſhe was dead. Antonius beleeuing it, ſaid vnto himſelf: What doeſt thou looke for further, Antonius, ſith ſpitefull fortune hath taken from thee the only ioy thou hadſt, for whom thou yet reſeruedſt thy life? When he had ſaid theſe words, he went into a chamber & vnarmed himſelf, & being naked, ſaid thus: O Cleopatra, it grieueth me not that I haue loſt thy company, for I will not be long frō thee: but I am ſory, that hauing bene ſo great a Captaine & Emperor, I am indeed condemned to be iudged of leſſe courage & noble mind, then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loued and truſted much, and whom he had long before cauſed to ſweare vnto him, that he ſhould kill him when he did commaund him: and then he willed him to keepe his promiſe. His man drawing his ſword, lift it vp as though he had meant to haue ſtriken his maſter: but turning his head at one side, he thrust his sword into himselfe, and fell downe dead at his masters foote. Then said Antonius: ô noble Eros, I thanke thee for this, and it is valiantly done of thee, to shew me what I should do to my selfe, which thou couldest not do for me. Therewithall he tooke his sword, and thrust it into his belly, and so fell downe vpon a litle bed. The wound he had, killed him not presently, for the bloud stinted a litle when he was layed: and when he came somewhat to himselfe againe, he prayed them that were about him, to dispatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out and tormenting himselfe: vntill at last there came a Secretarie vnto him (called Diomedes) who was commanded to bring him into the tomb or monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that she was aliue, he very earnestly prayed his men to carie his bodie thither, and so he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithstanding, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and cast out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius was trussed: and Cleopatra her owne selfe, with two women only, which she had suffered to come with her into these monuments, trised Antonius vp. They that were present to behold it, said they neuer saw so pitifull a sight. For they plucked vp poore Antonius all bloudie as he was, and drawing on with pangs of death: who holding vp his hands to Cleopatra, raised vp himselfe as well as he could. It was a hard thing for these women to do, to lift him vp: but Cleopatra stooping downe with her head, putting too all her strength to her vttermost power, did lift him vp with much ado, and neuer let go her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good courage, and were as sory to see her labour so, as she her selfe. So when she had gotten him in after that sort, and laid him on a bed: she rent her garments vpon him, clapping her breast, and scratching her face and stomacke. Then she dried vp his bloud that had berayed his face, and called him her Lord, her husband, and Emperor, forgetting her own miserie and calamitie, for the pity and compassion she took of him. Antonius made her cease her lamenting, and called for wine, either because he was a thirst, or else for that he thought thereby to hasten his death. When he had drunke, he earnestly prayed her, and perswaded her, that she would seek to saue her life, if she could possible, without reproch and dishonour: and that chiefly she should trust Proculeius aboue any man else about Cæsar. And as for himselfe, that she should not lament nor sorrow for the miserable chaunge of his fortune at the end of his dayes; but rather that she should think him the more fortunate, for the former triumphes and honors he had receiued; considering that while he liued, he was the noblest & greatest Prince of the world, & that now he was ouercome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a Romaine by another Romaine. As Antonius gaue the last gaspe, Proculeius came that was sent from Cæsar. For after Antonius had thrust his sword in himself, as they caried him into the tombes and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his guard (called Dercetæus) took his sword with the which he had striken himselfe, and hid it: then he secretly stale away, and brought Octauius Cæsar the first newes of his death, & shewed him his sword that was bloudied. Cæsar hearing these newes, straight withdrew himselfe into a secret place of his tent, and there burst out with teares, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had bene his friend and brother in law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in sundry great exploits and battels. Then he called for all his friends, and shewed them the letters Antonius had written to him, and his answers also sent him againe, during their quarrell and strife: and how fiercely and proudly the other answered him, to all iust and reasonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this, he sent Proculeius, and commanded him to do what he could possible to get Cleopatra aliue, fearing lest otherwise all the treasure would be lost: and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her aliue to Rome, she would marueilously beautifie and set out his triumph. But Cleopatra would neuer put her selfe into Proculeius hands, although they spake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were thicke and strong, and surely barred, but yet there were some cranewes, through the which her voice might be heard, and so they without vnderstood, that Cleopatra demaunded the kingdome of Ægypt for her sonnes: and that Proculeius answered her, That she should be of good cheare, and not be affrayed to referre all vnto Cæsar. After he had viewed the place very well, he came and reported her answer vnto Cæsar: who immediatly sent Gallus to speake once againe with her, and bad him purposely hold her with talke, whilest Proculeius did set vp a ladder against that high window, by the which Antonius was trised vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra stood to heare what Gallus sayd vnto her. One of her women which was shut vp in her monuments with her, saw Proculeius by chance

as he came downe, and ſhreeked out: O poore Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when ſhe ſawe Proculeius behind her as ſhe came from the gate, ſhe thought to haue ſtabbed her ſelfe in with a ſhort dagger ſhe wore of purpoſe by her ſide. But Proculeius came ſodainly vpon her, and taking her by both the handes, ſaid vnto her: Cleopatra, firſt, thou ſhalt do thy ſelfe great wrong, and ſecondly, vnto Cæſar, to depriue him of the occaſion and oportunitie, openly to ſhew his bountie and mercie, and to giue his enemies cauſe to accuſe the moſt courteous and noble Prince that euer was, and to appeach him, as though he were a cruell and mercileſſe man, that were not to be truſted. So euen as he ſpake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and ſhooke her clothes for feare of any poyſon hidden about her. Afterwards, Cæſar ſent one of his infranchiſed men called Epaphroditus, whom he ſtraightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in any caſe that ſhe made not her ſelfe away: and for the reſt, to vſe her with all the courteſie poſſible. And for himſelfe, he in the meane time entred the citie of ALEXANDRIA, and (as he went) talked with the Philoſopher Arrius, and held him by the hand, to the end that his countrymen ſhould reuerence him the more, becauſe they ſawe Cæſar ſo highly eſteeme and honour him. Then he went into the ſhew-place of exerciſes, and ſo vp to his chaire of ſtate which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commaundement, all the people of ALEXANDRIA were aſſembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craued mercie. Cæſar bad them all ſtand vp, and told them openly that he forgaue the people, and pardoned the fellonies and offences they had committed againſt him in this warre. Firſt, for the founders ſake of the ſame citie, which was Alexander the Great: ſecondly, for the beautie of the citie, which he much eſteemed and wondred at: thirdly, for the loue he bare vnto his very friend Arrius. Thus did Cæſar honour Arrius, who craued pardon for himſelfe and many others, and ſpecially for Philoſtratus, the eloquenteſt man of all the Sophiſters and Orators of his time, for preſent and ſodaine ſpeech: howbeit, he falſely named himſelfe an Academicke Philoſopher. Therefore Cæſar that hated his nature and conditions, would not heare his ſute. Therupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed Arrius ſtep by ſtep in a long mourning gowne, ſtill buzzing in his eares this Greeke verſe:

A wiſe man, if that he be wiſe indeed,
May by a wiſe man haue the better ſpeed.

Cæſar vnderſtanding this, not for the deſire he had to deliuer Philoſtratus of his feare, as to ridde Arrius of malice and enuie that might haue fallen out againſt him; he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius ſonnes, Antyllus, his eldeſt ſonne by Fuluia was ſlaine, becauſe his ſchoolemaſter Theodorus did betray him vnto the ſouldiers, who ſtrake off his head. And the villaine tooke a precious ſtone of great value from his necke, the which he did ſow in his girdle, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was found about him, and ſo Cæſar truſſed him vp for it. For Cleopatraes children, they were very honorably kept, with their gouernors and traine that waited on them. But for Cæſarion, who was ſaid to be Iulius Cæſars ſonne: his mother Cleopatra had ſent him vnto the INDIANS through ÆTHIOPIA, with a great ſumme of money. But one of his gouernors alſo called Rhodon, euen ſuch another as Theodorus, perſwaded him to returne into his countrey, and told him that Cæſar ſent for him to giue him his mothers kingdome. So, as Cæſar was determining with himſelfe what he ſhould do, Arrius ſaid vnto him:

Too many Cæſars is not good.

Alluding vnto a certaine verſe of Homer, that ſaith:

Too many Lords doth not well.

Therefore Cæſar did put Cæſarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great Kings and Captaines did craue Antonius bodie of Octauius Cæſar, to giue him honourable buriall: but Cæſar would neuer take it from Cleopatra, who did ſumptuouſly and royally burie him with her owne hands, whom Cæſar ſuffered to take as much as ſhe would to beſtow vpon his funerals. Now was ſhe altogether ouercome with ſorow and paſſion of mind, for ſhe had knocked her breſt ſo pitifully, that ſhe had martyred it, and in diuers places had raiſed vlcers and inflammations, ſo that ſhe fell into a feauer withall: whereof ſhe was very glad, hoping thereby to haue good colour to abſtaine from meat, and that ſo ſhe might haue died eaſily without any trouble. She had a Phiſitian called Olympus, whom ſhe made priuy of her intent, to the end he ſhould helpe to rid her out of her life: as Olympus writeth himſelfe, who wrote a booke of all theſe things. But Cæſar miſtruſted the matter, by many coniectures he had, and therefore did put her in feare, and threatned her to put her children to ſhamefull death. With theſe threates, Cleopatra for feare yeelded ſtraight, as ſhe would haue yeelded vnto ſtrokes: and afterwards ſuffered her ſelfe to be cured and dieted as they liſted. Shortly after, Cæſar came himſelfe in perſon to ſee her, and to comfort her. Cleopatra being layed vpon a litle low bed in poore eſtate (when ſhe ſaw Cæſar come into her chamber,) ſodainly roſe vp, naked in her ſmocke, and fell downe at his feet maruellouſly disfigured: both for that ſhe had plucked her haire from her head, as alſo for that ſhe had martyred all her face with her nailes; and beſides, her voice was ſmall and trembling, her eyes ſunke into her head with continuall blubbering; & moreouer, they might ſee the moſt part of her ſtomacke torne in ſunder. To be ſhort, her body was not much better then her mind: yet her good grace and comlineſſe, and the force of her beautie was not altogether defaced. But notwithſtanding this vgly and pitifull ſtate of hers, yet ſhe ſhewed her ſelfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cæſar had made her lie downe againe, and ſate by her beds ſide: Cleopatra began to cleare and excuſe her ſelfe for that ſhe had done, laying all to the feare ſhe had of Antonius: Cæſar in contrarie manner, reproued her in euery point. Then ſhe ſodainely altered her ſpeech, and prayed him to pardon her, as though ſhe were affrayed to dye, and deſirous to liue. At length, ſhe gaue him a briefe and memoriall of all the readie money and treaſure ſhe had. But by chaunce there ſtoode Seleucus by, one of her Treaſurers, who to ſeeme a good ſeruant, came ſtraight to Cæſar to diſproue Cleopatra, that ſhe had not ſet in all, but kept many things back of purpoſe. Cleopatra was in ſuch a rage with him, that ſhe flew vpon him, and tooke him by the haire of the head, and boxed him well fauouredly. Cæſar fell a laughing, and parted the fray. Alas, ſaid ſhe, ô Cæſar: is not this a great ſhame and reproch, that thou hauing vouchſafed to take the paines to come vnto me, and done me this honor, poore wretch, and caitife creature, brought into this pitifull and miſerable ſtate: and that mine owne ſeruants ſhould come now to accuſe me, though it may be I haue reſerued ſome iewels and trifles meete for womẽ, but not for me (poore ſoule) to ſet out my ſelfe withall, but meaning to giue ſome pretie preſents and gifts vnto Octauia and Liuia, that they making meanes and interceſſion for me to thee, thou mighteſt yet extend thy fauor and mercie vpon me? Cæſar was glad to heare her ſay ſo, perſwading himſelfe thereby that ſhe had yet a deſire to ſaue her life. So he made her anſwer, that he did not only giue her that to diſpoſe of at her pleaſure, which ſhe had kept backe, but further promiſed to vſe her more honourably and bountifully, then ſhe would thinke for: and ſo he tooke his leaue of her, ſuppoſing he had deceiued her, but indeed he was deceiũed himſelfe. There was a young Gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cæſars very great familiars, and beſides did beare no ill will vnto Cleopatra. He ſent her word ſecretly (as ſhe had requeſted him) that Cæſar determined to take his iourny through Syria, and that within three daies he would ſend her away before with her children. When this was told Cleopatra, ſhe requeſted Cæſar that it would pleaſe him to ſuffer her to offer the laſt oblations of the dead, vnto the ſoule of Antonius. This being graunted her, ſhe was caried to the place where his tombe was, and there falling downe on her knees, embracing the tombe with her women, the teares running downe her cheeks, ſhe began to ſpeak in this ſort: O my deare Lord Antonius, it is not long ſithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: & now I offer vnto thee the funerall ſprinklings and oblations, being a captiue and priſoner, and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing and murthering this captiue body of mine with blowes, which they carefully guard and keepe, onely to triumph of thee: looke therfore hencefoorth for no other honors, offerings, nor ſacrifices from me: for theſe are the laſt which Cleopatra can giue thee, ſith now they carie her away. Whileſt we liued together, nothing could ſeuer our companies: but now at our death, I feare me they will make vs chaunge our conntries. For as thou being a Romaine, haſt bene buried in Ægypt: euen ſo wretched creature I an Ægyptian, ſhall be buried in Italie, which ſhall be all the good that I haue receiued by thy country. If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power and authority, ſith our gods here haue forſaken vs: ſuffer not thy true friend and louer to be caried away aliue, that in me they triumph of thee: but receiue me with thee, and let me be buried in one ſelfe tombe with thee. For though my griefes and miſeries be infinit, yet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could leſſe beare withall, then this ſmall time which I haue bene driuen to liue alone without thee. Then hauing ended theſe doleful plaints, and crowned the tombe with garlands and ſundrie noſegayes, and meruellous louingly embraced the ſame: ſhe commanded they ſhould prepare her bath, and when ſhe had bathed and waſhed her ſelfe, ſhe fell to her meate, and was ſumptuouſly ſerued. Now whileſt ſhe was,

was at dinner, there came a countriman and brought her a basket. The ſouldiers that warded at the gates, asked him ſtraight what he had in his basket. He opened his basket, and tooke out the leaues that couered the figs, and ſhewed them that they were figs he brought. They all of them maruelled to ſee ſo goodly figges. The countriman laughed to heare them, and bad them take ſome if they would. They beleeued he told them truly, and ſo bad him carie them in. After Cleopatra had dined, ſhe ſent a certaine table written and ſealed vnto Cæſar, and commaunded them all to go out of the tombes where ſhe was, but the two women, then ſhe ſhut the doores to her. Cæſar when he receiued this table, and began to reade her lamentation and petition, requeſting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, found ſtraight what ſhe meant, and thought to haue gone thither himſelfe: howbeit, he ſent one before in all haſt that might be, to ſee what it was. Her death was very ſodaine: for thoſe whom Cæſar ſent vnto her, ran thither in all haſt poſſible, and found the ſouldiers ſtanding at the gate, miſtruſting nothing, nor vnderſtanding of her death. But when they had opened the doores, they found Cleopatra ſtarke dead, laid vpon a bed of gold, attired and arrayed in her royall robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feet: and her other woman (called Charmion) halfe dead, & trembling, trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra wore vpon her head. One of the ſoldiers ſeeing her, angrily ſaid vnto her: Is that well done Charmion? Very well, ſaid ſhe againe, and meete for a Princeſſe deſcended from the race of ſo many noble Kings: ſhe ſaid no more, but fell down dead hard by the bed. Some report, that this Aſpicke was brought vnto her in the basket with figs, and that ſhe had commanded them to hide it vnder the fig leaues, that when ſhe ſhould thinke to take out the figs, the Aſpicke ſhould bite her before ſhe ſhould ſee her: howbeit, that when ſhe wold haue taken away the leaues for the figs, ſhe perceiued it, and ſaid, Art thou here then? And ſo her arme being naked, ſhe put it to the Aſpicke to be bitten. Other ſay againe, ſhe kept it in a boxe, and that ſhe did pricke and thruſt it with a ſpindle of gold, ſo that the Aſpicke being angred withall, leapt out with great furie, and bit her in the arme. Howbeit few can tell the troth. For they report alſo, that ſhe had hidden poyſon in a hollow razor which ſhe caried in the haire of her head; and yet was there no marke ſeene of her bodie, or any ſigne diſcerned that ſhe was poiſoned, neither alſo did they find this ſerpent in her tombe: but it was reported onely, that there was ſeene certaine freſh ſteppes or trackes where it had gone, on the tombe ſide toward the ſea, and ſpecially by the doore ſide. Some ſay alſo, that they found two litle pretie bitings in her arme, ſcant to be diſcerned: the which it ſeemeth Cæſar himſelfe gaue credit vnto, becauſe in his triumph he caried Cleopatraes image, with an Aſpicke biting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Cæſar, though he was maruellous ſorie for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondred at her noble mind and courage, and therefore commaunded ſhe ſhould be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius: and willed alſo that her two women ſhould haue honourable buriall. Cleopatra died being eight and thirtie yeares old, after ſhe had raigned two and twentie yeares, and gouerned aboue fourteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, ſome ſay that he liued three and fiftie yeares: and others ſay, ſixe and fiftie. All his ſtatues, images, and mettals, were plucked downe and ouerthrowne, ſauing thoſe of Cleopatra which ſtoode ſtill in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her friends, who gaue Cæſar a thouſand talents that they ſhould not be handled as thoſe of Antonius were. Antonius left ſeuen children by three wiues, of the which, Cæſar did put Antyllus (the eldeſt ſon he had by Fuluia) to death. Octauia his wife tooke all the reſt, and brought them vp with hers, and maried Cleopatra, Antonius daughter, vnto king Iuba, a maruellous courteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius (the ſon of Fuluia) came to be ſo great, that next vnto Agrippa, who was in greateſt eſtimation about Cæſar; and next vnto the children of Liuia, which were the ſecond in eſtimation: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octauia hauing had two daughters by her firſt husband Marcellus, & a ſon alſo called Marcellus: Cæſar maried his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and ſo did adopt him for his ſon. And Octauia alſo maried one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was dead, after he had bene maried awhile, Octauia perceiuing that her brother Cæſar was very buſie to chuſe ſome one among his friends, whom he truſted beſt to make his ſonne in law: ſhe perſwaded him, that Agrippa ſhould marie his daughter (Marcellus widow) and leaue her owne daughter. Cæſar firſt was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and ſo ſhe afterwards tooke away her daughter and maried her vnto Antonius; & Agrippa maried Iulia, Cæſars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Octauia and Antonius: Domitius Ænobarbus maried the one; and the other, which was Antonia, ſo faire and vertuous a young

And of the ſonnes of Germanicus, the one whoſe name was Caius, came alſo to be Emperour: who after he had licentiouſly raigned a time, was ſlaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina alſo (hauing a ſonne by her firſt husband Ænobarbus, called Lucius Domitius) was afterwards maried vnto Clodius, who adopted her ſonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, who ſlue his owne mother, and had almoſt deſtroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madneſſe and wicked life, being the fifth Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

THE COMPARISON OF Demetrius with Antonius.

The power of Demetrius and Antonius.

NOw, ſithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of the much like to the other, hauing fortune a like diuers & variable vnto the: let vs therfore come to conſider their power & authorie, and how they came to be ſo great. Firſt of all, it is certaine that Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance frō his father Antigonus: who became the greateſt & mightieſt Prince of all the ſucceſſors of Alexander, and had won the moſt part of Asia, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary manner, borne of an honeſt man, who otherwiſe was no man of war, & had not left him any meane to ariſe to ſuch greatneſſe: durſt take vpon him to contend for the Empire with Cæſar, that had no right vnto it by inheritance, but yet made himſelfe ſucceſſor of the power, the which the other by great paine and trauell had obtained, and by his own induſtrie became ſo great, without the helpe of any other: that the Empire of the whole world being deuided into two partes, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greateſt countenance and power. Antonius being abſent, oftentimes ouercame the Parthians in battell by his Lieutenants, and chaſed away the barbarous people dwelling about mount Caucaſus, vnto the ſea Hyrcanium, inſomuch as the thing they moſt reproue him for, did moſt witneſſe his greatneſſe. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although ſhe was too old for him: becauſe ſhe was of a nobler houſe then himſelfe. Antonius on the other ſide was blamed for marying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for power and nobilitie of bloud, excelled all other kings in her time, but Arſaces: and moreouer, made himſelf ſo great, that others thought him worthie of greater things, then he himſelfe required. Now for the deſire that moued the one and the other to conquer Realmes: the deſire of Demetrius was vnblameable and iuſt, deſiring to raigne ouer people, which had bene gouerned at all times, and deſired to be gouerned by Kings. But Antonius deſire was altogether wicked and tyrannicall: who ſought to keepe the people of Rome in bondage and ſubiection, but lately before rid of Cæſars raigne and gouernment. For the greateſt and moſt famous exploite Antonius euer did in warres (to wit, the warre, in the which he ouerthrew Cassius and Brutus) was begun to no other end, but to depriue his countrimen of their libertie and freedome. Demetrius in contrarie manner, before fortune had ouerthrowne him, neuer left to set GREECE at libertie, and to driue the garrisons away, which kept the cities in bondage: and not like Antonius, that boasted he had slaine them that had set ROME at libertie. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius, was his liberalitie and bountie: in the which Demetrius excelled him so farre, that he gaue more to his enemies, then Antonius did to his friends: although he was maruellously well thought of, for the honourable and sumptuous funerall he gaue vnto Brutus bodie. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his enemies to be buried that were slaine in battell, and returned vnto Ptolomie all the prisoners he had taken, with great gifts and presents he gaue them. They were both in their prosperitie, very riotously and licentiously giuen: but yet no man can euer say, that Demetrius did at any time let slip any opportunitie or occasion to follow great matters, but onely gaue himselfe indeed to pleasure, when he had nothing else to do. And further, to say truly, he took pleasure of Lamia, as a man would haue a delight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing else to do, or is desirous to sleepe: but indeed when he was to make any preparation for war, he had not then lune at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came out of the Ladies closets picked and pinct to go to battell: but he let all dauncing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides saith:

The souldier of Mars, cruell, and bloudie.

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrow or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to follow his owne pleasure; as we see in painted tables, where Omphale secretly stealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him: euen so Cleopatra oftentimes vnarmed Antonius, and entised him to her, making him lose matters of great importance, and very needfull iourneis, to come and be dandled with her, about the riuers of Canobus, and Taphosiris. In the end, as Paris fled from the battell, and went to hide himselfe in Helens armes: euen so did he in Cleopatraes armes; or to speake more properly, Paris hid himselfe in Helens closet, but Antonius (to follow Cleopatra) fled and lost the victorie. Furthermore, Demetrius had many wiues that he had maried, and all at one time: the which was not disallowable or not forbidden by the kings of MACEDON, but had bene vsed from Philip and Alexanders time, as also king Lysimachus and Ptolomie had, and did honour all them that he maried. But Antonius first of all maried two wiues together, the which neuer ROMAINE durst do before, but himselfe. Secondly, he put away his first ROMAINE wife, which he had lawfully maried, for the loue of a strange woman, he fondly fell in fancie withall, and contrarie to the lawes and ordinances of ROME. And therefore Demetrius mariages neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wiues: but Antonius contrarily, was vndone by his wiues. Of all the lasciuious parts Antonius played, none were so abhominable, as this onely fact of Demetrius. For the Historiographers write, that they would not suffer dogges to come into the castle of ATHENS, because of all beasts he is too busie with bitcherie: and Demetrius, in Mineruaes temple it selfe lay with Curtisans, and there defiled many citizens wiues. And besides all this, the horrible vice of crueltie, which a man would thinke were least mingled with these wanton delights, is ioyned with Demetrius concupiscence: who suffered (or more properly, compelled) the goodliest young boy of ATHENS, to die a most pitifull death, to saue himselfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinencie, did no hurt but to himselfe, and Demetrius did hurt vnto all others. Demetrius neuer hurt any of his friends: and Antonius suffered his Vncle by his mothers side to be slaine, that he might haue his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing so damnable, wicked, and cruell of it selfe, that he hardly deserued to haue bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to haue saued his Vncles life. Now where they falsified and brake their othes, the one making Artabazus prisoner, and the other killing of Alexander: Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and iustest colour: for Artabazus had betrayed him, and forsaken him in MEDIA. But Demetrius (as diuers do report) deuised a false matter to accuse Alexander, to cloke the murther he had committed: and some thinke, he did accuse him, to whom he himselfe had done iniurie vnto: and was not reuenged of him, that would do him iniurie. Furthermore, Demetrius himselfe did noble feates of warre, as we haue recited of him before: and contrarily, Antonius, when he was not there in person, wanne many famous and great victories by his Lieutenants: and were both ouerthrowne being personally in battell, but yet not both after one sort. For the one was forsaken of his men being MACEDONIANS, and the other contrarily forsooke his that were ROMAINES: for he fled, and left them that ventured their liues for his honour. So that the fault the one did, was, that he made them his enemies that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he ſo beaſtly left them that loued him beſt, and were moſt faithfull to him. And for their deaths, a man cannot praiſe the one or the other, but yet Demetrius death was the more reprochfull: for he ſuffered himſelf to be taken priſoner, and when he was ſent away to be kept in a ſtraunge place, he had the heart to liue yet three yeares longer, to ſerue his mouth and bellie, as brute beaſts do. Antonius on the other ſide ſlue himſelfe (to confeſſe a troth) cowardly, and miſerably, to his great paine and griefe: and yet was it before his bodie came into his enemies hands.

THE LIFE OF Artaxerxes.

The parentage of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Rtaxerxes, the firſt of this name of all the kings of PERSIA, a noble and curteous Prince as any of all his houſe: was ſurnamed Long-hand, becauſe his right hand was longer then his left, and he was the ſon of king Xerxes. But the ſecond, whoſe life we preſently intend to write, was ſurnamed Mnemõ, as much to ſay, Great memory: & he was the ſon of the daughter of the firſt Artaxerxes. For king Darius, & his wife Paryſatis, had foure ſons, of the which, the eldeſt was this Artaxerxes, the ſecond Cyrus, and two other yonger, Oſtanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the name of the former ancient Cyrus, which in the PERSIAN tong ſignifieth the Sun. But Artaxerxes was called before Arſicas, although Dinon writeth, that he was called Oarſes. Howbeit it is vnlikely, that Cteſias (although his bookes otherwiſe be full of fables, and as vntrue as they are found) ſhould forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he ſerued, and continually followed, both him, his wife and children. Cyrus from his cradle was of a hote ſtirring mind, and Artaxerxes in contrary maner, more mild and gentle in all his actions and doings. He was maried to a very faire Ladie, by his father & mothers commandement: and afterwards kept her againſt their wils, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his father, hauing put his ſonnes wiues brother to death, he would alſo haue put her to death: but her husband with teares made ſuch humble ſute to his mother for her, that with much ado, he did not onely get pardon for her life, but graunt alſo that ſhe ſhould not be put

from him. This notwithstanding, his mother alwaies loued Cyrus better then him, and prayed that he might be king after his fathers death. Wherefore Cyrus being in his prouinces of Asia by the sea side, when he was sent for to come to the Court, at what time his father lay sicke of the disease he died: he went thither in good hope his mother had preuailed with his father, that in his will he would make him his heire of the realme of Persia. For his mother Paryſatis alleadged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did helpe king Xerxes in the like case, through Demaratus counsell. She said that Arſicas was borne before her husband Darius was king, and Cyrus after he was crowned king. All this could not preuaile: for her eldest son Arſicas, surnamed Artaxerxes, was assigned king of Persia, and Cyrus Gouernor of Lydia, and the kings Lieutenant general of all the low-countries of Asia toward the sea side. Shortly after king Darius death the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Paſargades, there to be consecrated & annointed king by the Priests of the country of Persia. The place of this Paſargades, is a temple dedicated vnto Minerua the goddesse of battels, as I take it: where the new king must be consecrated, and when he cometh into the temple, he putteth off his gowne, and putteth on that which the old auncient Cyrus wore before he was king. Furthermore, he must eate of a certaine tart or tricacie made of figs with turpentine: and then he must drinke a drinke made with vineger and milke. There are also certaine other secret ceremonies which they must keepe, and none do know, but the very Priests themselues. Now Artaxerxes being readie to enter into all these ceremonies, Tiſaphernes came vnto him, and brought him one of the Priests that had bene Cyrus schoolemaister in his youth, and had taught him Magicke, who by reason should haue bene more offended then any man else, for that he was not appointed king. And this was the cause why they beleeued him the better, when he accused Cyrus; for he said: That Cyrus had conspired treason against the king his brothers owne person, and that he meant traiterously to kill him in the temple, when he should put off his gown. Some do report, that Cyrus was apprehended vpon this simple accusation by word of mouth. Others write also, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding him selfe, he was taken with the maner, and bewrayed by the Priest. So, as he was going to suffer death, his mother tooke Cyrus in her armes, and wound the haire of her head about his necke, and tyed him straightly to her: and withall she wept so bitterly, and made such pitifull mone vnto the king her sonne, that through her intercession, the king graunted him his life, and sent him againe into his countrey and gouernment. But this satisfied not Cyrus, neither did he so much remember the king his brothers fauour vnto him, in graunting him his life, as he did the despite he had offered him, to be made prisoner. Insomuch that for this grudge and euill will, he euer after had a greater desire then before to be king. Some writers alleadge, that he entred into actuall rebellion against his brother by force of armes, because he had not sufficient reuenue to defray the ordinarie expence of his house: howbeit it is a meere folly to say so. For, though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might haue had of her what he would haue taken and desired. Againe, to shew that of himselfe he had abilitie enough: we need but alleadge the souldiers and straungers he gaue pay vnto, in diuers places, (as Xenophon writeth.) For he brought them not all together into one armie, because he desired to keepe his enterprise as secret as he could: but he had friends and seruants that leauied them in diuerse places, and vnder diuerse colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleared all suspitions conceiued against him. He himselfe also on the other side, whilest he made these preparations, wrote very humbly vnto his brother, somtime asking somwhat of him, and another time accusing Tiſaphernes: all to blind the king, to make him thinke that he bent all his malice and spite against him: besides that, the king of his own nature was somwhat dull, & slow, which the common people thought to proceed of his curtesie and good nature. At his first comming to the crowne, he followed the first Artaxerxes goodnesse and curtesie, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more easie audience vnto suters: he did also more honorably reward & recompence those that had deserued well: and he vsed such moderation in punishing of offenders, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious mind and desire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurt any man. When he had any thing giuen him, he tooke it as thankfully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankely also giue againe. For, how litle a thing soeuer was offered him, he tooke it well. And it is reported, that one Romiſes on a time presenting him a maruellous faire pomgranate: By the Sun (said he) this man in a short time, of a litle towne would make a great city, he that would make him gouernor of it. Another time there was a poore labourer seeing euery man giue the king a present, some one thing, some another, as he passed by them: he hauing nothing at hand to giue him, ranne to the riuers side, and tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offered it him. King Artaxerxes was so glad of it, that he sent him in a cup of massie gold, a thousand Dareckes, which were peeces of gold so named, because the image of Darius was stamped vpon them. And vnto one Euclidas a LACEDÆMONIAN, that presumed to giue him bold wordes, it pleased him to answer by one of his Captaines: Thou maist say what thou list; and I as king, may say and do what I list. An other time as he was a hunting, Tiribazus shewed the king his gown that was all too tattered: Well, said the king, and what wouldest thou haue me to do? Tiribazus answered him, I pray your Grace take another, & giue me that you haue on. The king did so, and told him: Tiribazus, I giue thee my gowne, but I cõmaund thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not for the kings commaundement that he should not weare it, not that he was any euill disposed man, but because he was a fond light headed fellow that cared for nothing: thereupon he straight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therwith, he did besides set on many iewels of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, & womens trinkets & ornaments. Therwithall euery man in the Court murmured at him, because it was a presumption, directly against the lawes & ordinances of PERSIA. Howbeit the king but laughed at it, & told him: I giue thee leaue Tiribazus to weare those womens gawds as a woman, & the kings robe as a foole. Furthermore, where the maner was in PERSIA, that no person sate at the kings boord, but his mother and wife, of the which, his mother sate vppermost, and his wife lowermost: Artaxerxes made his two brethren Ostanes and Oxathres sit at his owne bord: but yet he pleased the PERSIANS best of all, because he was content his wife Statyra should sit openly in her chariot, and that she might be seene and reuerenced by the other Ladies of the country. And this made him singularly beloued of the people. Now, such as desired innouation and change, and that could not away with quiet life: they gaue out that the Realme of PERSIA required such a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, giuen to armes, and greatly rewarded his seruants; and that the greatnesse of the Empire of PERSIA stood in need of a King, whose mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterprises. So Cyrus thereupon began to make warre vpon his brother, not onely trusting vnto them that were of the low countries about him, but hoping of those also in the high prouinces neare vnto the king. Furthermore, he wrote also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, to pray them to send him men of warre, promising to giue the footmen they sent, horses; and the horsemen, coaches; landed men, whole villages; and to those that had villages, to giue them cities: besides all this, that for the ordinarie wages of them that should serue him in this warre, he would not pay them by account, but by full measure. And boasting largely of himselfe, he said he had a greater mind then his brother, that he could better away with hardnesse then he, that he vnderstood Magicke better then he, and that he could drinke more wine then he, and carie it better: and that the king his brother in contrary manner was so womanish and fearefull, that when he went a hunting, he durst scarce get vpvpon his horse backe: and when he went to the warres, he would hardly take his chariot. When the LACEDÆMONIANS had read his letters, they sent a litle scrole vnto Clearchus, commaunding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would command him. So Cyrus did set forward to make war against his brother, hauing leauied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRECIANS, litle lesse then thirteene thousand men: somtime aduertising one cause, somtime another, why he leauied such a multitude of men. But his purpose could not be long dissembled: for Tisaphernes went himself vnto the Court, to bring newes of his attempt. Then all the Court was straight in an vprore withall. Many men also did accuse the Queene mother, for the practise of this warre, and all her friends and seruants were vehemently suspected to be conspiratours with Cyrus: but the greatest thing that troubled Parysatis most, was Queene Statyra her daughter in lawe, who stormed maruellously to see this warre begun against king Artaxerxes her husband, and incessantly cryed out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedst by oath? whereto are thy intercessions come thou madest, for the pardon of his life: who now conspireth his brothers death? By sauing of his life, art not thou now the cause of this warre and troubles we see at hand? After this reproch and shame receiued by Statyra, Parysatis being a cruell and malicious woman of nature, so hated her, that from thencefoorth she sought all the waies she could to put her to death. And Dinon the Historiographer saith: That during this war, she did execute her wicked purpose vpon her: but Ctesias writeth, that it was after the warre. And therfore it is liker, that he being daily in the king of PERSIAES court, shold certainly know the time when she did execute her her treaſon againſt her, and alſo there is no cauſe why he ſhould rather write it in any other time, then in that in the which the fact was done: although in many other places he cõmonly vſeth to fitten,& to write deuiſes of his owne head. Therfore let vs leaue the report of this fact to the ſelfe ſame time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare vnto his brothers country, he had newes, and a rumor ran through his campe, that the king was not determined to come and fight with him ſo ſoone: and that he meant firſt to go further into PERSIA, and to tary there till he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for proofe hereof, the king hauing caſt a great trench of ten yards broad,& as many high, the ſpace of foure hundred furlongs in length: he left it without guard, and let Cyrus win it, who came on further without any reſiſtance, euen to the very citie ſelfe of BABYLON. Howbeit in the end, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the firſt man that durſt tell the king, that he ſhould not flie fight in that ſort, nor hide himſelfe in the fartheſt part of PERSIA, leauing his enemie the Realmes of MEDIA, BABYLON, and SVSA: conſidering alſo that he had many moe ſouldiers in readineſſe then his enemie, and an infinite number of Captaines more skilfull, and able to giue counſell, and to fight, then he was. Theſe words of Tiribazus made the king alter his mind, and to determine to giue battell as ſoone as he could. Thereupon he marched forward againſt his enemy, with nine hundred thouſand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruellouſly aſtonied Cyrus men, and made them afraid at the firſt when they ſaw them in ſo excellent good order before them: for that they were diſperſed ſtraggling here and there without any order, and men vnarmed, truſting too much in themſelues in deſpiſing of their enemie: ſo that Cyrus had much ado to ſet his men in battell ray, and yet was it with great noiſe and tumult. But the GRECIANS wondred moſt of all other, when they ſaw the kings armie march in ſo good order of battell without any noiſe: for they thought to haue ſeene a wonderfull great diſorder and confuſion, in ſuch an infinite multitude of people; and ſuppoſed they would haue made ſuch a noiſe, that one of them ſhould not haue heard another. Where indeed to the contrary, all was ſo well martialled, ſpecially becauſe he had placed before his battel the beſt carts he had, armed with ſythes, and drawne with the ſtrongeſt and biggeſt great horſe he had in all his armie: hoping by the fierceneſſe and furie of their careire, to breake into the rankes of the enemies, before they could come to ioyne with theirs. But ſith this battell is deſcribed by diuerſe Hiſtoriographers, but ſpecially by Xenophon, who hath (as a man would ſay) liuely ſet it out to the eye, and ſetteth it forth to the Reader, not as a battell alreadie fought, but preſently a fighting, ſtirring vp their minds, as if themſelues were in the action and inſtant danger (he hath ſo paſſingly ſet it downe) it were but a folly therefore of me to take vpon me to make any further deſcription of it, ſauing to touch ſome ſpeciall points worthie of note, which he peraduenture hath left out. As, the place where the battell was fought, is called COVNAXA, fiue hundred furlongs from BABYLON: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counſell to keepe behind the ſquadron of the GRECIANS, and not to hazad his perſon among the firſt: and that Cyrus anſwered him, What ſayeſt thou Clearchus? wouldeſt thou haue me that ſtriues to be king, to ſhew my ſelfe vnworthie to be a king? But Cyrus hauing made this fault, not ſtanding vpon his ſafety and guard, but ouer-raſhly thruſting himſelfe into great danger: Clearchus ſelfe alſo committed as great a fault (if it were not worſe) when he would not ſet his men in order directly againſt the battell of the enemies, where the kings perſon ſtood, but went and pent them vp by the riuers ſide, being afraid leaſt they ſhould haue bene compaſſed in behind. For if he would haue looked ſo ſtraightly to himſelfe, and haue prouided euerie way for his ſafety, that no man might come to hurt him: he ſhould haue kept himſelfe at home, and not haue ſtirred one foote out of the doores. But ſith he had come ſo farre, as from the low countries of ASIA, vnto the place where the field was fought, and vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers ſeate and Imperiall crowne, to go chuſe a place in the battell, not where he might do his Lord beſt ſeruice that had hired him, but rather where he might fight more at his eaſe, and at leſſe daunger: it was euen as much, as if through cowardlineſſe his wits had bene taken from him when he ſhould haue fought, or that through treaſon he had forſaken his enterpriſe. For, to proue that the troupes which were about the kings perſon, had neuer bene able to haue receiued the charge of the GRECIANS, and that thoſe being ouerthrowne, the king had bene ſlaine in the field, or elſe forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonne the field, and by this victorie had bene king: the ſucceſſe of this battell doth plainely ſhew it. And therefore Clearchus ouer-curious reſpect, deſerued more blame for the loſſe of this battell: then Cyrus ouerhardineſſe. For if king Artaxerxes would haue choſen or wiſhed a place where the GRECIANS might haue done him leſſe hurt: he could not haue deuiſed a fitter place that was ſo far from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither ſee nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in ſequele. For Cyrus was ſlain before he could preuaile by Clearchus victory, he was ſo far from him: and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meeteſt to be done. For he commaunded Clearchus to place himſelfe with his company in the middeſt of the battell: who aunſwered him, he ſhould take no thought for any thing, for he would ſee all things well ordered. And when he had ſayd ſo, he marred all afterwards: For where the GRECIANS were, they ouerthrew the barbarous people that made head againſt them, and had them in chaſe while they were weary of following them. Cyrus being mounted vpon a hote ſtirring horſe, that had a hard head, and was very fierce and dogged, called Paſacas, as Cteſias writeth: Artagerſes, the gouernor of the prouince of the CADVSIANS, ſpied him a farre off, and when he had found him, clapped ſpurres to his horſe, and came with full cariere vnto him, and cried out: O traytor, and moſt vnfaithfull and deſperate man, thou now diſhonoreſt the name of Cyrus (which is the goodlieſt and moſt honorable name of all the PERSIANS) for that thou haſt brought ſo valiant GRECIANS hither to ſo wicked an enterpriſe, to ſpoile the PERSIANS goods, in hope to deſtroy thy ſoueraigne Lord & onely brother, who hath an infinite number of ſlaues and ſeruants farre honeſter men then thou wilt be while thou liueſt, and that thou ſhalt preſently know by proofe, for thou ſhalt die before thou ſee the king thy brothers face: and therwithall he threw his dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus armor was ſo good, that it pierced him not: yet the blow came with ſuch good will, that it made him ſtagger on his horſe backe. When Artagerſes had giuen him that blow, he preſently turned his horſe. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him ſo happily, that he ſlue him right in the place aboue the bone that ioyneth the two ſhoulders together: ſo that the head of his dart, ran quite through his necke. Now, that Cyrus ſlue Artagerſes with his owne hands in the field, all the Hiſtoriographers do agree vpon it: but for the death of Cyrus, becauſe Xenophon toucheth it but a litle by the way, for that he was not preſent in the very place where he was ſlaine: it ſhall not be hurtfull particularly to ſet downe the maner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and alſo of Cteſias. Firſt, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had ſlaine Artagerſes, he went with great furie, and flew in amongſt the troupe of them which were neareſt vnto the kings perſon, and that he came ſo neare the king, that he ſlue his horſe ſtarke dead vnder him, & the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, ſtraight mounted the king againe vpon another horſe, and ſayd vnto him: Your Grace will remember this battell another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping ſpurres againe to his horſe, threw another dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the king told them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather dye then ſuffer it: ſo therewithall he ſpurring his horſe to charge Cyrus (who came fiercely and deſperately, hauing an infinite number of blows with darts throwne at him on euery ſide) threw his dart at him alſo. So did all thoſe that were about his perſon: and ſo was Cyrus ſlaine in this conflict. Some ſay, that he was ſlaine with the wound the king his brother gaue him. Others ſay, that it was a man at armes of the countrey of CARIA, vnto whom the king for reward of his good ſeruice, gaue him the honor in all battels to cary before the firſt ranke, a cocke of gold on the top of a ſpeare: for the PERSIANS do call the CARIANS cockes, becauſe in the warres they vſe to weare creaſts in the top of their head-peeces. And this is Dinons report. But Cteſias, to couch in few words that which Dinon reporteth at large, ſaith: that Cyrus after he had ſlaine Artagerſes, he gallopped on the ſpurre againſt the king himſelfe, and the king againſt him, and not a word betweene them both. Arieus one of Cyrus flatterers, threw the firſt dart at the king, but killed him not: and the king with all his force againe threw his dart, thinking to haue hit Cyrus, but he miſſed him, and ſlue Tiſaphernes, one of the valianteſt and ſtouteſt men Cyrus had about him, and ſo fell downe dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes ſo ſore a blow on his breaſt, that he pierced his armor, and entred into his fleſh two fingers deepe. The king with this blow fell downe to the ground: therewithall the moſt part of his men about him were ſo afraid, that they forſooke him and fled. Howbeit he got vp againe, with the helpe of others that were about him, amongſt whom Cteſias ſayd he was one: and ſo recouered a litle hill not farre off, to take a little breath. In the meane time, Cyrus horſe that was hot in the mouth, and hard headed as we haue told you: caried his maiſter ſpite of his heart farre from the men, among his enemies, and no man man knew him, becauſe it was night, and his men were verie buſie in ſeeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had won the victory being of a hot ſtirring nature, and valiant: he went vp and downe in the thickeſt of his enemies, crying out in the PERSIAN tongue, Saue your ſelues poore men, ſaue your ſelues. When they heard him ſay ſo, ſome made a lane for him to paſſe by them, and did him reuerence: but by euill fortune his Tiara (which is the high royall hat after the PERSIAN maner) fell off from his head. Then a yong PERSIAN called Mithridates, paſſing by him, hit him a blow with his dart vpon one of his temples, hard by his eye, not knowing what he was. His wound ſtraight fell on a maruellous bleeding. Whereupon, Cyrus ſtaggering at it, fell to the ground in a ſownd, and his horſe ranne away from him: but the capariſon he had vpon him fell to the ground all bloudied, and his page that had hurt him, tooke it vp. Shortly after Cyrus being come to himſelfe againe, ſome of his Eunuches (which were men gelt, and groomes of his chamber) that were about him, did lift him vp, thinking to ſet him vpon another horſe, and to get him out of the preaſe: but he was not able to ſit on his horſe. Thereupon he proued if he could better go on foote, and the Eunuches held him vp by the armes, and led him amazed as he was, not able to ſtand on his feete, although he thought he had won the battell: becauſe he heard his enemies flying about him cry, The gods ſaue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receiue them to mercy. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the city of CAVNVS, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and ſlaues, to do moſt vile ſeruice. They ioyned with the troupe where Cyrus was, ſuppoſing they had bin the kings men: but when they perceiued in the end by the red coates they wore vpon their armors, that they were enemies, for that the kings men wore white coats: there was one among the reſt that valiantly ſtrake at Cyrus behind with his partizan, not knowing indeed that it was Cyrus. The blow lighted full on the hamme of his legge and cut his ſinewes ſo, that Cyrus fell withall; and falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great ſtone with his brow, where he had bene hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Cteſias report it: where me thinketh he cutteth his throat with a dull edged knife, he hath ſuch ado to bring Cyrus to his end. Now after Cyrus was dead, Artaſyras, one of king Artaxerxes Eunuches (whom they called the kings Eye in the Court) paſſing by on horſebacke, knew Cyrus Eunuches that mourned very pitifully, lamenting the death of their maiſter. So he asked the Eunuch whom Cyrus loued beſt: Who is that that is dead, ô Pariſcas, that thou weepeſt ſo bitterly? Pariſcas anſwered him againe, Seeſt thou not Artaſyras, this it is Cyrus but newly dead? Artaſyras wondred much when he ſaw him. So he comforted the Eunuch, and willed him in no caſe to go from the bodie: and in the meane time he gallopped a pace to the king, who thought he had loſt all, and was verie ill beſides, both for the great thirſt he ſuffered, as alſo for the wound he had on his breaſt. Now when the Eunuch came vnto the king, and told him with a ſmiling countenance the newes, how he had ſeene Cyrus dead: the king was ſo ioyfull at the newes, that he was deſirous himſelfe foorthwith to go vnto the place where he lay to ſee him, and commanded Artaſyras to bring him thither. But after he had conſidered better of it, he was counſelled not to go thither himſelfe for feare of the GRECIANS, who they ſayd wonne all, and were yet chaſing and killing them in the field, that fled: but rather that he ſhould ſend a good company of men thither, to bring him iuſt report, whether the newes were true of his death, or not. Vpon this aduice he ſtayed, and ſent thither thirty men, euerie man with torches in their hands. In the meane time, one of the Eunuches called Satibarzanes, ranne vp and downe to ſee if he could get anie water for the king, that was almoſt dead for thirſt: for there was no water neare vnto him where he was, and beſides, his campe was far from him. His Eunuch hauing runne vp and downe a great way to ſeeke it, met by chaunce with theſe poore ſlaues and porters the CAVNIANS, among the which one of them caried in an old ragged goates skinne, about eight glaſſe-fuls of naughtie ſtinking water. So he preſently caried the ſame to the king, who dranke it vp euerie whit. When the king had drunke it, the Eunuch asked him, if that naughtie water did him no hurt. The king ſware by the gods vnto him, that he neuer dranke better wine, nor ſweeter water then that was, nor that pleaſed him better then that did: and therefore, ſayd he, I beſeech the gods, if it be not my hap to find him that gaue thee this water to reward him, yet that it will pleaſe them to ſend him good fortune. As the king was talking thus with his Eunuch, the thirtie men with their torches returned vnto him, who altogether with ioyfull countenance, confirmed the good newes he looked not for: and then there were come together againe a greater number of ſouldiers about him, and ſtill came moe

Artaxerxes armie, of nine hundred thouſand fighting men, againſt his brother Cyrus.

one after another, that he began againe to be couragious. Then he came downe into the plaine, with a world of lights and torches about him, and went ſtraight to the place where his brother Cyrus bodie lay. There, following the ancient manner of the PERSIANS againſt traytors to the king: he cauſed his head and right hand to be ſtriken off, and then made his head be brought vnto him, the which he tooke by the haires of his head (for Cyrus wore them long and thicke) and did himſelfe ſhew it vnto them that fled ſtill and were afraid, to encourage them againe. They wondering to ſee it, did him humble reuerence, and ſo gathered by companies about the king, that in a ſmall time there were gathered together about him, threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards the campe. Indeed Cteſias ſaith, that he had but foure hundred thouſand fighting men in all: but Dinon and Xenophon ſay more. And for the number of them that were ſlaine, Cteſias ſaith: that word was brought to the king, that there were not aboue nine thouſand ſlaine, howbeit that to fight they ſeemed to be no leſſe then twenty thouſand: but for that point, he might be talked withall, in either of both. And furthermore, where he ſaith that the king did ſend him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN vnto the GRECIANS, and others with him: that is a flat lie. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Cteſias waited vpon the king, becauſe he ſpeaketh of him in diuerſe places of his hiſtory: and if he had bene appointed by the king to carie report vnto the GRECIANS of ſo waighty a matter, it is like inough Xenophon would not haue concealed it, when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Cteſias (as it appeareth by his writings) was a very ambitious man, & partiall vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, but ſpecially vnto Clearchus: and is glad when he can get any occaſion to ſpeake of himſelfe for his glorie, of LACEDÆMON, and of Clearchus. Now after this battell, king Artaxerxes ſent goodly rich gifts vnto Artagerſes ſon, whoſe father Cyrus had ſlaine with his own hands and (as it is reported) did alſo greatly honor Cteſias and many others: and did not forget alſo to cauſe the poore CAVNIAN ſlaue to be ſought out, that had giuen him the water to be caried to him which ſaued his life: and when he had found him out, of a poore wretch vnknowne before, he made him a rich noble man. He ſeuerely puniſhed thoſe alſo that had offended the martial law, as amongſt others, Arbazes, one of the MEDES: who (when the battell was ioyned) fled firſt on Cyrus ſide, and then, when he vnderſtood he was ſlaine, he returned againe to the kings ſide. For, ſuppoſing that it was rather timorouſneſſe and cowardly nature, then for treaſon or ill will he bare him: he compelled him to carie a whore on his backe ſtarke naked, all day long about the market place. And to another (who beſides he had yeelded himſelfe to his enemies, falſly boaſting that he had ſlaine two) he made his toung to be boared through in three ſeuerall places with a cordiners aule. Now the king being of opinion that it was himſelfe that had ſlaine his brother Cyrus with his owne hand, and being deſirous that euery man ſhould ſo thinke and ſay: he ſent preſents vnto Mithridates, that had hurt him firſt in the forehead, and commanded him that caried the gifts vnto him, to tell him from the king: The king doth ſend thee theſe preſents, becauſe thou finding firſt the capariſon of Cyrus horſe, diddeſt bring it vnto the king. The CARIAN alſo, that had cut the ham of his legge wherewith Cyrus fell downe, asked his gift likewiſe: which the king gaue him, and bad the meſſenger tell him, The king doth giue thee this, becauſe thou waſt the ſecond perſon that brought him the good newes: for Artaſyras was the firſt, and thou the ſecond, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleaſed in his mind with theſe words, he went his way, and ſayd nothing then, nor made any thing ado: but the vnfortunate CARIAN fondly fell into a fooliſh vaine, cõmon vnto men. For, the ſudden ioy he felt (as it ſeemeth) to ſee ſuch a goodly rich preſent before him, as the king ſent him, made him ſo forget himſelfe, that he began to aſpire, and to pretend greater things then became his ſtate and calling. And therefore he would not take the kings gift, as in reſpect that he had brought him word of Cyrus death: but began to ſtorme, and to rage, calling the gods to witneſſe, that it was he onely, and none other, that ſlue Cyrus, and that they did him great wrong, to take this honour from him. The king being told of it, tooke it ſo angrily: that he preſently commanded them to ſtrike of his head. But Paryſatis (the Queene mother) being preſent when the king gaue this commaundement, ſhe prayed him not to put him to death in that ſort: for the villaine (ſayd ſhe) let me alone, I will chaſtiſe him well inough for his preſumption and raſh ſpeech. The king was contented ſhe ſhould haue him. Thereupon ſhe ſent the Sergeant to take this curſed CARIAN, and made him be hanged vpon a gibbet ten dayes together; and at the ten dayes end cauſed his eyes to be pulled out of his head: and laſt of all, poured molten mettall into his eares, and ſo killed killed the villaine with this kind of torment. Mithridates alſo ſhortly after, died miſerably by a like folly. He was bidden to ſupper at a feaſt, whither came alſo the king and Queene mothers Eunuches: and when they came, Mithridates ſate downe at the boord in the kings golden gowne he gaue him. When they had ſupped, and that they began to drinke one to another, one of Paryſatis Eunuches ſayd vnto Mithridates: The king hath indeed giuen thee a goodly gowne Mithridates, and goodly chaines and carcanets of gold, and ſo is the ſword very rich and good he gaue thee, ſo that when thou haſt that by thy ſide, there is no man (I warrant thee) but wil thinke thee a happy man. Mithridates then, the wine fuming into his braine, anſwered ſtraight: What meaneſt thou by that, Sparamixes? I deſerued a better then this, when the battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, anſwered, I do not ſpeake it for any hurt or euill will I beare thee, Mithridates: but to ſpeake frankly among our ſelues, becauſe the GRECIANS haue a common prouerbe, that Wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valiant act was it to take vp a capariſon of a horſe that fell on the ground, and to carie it to the king? which the Eunuch ſpitefully put foorth vnto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to prouoke him to ſpeake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a haſty man of nature, and could not keepe his tongue, and leaſt of all when he had drunke ſo well as he had done, and ſo it fell out indeed. For Mithridates could not bite it in, but replied ſtraight: You may talke as long as you liſt of the capariſon of a horſe, & ſuch traſh, but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was ſlaine with mine owne hands, & with no mans elſe. For I hit him not in vaine as Artagerſes did, but full in the forehead hard by his eye, and ſtrake him through and through his head againe, and ſo ouerthrew him, of which blow he died. He had no ſooner ſpoken thoſe words, but the reſt that were at the boord, caſt down their eies, foreſeeing the death of this poore and vnfortunate Mithridates. But then the maiſter of the feaſt began to ſpeake, and ſayd vnto him: Friend Mithridates, I pray thee let vs drinke and be merrie, and reuerence and thanke the good fortune of our king; and for the reſt, let this talke go, it is too high for vs. When the Eunuch went from thence, he told Paryſatis (the Queene mother) what Mithridates had ſayd before them all: and ſhe went and told the king of it. Who was maruellouſly offended withall to be ſo belied, and to loſe the thing that was moſt honourable, and beſt pleaſed him in his victorie. For it was his mind, that all the world (both GRECIANS and barbarous people) ſhould certainely beleeue, that in the battell betwixt him and his brother he was hurt, but yet that he ſlue Cyrus with his owne hand. So the king commaunded that Mithridates ſhould ſuffer the paines of death in boates, the which is after this manner. They take two boates made of purpoſe ſo euen, that the one is neither broader nor longer then the other, and then lay the offender in one of them vpon his backe, and ſo couer him with the other, and do ſow both boates together: ſo that the parties feete, hands, and head do come out at holes made of purpoſe for him, the reſt of his body is all hidden within. Now they giue him meate as much as he will eate, and if he will not eate, they force him to it, by thruſting aules in his eyes: then when he hath eaten, they giue him honey to drinke mingled with milke, and they do not onely poure it into his mouth, but alſo all his face ouer, turning him full into the Sunne, ſo that his face is all couered ouer with flies: and furthermore, being driuen to do his needs in that trough, of his excremẽts there ingender worms that eate his bodie to the very priuities. Then, when they ſee the man is dead, they take off the vppermoſt boate, and find all his fleſh deuoured with vermine ingendred of him, euen to his very intrals. So, when Mithridates had miſerably languiſhed in this maner, ſeuenteene dayes together: at length he died in extreame torments. Now Paryſatis (the Queene mother) lacked no more to accompliſh her wicked deſire, but Meſabates, one of the kings Eunuches that had cut off Cyrus head and hand; & ſeeing that he was very warie and circumſpect in his behauior, that ſhe could not take him at any aduantage: in the end ſhe deuiſed a fine way to intrap him. She had a maruellous wit, and among other things could play paſſingly well at all games at dice, and did manie times play with the king her ſon before the warres: and after the warres alſo, when he had made peace, ſhe did play at dice with him as ſhe had done before, in ſo much as ſhe knew all his ſecret loue, and furthered him to enioy it. To be ſhort, ſhe would neuer be out of his ſight but as litle as ſhe could, and would let his wife Statira haue as litle time with him as might be, that ſhe might gouerne and rule him as ſhe would: both becauſe ſhe hated her of al creatures liuing, and alſo for that ſhe would beare the greateſt ſway and credite about him. When ſhe ſaw the king one day at leiſure, not knowing how to paſſe the time away: ſhe inticed him to play a thouſand Dareckes at dice, and was contented to loſe them willingly, and payed the thouſand Dareckes downe, seeming notwithstanding to be angrie with her losse. So she prayed him also to play one of his Eunuches with her: and the king was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed betweene them that they should both name and except fiue of the trustiest and chiefest Eunuches they had: and then, which of them lost, should presently deliuer vnto the winner his choise of all the other Eunuches he would demand. Thus they fell to play, and she imploying all the cũning she had, & playing as warily as she could possible, besides that the dice ran on her side, her lucke serued her so, that she wan: and then she required Mesabates for her winnings, being none of those the king had excepted. When she had him deliuered her, she gaue him to the hangman, & willed him to flea him aliue, & then that they should crucifie him, & naile him to a crosse, and hang his skin vpon another peece of timber by him: the which was done accordingly. The king was maruellous angry withall when he knew it, and grieuously offended with his mother. Howbeit she sported it out, and laughing told him: Indeed it becomes thee well to be angry for loosing an old gelded villaine, where I lost a thousand Darecks quietly, & sayd neuer a word. So there came no other thing of it, sauing that the king was a litle angry, & repented him that he had played so fondly and was so finely mocked. But Queene Statira on the other side (besides that she was against her in all other things) spared not to tell Queene mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the kings good and faithfull seruants so cruelly to death, for Cyrus sake. But now, after that Tisaphernes (king Artaxerxes Lieutenant) had deceiued Clearchus, and other Captaines of Greece, detestably falsifying his word he had giuen them, & that he had sent them bound vnto the king: Ctesias saith, that Clearchus prayed him to helpe him to a combe, & that hauing had one by his means, & so combed his head, it pleased him so well, that to requite his goodwill, he gaue him his seale of armes from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, for a witnesse of the great friendship that was betweene them two. He saith also, that in the stone of this ring there was grauen the daunce of the Caryatides. And furthermore, that the other souldiers which were prisoners with Clearchus, did take away the most part of the victuals that were sent to him, & left him litle or nothing: & that he did remedy all this, procuring a greater quantitie to be sent vnto thẽ, & that they shold put Clearchus portion apart, & all the other soldiers parts by thẽselues. This he did, as he saith, by Parysatis consent & cõmandement, who knowing that amongst other victuals they daily sent Clearchus a gammon of bacon: she told him one day he should do well to hide a litle knife in this gammon of bacon, and to send it him, to the end that the life of so noble and valiant a man as he was, should not fall to the cruelty of the king. Howbeit, that he was afraid to meddle withall, and durst not do it: & that the king sware, & promised his mother (who was an earnest suter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithstanding, the king being afterwards procured, and perswaded to the contrary, by Queene Statira his wife: he put thẽ all to death, but Menon. Therfore Parysatis (Queene mother) after that time (saith Ctesias) deuised all the waies she could to poyson Queene Statira, & to make her out of the way. But me thinketh this smelleth like a lie, that Parysatis should intend so wicked and dangerous an act, as to put the kings lawfull wife to death, by whom he had sonnes that were to inherite the Crowne, only for the loue and respect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coined that, to honor and magnifie Clearchus memory the more. But to proue it, a man may easily find it by the lies he addeth afterwards vnto it: saying, that after the Captaines were slaine, all the bodies of the rest were torne in peeces by dogs and fowles: and also that there came a boisterous wind, and couered all Clearchus body with a great hill of dust, and that out of this hill of dust shortly after there sprung vp many palme trees, which made a prety thicke groue, that it shadowed all that place. Insomuch that the king himselfe did afterwards maruellously repent him for putting him to death, for that he was an honest man, & beloued of the gods. This was not for Clearchus sake, but for an old cankered malice Parysatis had long time borne in her heart against Queene Statira: becausse she saw well inough, that the credite and authoritie her selfe had with the king, was in respect of a sons duty and obedience to his mother; and in contrary maner, Statiraes credit and authoritie had a better ground and foundation, becausse it came of the loue and goodwill the king did beare her. And this is the only cause that made her to practise the death of Queene Statira, hauing determined that her selfe, or daughter in law, must needs die. Now Queene mother had one of the women of her chamber called Gigis, that was of great credite about her, & whom she only trusted. Dinon writeth, that this Gigis did helpe Parysatis to make the poyson: but Ctesias writeth contrarily, and saith, that she onely knew it, but otherwise that it was against her will: and

and that he that made the poyſon, was one Belitaras, but Dinon calleth him Melantas. Now, though in outward ſemblance and ſhew Queene mother and Statira ſeemed to haue forgotten all malice between them,& that they began againe one of thē to keepe company with the other, & did eate & drinke together: yet one of them miſtruſted the other, and tooke great heed to thē-ſelues, both of them eating one ſelfe meate, and in one diſh together, and were both ſerued with one ſelfe officers and men. In PERSIA there is a litle bird, of the which all the parts of it is excellent good to eate, and is full of fat within: ſo that it is thought it liueth by aire and dew, and in the PERSIAN tongue they call it Ryntaces. Paryſatis, as Cteſias ſaith, tooke one of theſe birds, and cut it in the middeſt with a litle knife, the which was poyſoned onely on one of the ſides, and gaue that halfe which was poyſoned vnto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Paryſatis her ſelfe that gaue it her, but her caruer Melantas that carued her meate, and ſtill gaue Queene Statira of that meate which the ſide of his poyſoned knife had touched. So Queene Statira preſently fell ſicke of the diſeaſe whereof ſhe died, with grieuous pangs and gripings in her bowels, and found plainely that ſhe was poyſoned by Paryſatis meanes: whereupon ſhe told the king as much, who was of the ſame opinion, and thought it was his mother, becauſe he knew her cruell reuenging mind, that neuer pardoned any, againſt whom ſhe conceiued any grudge. The king therefore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his mothers houſhold ſeruants and officers, and did put them to torments, to make them confeſſe the troth, ſauing Gigis, whom Queene mother kept cloſe in her chamber a long time, and would neuer ſuffer the king to haue her: who earneſtly requeſted her to deliuer her vnto him. Notwithſtanding, Gigis her ſelfe at length prayed Queene mother to giue her leaue one night to go home to her houſe. The king vnderſtanding it, layed waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when ſhe was taken, he condemned her to ſuffer the paines of death ordained for poyſoners, the which in PERSIA is executed in this maner. They make them put their head vpon a great plaine ſtone, and with another ſtone they preſſe and ſtrike it ſo long, till they haue daſhed the braines of the malefactor out of their head. After this ſort was Gigis put to death. Now for Paryſatis his mother, the king did her no other hurt, nor ſayd any more vnto her, but cōfined her to BABYLON according to her deſire, and ſware, that whileſt ſhe liued, he would neuer ſee BABYLON. In this ſtate ſtood the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes hauing done the vtmoſt he could to haue ouercome the GRECIANS which came to make warre with him in the heart of his Realme, and would haue bene as glad of that, as he was to haue ouercome Cyrus, and to keepe his crowne and Realme: he could neuer preuaile againſt them. For, though they had loſt Cyrus that gaue them entertainment, and all their priuate Captaines that led them: they ſaued themſelues notwithſtanding, being in the heart of his Realme, and ſhewed the PERSIANS by experience, that all their doings was nothing but gold and ſiluer, curioſity, and faire women; or otherwiſe, nothing but pompe and vanity. Hereupon all the GRECIANS became couragious, and deſpiſed the barbarous people: inſomuch that the LACEDÆMONIANS thought it a great ſhame and diſhonor vnto them, if they did not deliuer the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the ſlauery & bondage of the PERSIANS, & keepe them from the open violence & crueltie of the barbarous people. For they hauing at other times attempted to do it by their Captaine Thimbron, & afterwards alſo by Dercillidas, whom they ſent thither with an armie, & hauing done nothing worthy memory: at length they determined, to ſend their king Ageſilaus thither in perſon, who paſſing through ASIA with his ſhips, began preſently to make hote warre againſt the PERSIANS as ſoone as euer he had landed his armie. For, at the firſt conflict he ouerthrew Tiſaphernes (the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant) in battell, and made the moſt part of the cities of GRECE that are in ASIA, to rebell againſt him. Artaxerxes looking into this warre, and wiſely conſidering what way and meanes he was to take, to make warre with the GRECIANS: he ſent into GRECE one Hermocrates a RHODIAN (of great credite about him) with a maruellous ſumme of gold and ſiluer, bountifully to beſtow in gifts among the nobilitie and chiefe rulers of the cities of GRECE, to make all the other GRECIANS to riſe againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS. Hermocrates wiſely executed his commiſſion, for he made the chiefeſt cities of GRECE to rebell againſt LACEDÆMON: ſo that all PELOPONNESVS being vp in armes, and in great garboile, the Ephori at LACEDÆMON were inforced to ſend for Ageſilaus home againe. Ageſilaus being ſory to depart out of ASIA, ſayd vnto his friends: that the king of PERSIA had driuen him out of his Realme with thirtie thouſand archers: becauſe that the PERSIAN coine is ſtamped with an archer, hauing a bow in his hand.

Artaxerxes also draue the LACEDÆMONIANS out of all their iurisdiction by sea, by the meanes of Conon, Generall of the ATHENIANS, whom Pharnabazus (one of his Lieutenants) had won to take his part. For Conon, after he was ouerthrowne in battell at a place called the Goats riuer, kept euer after in the Ile of CYPRVS, not so much for the safety of his person, as also for that it was a meete place to stay in, vntill the wars of GRECE were appeased. He, knowing that the deuice he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution; and on the contrary side, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe iudgement to be imployed: wrote letters vnto him of his aduice what he thought to do, straightly charging him whom he deliuered his letters vnto, that if he could possibly, she should cause the same to be deliuered vnto the king by Zenon the CRETAN, one of the kings dancers, or by one Polycritus his Phisitian, borne in the citie of MENDE: and in both their absences, then to giue it vnto Ctesias, to deliuer vnto the king. It chanced so, that this letter came to the hands of Ctesias; who (as it is reported) added moreouer vnto the contents of the letter, that the king should send him to Conon, because he was a necessary man to be imployed in his seruice, but specially by sea. Ctesias saith not so: but writeth that the king of his owne voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Now, after Artaxerxes had through the leading of Conon and Pharnabazus, won the battell by sea neare to the Ile of GNIDVS, & that thereby he had driuen all the LACEDÆMONIANS from their iurisdiction by sea, all GRECE had him in maruellous great estimation: so that he gaue vnto the GRECIANS with such cõditions as he would, that so famous peace, called Antalcidas peace. This Antalcidas was a citizen of SPARTA, the son of one Leon, who fauoring king Artaxerxes affaires, procured by the treaty of this peace, that the LACEDÆMONIANS left vnto Artaxerxes all the cities of GRECE in ASIA, & all the Iles contained in the same, to enioy quietly, making them pay tribute at his pleasure. This peace being concluded with the GRECIANS (if so shamefull a treason, reproch & common infamy to al GRECE may be called a peace, as neuer war fell out more dishonorable and infamous for the vanquished) king Artaxerxes, that otherwise hated the LACEDÆMONIANS to the death, and that esteemed them (as Dinon writeth) the impudentest men liuing: did notwithstanding loue Antalcidas passingly wel, and entertained him very honorably, when he came into PERSIA vnto him. It is reported, that the king one day tooke a garland of flowers, and did wet it with the most precious and sweetest oile of perfume that was prepared for the feast, & sent the same vnto Antalcidas: insomuch as euery man maruelled to see the king set so much by him. Indeed he was a meet man to follow the vanity and curiositie of the PERSIANS, and had well deserued such a garland to be sent him: who was so bold to dance a dance before the PERSIANS, mocking and counterfeiting Leonidas & Callicratidas, two of the valiantest men that euer were in GRECE. Therefore one sayd at that time in the presence of king Agesilaus: O how vnhappie is poore GRECE at this day, when the LACEDÆMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Agesilaus presently answered him againe, Not so, sayd he: but rather the PERSIANS follow the LACEDÆMONIANS. Notwithstanding, this wise answer Agesilaus made, did not take away the shame of the fact: and shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS lost the battell of LEVCTRES, and therewith also the signiority and principality they had kept of long time ouer all GRECE, although they had lost their estimatiõ before, for consenting to so shamefull and dishonorable a peace. When SPARTA florished most, and was chiefe of all the other cities of GRECE: so long did Artaxerxes still continue to make much of Antalcidas, and called him, his friend. But after that the LACEDÆMONIANS had lost the battell of LEVCTRES, hauing receiued so great an ouerthrow and wanting money: they sent Agesilaus into ÆGYPT, and Antalcidas into PERSIA vnto king Artaxerxes, to pray him to aide and helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Howbeit, the king made so small account of him, and disdained him so much, denying him and his requests: that he returned backe to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the king. And there also seeing that his enemies mocked him; and fearing that the Ephori would cõmit him to prison: he killed himselfe with famine. About that time also, the THEBANS after they had won the battell of LEVCTRES, sent Ismenias and Pelopidas into PERSIA, vnto king Artaxerxes: where Pelopidas did nothing vnworthy of himselfe. Howbeit, Ismenias being commanded to kneele to the king, he let fall his ring at his feet, and stouped to take it vp: whereby it was thought of some, that he did it to kneele to the king. Another time Artaxerxes liking a secret aduertisement very well, sent him from Timagoras the ATHENIAN: he gaue him ten thousand Daricks by his Secretarie called Belluris. And because he had a sickly bodie, and was driuen to drinke cowes milke to restore him: the king therefore sent foure score milch kine with him him to giue milke to the paile, to haue fresh milke euerie day. Furthermore, he sent him a bed throughly furnished with all things necessary, & groomes of the chãber to make his bed, saying, that the GRECIANS could not tell how to make it: and did also let him haue men to cary him vpon their armes to the sea side, because he was sicke, and whilest he was at the Court, he entertained him very honorably and bountifully. So Ostanes, the kings brother, sayd one day vnto him: Timagoras, remember how honourably thou art serued at thy boord, for it is for no small matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cut him for his treason, then for any remembrance of the benefit receiued. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condemned the same Timagoras to die, because he had taken bribes and money of the king of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recompence of so many other things that he had done, to despite the GRECIANS with, he did one thing that pleased them maruellously: when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfullest enemie the GRECIANS had. Paryſatis the Queene mother did helpe to bring this to passe, aggrauating the accusations brought in against him: for the king kept not his anger long against his mother, but fell in againe with her, & sent for her, knowing that she had an excellent wit & noble courage to gouerne a great kingdome: and besides, that there was nothing now to let them to come together as much as they would, to giue any occasion of iealousie or malice to any person. So euer after, his mother Paryſatis endeuored her selfe to feed the king her sonnes humour euerie maner of way, seeming to mislike nothing that he did: whereby she grew in so great credite with him, that he denied her nothing whatsoeuer she asked him. So she perceiued, that the king was extreamly in loue with one of his own daughters, that was called Atoſſa: howbeit that he dissembled his loue the best he could, and kept it secret, chiefly for feare of her, although some write, that indeed he had already had her maiden-head. Now Paryſatis hauing found his loue, she began to make more of his daughter then she did before, and talking with her father, sometime she praised her beauty, another time her grace and good countenance, saying that she was like a Queene and noble Princesse: so that at length by litle and litle she perswaded him to marry her openly, not passing for the lawes and opinions of the GRECIANS, considering that God had giuen him vnto the PERSIANS, to stablish lawes vnto them, to decide right from wrong, and the good from the bad. Some Historiographers do write, and amongst them Heraclides of CYMES: that Artaxerxes did not onely marry the eldest of his daughters, but the second also called Ameſtris, of whom we will speake hereafter. Now when he had maried the eldest, Atoſſa, he loued her so entirely well, that though she fell sicke of the disease commonly called Vitiligo, that ran ouer all her bodie: he loued her not the worse for it, but prayed continually for her vnto the goddesse Iuno, honoring no other goddesse but her onely, and fell downe on his knees before her image, and sent by his friends and Lieutenants so many offerings, that all the way from his Court gates vnto the temple of Iuno (which was sixteene furlongs off) was full of gold, siluer, rich purple silkes, and horse that were sent thither. He began to make warre also with the ÆGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ATHENIAN, his Lieutenants, who did no good, because they fell at variance the one with the other. But afterwards, Artaxerxes himselfe went in person to conquer the CADVSIANS with three hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen. So he inuaded their country, which was a very rude country, alway darke and cloudie: the earth bringeth forth nothing that man soweth, but doth only feed the inhabitants with peares, apples, and such like fruit, and yet the men be verie strong and valiant notwithstanding. So when he was entred farre into the country before he was ware, he fell into great want of victuals, and was also in great danger. For his souldiers found nothing in all the countrey that was good to eate; and worst of all, no victuals could come vnto them from any place, because of the hardnesse and naughty wayes of the country: so that his campe liued onely with the flesh of their beasts of cariage, and yet they sold it dearly; for, an Asses head was sold for three score siluer Drachmaes. To conclude, the famine was so great, that prouision failed for the kings owne mouth, and there were but few horse left, for all the rest were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes bene chiefe about the king, because he was a valiant man, and that through his folly was many times also out of fauor, as at that present time, when he had no authoritie nor estimation: he deuised a stratageme, whereby he saued the king and all his campe. In this country of the CADVSIANS, there were two kings in the field with their armies, both of them camped asunder one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had spoken with king Artaxerxes, and had told him what he meant to do: he went vnto one of the kings, and at the selfe same time also secretly sent his sonne vnto the other king, and told either of them, that the other king had sent Ambassadors vnto Artaxerxes to make peace with him, vnwitting to his companion; and therefore he counselled them, if they were wise, one of them to seeke to preuent another with all the possible speed he could, and promised them both, one after another, to helpe them the best he could. Both the one and the other of the kings gaue credite to his words, either of them both mistrusting one another: so that the one speedily sent his Ambassadours vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus; and the other also his Ambassadors with his sonne. But Tiribazus tarying long in his iourney, king Artaxerxes began somewhat to suspect him: his enemies also did accuse him in his absence, and the king grew very cholericke, and repented him that he had trusted him so farre, and was willing to heare euery man that spake against him. Howbeit, Tiribazus at length returned, and his son also, and either of them brought with them the Ambassadours of the CADVSIANS, and so peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft againe, and in greater credite then euer he was, and so departed with the king. The king then shewed plainely, that cowardlinesse proceedeth not of pompe and curiosity, as some take it, beleeuing that it doth effeminate mens hearts, but rather of a vile base mind, that commonly followeth euill, and the worst counsell: for neither the iewels of gold, the kingly robe, nor other sumptuous ornaments which the king euer wore about him, worth twelue thousand talents (as it is reported) did not hinder him at that time to trauell, and to take as much paine as any man in all his armie. For he himselfe marched on foote the foremost man, carying his owne trusse in a scarfe vpon his shoulders, and his target on his arme, and trauelled through high stonie mountaines. So that, his souldiers seeing the courage and paine the king himselfe tooke, they marched so nimbly, that it seemed they had wings: for he daily marched aboue two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by sore trauell, came to one of his owne houses, where there were goodly arbors & parks, with goodly trees passingly set forth: but all the countrey besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a tree a great way from thence, and it was maruellous cold. The king suffered his souldiers to hew downe the goodly pines and cypres trees in his parkes: and because they durst not presume to touch them, he himselfe as he was, tooke an axe in his hand and began to hew downe the goodliest tree there. The souldiers seeing that, fell euery man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short time they had prouided themselues well with wood, and made them great fires in euery place, and so past ouer the night quietly by the fires side. This notwithstanding, he lost a great number of valiant men in this voyage, and almost all his horses. Therefore, thinking his men would mocke him because he did faile of his purpose: he began to grow mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefest noble men he had about him: so that in a rage he put many of them to death; but much more of them remained, whom he mistrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloudsucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary maner nothing is more courteous, and lesse suspitious, then a valiant and hardie man. And therefore brute beasts that be neuer made tame nor mastered, are commonly cowardly, and timorous: and the other on the contrary, that are noble and couragious, are bold, and do come straight to know a man, because they haue no feare, neither do they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they do. Afterwards, king Artaxerxes being growne very old, heard that there was great stirre and contention between his sonnes which of them should be heire after his death, and that this contention fell out also among his friends and men of great calling. The wisest of them wished, that as he himselfe came vnto the crowne, as his fathers eldest sonne: so, that he likewise should after his death leaue it vnto his eldest sonne, called Darius. But the yonger, which was called Ochus, being a valiant man, and of a hote stirring nature, had some in the Court also that tooke his part, and hoped to attaine to his purpose, by the meanes of his sister Atossa, whom he loued and honoured, promising to marry her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers decease. And besides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he secretly kept her: howbeit Artaxerxes neuer vnderstood it. Now, because he would betimes put his sonne Ochus out of all hope to succeed him in his kingdome, least this expectation might make him go about to practise that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme should grow into faction and ciuill warres: he proclaimed his eldest sonne Darius (being fiftie yeares old) king after his death; and furthermore, gaue him leaue from thencefoorth to weare the point of his hat right vp. In PERSIA the custome is, that when any commeth to be proclaimed successour and heire apparant to the crowne, he should require a gift of him that proclaimeth him him ſucceſſour. The which the other doth graunt him, whatſoeuer it be that he asketh, ſo it be not impoſſible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aſpaſia, who was firſt with Cyrus, and in greateſt fauour with him aboue all the reſt, but then was for the kings owne body. She was borne in the countrey of IONIA, of free parents: and being vertuouſly brought vp, ſhe was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at ſupper, with other womē, who ſate them downe without too curious bidding hard by him, and were verie glad when Cyrus offered to play and be merry with them, giuing euery one of them ſome pleaſant word, and they made it not coy. But Aſpaſia ſtood on her feete by the table, and ſayd neuer a word: and notwithſtanding that Cyrus called her, ſhe would not come at him. Moreouer, when one of the groomes of his chamber would haue taken her to haue brought her to him: The firſt, ſaith ſhe, that layeth hands on me ſhall repent it. Thereupon all thoſe that were preſent, ſayd ſhe was a fooliſh thing, and ſimply brought vp, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, paſſed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought them vnto him: Doeſt thou not ſee, that of all theſe thou haſt brought me, there is not an honeſt woman but ſhe? After that, Cyrus began to make much of her, and loued her better continually then all the reſt, and called her Aſpaſia the wiſe. This Aſpaſia was taken among the ſpoiles of Cyrus campe after he was ouerthrowne; and Darius as we haue told ye, did beg her of his father, who was very angry with it in his mind. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruellous iealous of their women, ſo that not onely he ſhould be put to death, that durſt but ſpeake to, or touch any concubine of the kings but in ſport: but alſo whoſoeuer came neare them, or neare their coaches as they trauelled. The kings daughter Atoſſa, whom he had maried againſt all law, was yet liuing, & beſides her he had alſo three hundred and threeſcore paſſing faire concubines: and yet when his ſonne Darius asked Aſpaſia of him, the king anſwered, ſhe was a free woman borne, and therefore if ſhe would, he was content he ſhould haue her: but if ſhe were vnwilling to go to him, then he would not haue him force her by any means. So Aſpaſia was ſent for, and ſhe was asked with whom ſhe had rather be. She anſwered, With Darius: contrary to king Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the cuſtome, and alſo the law, was compelled to let him haue her. But ſhortly after he tooke her from him againe, ſaying that he would place her in a Nunrie of Diana, in the countrey of ECBATANE, where they call her Anitis, there to ſerue the goddeſſe, and to liue chaſt all the dayes of her life: ſuppoſing by this meanes to puniſh his ſon, not rigorouſly, but moderatly, with griefe mixt with ſport and earneſt. Howbeit his ſon tooke it not ſo patiently, either becauſe he was deeply in loue with Aſpaſia, or elſe for that he ſaw his father mocked him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, & perceiuing that Darius tooke it very grieuouſly: he aggrauated his anger againſt his father, knowing the paſſion of loue in Darius, by his owne vpon the like occaſion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, and had promiſed Pharnabazus one of them, called Apama: vnto Orontes, Rodogoune: and to Tiribazus, Ameſtris. The king performed the other two mariages, and did put Tiribazus by his wife. For the king himſelfe maried his owne daughter Ameſtris; and for her, he promiſed Tiribazus the yonger, Atoſſa: with whom alſo he himſelfe fell in loue, and maried her. Tiribazus herupon was in ſuch a rage with the king, that he hated him to the death: not becauſe he was any traytor or ſeditious man in nature, but a mad hare-brain'd fellow. For ſomtime he was aloft, and in as good credite and authority as the beſt: ſuddenly againe he would play ſome mad part to anger the king, and then he was in as much diſgrace, and out of countenance: and could away with neither fortune. For when he was in authoritie, he made euery man hate him for his pride: and being in diſgrace, he could not humble himſelfe, but looke bigger then before. Now there was fire and brimſtone met, when Tiribazus tooke part with Darius. For he daily blew into his eares, that it was to no purpoſe for him to weare his hat right vp, if his affaires alſo went not rightly forwardly: and that he deceiued himſelfe much, if he did not know that his brother (by meanes of the women he kept) ſecretly aſpired to the crowne: and that his father being ſo vnconſtant as he was, he muſt not truſt in any ſort to ſucceed his father in the kingdome, what proclamation ſoeuer he hath made in his behalfe to the contrary. For, ſayd he, he that for a GRECIAN woman hath broken and violated the holieſt law that was in PERSIA: thou muſt not looke that he will performe that he hath promiſed thee. And furthermore, he perſwaded him, that it was not a like repulſe vnto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for: as it was for him to be turned out of all that euer he had gotten. For ſaid he, If it pleaſe Ochus to liue like a priuate man, he may ſafely do it, and no man will trouble him: but for himſelfe that was already proclaimed king, he muſt of neceſſity make himſelfe king, or elſe he muſt not liue. So, the Poet Sophocles his ſaying moſt commonly proueth true:

For the way is large and plaine for a man to beleeue as he liſt, and men commonly are giuen rather to beleeue the euill then the good, becauſe moſt men know not what goodneſſe meaneth. But now beſide theſe perſwaſions, the greatneſſe of the kingdome, and the feare Darius ſtood in of his brother Ochus, tooke great force and effect with him: and it may be alſo, that Venus her ſelf did ſomwhat in the matter, for the malice and ſpite that Aſpaſia was taken from him. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, thus was it handled: that Darius flatly conſpired againſt his father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they hauing gotten many conſpirators to ioyne with them, one of the kings Eunuchs perceiuing it, ran and told the king of it, and how they had ſuddenly determined to aſſaile him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among themſelues, that they ſhould kill him in his bed in the night. Artaxerxes receiuing this aduertiſement, thought it was not good to be careleſſe of a matter of ſo great importance, as his life: and alſo that it were too great lightneſſe in him ſo ſuddenly to beleeue his Eunuch, without better proofe or knowledge. So he tooke this way with himſelfe. He commaunded the Eunuch that had giuen him this information, to keepe company ſtill with the conſpirators, and to follow them whereſoeuer they went, to ſee their doings: and in the meane time he beate downe his wall behind his bed, and made a doore through, and ſet vp a hanging of tapeſtry before it. When the time was come, as the Eunuch had aduertiſed the king, that the traytors meant to do their feate: Artaxerxes being layd on his bed, roſe not vp, till he had ſeene euery traytor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then, when he ſaw them comming towards him with their ſwords drawne, he ſuddenly lift vp the hanging, and got into his inner chamber, & ſhut the doore after him, making an out-cry, Murder, murder. So, the traytors being plainely ſeene and knowne by the king, fled the ſame way they came, and failed of their purpoſe, and bad Tiribazus ſaue himſelfe, becauſe he was knowne. So they diſperſed themſelues, & ſcaped by flying. But Tiribazus was taken tardy, although he had ſlaine diuers of the kings guard, valiantly defending himſelfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was ſtriken with a dart a good way off, which ſlue him. Darius was alſo taken and apprehended, and brought priſoner with his ſons: and the king referred him to be iudged by his Peeres. For the king himſelfe would not be preſent to giue iudgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuſe him: howbeit, he commanded his Secretaries to ſet downe in writing, the opinion and ſentence of euerie one of the Iudges, and to bring it to him. In fine, they all caſt him, and condemned him to die. Then the officers layd hold on him, & brought him into a chamber of the priſon, where the hangman came with a razer in his hand, with the which he vſed to cut mens throats ſo cõdemned to die. So the hangman comming into the chamber, when he ſaw it was Darius, he was afraid, and came out of the chamber againe, his heart failing him, and durſt not lay hands vpon the perſon of the king. But the Iudges that ſtood without the chamber, bad him go and do it, vnleſſe he would haue his owne throat cut. So the hangman then came in, and tooke Darius by the haire of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and ſo cut his necke with his razer he had in his other hand. Others do write, that this ſentence was giuẽ in the preſence of king Artaxerxes ſelfe, and that Darius ſeeing himſelfe conuicted by manifeſt proofes brought in againſt him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and beſought him to pardon him: and then, that his father being angrie, roſe vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in ſo many places withall, that at length he ſlue him. Then returning into his Court, he worſhipped the Sunne, & turning him to his Lords that were about him, he ſayd vnto them: My Lords, God be with you, and be merry at home in your houſes, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken reuenge of them, that practiſed treaſon againſt me. This was the end of Darius treaſon. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother ſtood in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, and the rather through the meanes and friendſhip of his ſiſter Atoſſa: but yet of his legitimate brethren, he feared Ariaſpes, who was onely left of all the reſt that were legitimate: and of his baſtard brethren, Arſames: not becauſe Ariaſpes was elder then he, but for that (he being of a ſoft and plaine nature) the PERSIANS therefore deſired he might be their king. On the other ſide, Arſames was wiſe, and valiant: and Ochus ſaw that his father loued him dearely. So he determined to intrap them both. Now Ochus being a ſubtile and malicious natured man, he firſt ſhewed his cruelty vpon Arſames, and his malice vpon Ariaſpes his legitimate brother. For, becauſe he knew he was but ſimple and plaine, he ſent daily ſome of the kings Eunuches vnto him, who brought him threatning words and meſſages, as from the king: telling him, that he had determined to put him to a ſhamefull and cruell death. So, forging theſe newes continually as things very ſecret, they did ſo terrifie poore Ariaſpes, telling him, that the king was fully bent to put ſome of his threates in execution out of hand; that he was put in ſuch feare and diſpaire of his life, that he prepared himſelfe a poiſon, and dranke it, to rid himſelfe of his life. King Artaxerxes vnderſtanding of his death, took it very heauily, and began to miſtruſt the cauſe that made him to make himſelf away: howbeit, he could not ſeeke the proofe of it, for his extreame age. But this chaunce made him loue Arſames better then before, ſhewing plainely that he truſted him better then Ochus, and did make him priuie to all things. Ochus could no longer abide to deferre his intent, and therfore intiſed Harpaces, Tiribazus ſonne, to kill his baſtard brother Arſames; the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was ſo extreame old, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his ſonne Arſames was murthered, he could beare it no longer, but tooke it ſo to his heart for ſorrow, that when he had liued foureſcore and fourteene yeares, and raigned threeſcore and two, he died. When he was dead, they then found that he had benea gracious and courteous Prince, and one that loued his people and ſubiects; when they ſaw the proofe of his ſucceſſor Ochus, that paſſed all men liuing, in crueltie and ſeueritie.

THE LIFE OF Dion.

LIke as Simonides (ô Soſius Senecio) ſaith, that the citie of ILLIVM was not offended with the CORINTHIANS, for that they came to make war with thẽ with other GRECIANS, becauſe Glaucus (whoſe firſt anceſtors came from CORINTH) had taken armes, and louingly fought for the ſame: euen ſo me thinkes, that neither the GRECIANS, nor ROMAINES haue cauſe to complaine of the Academie, ſith they be both alike praiſed of the ſame in this preſent booke, in the which are contained the liues of Dion and Brutus. Of the which, the one of them hauing bene very familiar with Plato himſelfe, and the other from his childhood brought vp in Platoes doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one ſelfe ſchoole-houſe to attempt the greateſt enterpriſes amongſt men. And it is no maruell if they two were much like in many of their doings, prouing that true, which their ſchoolemaiſter Plato wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the gouernement of a commonwealth, which ſhould be famous and of credite; authoritie, and good fortune, muſt both meete in one ſelfe perſon, ioyned with iuſtice and wiſedome. For as a certaine fencer (called Hippomachus) ſaid, that he knew his ſcholers farre off, if he did but ſee them comming from the market with meate in their hands: ſo it muſt needs follow, that men hauing bene vertuouſly brought vp, muſt needs be wiſe in all their doings; and beſide that it bringeth them to ciuilitie and honeſtie, euen ſo it frameth their conditions much like one to another: furthermore, their fortunes hauing alſo fallen out both alike, more by chance then by any reaſon, do make their liues very like to each other; for they were both of them ſlain, before they could bring their enterpriſes to paſſe which they had determined. But the greateſt wonder of all is this: that their deaths were foreſhewed vnto them both, by a wicked ſpirit that viſibly appeared vnto either of them: albeit there be ſome that cannot abide thoſe opinions, and do maintaine, that theſe ſights and euill ſpirits do neuer appeare to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of litle children, or old women, or of ſome men whoſe wits are weakened by ſickneſſe, and ſo haue a certaine imagination of ſuch ſtrange ſights, being of this ſuperſtitious mind, that they haue a wicked ſpirit, and an euill angell in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them graue and learned Philoſophers, and very conſtant men, not ouercome by any ſodaine paſſion or imagination of mind, haue bene moued by ſuch ſights and ſpirits, and haue alſo told it vnto their friends: I cannot tell whether we ſhall be enforced, to grant the moſt ſtraunge and olde opinion of this, which ſaith: That there be euill ſpirits which enuying the vertue of good men to withdraw them from their godly minds, do make them affraid with theſe fearefull ſights, inticing them to forſake their godlineſſe, leſt that perſiſting therein, they ſhould be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let vs referre this diſputation to ſome other booke: and now in this twelfth couple of theſe famous mens liues compared, let vs firſt begin to write the life of him that is the elder of theſe two men we ſpeake of.

Dionyſius the elder, after he had the gouernement of SICILIA in his hands, he maried the daughter of Hermocrates, a citizen of SYRACVSA. But yet not being throughly ſetled in his tyrannie, the SYRACVSANS did rebell againſt him, and did ſo cruelly & abhominably handle the bodie of his wife, that ſhe willingly poiſoned her ſelfe. So, after he had eſtabliſhed himſelfe in his gouernment with more ſuretie then before, he maried againe two other wiues together, the one a ſtranger of the citie of LOCRES, called Doride: and the other of the country it ſelfe, called Ariſtomaché, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefeſt man of all SYRACVSA, and that had bene companion with Dionyſius, the firſt time he was choſen General. It was ſaid that Dionyſius maried them both in one day, and that they could neuer tell which of them he knew firſt: but otherwiſe, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly ſate together with him at his table, and did either of them lie with him by turnes; though the SYRACVSANS would haue their owne countriwoman preferred before the ſtraunger. Howbeit, the ſtraunge woman had this good happe, to bring foorth Dionyſius his eldeſt ſonne, which was a good countenance to defend her being a forreiner. Ariſtomaché in contrarie manner, continued a long time with Dionyſius without fruit of her wombe, although he was very deſirous to haue children by her: ſo that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accuſing her that ſhe had with ſorceries and witchcraft, kept Ariſtomaché from being with child. Dion being the brother of Ariſtomaché, was had in great eſtimation at the firſt, for his ſiſters ſake: but afterwards the tyrant finding him to be a wiſe man, he loued him then for his owne ſake. Inſomuch, that among many ſundrie things and pleaſures he did for him; he commanded his Treaſurers to let him haue what money he asked of them, ſo they made him acquainted withall the ſelfe ſame day they gaue him any. Now, though Dion had euer before a noble mind in him by nature, yet much more did that magnanimitie increaſe, when Plato (by good fortune) arriued in SICILE. For his comming thither ſurely was no mans deuiſe, (as I take it) but the very prouidence of ſome god: who (bringing far off the firſt beginning and foundation of the libertie of the SYRACVSANS, and to ouerthrow the tyrannicall ſtate) ſent Plato out of ITALY vnto the citie of SYRACVSA, and brought him acquainted with Dion, who was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter wit to learne, & readier goodwill to follow vertue, then any yong man elſe that followed Plato; as Plato himſelfe writeth, and his owne doings alſo do witneſſe. For Dion hauing from a child bene brought vp with humble cõditions vnder a tyrant, & acquainted with a ſeruile timorous life, with a proud & inſolent raigne, with al vanitie and curioſitie, as placing chiefe felicitie in couetouſnes: neuertheleſſe, after he had felt the ſweet reaſons of Philoſophie, teaching the broad way to vertue, his hart was enflamed ſtraight with an earneſt deſire to follow the ſame. And becauſe he found that he was so easily perswaded to loue vertue and honestie, he simply thinking (being of an honest plain nature) that the selfe same perswasions would moue a like affection in Dionysius; obtained of Dionysius, that being at leasure, he was contented to see Plato, and to speake with him. When Plato came to Dionysius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, and they chiefly reasoned, what was fortitude: where Plato proued that tyrants were no valiant men. From thence passing farther into iustice, he told him, that the life of iust men was happie; and contrarily, the life of vniust men, vnfortunate. Thus the tyrant Dionysius perceiuing he was ouercome, durst no more abide him, and was angry to see the standers by make such estimation of Plato, and that they had such delight to heare him speake. At length he angrily asked him, What businesse he had to do there? Plato answered him, he came to seeke a good man. Dionysius then replyed againe: What, in Gods name, by thy speech thē it seemeth thou hast found none yet. Now Dion thought, that Dionysius anger would proceed no further, & therfore at Platoes earnest request, he sent him away in a galley with three bankes of oares, the which Pollis a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine caried backe againe into GREECE. Howbeit, Dionysius secretly requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as euer he would do him pleasure: if not, yet that he would sell him for a slaue, howsoeuer he did: for, said he, he shall be nothing the worse for that; because, if he be a iust man, he shall be as happie to be a slaue, as a freeman. Thus (as it is reported) this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of ÆGINA, and there sold him. For the ÆGINETES hauing war at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the ATHENIANS that were taken in their Ile, shold be sold. This notwithstanding, Dionysius refused not to honor & trust Dion, as much as euer he did before, & did also send him Ambassador in matters of great waight: as when he sent him vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaued himself so well, that he wan great reputation by his iourny: and the tyrant could well away with his plaine speech. For no man but he, durst say their minds so boldly vnto him, to speake what he thought good: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked Gelons gouernement before the tyrants face, and that Dionysius himselfe said (finely descanting on his name, which signifieth, laughter) that he was euen the very laughing stocke himselfe of SICILE: the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretation of laughter passingly well: but Dion not being well pleased withall, said vnto him: For his sake men trusted thee, wherby thou camest to be tyrant: but for thine owne sake they will neuer trust any man: for (to say truly) Gelon shewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as could be, to see a citie gouerned by an absolute Prince: but Dionysius by his gouernmēt on the other side, made it appeare as detestable a thing. This Dionysius had by his LOCRIAN wife, three children; and by Aristomaché, foure: of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophrosynè, and the other Areté. Of them, Dionysius eldest son maried Sophrosyné, and Areté was maried vnto his brother Thearides: after whose death Dion maried her, being his Neece. Now when Dionysius her father fell sicke, not likely to escape: Dion would haue spoken with him for his children he had by his sister Aristomaché. Howbeit the Phisitians about him, to curry fauor with the next heire and successor of the tyrannie, would neuer let him haue any time or oportunitie to speake with him. For (as Timæus writeth) they gaue Dionysius the elder (as he had cōmanded them) a strong opiat drinke to cast him in a sleepe, and so therby they tooke from him all his senses, and ioyned death with his sleepe. Notwithstanding, in the first counsell and assemblie holden by his friends, to consult about the state and affaires of the younger Dionysius: Dion moued matter so necessarie and profitable for that present time, that by his wisedome he shewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke speech made them know, that they were but slaues of the tyrannie: because they beastly and cowardly gaue such counsell and aduise, as might best please and feed the young tyrants humour. But, he made them most to wonder at him, when they fearing aboue all other things, the daunger Dionysius state was in, by reason of CARTHAGE, he did promise them, that if Dionysius would haue peace, he would then go foorthwith into AFRICKE, and find the meanes honourably to quench the warres: or, if otherwise he better liked of warre, that he would furnish him at his owne proper costs and charges, fiftie gallies readie to rowe. Dionysius wondred greatly at the noble mind of Dion, and thanked him much for the goodwill he bare vnto him, touching his estate. But all men else taking Dions noble offer to be a reproch of their auarice; and his credite and authoritie, an impaire vnto theirs: they presently vpon this liberall offer tooke occasion to accuse him, not sparing any reprochfull words against him, to moue Dionysius to be offended with him. For they complained of him, and said, that he cunningly practised to possesse the tyrannie, making him-

ſelfe ſtrong by ſea, going about by his gallies to make the tyrannie fall into the hands of the children of Ariſtomache his ſiſter. But the chiefeſt cauſe of all why they did malice and hate him, was his ſtraunge maner of life: that he neither would keepe companie with them, nor liue after their maner. For they that from the beginning were crept in fauour and friendſhip with this young ill-brought-vp tyrant, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleaſures; ſtudied for no other thing, but to entertaine him in loue matters, and other vaine exerciſes, as to riot and banquet, to keepe light women companie, and all ſuch other vile vicious paſtimes and recreations: by the which the tyrannie became like iron ſoftened by fire, and ſeemed to be very pleaſant vnto the ſubiects, becauſe the ouer-great maieſtie and ſeueritie thereof was ſomwhat milder, not ſo much by the bountie and goodneſſe, as by the folly and retchleſneſſe of the Lord. Thus, this litle care and regard increaſing more and more, ſtill winning way with the young tyrant; did at length melt and breake a ſunder thoſe ſtrong Diamond chaines, with the which Dionyſius the elder made his boaſt that he left his Monarchie and tyrannie chained to his ſon. For ſometime he would be three daies together without intermiſſion, ſtill banquetting and being drunke: and all that time his Court gates were kept ſhut vnto graue and wiſe men, and for all honeſt matters; and was then full of drunkards, of common playes, dancings, masks, and mummeries, & full of al ſuch trumperie and diſſolute paſtimes. And therfore Dion vndoubtedly was much enuied of them, becauſe he gaue himſelfe to no ſport nor pleaſure: wherupon they accuſed him, and miſnamed his vertues, vices, being ſomewhat to be reſembled vnto them; as in calling his grauitie, pride; his plainneſſe and boldneſſe in his oration, obſtinacie; if he did perſwade them, that he accuſed them; and becauſe he would not make one in their fond paſtimes, that therfore he deſpiſed thē. For, to ſay truly, his maners by nature had a certaine haughtineſſe of mind and ſeueritie, and he was a ſower man to be acquainted with: wherby his company was not only troubleſome, but alſo vnpleaſant to this younger Dionyſius, whoſe eares were ſo fine, that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, diuers of his very friends & familiars (that did like and commend his plaine manner of ſpeech and noble mind) did yet reproue his ſterneneſſe, and auſtere conuerſation with men: for it ſeemed vnto them, that he ſpake too roughly, & dealt ouer hardly with them that had to do with him, and more then became a ciuil or courteous man. And for proofe hereof, Plato himſelfe ſomtime wrote vnto him (as if he had propheſied what ſhould happen) that he ſhould beware of obſtinacie, the companion of ſolitarineſſe, that bringeth a man in the end to be forſaken of euery one. This notwithſtanding, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any man elſe, becauſe of the ſtate and gouernment, and for that they thought him the only man that could beſt prouide for the ſafetie and quietneſſe of the tyrannie, the which ſtood then in tickle ſtate. Now Dion knew well enough, that he was not ſo well taken and eſteemed through the goodwill of the tyrant, as againſt his will, and for the neceſſitie of the ſtate and time. So Dion ſuppoſing that ignorance, & want of knowledge in Dionyſius was the cauſe: he deuiſed to put him into ſome honeſt trade or exerciſe, & to teach him the liberal ſciences, to frame him to a ciuill life, that thencefoorth he ſhould no more be afraid of vertue, and ſhould alſo take pleaſure & delight in honeſt things. For Dionyſius of his owne nature, was none of the worſt ſort of tyrants, but his father fearing that if he came once to haue a feeling and conceit of himſelfe, or that he companied with wiſe & learned men, he would go neare to enter into practiſe, & put him out of his ſeate; he euer kept him locked vp in a chamber, & would ſuffer no man to ſpeake with him. Then the yonger Dionyſius, hauing nothing elſe to do, gaue himſelfe to make litle chariots, candleſticks, chaires, ſtooles, and tables of wood: for his father Dionyſius was ſo fearefull & miſtruſtfull of euery body, that he would ſuffer no man with a paire of Barbers ſizers to poule the haires of his head, but cauſed an image-maker of earth to come vnto him, and with a hote burning cole to burne his goodly buſh of haire round about. No man came into his chamber where he was with a gowne on his backe, no not his owne brother nor ſon, but he was driuen (before he could come in) to put off his gowne, and the guard of his chamber to ſtrip him naked, whatſoeuer he was: and then they gaue him another gowne to caſt vpon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines going about to deſcribe vnto him the ſituation of ſome place, he tooke a halbard from one of the guard, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a plot of the ſame vpon the ground. Dionyſius was terribly offended with him, and did put the ſouldier to death that gaue him his halbard. He ſaid, he was affraid of his friends, yea and of the wiſeſt of them; becauſe he knew that they deſired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to commaund, maund, then to obey. He slue one of his Captaines called Marsyas (whom he had preferred and had giuen him charge of men) becausse he dreamed, that he killed him: saying, that he dreamed of this in the night, becausse that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionysius that was so timorous, and whose mind through fearefulnesse was still miserably occupied; was notwithstanding maruellously offended with Plato, becausse he did not iudge him to be the noblest and valiantest man aliue. Dion therefore seeing (as we haue said) the younger Dionysius cleane marred, and in manner cast away for lacke of good education; perswaded him the best he could to giue himselfe vnto studie, and by the greatest intreatie he could possibly make, to pray the Prince of all Philosophers to come into Sicile. And then, when through his intreatie he were come, that he would refer himselfe wholly vnto him, to the end that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby, (the best example that can be possible, and by whom the whole world is ruled and gouerned, which otherwise were out of all order and confused) he should first obtaine great happinesse to himselfe, & consequently vnto all his citizens; who euer after through the temperance & iustice of a father, wold with good will do those things, which they then vnwillingly did for the feare of a Lord; and in doing this, from a tyrant he should come to be a king: for, the chaines of a Diamond to keepe a realme in safetie, were not force & feare, as his father Dionysius held opinion: neither the great multitude of yong souldiers, nor the guard of 10000 barbarous people: but in cõtrary maner, that they were the loue & good will of their subiects, which the Prince obtaineth through vertue and iustice: the which chaines though they be slacker then the other that are so hard and stiffe, yet are they stronger, & will last longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdome in safetie. And furthermore, the Prince (said he) is not desirous of honor, neither is a man that deserueth greatly to be praised & commended, that only studieth to weare sumptuous apparell, & that glorieth to see his Court richly furnished, and himselfe curiously serued: and in the meane time doth not frame himselfe to speake better, to be wiser, and to carie a greater maiestie then any other meane or common person; not esteeming to adorne & beautifie the princely pallace of his mind, as becommeth the royall Maiestie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearsing these exhortations vnto Dionysius, and otherwhile enterlacing betweene, some reasons he had learned of Plato: he graffed in him a wonderfull and (as it were) a vehement desire to haue Plato in his companie, and to learne of him. So, sundrie letters came frõ Dionysius vnto Athens, diuers requests from Dion, & great intreatie made by certaine Pythagorian Philosophers, that prayed & perswaded Plato to come into Sicile, to bridle the light disposition of this yong man, by his graue & wise instructions: who without regard of reason, led a dissolute and licentious life. Therfore Plato (as himselfe reporteth) blushing to himselfe, and fearing lest he shold giue men cause to think, that it was but the opinion men had of him, & that of himselfe he was vnwilling to do any worthie act: & further, hoping that doing good but vnto one man alone, who was the only guide of all the rest, he should (as it were) recouer all Sicile from her corruption and sickenesse: he performed their requests that sent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the chaunge & alteration of Dionysius, they perswaded him to call Philistus the Historiographer home again frõ banishment, who was a learned man, & had bene brought vp & acquainted with the tyrants fashions: to the end he shold serue as a counter-pease, to withstand Plato and his Philosophie: for this Philistus, frõ the first time that the tyranny began to be established, did shew himself very willing & conformable to the stablishment therof, and had of long time kept the castle: & the voice went, that he kept the mother of Dionysius the elder, and as it was supposed, not altogether without the tyrants knowledg. But afterwards, Leptines hauing had two daughters by one woman, whom he intised to folly being another mans wife: he maried one of these his daughters vnto Philistus, and made not Dionysius priuie to it before. The tyrant therewith was so offended, that he put Leptines woman in prison fast locked vp, and draue Philistus out of Sicile. He being banished thus, repaired vnto some of his friends that dwelt about the Adriaticke sea, where it seemeth, he wrote the most part of all his historie, being then at good leasure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionysius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare vnto Dion, caused them to procure Philistus calling home againe (as we haue told you) as the man they thought would sticke stoutly in defence of the tyranny. So, Philistus no sooner returned, but he stoutly began to defend the tyranny: and others in contrarie maner, deuised accusations to the tyrant against Dion, accusing him that he had practised with Theodotes & Heraclides, to ouerthrow the tyranny of Dionysius. For Dion (in my opinion) hoped by Platoes comming to bridle and leſſen a litle the ouer-licentious and imperious tyrannie of Dionyſius, and thereby to frame Dionyſius a wiſe and righteous gouernor. But on the other ſide, if he ſaw he would not follow his counſell, and that he yeelded not to his wiſe inſtructions: he then determined to put him down, and to bring the gouernment of the cõmonwealth into the hands of the SYRACVSANS: not that he allowed of Democratia, (to wit, where the people gouerne) but yet certainly thinking that Democratia was much better then the tyranny, when they could not come vnto Ariſtocratia, (to wit, the gouernment of a few of the Nobility.) Now things being in this ſtate, Plato arriued in SICILE, where he was maruellouſly receiued & honored by Dionyſius. For when he landed on the ſhore, leauing his galley that brought him; there was readie for him one of the kings rich and ſumptuous chariots to conuey him to the caſtell: & the tyrant made ſacrifice to giue the gods thanks for his coming, as for ſome wonderfull great good hap chaunced vnto his ſeignioric. Furthermore, the wonderfull modeſty and temperance that was begun to be obſerued in feaſts & banquets, the Court cleane changed, and the great goodnes & clemencie of the tyrant in al things, in miniſtring iuſtice to euery man; did put the SYRACVSANS in great good hope of change, and euery man in the Court was very deſirous to giue himſelfe to learning and Philoſophy: ſo that, (as men reported) the tyrants pallace was full of ſand & duſt, with the number of ſtudents that drew plattes and figures of Geometry. Shortly after Plato was arriued, by chance the time was come about to do a ſolemn ſacrifice within the caſtell, at which ſacrifice the herald (as the maner was) proclaimed aloud the ſolemne prayer accuſtomed to be done: That it would pleaſe the gods, long to preſerue the ſtate of the tyranny. Wherat, Dionyſius being hard by him, ſaid vnto him: What, wilt thou not leaue to curſe me? This word grieued Philiſtus and his companions to the hart, thinking that with time, by litle & litle, Plato would win ſuch eſtimation and great authority with Dionyſius, that afterwards they ſhould not be able to reſiſt him: conſidering that in ſo ſhort a time as he had bene with Dionyſius, he had ſo altered his mind and courage. And therfore they now began, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuſe Dion: and ſaid, that it was eaſie to be ſeene, how he charmed and inchaunted Dionyſius through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to reſigne his gouernment becauſe he would transfer it to the hands of the children of his ſiſter Ariſtomaché. Others ſeemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS hauing come before into SICILIA with a great armie, both by ſea and land, they were all loſt and caſt away, and could not win the citie of SYRACVSA: and that now by one only Sophiſter, they vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrew the Empire of Dionyſius, perſwading him to diſcharge the ten thouſand ſouldiers he had about him for his guard, to forſake the foure hundred gallies, the ten thouſand horſemen, and as many mo footmen, to go to the Academy to ſeeke an vnknowne happineſſe neuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometrie, reſigning his preſent happineſſe and felicitie to be a great Lord, to haue money at will, and to liue pleaſantly, vnto Dion and his Nephewes. By ſuch like accuſations and wicked tongues, Dionyſius began firſt to miſtruſt Dion, and afterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frowne vpon him. In the meane time they brought letters that Dion wrote ſecretly vnto the Gouernors of the city of CARTHAGE, willing them, that when they would make peace with Dionyſius, they ſhould not talke with him vnleſſe he ſtood by; aſſuring them that he would helpe them to ſet things in quietneſſe, and that all ſhould be wel againe. When Dionyſius had read theſe letters with Philiſtus, and had taken his aduice and counſell what he ſhould do, as Timæus ſaid: he deceiued Dion vnder pretence of reconciliation, making as though he meant him no hurt, and ſaying that he would become friends againe with him. So he brought Dion one day to the ſea ſide vnder his caſtell, and ſhewed him theſe letters, burdening him to haue practiſed with the CARTHAGINIANS againſt him. And, as Dion went about to make him anſwer to cleare himſelfe; Dionyſius would not heare him, but cauſed him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnaſe, and commanded the mariners to ſet him a land vpon the coaſt of ITALIE. After this was done, and that it was knowne abroad in the city, euery man thought it a cruell part of Dionyſius: inſomuch that the tyrants pallace was in a maruellous pecke of troubles, for the great ſorow the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreouer, the city ſelfe of SYRACVSA began to look about them, looking for ſome ſodaine great change & innouation, for the tumult and vprore that wold happen by means of Dions baniſhment; & for the miſtruſt alſo that all men wold haue of Dionyſius. Dionyſius conſidering this, and being afraid of ſome misfortune, he gaue his friends and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not baniſhed him, but was contented ted that he ſhould abſent himſelfe for a time: being affraid, that in his ſodaine angrie moode, he might peraduenture be compelled to do him ſome worſe turne if he remained, becauſe of his obſtinacie and ſelfe-will. Furthermore, he gaue vnto Dions friends two ſhippes, to carie as much goods, mony, and as many of Dions ſeruants as they would, and to conuey them vnto him vnto PELOPONNESVS. Dion was a maruellous rich man, and for the pompe of his ſeruice, and ſumptuous moueables of his houſe, they were like vnto the perſon of a tyrant. All theſe riches Dions friends brought abord vpon thoſe ſhips, and caried them vnto him; beſides many other rich gifts, which the women and his friends ſent vnto him: ſo that by meanes of his great riches, Dion was maruellouſly eſteemed among the GRECIANS; who by the riches of a baniſhed citizen, coniectured what the power of a tyrannie might be. But now concerning Plato. When Dion was exiled, Dionyſius cauſed him to be lodged in his caſtle, and by this means craftily placed (vnder cloke of friendſhip) an honorable guard about him, becauſe he ſhould not returne into GRECE to ſeek Dion, to tell him of the iniurie he had done vnto him. Howbeit, Dionyſius often frequenting his companie, (as a wild beaſt is made tame by companie of man) he liked his talke ſo well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tyrannicall loue: for he would haue Plato to loue none but him, and that he ſhould eſteeme him aboue all men liuing, being ready to put the whole realme into his hands, and all his forces; ſo that he would thinke better of him, then of Dion. Thus was this paſſionate affection of Dionyſius, grieuous vnto Plato: for he was ſo drowned with the loue of him, as men extreamly iealous of the women they loue, that in a moment he would ſodainly fall out with him, and ſtraight againe become friends, and pray him to pardon him. And to ſay truly, he had a maruellous deſire to heare Platoes Philoſophie: but on the other ſide, he reuerenced thē that did diſwade him from it, and told him, that he would ſpoile himſelf, if he entred ouer-deeply into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereupon he ſent Plato againe away, promiſing him, that the next Spring he would ſend for Dion home. But he brake promiſe therein, and yet ſent him his reuenues: and prayed Plato to pardon him, though he had not kept promiſe at his time appointed. For he alleadged the warre was the cauſe, and that ſo ſoone as he had ended his war, he would ſend for Dion; whom in the meane time he prayed to haue patience, and not to attempt any ſtir or alteration againſt him, nor to ſpeak euill of him among the GRECIANS. This Plato ſought to bring to paſſe, & brought Dion to ſtudie Philoſophie, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS. Dion lay in the city of ATHENS with one Calippus, whom he had known of long time; howbeit, he bought him a houſe in the country, to lie there ſomtime for his pleaſure, the which he gaue afterwards (at his returne into SICILE) vnto Speuſippus that kept him companie, and was continually with him, more then with any other friend he had in ATHENS, through Platoes counſell: who to ſoften and recreate Dions maners, gaue him the company of ſome pleaſant conceited man, knowing that this Speuſippus could modeſtly obſerue time and place to be pleaſant & mery; for which reſpect, Timon in his ſatyricall ieaſts, calleth Speuſippus, A good ieaſter. Now Plato himſelfe hauing vndertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dauncings of yong children: Dion took the paines to teach and exerciſe them; and moreouer was himſelfe at the whole charge of theſe playes, Plato ſuffering him to beſtow that liberalitie and courteſie vpon the ATHENIHNS: the which wan Dion a great deale more goodwill, then Plato honor. Dion kept not ſtill at ATHENS; but went alſo to ſee the other good cities of GRECE, paſſing his time away. He being at common feaſts and aſſemblies with the chiefeſt men, and beſt learned in matters of ſtate and gouernment, and neuer ſhewing any light parts, nor ſigne of tyrannicall pride in his manner of life, nor of a man that had bene brought vp with all pompe and pleaſure, but like a graue vertuous man, and well ſtudied in Philoſophie, whereby he grew to be generally beloued and eſteemed of all men: the citie graunted him publike honors, and ſent him decrees of his glorie, made in their counſels and aſſemblies. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS made him a SPARTAN and Burgeſſe of the city, not paſſing for Dionyſius diſpleaſure, though at that time he had giuen them great aide, in the warthey made againſt the THEBANS. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Pteodorus MEGARIAN, to come and ſee him at his houſe, and Dion went thither. This Pteodorus was a maruellous great rich man, and therefore Dion ſeeing a great number of people ſtanding at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and ſpeake with him, he had ſuch great buſines: he turned vnto his friends that did accompany him, who were angry they made him tarie ſo long at the gate, and ſaid vnto them: What cauſe haue we to think euill of him, ſith we did the like when we were at SYRACVSA? But Dionyſius being incenſed with enuie againſt him, and

fearing the goodwill the GRECIANS bare him: he kept backe his reuenue, and would no more send it him, and seazed all the goods, the which he gaue to his receiuers to keepe. Furthermore, because he wold cleare himselfe of the infamie he had gotten amongst the Philosophers for Platoes sake, he went for diuers wise and learned men, and vainely coueting to excell them all in wisedome, he was driuen improperly, and out of time, to alleadge many wise sayings he had learned of Plato. Thereupon he began againe to wish for him, and to condemne himselfe, for that he had no wit to vse him well when he had him at his commandement, and that he had not heard him so much as he should haue done: and like a tyrant as he was, madly caried away with light desires, and easily chaunging mind from time to time, a sodaine vehement desire tooke him in the head, to haue Plato againe. So he sought all the meanes and waies he could deuise, to pray Architas the Pythagorian Philosopher, to tell him, that he might boldly come; and to be his suretie vnto him, for that he would promise him: for first of all, they were acquainted together by his meanes. Therefore Archytas sent thither Archidamus the Philosopher. Dionysius also sent certaine gallies, and some of his friends thither, to pray Plato to come to him: and he himselfe wrote specially and plainely, that it should not go well with Dion, if Plato came not into SICILE: but if he would be perswaded to come, that then he would do what he would haue him. Many letters and requests came vnto Dion from his wife and sister, insomuch as Dion so vsed the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionysius, without making any excuse at all. So Plato writeth himselfe, that he was driuen to come againe the third time into the streight of SICILE;

To trie, if once he could Charibdis dangers passe.

Now Plato being arriued in SICILE, he made Dionysius a great ioyfull man, and filled all SICILE againe with great good hope: for they were all very desirous, and did what they could, to make Plato ouercome Philistus and the tyrannie, with his Philosophie. The women of Dionysius Court did entertaine Plato the best they could: but aboue all, Dionysius seemed to haue a maruellous trust and affiance in him, & more then in any other of all his friends. For he suffered Plato to come to him without searching of him, and oftentimes offered to giue him a great summe of money: but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Aristippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrants Court in SICILE, said, that Dionysius bestowed his liberalitie surely: for, to vs that aske much, he giueth litle; and much vnto Plato, that requireth nothing. After Dionysius had giuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion. Dionysius on the other side, at the first did vse him with fine delayes, but afterwards he shewed himselfe angrie indeede: and at length fell out with Plato, but yet so couertly, that others saw it not: for Dionysius dissembled that; but otherwise in all other things he did him as much honour as he could deuise, practising thereby to make him to forsake Dions friendship. Now Plato found him at the first, that there was no trust to be giuen to his wordes, and that all were but lyes and deuises he either said or did: howbeit, he kept it to himselfe, and euer patiently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he beleeued him. They two thus finely dissembling with each other, thinking to deceiue all men, and that none should vnderstand their secrets: Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platoes friendes, did prognosticate the eclipse of the Sunne. The same falling out as he had prognosticated, the tyrant esteemed maruellously of him, and gaue him a siluer talent for his labour. Then Aristippus sporting with other Philosophers, said, he could tell them of a straunger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognosticate (said he) that Plato and Dionysius will be enemies ere it be long. In the end it came to passe, that Dionysius made port-sale of all Dions goods, and kept the money to himselfe, and lodged Plato (that before lay in the next Court to his pallace) among the souldiers of his guard, whom he knew maliced him of long time, and sought to kill him: because he did perswade Dionysius to leaue his tyrannie, and to liue without his guard. Plato being in this instant daunger, Archytas sent Ambassadours foorthwith vnto Dionysius, in a galley of thirtie oares, to demand Plato againe: declaring that Plato came againe to SYRACVSA, vpon his word and caution. Dionysius to excuse himselfe, and to shewe that he was not angrie with him: at his departure from him, he made him all the great cheare and feastes he could, and so sent him home with great shewes of goodwill. One day among the rest, he said vnto Plato: I am afraid Plato, (said he) that thou wilt speake euill of me when thou art among thy friends and companions in the Academie. Then Plato smiling, answered him againe: The goddes forbid, that they should haue such scarcitie of matter in the Academie, as that they must needes talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, (as it is reported) although that that which he himſelfe writeth, agreeth not much with this report. Theſe things went to Dions heart, ſo that ſhortly after he ſhewed himſelfe an open enemie vnto Dionyſius, but ſpecially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plato vnder couert words, ſent Dionyſius word of it by his letters: and thus it was. After Dion was exiled, Dionyſius returning Plato backe againe, he willed him ſecretly to feele Dions mind, whether he wold not be angrie that his wife ſhould be maried to another man; becauſe there ranne a rumour abroad, (whether it were true, or inuented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and could not liue quietly with his wife. Therfore when Plato was at ATHENS, and had told Dion of all things, he wrote a letter vnto Dionyſius the tyrant, and did ſet all other things downe ſo plainely, that euery man might vnderſtand him; but this one thing onely ſo darkely, that he alone and none other could vnderſtand him, but he to whome he had written: declaring vnto him, that he had ſpoken with Dion about the matter he wote of, and that he did let him vnderſtand he would be maruellous angrie, if Dionyſius did it. So at that time, becauſe there was great hope of reconciliation betweene them, the tyrant did nothing lately touching his ſiſter, but ſuffered her ſtill to remaine with Dions ſonne. But when they were ſo farre out, that there was no more hope to returne in fauour again, and that he had alſo ſent home Plato in diſgrace & diſpleaſure: then he maried his ſiſter Areté (Dions wife) againſt her will, vnto one of his friends called Timocrates, not following therein his fathers iuſtice and lenitie. For Polyxenus, that had maried his fathers ſiſter Theſta, being alſo become his enemie, fled out of SICILE. Dionyſius the elder ſent for his ſiſter Theſta, and tooke her vp very ſharpely, for that ſhe knowing her husband would flye, did not come and tell him of it. Theſta nobly anſwered him againe, and neuer was afraid nor abaſhed: Why, Dionyſius, doeſt thou thinke me a woman ſo faint-hearted and beaſtly, that if I had knowne my husband would haue gone his way and left me, I would not haue taken ſea with him, and both haue runne one fortune together? Truly, I knew not of his departure till he was gone: for it had bene more for mine honour, to haue bene called the wife of the baniſhed Polyxenus, then the ſiſter of thee a tyrant. Dionyſius maruelled to heare his ſiſter ſpeake thus boldly, and the SYRACVSANS wondered at her noble courage: inſomuch, that when the tyranny was vtterly deſtroyed, they did not refuſe to do her all the honor they could deuiſe, as vnto a Queene. And when ſhe was dead alſo, all the citizens of SYRACVSA by a common decree, did accompanie her body at her buriall. This litle digreſſion from our hiſtory, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now againe to our matter. Dion from thenceforth diſpoſed himſelf altogether vnto war, againſt Platoes counſell and aduiſe: who did his beſt indeuour to diſſwade him from it, both for the reſpect of Dionyſius good entertainment he had giuen him, as alſo for that Dion was of great yeares. Howbeit, on the other ſide, Speuſippus and his other friends did prouoke him vnto it, and perſwade him to deliuer SICILE from the ſlauerie and bondage of the tyrant, the which held vp her hands vnto him, and would receiue him with great loue and goodwill. For whilſt Plato lay at SYRACVSA, Speuſippus keeping the citizens cõpanie more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the firſt, they were afraid to open themſelues vnto him, and franckly to ſpeake what they thought, miſtruſting he was a ſpie vnto the tyrant, ſent amongſt them to feele their minds: but within a ſhort time they began to truſt him, and were all of one mind; for they prayed & perſwaded Dion to come, & not to care otherwiſe for bringing of ſhips, ſouldiers, nor horſes with him, but only to hire a ſhip, and to lend the SICILIANS his body and name againſt Dionyſius. Speuſippus reporting theſe newes vnto Dion, did put him in good heart againe: wherupon he began ſecretly to leauie men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpoſe & intent. The Philoſophers do ſet forward Dions wars; many citizens dealing in the affaires of the cõmonwealth, did aide him, and diuers of them alſo that only gaue their minds to the ſtudie of Philoſophie: and among thẽ, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whoſe death Ariſtotle wrote his Dialogue of the ſoule) and Timonides LEVCADIAN, went with him. Furthermore, there ioyned alſo with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothſayer, and that had bene his companion in ſtudie in the Academie. Now, of all them whom the tyrant had baniſhed, (which were no leſſe then a thouſand perſons) there were but only fiue and twenty that durſt accompany him in this war: for all the other were ſuch daſtards, that they forſooke him, and durſt not go with him. The place where they appointed to meete, was the Ile of ZACINTH, where they leauied all their ſouldiers, that were not aboue eight hundred in all; but all of them braue ſouldiers, and valiant men, and excellently well trained in wars: and to conclude, ſuch luſtie men, as would encourage all the armie Dion hoped of at his arriuall in SICILE, to fight like valiant men with them. These hired souldiers, the first time that they vnderstood it was to go into SICILE, to make warre with Dionysius: they were amazed at the first, and misliked the iourney, because it was vndertaken rather of malice and spite that Dion had to be reuenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrell; who hauing no better hope, tooke vpon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therfore the souldiers were offended with their Captains that had pressed them, because they had not told them of this warre before. But, after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies haue euill foundations, and are subiect vnto ruine; and that he led thē not into SICILE so much for souldiers, as he did to make them Captaines of the SYRACVSANS: and the other SICILIANS; who of long time desired nothing more then occasion to rise: and, whē after him also Alcimenes (a companion with him in this warre, and the chiefest man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobilitie and estimation) did speake vnto them in like manner; then they were all contented to go whither they would leade them. It was then in the heart of Sommer, and the wind blew, called the GRECIAN wind, the Moone being at the ful; and Dion hauing prepared to make a sumptuous sacrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corslets in procession into the temple: & after the sacrifice done, he made them a feast in the parke or shew-place of the ZAZINTHIANS. There the tables were layed, and the souldiers wondred to see the great state and magnificence of the great number of pots of gold & siluer, and such other furniture & preparation, as passed a priuat mans wealth: then they thought with themselues, that a man being so old, & Lord of so great a good, would not attempt things of such danger, without good ground, & great assurance of his friends aide & help. But, after his oblations of wine, & common prayers made to the gods at feastes, sodainly the Moone eclipsed. Dion thought it not strange to see an eclipse, considering the reuolutions of the eclipses, and knowing very well it is a shadow that falleth vpon the body of the Moone, because of the direct interposition of the earth betwixt her & the Sun. But because the soldiers that were afraid & astonied withal, stood in need of some cōfort & encoragement, Miltas the Soothsayer standing vp in the midst amongst them, said vnto them: My fellow soldiers, be of good cheare, & assure your selues that we shall prosper: for God doth foreshew vs by this sight we see, that some one of the chiefest things now in highest place & dignity shall be eclipsed. And at this present time what thing carieth greater glory and fame, then the tyranny of Dionysius? Therfore you must think, that so soone as you arriue in SICILE, your selues shall put out his light & glory. This interpretation of the eclipse of the Moone, did Miltas the Soothsayer make, before all the whole company. But touching the swarme of Bees that lighted on the poope of Dions ship, he told him and his friends priuatly: That he was affraid his acts (which should fall out famous and glorious) should last but awhile, and flourishing a few daies, would straight consume away. It is reported also, that Dionysius in like manner had many strange signes & wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came an Eagle, that snatched a partisan out of a souldiers hand, and caried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the sea. The sea also beating against the wals of the castell, was as sweet to drinke a whole day together, as any conduit or running water: as those that tasted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a Sowe farrowed Pigges that lacked no parts of the bodie, but onely their eares. This the Soothsayers sayed, did signifie rebellion, and disobedience of his subiects: and that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told also, that the sweetnesse of the salt water, prognosticated to the SYRACVSANS, change of cruell and euill time, vnto good and ciuill gouernment: and that the Eagle, Iupiters minister; and the partisan, the mark and token of the kingdome and Empire; did betoken, that Iupiter (the chiefe of all the gods) had determined to destroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So, Dions souldiers were embarked into two great ships of burden, and another third ship that was not very great, and two pinnaces with thirtie oares, followed them. For their armor and weapon, beside those the souldiers had; he caried two thousand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pikes, and plentie of victuals: that they shold lacke nothing all the time they were vpon the sea, considering that their iourney stood altogether at the courtesie of the winds and sea; and for that they were affrayed to land, vnderstanding that Philistus rode at anker in the coast of APVGLIA, with a fleete of shippes that lay in waite for their comming. So hauing a pleasant gale of wind, they sayled the space of twelue dayes together, and the thirteenth day they came to the fore-land of SICILE called Pachynus. There the Pylot thought it best they should land presently: for if they willingly looffed into the sea, and lost that point, they were sure they should lose also many nights nights and daies in vaine in the midst of the sea, being then Sommer time, and the wind at the South. But Dion being affraid to land so neare his enemies, he was desirous to go farther, and so past by the foreland of PACHYNVS. Then the North wind rose so bigge and great, that with great violence it draue backe their ships from the coasts of SICILE. Furthermore, lightning and thunder mingled withall, (because it was at that time when the starre Acturus beginneth to shew) it made so terrible a tempest, and powred downe such a sore shower of raine vpon them, that al the mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whither the wind would driue them: till that suddenly they saw the storm had cast them vpon the Ile of CERCINA, (which is on the coast of LYBIA) and specially where it is most dangerous to arriue for the rockes, for their ships were like to haue run vpon them, and to haue made shipwracke. But with much ado they bare off the ships with their great long poles, and wandred vp and down the sea, not knowing whither they went, vntill the storme ceased. Then they met a shippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Mariners call, The heads of the great Syrte. Thus they wandring vp and downe, being maruellous angry that the sea was calme; there rose a litle South wind from the land, although they least looked for any such wind at that time; and litle thinking it would so haue changed: but seeing the wind rise bigger and bigger, they packed on all the sailes they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods, they crossed the sea, and sailed from the coast of LYBIA, directly vnto SICILE, and had the wind so luckie, that at the fifth day they were neare vnto a litle village of SICILE, called MINOA, the which was subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS. Synalus CARTHAGINIAN, being at that time Captaine and gouernour of the towne of MINOA, and Dions friend, was there by chaunce at that present, who being ignorant of his enterprise and comming, did what he could to keepe Dions souldiers from landing. But they notwithstanding sodainly leapt a land armed, but slue no man: for Dion had commaunded them the contrarie, for the friendship he bare the Captaine: and they following the townesmen hard that fled before them, entred the towne, hand ouer head amongst them, and so wan the market place. When both the Captaines met, and that they had spoken together, Dion redeliuered the towne into Synalus hands againe, without any hurt or violence offered him. Synalus on the other side, did indeuour himselfe all he could to make much of the souldiers, and holpe Dion to prouide him of all things necessarie. But this did most of all encourage the souldiers, because Dionysius at their arriuall, was not then in SICILE: for it chaunced so, that not many daies before he went into ITALY with fourescore saile. Therefore when Dion willed them to remaine there a few daies to refresh themselues, because they had bene so sore sea-beaten a long time together; they thēselues wold not, they were so glad to imbrace the occasion offered them, and prayed Dion to leade them foorthwith to SYRACVSA. Dion leauing all his superfluous armor and prouision in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to send them to him when time serued: he tooke his way towards SYRACVSA. So by the way, two hundred horsemen of the ARGENTINES, which dwell in that part called ECNOMVS, came first to ioyne with him, and after them, the GELOIANS. The rumor of their comming ran straight to SYRACVSA: therupon Timocrates that had maried Areté, Dions wife, and Dionysius the fathers sister, and to whom Dionysius the younger had left the charge and gouernment of all his men and friends in the citie: he presently dispatched a post with letters, to aduertise Dionysius of Dions coming. He himselfe also in the meane time had taken such order, that there rose no tumult nor mutinie in the citie, though they all of them lacked no goodwill to rebell: but because they were vncertaine whether this rumour was true or false, (being afraid) euery man was quiet. Now there chaunced a strange misfortune vnto the messengers, which caried the letters vnto Dionysius. For after he had passed the straight, and that he was arriued in the citie of RHEGIO of ITALIES side, making hast to come to the citie of CAVLONIA, where Dionysius was: he met by the way one of his acquaintance that caried a mutton but newly sacrificed. This good fellow gaue him a peece of it, and the messenger spurred away with al the speed he could possible: but when he had ridden the most part of the night, he was so wearie and drowsie for lacke of sleepe, that he was driuen to lye downe: so he lay downe vpon the ground in a wood hard by the high way. The sauour of this flesh brought a Wolfe to him that caried away the flesh and the portmantle it was wrapt in, and in the which also were his letters of aduertisement, which he caried vnto Dionysius. When he awoke out of his sleepe, and saw that his portmantle was gone; he enquired for it, and went wandring vp and downe a long time to seeke it: howbeit, all in vaine, for he could neuer find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to go to the tyrant without his letters, but rather to flie into ſome vnknowne place where no bodie knew him. Thus ouerlate receiued Dionyſius aduertiſement by others of this war, which Dion made in SICILE. In the meane time, the CAMARINIANS came and ioyned with Dions armie, in the high-way towards SYRACVSA: and ſtill there came vnto him alſo a great number of the SYRACVSANS that were vp in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other ſide, certaine CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the caſtell of EPIPOLES with Timocrates of purpoſe to keepe it; vpon a falſe rumour Dion gaue out (and which came vnto them) that he would firſt go againſt their townes: they forſooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion vnderſtanding that, being lodged with his armie in a place called MACRÆ: he preſently remoued his campe being darke night, and marched forward till he came vnto the riuer of Anapus, which is not from the citie aboue ten furlongs off: and there ſtaying awhile, he ſacrificed vnto the riuer, and made his prayer, and worſhipped the riſing of the Sunne. At the ſelfe ſame inſtant alſo, the Soothſayers came and told him, that the gods did promiſe him aſſured victorie. And the ſouldiers alſo ſeeing Dion weare a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremonie of the ſacrifice: all of them with one ſelfe goodwill, tooke euery man one of them, (being no leſſe then fiue thouſand men that were gathered together by the way, and but ſlenderly armed with ſuch things as came firſt to hand; howbeit, ſupplying with good will their want of better furniture and armor) and when Dion commaunded them to march, for ioy they ranne, and encouraged one another with great cries, to ſhew themſelues valiant for recouerie of their libertie. Now for them that were within the city ſelfe of SYRACVSA, the Noblemen and chiefe Citizens went to receiue them at the gates, in their beſt gownes. The common people on the other ſide, ran and ſet vpon them that tooke part with the tyrant, and ſpoiled them that were called the PROSAGOGIDES (as much to ſay, The common Promooters of men) the deteſtableſt villaines, hatefull to the gods and men: for they like Sycophants and buſie tale-bearers, would iet vp and downe the citie, and mingle among the Citizens, hauing an oare in euery mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and buſie-headed, to know what euery man ſaid and did, and then to go carie it to the tyrant. Theſe men were they that had their payment firſt of all, for they killed them with drie blowes, beating them to death with ſtaues. When Timocrates could not enter into the caſtell with them that kept it, he tooke his horſebacke, and fled out of the citie; and flying made all men afraid and amazed where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, becauſe it ſhould not ſeeme, that for feare of a trifle, he had forſaken the citie. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come ſo neare, that they might ſee him plainely from the citie, marching foremoſt of all, armed with a faire bright white corſelet, hauing his brother Megacles on his right hand of him, & Calippus ATHENIAN on the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him alſo there followed an hundred ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, choſen for his guard about him, and the reſt came marching after in good order of battell, being lead by their Captaines. The SYRACVSANS ſaw him comming, & went out and receiued him as a holy & bleſſed proceſſion, that brought them their libertie and popular ſtate againe, the which they had loſt the ſpace of eight and fortie yeares. When Dion was come into the citie by the gate called Menitide, he cauſed his trumpeter to ſound, to appeaſe the rumor and tumult of the people. Then he commaunded an Herald to proclaime aloud: That Dion and Megacles, who were come to put downe the tyranny, did ſet all the SYRACVSANS at libertie, and all the other SICILIANS alſo from the bondage and ſubiection of the tyrant. And becauſe Dion himſelf was deſirous to ſpeake vnto the peoople, he went to the vpper part of the towne, called ACRADINA. The SYRACVSANS all the ſtreetes through as he paſſed by, had on either hand of him prepared ſacrifices, and ſet vp tables and cuppes vpon them: and as he paſſed by their houſes, they caſt flowers and fruites on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had bene a god. Now, vnder the caſtell there was a place called Pentapyla (a clocke, to know by the Sunne how the day went) the which Dionyſius had cauſed to be made, and it was of a good pretie height. Dion got vp vpon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perſwading his countrimen to do their indeuor to recouer their liberty againe, and to maintaine it. They being in a maruellous ioy withall, and deſirous to pleaſe Dion: did chooſe him and his brother Megacles their Lieutenants generall, with abſolute power and authoritie. Afterwards alſo, by the conſent of Dion himſelfe and his brother, and at their requeſtes in like manner, they choſe twentie other Captaines, of the which the moſt part of them had bene baniſhed by the tyrant, and

and were returned againe with Dion. The Soothſayers and Prognoſticators liked it well, and ſayd it was a good ſigne for Dion, that he trode that ſumptuous building and workmanſhip of the tyrant vnder his feete, when he made his Oration: but becauſe the hand of the Diall did ſhew the courſe of the Sunne, which neuer leaueth going, vpon the which he got vp when he was choſen Lieutenant generall with abſolute power and authoritie: they were afraid againe, that it was a ſigne Dions affaires ſhould haue a ſudden change of fortune. After this, Dion hauing taken the caſtell of EPIPOLES, he ſet all the citizens at libertie which were kept there as priſoners in captiuitie by the tyrant, and enuironed the caſtell round about with a wall. Within ſeuen dayes after, Dionyſius returned by ſea to the caſtell of SYRACVSA, and therewithall alſo came the carts loaden with armour and weapon to SYRACVSA, which Dion had left with Synalus: the which, Dion cauſed to be diſtributed among the citizens of SYRACVSA that had none. Others did furniſh themſelues as well as they could, and ſhewed that they had courage and good-will to fight for the maintenance and defence of their libertie. In the meane time, Dionyſius ſent Ambaſſadors, firſt vnto Dion priuatly, to ſee if he would yeeld to anie compoſition. But Dion would not heare them, but bad them tell the SYRACVSANS openly what they had to ſay, being men that were free, and enioyed libertie. Then the Ambaſſadors ſpake in the behalfe of the tyrant, vnto the people of SYRACVSA, promiſing them with mild and gentle words, that they ſhould pay no more ſubſidies and taxes, but verie litle, and ſhould be no more troubled with warres, other then ſuch as they themſelues ſhould like of. The SYRACVSANS made a mockerie at thoſe offers, and Dion alſo anſwered the Ambaſſadours, and willed Dionyſius to ſend no more to the SYRACVSANS, before he had diſpoſſeſt himſelfe of his tyranny: and, ſo that he would leaue it, he would be his meane to obtaine all things iuſt and reaſonable of the people. Dionyſius liked very well of this good offer: and therfore ſent his Ambaſſadors againe to pray the SYRACVSANS, that they would appoint ſome amongſt them to come to the caſtell, to talke with him for the benefit and commodity of the common wealth; that he might heare what they would alleadge, and they alſo what anſwer he would make. Dion choſe certaine whom he ſent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the city among the SYRACVSANS, which came from the caſtell: that Dionyſius would willingly of himſelfe, rather then by reaſon of Dions comming, depoſe himſelfe of the tyranny. But this was but a falſe allarme, and crafty fetch of Dionyſius, to intrap the SYRACVSANS by. For thoſe that were ſent him from the city, he kept them priſoners euerie man of them, and one morning hauing made his ſouldiers drinke wine luſtily, which he kept in pay to guard his perſon, he ſent them with great fury to aſſault the wall the SYRACVSANS had built againſt the caſtel. Now, becauſe the SYRACVSANS looked for nothing leſſe then for the ſudden aſſault, & for that theſe barbarous people with a wonderfull courage and great tumult ouerthrew the wall, and others of them alſo did ſet vpon the SYRACVSANS: there was not a man of them that durſt make head to fight with them, ſauing the ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, whom Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noiſe, ranne ſtraight to repulſe them, and yet they themſelues could not well tell what they ſhould do vpon that ſudden. For, they could heare nothing for the great noiſe and hurley burley of the SYRACVSANS, which fled with great diſorder, and came and mingled themſelues amongſt them. Till at length, Dion perceiuing he could not be heard, to ſhew them by deed what they ſhould do: he went firſt himſelfe againſt theſe barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloudie fight: for his enemies knew him as well, as his owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cries. Now for Dion himſelfe, indeed becauſe of his age, he was heauier then was requiſite for one that ſhould away with the paines of ſuch battels: but he had ſuch a valiant courage in him, that he went through withall luſtily, and ſlue them that did aſſaile him. Yet he had his hand alſo thruſt through with a pike, and very hardly did his curaces hold out the blowes of the darts and thruſts by hand which he receiued on them, they were ſo mangled and hacked with ſuch a number of darts and pikes paſſed through his ſheld and broken on him, that in the end he was beaten downe: howbeit his ſouldiers reſcued him ſtraight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he himſelfe tooke his horſe-backe, and went vp and downe the citie, ſtaying and quieting the flying of the SYRACVSANS. Then he ſent for his ſouldiers the ſtraungers, which he had put in garniſon in that part of the citie called the ACRADINE to keepe it; and brought them being freſh, againſt the barbarous people of the caſtell that were wearied, and almoſt all of them diſcouraged to attempt any further enterpriſe. For they had made this ſallie out, in hope to haue taken all the citie at the firſt onſet, onely running vp and downe: but when contrary to their expectation, they met theſe valiant ſouldiers and freſh ſupply, they then began to retire againe into the caſtell. And the GRECIAN ſouldiers on the other ſide, perceiuing they gaue backe, they came the faſter vpon them, ſo that they were compelled to turne their backes, and were driuen within their wals, after they had ſlaine three ſcore and fourteene of Dions men, and loſt a great number of their owne. This was a noble victory, and therefore the SYRACVSANS gaue the ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, an hundred ſiluer Minaes, in reward for ther good ſeruice: and they gaue Dion their Generall, a crowne of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trumpet from the caſtell, written from the women of his houſe: & among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed to my father, the which Hipparinus wrote vnto him. For that was Dions ſonnes name, though Timæus writeth he was called Areteus, after his mothers name Aretè. But in ſuch matters, me thinkes Timonides is better to be credited, becauſe he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were ſent, were openly read before the aſſembly of the SYRACVSANS, and did onely concerne requeſts of theſe women vnto Dion. The SYRACVSANS would not haue the ſuppoſed letter of his ſonne to be openly read: but Dion againſt their minds opened it, and found that it was Dionyſius letter; who by words, made the direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he ſpake vnto the SYRACVSANS. For in ſight, it ſeemed a manner of requeſt and iuſtification of him: but in truth, it was written of purpoſe to accuſe Dion. Firſt of all, he remembred him of the things he had done before, for the eſtabliſhing and preſeruation of the tyranny: and afterwards, of cruell threats againſt thoſe whom he ſhould loue beſt, as his wife, his ſonne and ſiſter: and laſt of all, full of moſt humble requeſts and intreaties with ſorow and lamentation. But that which moſt moued Dion of all other was, that he required him not to deſtroy the tyranny, but rather to take it for himſelfe, and not to ſet them at libertie that hated him, and would alwayes remember the miſchiefe he had done vnto them: and that he would himſelfe take vpon him to be Lord, ſauing by that means the liues of their parents and friends. When theſe letters had bin read before the whole aſſembly of the people, the SYRACVSANS thought not how to reuerence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible conſtancy & magnanimity of Dion, that ſtood firme and faſt for iuſtice and vertue, againſt ſuch vehement intreatie & perſwaſion of his kinſfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be afraid, and to miſtruſt him, as he that of neceſſity ſhould be forced to pardon the tyrant, for the great pledges and hoſtages he had of him. Wherfore, they began to chuſe them new gouernours, and the rather, becauſe they heard that Heraclides was coming vnto them, whom they loued ſingularly well. This Heraclides was one of them that had bene baniſhed, a good ſouldier and Captaine, and well eſteemed of for the charge and office he bare vnder the tyrants: howbeit, a very vnconſtant man in euery thing, and would not continue long in a mind, and leaſt conſtant in warres where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOPONNESVS; wherefore he determined to come with a power by himſelfe, and with his owne fleet againſt the tyrant. So, he ariued at length in SYRACVSA, with ſeuen galleys, and three other ſhips: where he found Dionyſius againe ſhut vp into his caſtell with a wall, and the SYRACVSANS alſo to haue the better hand of him. Then he began to curry fauour with the common people all the waies he could poſſibly deuiſe, hauing by nature a certaine pleaſing maner to win the comon people, which ſeeke nothing elſe but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the eaſier for him to win them, becauſe the people did already miſlike Dions ſeuerity, as a man too ſeuere and cruell to gouerne a common-wealth. For they had now their will ſo much, and were growne ſo ſtrong headed, becauſe they ſaw themſelues the ſtronger: that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they only be Lords, and do rule) before they were fully ſet at libertie. Therefore firſt of all, not being called together by the authoritie of the gouernours: they ranne in a furie, of their owne light heads, vnto the place of common aſſemblies, and there choſe Heraclides Admirall. Then Dion vnderſtanding this, came to complaine of the iniurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to giue this power now vnto Hiraclides, was to take that away which they had firſt giuen vnto him: becauſe he ſhould no more be Generall, if they choſe any other Admirall by ſea then himſelfe. The SYRACVSANS then, as it were againſt their wils, did reuoke the power they had giuen vnto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion ſent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a litle, and told him it was not honeſtly, nor profitably done of him, to ſue to the people, and to contend for honour againſt him in ſo dangerous a time, when the leaſt occaſion in

in the world was inough to haue marred all. Afterwards, Dion himſelf called an aſſembly againe of the city, and eſtabliſhed Heraclides Admirall: and perſwaded the citizens to giue him ſouldiers, as he had indeed. Heraclides outwardly ſeemed to honour Dion, and confeſſed openly that he was greatly bound vnto him, and was alwayes at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his commaundement: but in the meane time, ſecretly he inticed the common people to rebell, and to ſtirre vp thoſe whom he knew meete men to like of change. Whereby he procured Dion ſuch trouble, and brought him into ſuch perplexity, that he knew not well what way to take. For, if he gaue the aduice to let Dionyſius quietly come out of the caſtell; then they accuſed him, and ſayd he did it to ſaue his life: if on the contrary ſide, becauſe he would not trouble them, he continued ſiege ſtill, and did eſtabliſh nothing; then they thought he did it of purpoſe to draw out the wars in length, becauſe he might the longer time remaine their Chieftaine general, & ſo to keepe the citizens longer in feare. At that time there was one Soſis in SYRACVSA, a man of no name, but noted among the SYRACVSANS for his villanie and wickedneſſe, eſteeming that full and ample libertie, when he might vnchecked licenciouſly ſpeake what he would, as indeed he did. For, he ſeeking to do Dion a diſpleaſure: firſt of all one day at a common counſell he ſtood vp on his feete, and called the SYRACVSANS beaſts (amongſt many other vile words he gaue them) if they did not perceiue, that being come from a fond and drunken tyrannie, they had now receiued a ſober maiſter, and a wiſe warie tyrant. So, when he had thus openly ſhewed himſelfe an enemie vnto Dion, he came no more that day into the market place: but the next morning he was ſeene running vp and downe the citie naked, his head and face all of a gore-bloud, as if he had bene followed of men to haue ſlaine him. Thus Soſis, comming in this maner into the middeſt of the market place, cried out that Dions ſtraungers had lyen in waite for him, and had handled him in this ſort, ſhewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grieuouſly, and cried out vpon Dion, and ſayd it was vilely and tyrannically done of him: by feare of murther and daunger, to take away the libertie from the citizens to ſpeake. Now, though the whole aſſembly hereupon fell into an vprore withall; Dion notwithſtanding came thither to cleare himſelfe of theſe accuſations, and made them preſently ſee, that this Soſis was brother to one of Dionyſius guard: who had put into his head, in this ſort to put the citie of SYRACVSA in an vprore, becauſe Dionyſius had no other hope nor meane to eſcape, but by ſtirring vp faction and ſedition among them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgeons were ſent for forthwith to ſearch the wound of this Soſis: who found, that it was rather a litle ſcratch, then any violent wound giuen him. For the wounds or cuts of a ſword, are euer deepeſt in the middeſt: and Soſis cut was but very litle, and not deepe, hauing had many beginnings, & giuen him (as it ſeemed) at ſundry times, that for very paine, the party that cut him, was driuen to leaue off, & came to cut him at diuerſe times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friends in the meane time, that brought a razer before the aſſembly, and reported that as they came, they met Soſis by the way all bloudied: who ſayd, that he fled from Dions ſouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they preſently followed them, but found no man, and onely they ſaw a razer, which ſome bodie had caſt vpon a hollow ſtone thereabout, where they firſt ſaw him comming vnto them. Thus, Soſis deuice had but euill ſucceſſe. For beſide all theſe proofes and tokens, Dions houſhold ſeruants came to be witneſſe againſt him: that very early in the morning he went abroad alone with a razer in his hand. Then they that before did burthen and accuſe Dion, knew not what to ſay to the matter, but ſhrunke away: whereupon the people condemning Soſis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies afraid of theſe ſoldiers that were ſtrangers, ſpecially when they ſaw the greateſt cõflicts they had with the tyrant, was by ſea, after that Philiſtus was come from the coaſt of APVGLIA with a great number of galleys to aide the tyrant. For then they thought, that theſe ſouldiers (the ſtrangers) being armed at all parts to fight by land, they would do him no more ſeruice by ſea: becauſe the citizens themſelues were they that kept them in ſafetie, for that they were men practiſed to fight by ſea, and were alſo the ſtronger by meanes of their ſhips. But beſide all this, the onely thing that made them to be couragious againe, was the good fortune they had at the battell by ſea, in the which when they had ouercome Philiſtus, they cruelly and barbarouſly vſed him. Truly Ephorus ſaith, that Philiſtus ſlue himſelfe, when he ſaw his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the firſt beginning of this war) writing vnto Speuſippus the Philoſopher, ſaith: that Philiſtus was taken aliue, becauſe his galley ran a land: and that the SYRACVSANS firſt

tooke off his curaces, and ſtripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villany & ſpite they coule, they cut off his head, and gaue his bodie vnto boyes, commanding them to dragge it into that part of the citie called ACRADINE, and then to caſt it into the common priuy. Timæus alſo to ſpite him the more, ſaith that the boyes tied the dead body by his lame-legge, and ſo dragged him vp and downe the city, where all the SYRACVSANS did what villany to it they could, being glad to ſee him dragged by the legge, that had ſayd: Dionyſius ſhould not flie from the tyranny vpon a light horſe, but that they ſhould pull him out by the legge againſt his will. Now Philiſtus reporteth this matter thus: not as ſpoken to Dionyſius by himſelfe, but by ſome other. But Timæus taking a iuſt occaſion and colour to ſpeake euill of the good will, fidelity, & care that Philiſtus had alwayes ſeemed to ſhew in the confirmation and defence of the tyranny: doth liberally beſtow iniurious words on him in this place. Now for them, whom he had indeed offended, if they of malice and ſpite to be reuenged, did offer him cruelty, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed: but for them that ſince his death haue written the geſts, who were neuer offended by him in his life time, and who ought to ſhew themſelues diſcreet in their writing, me thinkes that if they had regarded their owne credite & eſtimation, they ſhould not ſo fondly and outragiouſly haue reproued the aduerſities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chance to the honeſteſt man, as vnto him. Thus fondly did Ephorus praiſe Philiſtus, who although he haue an excellent fine wit to counterfeit goodly excuſes, and cunningly to hide wicked and diſhoneſt parts, and eloquently to deuiſe by honeſt words to defend an euill cauſe: yet cannot he with all the fine wit he hath, excuſe himſelfe, that he hath not bene the onely man of the world that hath moſt fauored tyrants, and that hath euer loued, and ſpecially deſired power, wealth and alliance with tyrants. But he (in my opinion) taketh the right courſe of an Hiſtoriographer, that neither doth commend Philiſtus doings, nor yet caſteth his aduerſities in his teeth to his reproch. After Philiſtus death, Dionyſius ſent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliuer him the caſtell, armor, munition, and ſouldiers that were in it, with money alſo to pay them for fiue moneths ſpace. For himſelfe, he prayed that he might be ſuffered to go ſafely into ITALIE, and to lie there, to take the pleaſure of the fruits of the countrey called GYARTA, which was within the territory of SYRACVSA, & lieth out from the ſea towards the main land. Dion refuſed this offer, & anſwered the Ambaſſadors, that they muſt moue the SYRACVSANS in it. They ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily take Dionyſius aliue, would not heare the Ambaſſadours ſpeake, but turned them away. Dionyſius ſeeing no other remedie, left the caſtell in the hands of his eldeſt ſonne Apollocrates, and hauing a luſtie gale of wind, he ſecretly imbarked certaine of his men he loued beſt, with the richeſt things he had, and ſo hoiſed ſaile, vnwares to Heraclides, the Admirall of SYRACVSA. The people were maruellouſly offended with Heraclides for it, and began to mutine againſt him. But Heraclides, to pacifie this tumult of the people, ſuborned one Hippon an Orator, who preferred the law Agraria vnto the people, for the diuiſion of all the Iland among them: and that the beginning of libertie was equalitie, and of bondage pouertie, vnto them that had no lands. Heraclides giuing his conſent to this decree, and ſtirring the common people to ſedition againſt Dion, that withſtood it: perſwaded the SYRACVSANS, not onely to confirme the law Hippon had propounded, but alſo to diſcharge the hired ſtraungers, to chuſe other Captaines and gouernours, and to rid themſelues of Dions ſeuere gouernement. But they ſuppoſing ſtraight to haue bene rid from the tyrannie, as from a long and grieuous ſickneſſe, ouer-raſhly taking vpon them like people that of long time had bene at libertie, they vtterly vndid themſelues, and ouerthrew Dions purpoſe: who like a good Phyſitian was carefull to ſee the citie well ordered and gouerned. So when they were aſſembled to chuſe new officers in the middeſt of ſommer, there fell ſuch horrible thunders, and other terrible ſtormes, and vnfortunate ſignes in the element, that for the ſpace of fifteene dayes together, the people were ſtill ſcattered and diſperſed when they were aſſembled: in ſo much, that being afraid of theſe ſignes aboue, they durſt not at that time create any new Captains. Certaine daies after, as the Orators had choſen a faire time to proceed to the election of officers, an Oxe drawing in a cart (being daily acquainted with euery ſight and noiſe) ſuddenly without any occaſion offered, fell into a madneſſe againſt the carter that draue him, and breaking his yoke aſunder, ran ſtraight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into euery corner, to flie and ſaue themſelues: and then flinging, and bearing all downe before him that ſtood in his way, he ran through as much of the citie, as the enemies afterwards wan of them. This notwithſtanding, the SYRACVSANS making light account of all theſe theſe ſignes, they choſe fiue and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and ſecretly they ſent to feele the hired ſouldiers, to ſee if they could entice them from Dion, to cauſe them to take their part, and made them large promiſes to make them free men (as themſelues) of SYRACVSA. The ſouldiers would not be enticed from him; but faithfully and louingly tooke Dion amongſt them with their armor and weapon: and putting him in the middeſt of them, led him in this maner out of the citie, and did no man hurt, but reproued their vnthankfulneſſe and villanie vnto all thoſe they met by the way. Then the SYRACVSANS deſpiſing thē for their ſmall number; & becauſe they did not firſt ſet vpon them, but truſting on the other ſide to themſelues, for that they were the greater number: they came to aſſaile them, ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily ouercome them in the citie, and kill euery man of them. Dion being thus in a ſtraight, that of neceſſity he muſt fight againſt his owne countrimen, or elſe be ſlaine himſelfe with his ſouldiers: he held vp his hands to the SYRACVSANS, and very earneſtly prayed them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the caſtell that was full of their enemies, which ſhewed themſelues vpon the wals, & ſaw what they did. In the end, when he ſaw that he could not pacifie their furie & tumult, and that all the citie was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of theſe ſeditious people, who like the ſea were caried with the wind: he did yet forbid his ſouldiers to giue any charge vpon them; who notwithſtanding made a countenance with great cries, and rating of their harneſſe, as if they had meant to runne on them. Then the SYRACVSANS durſt not abide by it, but ran away like ſheepe through the ſtreets & no man chaſed them. So Dion called backe againe his men, and led them directly into the coūtry of the LEONTINES. Then the new officers & gouernors of SYRACVSA, perceiuing that the women laughed them to ſcorne: becauſe they would recouer the ſhame they had loſt, they armed their men anew again, & did march after Dion to fight with him; whom they ouertooke at a riuer, as he was ready to paſſe ouer. Then began their horſemen a litle to skirmiſh with Dions company: but when they ſaw he did no more beare with their faults for countries ſake, but frowned indeed vpon them, & did ſet his men in battell ray againſt thē: then they turned their backes againe, with more ſhame and reproch then before, & ſo fled vnto the city of SYRACVSA, & had not many of their men ſlaine. The LEONTINES receiued Dion very honorably, tooke the ſtrangers his ſouldiers, & gaue them pay, & made them free citizens with them: and ſent Ambaſſadors alſo vnto the SYRACVSANS, to will them, to let the ſtrangers haue their pay. The SYRACVSANS on their ſide alſo, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the LEONTINES to accuſe Dion. So, all their confederates were aſſembled in the city of the LEONTINES; & in that aſſembly, after both parties had bin heard, to heare what they would ſay; it was iudged: That the SYRACVSANS were too blame. Howbeit, they would not ſtand to the iudgement of their confederats, for they were now growne proud & careleſſe, becauſe they were gouerned by no man, but had Captains that ſtudied to pleaſe thē, & were afraid alſo to diſpleaſe thē. After that, there ariued certain gallies of Dionyſius at SYRACVSA, of the which Nypſius NEAPOLITAN was captain: which brought victuals & money, to helpe thē that were beſieged within the caſtell. Theſe galleys were fought with, and the SYRACVSANS obtained victory, and tooke foure of the tyrants galleys with three bankes of oares a peece: howbeit they fondly abuſed their victorie. For they hauing no body to command or rule them, imployed all their ioy, in rioting and banquetting, and in fond and diſſolute meetings, taking ſo litle care and regard to their buſineſſe, that now when they thought the caſtell was ſure their owne, they almoſt loſt their citie. For Nypſius perceiuing that euery part of the citie was out of order, and that the common people did nothing all day long vnto darke night, but bib and drinke drunke, dauncing after their pipes and howboyes; and that the gouernours themſelues were verie glad alſo to ſee ſuch feaſting, or elſe for that they diſſembled it, and durſt not commaund and compell them that were drunke: he wiſely tooke the occaſion offered him, and ſcaled the wall which had ſhut vp the caſtell, and wanne it, and ouerthrew it. Then he ſent the barbarous ſouldiers into the citie, and commaunded them to do with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACVSANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue preſent remedie, they were ſo amazed and ſuddenly ſet on: for indeed they made a right ſacke of the citie. Here men were killed; there they ouerthrew the wall; in another place they caried away women and little children priſoners into the caſtell, weeping and crying out: and laſtly, they made the Captaines at their wits end, who could giue no preſent order, nor haue their men to ſerue them againſt their enemies, that came hand ouer head on euerie ſide amongſt them. The citie being thus miſerably in garboile, and the ACRADINE alſo in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to riſe againe: euery man thought then with himſelfe, that Dion muſt be ſent for, but yet no man moued it notwithſtanding, being aſhamed of their vnthankfulneſſe and ouer-great folly they had committed, in driuing him away. Yet neceſſity enforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horſmen and of their confederates that cried, that they muſt ſend for Dion & the PELOPONNESIANS his ſouldiers, which were with him in the territory of the LEONTINES. Aſſoone as the firſt word was heard, and that one had the hart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACVSANS cried out, There was the point: and they were ſo glad of it, that the water ſtood in their eyes for ioy, & beſought the gods it would pleaſe them to bring him vnto them, they were ſo deſirous to haue him againe. For they called to mind how valiant and reſolute he was in danger, & how that he was neuer afraid, but did encourage them with his manhood in ſuch ſort, that being led by him, they were not afraid to ſet vpon their enemies. So the confederates of them, ſent preſently Archonides and Teleſides vnto him: and the noblemen that ſerued on horſebacke, they ſent him alſo fiue amongſt them, beſide Hellanicus. Who tooke their horſes, and poaſted for life, ſo that they came vnto the citie of the LEONTINES about Sunne-ſet: & lighting off from their horſes, they went firſt of all and kneeled downe at Dions feet, and weeping, told him the miſerable ſtate of the SYRACVSANS. Straight there came diuerſe of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN ſouldiers vnto Dion, miſtruſting then that there was ſome newes in hand, to ſee the earneſt and humble ſute the Ambaſſadors of SYRACVSA made vnto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them preſently with him, and brought them himſelfe vnto the Theater, where the common councels and aſſemblies of the city were holden: thither ranne euery man to heare what the matter was. Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, told openly before the whole aſſembly the greatneſſe of their miſery, and requeſted the hired ſouldiers to come and aide the SYRACVSANS, forgetting the iniurie they had receiued: conſidering, that they had more dearly payed for their folly, then they themſelues (whom they had ſo iniuried) would haue made them to haue ſuffered. When they had ſayd their minds, there was a great ſilence through all the Theater: and then Dion roſe vp, & began to ſpeake. But the great teares that fell from his eyes would not ſuffer him to ſpeake: wherefore the hired ſouldiers being ſory to ſee him weepe, prayed him not to trouble himſelfe, but to be of good courage. Then Dion letting go the ſorow and griefe he had conceiued, began to ſpeake vnto them in this maner. My Lords of PELOPONNESVS, and you alſo the confederates: I haue called you together to conſult with you, what you ſhould do. For my ſelfe, it were no honeſty for me to conſult what I ſhould do now, when the citie of SYRACVSA ſtandeth in peril of deſtruction: and therfore if I cannot ſaue it from deſtruction, yet at the leaſt I will burie my ſelfe in the fire and ruine of my countrey. But for you, if it pleaſe you once more to helpe vs vnaduiſed and moſt vnfortunate people: you ſhall by your meanes ſet the poore diſtreſſed city of SYRACVSA againe on foot, which is your deed. Or if it be ſo, that remembring the iniuries the SYRACVSANS haue offered you, you will ſuffer it to be deſtroyed: yet I beſeech the gods, that at the leaſt they wil requite your valiantneſſe, fidelity & good loue you haue borne me vntill this preſent, beſeeching you to remember Dion, who neither forſooke you at any time when you haue bin iniuried, nor his countrimen, when they were in trouble. So going on ſtill with his tale, the mercenary ſtraungers ſtepped forth with great noiſe, and prayed him to leade thē to aid SYRACVSA. Then the Ambaſſadors alſo that were ſent from the SYRACVSANS ſaluted & imbraced them, and prayed the gods to bleſſe Dion & them, with all the good hap that might be. So when all was whiſht & quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to go & prepare themſelues, & that they ſhould be there ready armed after ſupper, determining the very ſame night to go to aid SYRACVSA. But now at SYRACVSA, while day light laſted, Dionyſius ſouldiers & Captaines did all the miſchiefe & villany, they could in the city, & when night came, they retired again into the caſtell, hauing loſt very few of their men. Then the ſeditious gouernours of the SYRACVSANS tooke hart again vnto thē, hoping that the enemies wold be contented with that they had done: & therefore began a new to perſwade the citizens to let Dion alone, & not to receiue him with his mercenary ſouldiers if they came to aide him, ſaying that they themſelues were honeſter men then the ſtrangers, to ſaue their citie, and to defend their libertie without helpe of any other. So, other Ambaſſadors were ſent again vnto Dion; ſome from the Captaines & gouernors of the city, to ſtay them that they ſhould not come; and other alſo from the horſemen, & noble citizens his friends to haſten his iourny: whereupon by reaſon of this variance, Dion marched very ſoftly at his eaſe. Now by night, Dions enemies within the citie got to the gates, and kept them that Dion ſhould not come in. Nypſius on the other ſide made a ſallie out of the caſtell, with his mercenarie ſouldiers, being better appointed, and a greater number of them then before: and with them he ſtraight plucked downe all the wall which they had built before the caſtell, and ranne and ſacked the citie. At this ſallie out of the caſtell, they did not onely kill the men they met, but women and litle children alſo, and ſtayed no more to ſpoile but to deſtroy and put all to hauock. For, becauſe Dionyſius ſaw that he was brought to a ſtraight and deſperat caſe, he bare ſuch mortall malice againſt the SYRACVSANS, that ſith there was no remedie but that he muſt needs forgo his tyrannie: he determined to burie it, with the vtter deſtruction & deſolation of their city. And therfore to preuent Dions aide, and to make a quicke diſpatch to deſtroy all: they came with burning torches in their hands, and did ſet fire on all things they could come too: and farther off, they fired their darts and arrowes, and beſtowed them in euery part of the citie. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall, and ſlaine in the ſtreetes by the ſouldiers, and others alſo that ran into their houſes, were driuen out againe by force of fire: for there were a number of houſes that were on fire, and fell downe vpon them that went and came. This miſery was the chiefeſt cauſe why all the SYRACVSANS agreed together to ſet open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionyſius ſouldiers were gone againe into the caſtell, he made no great haſt to march forward: but when day was broken, there came certaine horſe men from SYRACVSA vnto Dion, who brought him newes that the enemies had once againe taken the citie. Then alſo came other of his enemies vnto him, and prayed him to make haſt. Now their miſerie increaſing ſtill, and they being brought into hard ſtate: Heraclides firſt ſent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his Vncle, to pray him to come quickly and helpe them. For now there was no man left to reſiſt the enemies, becauſe he himſelf was hurt, and the citie alſo was in manner cleane burnt and deſtroyed. When theſe men came to Dion, he was yet about threeſcore furlongs from the town. So he told his mercenarie ſouldiers the daunger that the towne was in, and hauing encouraged them, he led them no more faire and ſoftly, but running toward the city, and meeting meſſengers one of anothers necke as he went, that prayed him to make al the poſſible ſpeed he could. By this meanes, the ſoldiers marching with wonderfull ſpeed and good will together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called Hecatompedon. Firſt of all, he ſent the lighteſt armed he had againſt the enemies, to the end that the SYRACVSANS ſeeing them, they might take a good heart againe to them, whilſt he himſelfe in the meane time did ſet all the other heauie armed ſouldiers & citizens that came to ioyne with him, in battell ray, & did caſt thē into diuers ſquadrons, of greater length and breadth, & appointed thē that ſhould haue the leading of thē, to the end that ſetting vpon the enemies in diuers places together, they ſhould put them in greater feare and terror. When he had ſet all things in this order, & made his prayer vnto the gods, and that they ſaw him marching through the city againſt their enemies: then there roſe ſuch a cōmon noiſe and reioycing, and great ſhout of the ſouldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, & perſwaſions of all the SYRACVSANS: that they called Dion their god and ſauiour, & the mercenarie ſouldiers their brethrē and fellow citizens. Furthermore, there was not a SYRACVSAN that ſo much regarded his owne life and perſon, but he ſeemed to be more afraid of the loſſe of Dion only, then of all the reſt. For they ſaw him the formoſt man running through the danger of the fire, treading in bloud, & vpon dead bodies that lay ſlaine in the midſt of the ſtreets. Now indeed to charge the enemies, it was a maruellous dangerous enterpriſe: for they were like mad beaſts, and ſtood beſide in battell ray alongſt the wall which they had ouerthrowne, in a very dangerous place, and hard to win. Howbeit, the danger of the fire, did moſt of all trouble and amaze the ſtrangers, & did ſtop their way: for on which ſide ſoeuer they turned them, the houſes round about them, were all on a fire, and they were driuen to march ouer the burnt timber of the houſes, & to run in great daunger of the wals of the houſe ſides that fell on them, & to paſſe through the thicke ſmoke mingled with duſt, and beſide to keepe their rankes with great difficulty. And when they came to aſſaile the enemies they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, becauſe of the ſtraightneſſe of the place: howbeit, the SYRACVSANS with force of cries & ſhowts did ſo animate and incourage their men, that at length they draue Nypſius and his men to forſake the place. The moſt part of them got into the caſtle, being very neare vnto them: the other that could not get in in time, fled ſtraglingly vp and down, whō the GRECIAN ſouldiers ſlue, chaſing of thē. The extremity of the time did not preſently ſuffer the conquerors to reape the fruit of their victory, neither the ioyes and imbracings meete for so great an exploit. For the SYRACVSANS went euery man home to his owne house, to quench the fire, the which could scarcely be put out all the night. When day brake, there was none of these seditious flatterers of the people that durst tary in the city, but condemning themselues, they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotes came together of their owne goodwils to yeeld themselues vnto Dion, confessing that they had done him wrong, and humbly praying him to shew himselfe better vnto them, then they had shewed themselues vnto him: and that it was more honorable for him, being euery way vnmachable for his vertues, to shew himselfe more noble to conquer his anger, then his vnthankfull enemies had done: who contending with him before in vertue, did now confesse themselues to be far inferior vnto him. This was the summe and effect of Heraclides and Theodotes submission vnto Dion. But his friends did perswade him not to pardon two such wicked men, who did malice and enuy his honor: and as he would do the strangers his souldiers any pleasure, that he should put Heraclides into their hands, to roote out of the common-wealth of SYRACVSA, his vile maner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as dangerous and great a plague to a city, as the tyranny. Dion pacifying them, answered: Other Generals of armies sayd he, do imploy all their wits in martiall exercise and wars: but for himselfe, that he had of long time studied and learned in the schoole of the Academy, to ouercome anger, enuy, and all malice and contention. The noble proofe whereof is most seene, not in vsing honest men and his friends moderately, but shewing mercy also vnto his enemies, & forgetting his anger against them that haue offended him: and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wisdome, but in clemencie and iustice, for therein chiefly consisted excellency, sith no man else in wars can chalenge power and gouernement, but fortune, that ruleth most. And though Heraclides, said he, through enuy hath done like a wicked man: must Dion therefore through anger bleamish his vertue? Indeed by mans law it is thought meeter to reuenge an iniury offered, then to do an iniurie: but nature sheweth, that they both proceed of one selfe imperfection. Now though it be a hard thing to change & alter the euill disposition of a man, after he is once nusled in villany: yet is not man of so wild & brutish a nature, that his wickednesse may not be ouercome with often pleasures, whē he seeth that they are continually shewed him. Dion answering his friends thus, he forgaue Heraclides, & beginning againe to shut vp the castell with a wall round about, he commanded the SYRACVSANS euery man of them to cut downe a stake, and to bring it thither. So when night was come, setting his souldiers the strangers in hand withall whilest the SYRACVSANS slept & tooke their ease: by morning he had compassed the castell round about with a pale. The next day, they that saw the greatnesse and sudden expedition of this worke, wondred much at it, as wel the enemies, as also the citizens: and when they had buried the dead bodies, and redeemed thē that were taken prisoners (which were not much lesse then 2000 persons) he called a common councell of the city, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion should be chosen Generall of SYRACVSA, with absolute power & authority, both by sea and land. The chiefest men of the city liked very well of it, & would haue had the people to haue passed it. But the rabble of these mariners & other mechanicall people liuing by their labour, would not suffer Heraclides to be put from his Admiralship, but fell to mutinie, thinking that though Heraclides did them no pleasure else, yet he would euer be a more popular man then Dion, and please the common people better. Dion granted their desire, and made Heraclides Admirall againe of the sea: howbeit he did anger them as much another way, when he did not only reiect the earnest sute they made to haue the law Agraria passe for diuision of lands in equality amongst them, but did also cancell and reuoke al that had bene done before. Wherefore Heraclides remaining at MESSINA, began thenceforth to enter into new practises againe, and to flatter the souldiers and sea-faring men he had brought thither with him, and to stirre them vp against Dion, saying that he would make himselfe tyrant: and himselfe in the meane time secretly practised with Dionysius, by meanes of a SPARTAN called Pharax. The noblest man of the SYRACVSANS mistrusted it, and therupon there fell out great mutiny in their campe, whereby also followed great famine in SYRACVSA: so that Dion was at such a straight, that he could not tell what to say to it, and was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authoritie against himselfe, so vntractable a man and so malicious and wicked a person as Heraclides was. Now when Pharax lay in campe with an armie neare vnto the citie of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES: Dion did bring the armie of the SYRACVSANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him till an other time. But through Heraclides, and the ſea-mens crying out, that ſaid, he would not trie this warre by battell, but would draw it out in length, becauſe he would be ſtill Generall: he was forced to giue battell, and loſt it. Howbeit, the ouerthrow was not great, and happened rather, becauſe his men were at a iarre among themſelues by reaſon of their faction and diuiſion, then otherwiſe. Dion therefore prepared to fight another battell, and gathered his men together againe encouraging them, when euen at twi-light word was brought him, that Heraclides with all his fleete was vnder ſaile towards SYRACVSA meaning to take the citie, and to ſhut Dion and his armie out of it. Wherefore he preſently tooke with him the chiefeſt men of authoritie in the citie, and the moſt willingeſt men, and rode all night with them in ſuch haſt, that they were at the gates of SYRACVSA the next morning by nine of the clocke, hauing ridden ſeuen hundred furlongs. Heraclides that had ſailed with all the poſſible ſpeede he could to preuent him with his ſhippes, perceiuing that he came ſhort, he turned ſaile, and taking ſeas at all aduenture, by chance he met with Gæſylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who told him he was ſent from LACEDEMON, to be Generall to the SICILIANS in this warre, as Gylippus was ſent at other times before. He was glad he had met with him to haue ſuch a remedie and defence againſt Dion, and boaſted of it vnto the friends and confederates of SYRACVSA, and ſent an Herauld before vnto the SYRACVSANS, ſummoning them to receiue Gæſylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who was ſent to be their Generall. Dion made anſwer: That the SYRACVSANS had gouernours enough; and though that their affaires did of neceſſitie require a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine, yet that himſelfe was he; for that he was made free in SPARTA. Then Gæſylus perceiuing he could not obtaine to be Generall, he went vnto SYRACVSA, and came to Dion, and there made Heraclides, and him friends againe, by the great and ſolemne othes he made: and becauſe Gæſylus alſo ſware, that he himſelfe would be reuenged of him for Dions ſake, and puniſh Heraclides, if euer after he did once more conſpire againſt him. After that, the SYRACVSANS brake vp their armie by ſea, becauſe it did them no ſeruice, and was beſide chargeable keeping of it, and further did alſo breed ſedition and trouble amongſt their gouernours: and ſo went to lay ſtraighter ſiege to the caſtell then euer they did, and built vp the wall againe, which the enemies had ouerthrowne. Then Dionyſius ſonne ſeeing no aide to come to him from any part, and that victuals failed them: and further, that the ſouldiers began to mutine, being vnable to keepe them; he fell to a compoſition with Dion, and deliuered vp the caſtell into his hands, with all the armour and munition in it: and ſo tooke his mother and his ſiſters of Dion, and put them abord vpon fiue gallies, with the which he went vnto his father, through the ſafe conduct of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all SYRACVSA, but was there to ſee this ſight; or if by chaunce there were any abſent, the other that were there called them thither as loude as they could crie, ſaying: That they did not ſee the goodlieſt day and Sunſhine, which the citie of SYRACVSA might ſee then at her riſing, the ſame being now reſtored againe to her former libertie. If vntill this preſent day they do recken the flying of Dionyſius, for one of the rareſt examples of fortunes chaunge, as one of the greateſt and notableſt things that euer was: what ioy (thinke we) had they that draue him out, and what pleaſure had they with themſelues, that with the leaſt meane that could be poſſible, did deſtroy the greateſt tyrannie in the world? So when Apollocrates (Dionyſius ſonne) was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into the caſtel: the women within the caſtell would not tarie till he came into the houſe, but went to meete him at the gates; Ariſtomachè leading Dions ſonne in her hand, and Areté following her weeping, but very fearefull how ſhe ſhould call and ſalute her husband, hauing lyen with another man. Dion firſt ſpake to his ſiſter, and afterwards to his ſonne: and then Ariſtomachè offering him Areté, ſaid vnto him: Since thy baniſhment ô Dion, we haue led a miſerable and captiue life, but now that thou art returned home with victorie, thou haſt rid vs out of care and thraldome, and haſt alſo made vs againe bold to lift vp our heads, ſauing her here, whom I (wretched creature) haue by force (thy ſelfe aliue) ſeene maried vnto another man. Now then, ſith fortune hath made thee Lord of vs all, what iudgement giueſt thou of this compulſion? How wilt thou haue her to ſalute thee, as her Vncle, or husband? As Ariſtomachè ſpake theſe words, the water ſtoode in Dions eyes: ſo he gently and louingly taking his wife Areté by the hand, he gaue her his ſonne, and willed her to go home to his houſe where he then remained, and ſo deliuered the caſtell vnto the SYRACVSANS. He hauing this proſperous ſucceſſe and victorie, would not reape any preſent benefite or pleaſure thereby, before he had ſhewed himſelfe thankefull to his friends, giuen great gifts alſo vnto the confederats of SYRACVSA, and ſpecially before he had giuen euery one of his friends in the city, & his mercenary souldiers the strangers, some honorable reward according to their deserts, exceeding his hability with magnanimity of mind: when he himselfe liued soberly, and kept a moderate diet, contenting him with any thing that came first to hand. Euerie man that heard of it, wondred at him, considering that not onely all SICILE and CARTHAGE, but generally all GRECE looked vpon his great prosperity and good fortune, thinking no man liuing greater then himselfe, nor that any Captaine euer attained vnto such fame and wonderfull fortune, as he was come vnto. This notwithstanding, Dion liued as temperately and modestly in his apparell, and also in his number of seruants, and seruice at his boord, as if he had liued with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, & had not bene conuersant amongst souldiers and Captaines, which haue no other comfort nor pleasure for all the paines and dangers they suffer continually, but to eate and drinke their fill, and to take their pleasure all day long. Plato wrote vnto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no respect but to one place, and to one city (to wit, the Academy) and would haue no other Iudges nor lookers into his doings, but the scholers of the same: who neither wondred at his great exploits, valiantnesse, nor victorie, but only considering if he did wisely and modestly vse the fortune he had, and could so keepe himselfe within modest bounds, hauing done so great things. Furthermore, touching the grauity he had when he spake to any body, & his inflexible seuerity which he vsed towards the people, he determined neuer to alter or change it: notwithstanding that his affaires required him to shew courtesie and lenity, and that Plato also reproued him for it, and wrote, that seuerity and obstinacy (as we sayd before) was the companion of solitarinesse. But it seemeth to me that Dion did vse it for two respects. The first, because nature had not framed him, courteous and affable to win men: secondly he did what he could to draw the SYRACVSANS to the contrary, who were ouer licencious, and spoiled with too much flattery: for Heraclides began againe to be busie with him. First of all, Dion sending for him to come to councel, he sent him word he would not come: and that being a priuate citizen, he would be at the common councell amongst others when any was kept. Afterwards he accused him, for that he had not ouerthrowne & razed the castell: & also because he would not suffer the people to breake open the tombe of Dionysius the elder, to cast out his body: and because he sent for counsellors to CORINTH, & disdained to make the citizens his companions in the gouernment of the commonwealth. Indeed to confesse a troth, Dion had sent for certaine CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to stablish the forme of a cõmonwealth, which he had in his mind, whẽ they were come. For his mind was vtterly to breake the gouernment of Democratia (to wit, the absolute gouernment & authority of the people in a city, not being as it were a commonwealth, but rather a faier & market where things are sold, as Plato saith) & to establish the LACONIAN or CRETAN cõmonwealth, mingled with a princely & popular gouernment: & that should be, Aristocratia, to wit, the number of a few noble men that should gouerne and direct the chiefest and waightiest matters of state. And for that purpose he thought the CORINTHIANS the meetest men to help him to frame this cõmonwealth, cõsidering that they gouerned their affaires more by chusing a few nũber of the nobility, then otherwise, & that they did not refer many things to the voice of the people. And because he was assured that Heraclides would be against him in it all that he could, and that otherwise he knew he was a seditious, a troublesome, & light headed fellow: he then suffered thẽ to kil him who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it, & so they went home to his house, & slue him there. The murther of Heraclides was much misliked of the SYRACVSANS: howbeit Dion caused him to be honorably buried, & brought his body to the grouud, folowed with all his army. Thẽ he made an Oration himself to the people, & told thẽ, that it was impossible to auoid seditiõ & trouble in the city, so long as Dion & Heraclides did both gouern together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato saith) came not acquainted with Dion through the occasion of his study in Philosophy: but because he had bin his guide to bring him to see the secret mysteries & ceremonies of the sacrifices, and for such other like common talke and company. This notwithstanding, Callippus did accõpany him in all this war, & was very much honored of him, and was one of the first of all his friends that entred into SYRACVSA with him, & did valiantly behaue himself in all the battels & conflicts that were fought. This Callippus seeing that Dions best and chiefest friends were all slaine in this war, & that Heraclides also was dead, that the people of SYRACVSA had no more any head, & besides, that the soldiers which were with Dion did loue him better then any other man: he became the vnfaithfullest man, & the verie villaine

of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his friend Dion, he ſhould vndoubtedly come to haue the whole gouernment of all SICILE, and as ſome do report, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies of twenty talents for his labor to commit this murther. So he began to practiſe, to bribe, and to ſubborne certaine of the mercenarie ſouldiers againſt Dion, & that by a maruellous crafty and ſubtile fetch. For, vſing commonly to report vnto Dion certaine ſeditious words, ſpoke peraduenture by the ſouldiers indeed, or elſe deuiſed of his owne head: he wanne ſuch a liberty and boldneſſe by the truſt Dion had in him, that he might ſafely ſay what he would to any of the ſouldiers, & boldly ſpeake euill of Dion by his owne commandement: to the end he might thereby vnderſtand the better, whether anie of his ſouldiers were angry with him, or wiſhed his death. By this pollicie, Calippus ſtraight found out thoſe that bare Dion grudge, & that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his conſpiracy. And if any man vnwilling to giue eare vnto him, went and told Dion, that Callippus wold haue intiſed him to conſpire againſt him: Dion was not angry with him for it, thinking that he did but as he had cõmanded him to do. Now as this treaſon was practiſing againſt Dion, there appeared a great and monſtrous ghoſt or ſpirit vnto him. By chaunce ſitting late one euening all alone in a gallery he had, and being in a deepe thought with himſelfe, ſuddenly he heard a noiſe: and therewith caſting his eye to the end of his gallery (being yet day light) he ſaw a monſtrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies ſhewed in playes, and ſaw her ſweeping of the houſe with a broome. This viſion ſo amazed and affrighted him, that he ſent for his friends, and told them what a ſight he had ſeene: and prayed them to tarie with him all night, being as it were a man beſide himſelfe, fearing leſt the ſpirit would come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which notwithſtanding he neuer heard more afterwards. Howbeit ſhortly after, his ſonne being growne to mans ſtate, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he caſt himſelfe headlong downe from the top of the houſe, and ſo was ſlaine. Dion being in this ſtate, Callippus went on ſtil with his treaſon, and ſpread a rumor abroad among the SYRACVSANS, that Dion ſeeing himſelfe now deſtitute of children, was determined to ſend for Apollocrates, Dionyſius ſon, to make him his heire and ſucceſſor, being coſin germaine to his wife, and his ſiſters daughters ſonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and ſiſters to miſtruſt Callippus practiſes, and they were told of it by diuerſe and manifeſt proofes. But Dion being ſory (as I ſuppoſe) for Heraclides death, and inwardly taking that murther in verie euill part, as a fowle blot to his life & doings: he ſaid he had rather dye a thouſand deaths, & to offer his throat to be cut to any that would, rather then he would liue in that miſerie, to be compelled to take heed as well of his friends, as of his enemies. Callippus then ſeeing the women ſo buſie and inquiſitiue of his doings, and fearing leaſt he ſhould be bewrayed: he came weeping vnto them, and told them it was nothing, & that he was ready to aſſure them of it by any maner of way they would deuiſe. The women then willed him to ſweare by the great oath, which was in this maner. He that muſt take this oath, commeth into the temple of the goddeſſes Theſmophores, which are, Ceres and Proſerpina: and after certaine ſacrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, holding a burning torch in his hand, and ſweareth in this maner. Callippus hauing done all theſe ceremonies, & made the oath in forme as I haue told you: he made ſo light account of the goddeſſes, that he taried no lõger to do the murther he had determined, but till the very feaſt day of the goddeſſe ſhould come, by whom he had ſworne: and ſlue him on the day of the feaſt of Proſerpina. Now, I do not thinke that he choſe that day of ſet purpoſe, knowing right well that he did alwayes ſinne againſt her, what time ſoeuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes ſpecially admitted to the ſociety and brotherhood with him, of the fraternity & myſteries of Ceres and Proſerpina. Of this conſpiracie there were diuerſe. For, as Dion was ſet in his chamber talking with his friends where there were many beds to ſit on: ſome cõpaſſed the houſe round about, others came to the doores and windowes of his chamber, and they that ſhold do the deed to diſpatch him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN ſouldiers, came into his chamber in their coates without any ſword. But when they were come in, they that were without did ſhut the doores after them, and locked them in, leſt any man ſhould come out: and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to haue ſtrangled him. But when they ſaw they could not, they called for a ſword. Neuer a man that was within, durſt open the doores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought euerie man to ſaue their owne liues, by ſuffering him to be killed, and therefore durſt not come to helpe him. So the murtherers taried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a SYRACVSAN, that gaue one of the ZACYNTHIAN ſouldiers

a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throate, as a weather they had holden a long time in their hands, euen dead for feare. The murther being executed, they cast his sister and wife, great with child into prison, and there the poore ladie was pitifully brought to bed of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring vp, then otherwise to do any thing with the child. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, because Callypus began then a litle to grow to some trouble: for at the first, after he had slaine Dion, he bare all the whole sway for a time, and kept the citie of SYRACVSA in his hands: and wrote vnto ATHENS, the which next vnto the immortall gods he was most afraid of, hauing defiled his hands in so damnable a treason. And therefore (in my opinion) it was was not euill spoken, That ATHENS is a citie of all other that bringeth forth the best, when they giue themselues to goodnesse, & the wickedest people also, when they dispose themselues to euil: as their countrie also bringeth foorth the best honie that is, and hemlocke in like manner that quickely dispatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit, the gods and fortune did not suffer this treason and wicked man to raigne long, hauing come to the gouernment of a Realme by so damnable a murther: but shortly after they gaue him his payment he had deserued. For Callyppus going to take a litle towne called * CATANA, he lost the citie of SYRACVSA: whereupon he said, That he had lost a citie, and got a * cheese-knife. Afterwards he went to assaile the MESSENIANS, and there he lost a great number of his men, and amongst them were slaine those that killed Dion. Now Callyppus finding no citie in all SICILE that would receiue him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him: he went to take the citie of RHEGIO in ITALIE. There being in great distresse and need of all things, and not able to maintaine his souldiers; he was slaine by Laptines and Polyperchon, with the selfe same dagger wherewith Dion before was slaine: the which was knowne by the fashion, being short after the LACONIAN daggers, and also by the workmanship vpon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callyppus. Now for Aristomachè and Areté, they were taken out of prison: & Icetes SYRACVSAN, that somtimes had bene one of Dions friends, took thē home to his owne house, and vsed them very well and faithfully for a certaine time, but afterwards was wonne and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he caused a ship to be prouided for them, and bare them in hand that he would send them into PELOPONNESVS: but he gaue them charge that caried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them ouer boord into the sea. Some say, that the two women, and the litle young boy, were cast aliue into the sea. But this reward of the sinfull act that he committed, returned againe vpon himselfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and besides, the SYRACVSANS did also kill two of his daughters in reuenge of the vnfaithfulnesse he had shewed vnto Dion.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Brutus.

MArcus Brutus came of that Iunius Brutus, for whom the auncient ROMAINES made his ſtatue of braſſe to be ſet vp in the Capitoll, with the images of the kings, holding a naked ſword in his hand: becauſe he had valiantly put downe the TARQVINES from their kingdome of ROME. But that Iunius Brutus being of a ſower ſterne nature, not ſoftened by reaſon, being like vnto ſword blades of too hard a temper: was ſo ſubiect to his choller and malice he bare vnto the tyrants, that for their ſakes he cauſed his owne ſonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrarie manner, whoſe life we preſently write, hauing framed his manners of life by the rules of vertue, and ſtudie of Philoſophie, and hauing employed his wit, which was gentle and conſtant, in attempting of great things: me thinkes he was rightly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his very enemies which wiſh him moſt hurt, becauſe of his conſpiracie againſt Iulius Cæſar: if there were any noble attempt done in all this conſpiracie, they referre it wholy vnto Brutus, and all the cruell and violent actes vnto Caſsius, who was Brutus familiar friend, but not ſo well giuen, and conditioned as he. His mother Seruilia, it is thought came of the bloud of Seruilius Hala; who, when Spurius Melius went about to make himſelfe king, and to bring it to paſſe had entiſed the common people to rebell: tooke a dagger, and hid it cloſe vnder his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had ſomwhat to ſay vnto him, and preſſed as neare him as he could: wherfore Melius ſtouping downe with his head, to heare what he would ſay, Brutus ſtabbed him in with his dagger and ſlue him. Thus much all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father, ſome for the euill will and malice they bare vnto Brutus, becauſe of the death of Iulius Cæſar, do maintaine, that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the TARQVINES: for there were none left of his race, conſidering that his two ſons were executed for conſpiracie with the TARQVINS: and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane houſe, the which was raiſed to honour and office in the commonwealth, but of late time. Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth the contrarie, that Iunius Brutus indeed ſlue two of his ſonnes which were men growne, as the hiſtories do declare: howbeit, that there was a third ſonne, being but a litle child at that time, from whome the houſe and family afterwards was deriued: and furthermore, that there were in his time certaine famous men of that familie, whose stature and countenance resembled much the image of Iunius Brutus. And thus much for this matter. Marcus Cato the Philosopher was brother vnto Seruilia, Marcus Brutus mother: whom Brutus studied most to follow of all the other ROMAINES, because he was his vncle, and afterwards he maried his daughter. Now touching the GRECIAN Philosophers, there was no sect nor Philosopher of them, but he heard and liked it: but aboue all the rest, he loued Platoes sect best, and did not much giue himselfe to the new or meane Academie (as they call it) but altogether to the old Academie. Therefore he did euer greatly esteeme the Philosopher Antiochus, of the citie of ASCALON: but he was more familiar with his brother Ariston, who for learning and knowledge was inferiour to many other Philosophers, but for wisdome and curtesie, equall with the best and chiefest. Touching Empylus, whom M. Brutus himselfe doth mention in his Epistles, and his friends also in many places: he was an Orator, & left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Iulius Cæsar, & intituled it, Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latin tongue, and was able to make long discourse in it: beside that he could also plead very well in Latine. But for the Greeke tong, they do note in some of his Epistles, that he counterfeited that briefe compendious maner of speech of the LACEDÆMONIANS. As when the war was begun, he wrote vnto the PARGAMENIANS in this sort: I vnderstand you haue giuen Dolabella money: if you haue done it willingly, you confesse you haue offended me; if against your wils, shew it then by giuing me willingly. Another time againe vnto the SAMIANS: Your councels be long, your doings be slow, consider the end. And in another Epistle he wrote vnto the PATAREIANS: The XANTHIANS despising my good wil, haue made their country a graue of dispaire; and the PATAREIANS that put themselues into my protection, haue lost no iot of their liberty: and therefore whilst you haue libertie, either chuse the iudgement of the PATAREIANS, or the fortune of the XANTHIANS. These were Brutus maner of letters which were honored for their briefenesse. So Brutus being but a young stripling, went into CYPRVS with his Vncle Cato, who was sent against Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, who hauing slaine himself, Cato staying for certain necessarie busines he had in the Ile of RHODES, had already sent * Caninius, one of his friends before to keepe his treasure and goods. But Cato fearing he would be light-fingered, wrote vnto Brutus forthwith to come out of PAMPHILIA (where he was but newly recouered of a sickenesse) into CYPRVS, the which he did. The which iourney he was sory to take vpon him, both for respect of Caninius shame, whom Cato (as he thought) wrongfully slaundered: as also becausse he thought this office too meane and vnmeet for him, being a young man, and giuen to his booke. This notwithstanding, he behaued himselfe so honestly and carefully, that Cato did greatly commend him: and after all the goods were sold and conuerted into readie money, he tooke the most part of it, and returned withall to ROME. Afterwardes, when the Empire of ROME was deuided into factions, and that Cæsar and Pompey both were in armes one against the other, and that all the Empire of ROME was in garboile and vprore: it was thought then that Brutus would take part with Cæsar, becausse Pompey not long before had put his father to death. But Brutus preferring the respect of his countrie and commonwealth before priuate affection, and perswading himselfe that Pompey had iuster cause to enter into armes, then Cæsar: he then tooke part with Pompey, though oftentimes meeting him before, he thought scorne to speake to him, thinking it a great sin and offence in him, to speake to the murtherer of his father. But then submitting himselfe vnto Pompey, as vnto the head of the commonwealth: he sailed into SICILE, Lieutenant vnder Sestius that was Gouernor of that prouince. But when he saw that there was no way to rise, nor to do any noble exploits, and that Cæsar and Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victorie: he went of himselfe vnsent for into MACEDON, to be partaker of the danger. It is reported, that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his comming; when he saw him come to him, he rose out of his chaire, and went and imbraced him before them all, and vsed him as honorably, as he could haue done the noblest man that tooke his part. Brutus being in Pompeys campe, did nothing but studie all day long, except he were with Pompey, and not only the dayes before, but the selfe same day also before the great battell was fought in the fields of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was ouerthrowne. It was in the middest of Sommer, and the Sunne was very hote, besides that the campe was lodged neare vnto marishes, and they that caried his tent, taried long before they came: whereupon, being very wearie with trauell, scant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others slept, or thought what would happen the morow after, he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long til night, writing a breuiarie of Polybius.

It is reported that Cæſar did not forget him, and that he gaue his Captaines charge before the battell, that they ſhould beware they killed not Brutus in fight, and if he yeelded willingly vnto them, that then they ſhould bring him vnto him: but if he reſiſted, and would not be taken, thē that they ſhould let him go, and do him no hurt. Some ſay he did this for Seruiliaes ſake, Brutus mother. For when he was a young man, he had bene acquainted with Seruilia, who was extreamely in loue with him. And becauſe Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was hoteſt, he perſwaded himſelfe that he begate him. For proofe hereof the report goeth, that when the waightieſt matters were in hand in the Senate, about the conſpiracie of Catiline, which was likely to haue vndone the citie of ROME, Cæſar and Cato ſate neare together, and were both of contrarie minds to each other: and then, that in the meane time one deliuered Cæſar a letter. Cæſar tooke it, and read it ſoftly to himſelfe: but Cato cryed out vpon Cæſar, and ſayed he did not well to receiue aduertiſements from enemies: whereupon the whole Senate beganne to murmure at it. Then Cæſar gaue Cato the letter as it was ſent him, who read it, and found that it was a loue-letter ſent from his ſiſter Seruilia: therupon he caſt it againe to Cæſar, and ſayed vnto him; Hold, drunken ſoppe. When he had done ſo, he went on with his tale, and maintained his opinion as he did before: ſo commonly was the loue of Seruilia knowne, which ſhe bare vnto Cæſar. So, after Pompeys ouerthrowe at the battell of PHARSALIA, and that he fled to the ſea: when Cæſar came to beſiege his campe, Brutus went out of the campe gates vnſeene of any man, and leapt into a mariſh full of water and reeds. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the citie of LARISSA: from whence he wrote vnto Cæſar, who was very glad that he had ſcaped, and ſent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onely pardon him, but alſo kept him alwaies about him, and did as much honour and eſteeme him, as any man he had in his companie. Nowe, no man could tell whither Pompey was fled, and all were maruellous deſirous to knowe it: wherefore Cæſar walking a good way alone with Brutus, he did aske him which way he thought Pompey tooke. Cæſar perceiuing by his talke that Brutus gueſſed certainely whither Pompey ſhould be fledde: he left all other wayes, and tooke his iourney directly towardes ÆGYPT. Pompey (as Brutus had coniectured) was indeede fled into ÆGYPT, but there he was villanouſly ſlaine. Furthermore, Brutus obtained pardon of Cæſar for Caſſius: and defending alſo the King* of LYBIANS cauſe, he was ouerlayed with a world of accuſations againſt him; howbeit, intreating for him, he ſaued him the beſt part of his Realme and Kingdome. They ſay alſo, that Cæſar ſayed, when he heard Brutus pleade: I knowe not (ſayed he) what this young man would; but what he would, he willeth it vehemently. For as Brutus grauitie and conſtant minde would not graunt all men their requeſtes that ſued vnto him, but being mooued with reaſon and diſcretion, did alwayes encline to that which was good and honeſt: euen ſo when it was mooued to followe any matter, he vſed a kind of forcible and vehement perſwaſion that calmed not, till he had obtained his deſire. For by flattering of him, a man could neuer obtaine any thing at his handes, nor make him to doe that which was vniuſt. Further, he thought it not meete for a man of calling and eſtimation, to yeeld vnto the requeſtes and intreaties of a ſhameleſſe and importunate ſuter, requeſting things vnmeete: the which notwithſtanding ſome men doe for ſhame, becauſe they dare denie nothing, and therefore he was wont to ſay, That he thought them evill brought vp in their youth, that could deny nothing. Nowe when Cæſar tooke ſea to goe into AFRICKE againſt Cato and Scipio, he left Brutus Gouernour of GAVLE in ITALIE on this ſide of the Alpes, which was a great good happe for that Prouince. For where others were ſpoyled and polled by the inſolencie and couetouſneſſe of the Gouernours, as if it had bene a country conquered: Brutus was a comfort and reſt vnto their former troubles and miſeries they ſuſtained. But he referred it wholy vnto Cæſars grace and goodneſſe. For when Cæſar returned out of AFRICKE, and progreſſed vp and downe ITALIE: the things that pleaſed him beſt to ſee, were the cities vnder Brutus charge and gouernment, and Brutus himſelfe; who honoured Cæſar in perſon, and whoſe companie alſo Cæſar greatly eſteemed. Now there were diuerſe ſorts of Prætorſhips at ROME, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Caſſius would make ſute for the chiefeſt Prætorſhip, which they called, The Prætorſhip of the citie: becauſe he that had that office, was as a Iudge to miniſter iuſtice vnto the citizens. Therefore they ſtroue one againſt the other, though ſome ſay, that there was ſome litle grudge betwixt them for other matters before, and that this contention did ſet them further out, though they were allyed together: for Caſſius had maried Iunia, Brutus ſiſter. Others ſay, that this contention betwixt them came by Cæsar himselfe, who secretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauor. So their sute for the Prætorship was so followed and laboured of either partie, that one of them put another in sute of law. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble exploits in armes, which Cassius had done against the PARTHIANS. So Cæsar, after he had heard both their obiections, told his friends with whom he consulted about this matter: Cassius cause is the iuster (said he) but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorship, and Cassius the second: who thanked not Cæsar so much for the Prætorship he had, as he was angrie with him for that he had lost. But Brutus in many other things tasted of the benefite of Cæsars fauour in any thing he requested. For if he had listed, he might haue bene one of Cæsars chiefest friends, and of greatest authoritie and credite about him. Howbeit, Cassius friends did disswade him from it (for Cassius and he were not yet reconciled together sithence their first contention and strife for the Prætorship) & prayed him to beware of Cæsars sweet entisements, and to flie his tyrannicall fauors: the which they said Cæsar gaue him, not to honor his vertue, but to weaken his constant mind, framing it to the bent of his bow. Now Cæsar on the other side did not trust him ouermuch, nor was without tales brought vnto him against him: howbeit he feared his great mind, authoritie and friends. Yet on the other side also, he trusted his good nature, and faire conditions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him: he answered, That these fat long haired men made him not affraid, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that by Brutus and Cassius. At an other time also when one accused Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: What, (said he againe, clapping his hands on his breast) thinke ye that Brutus will not tarie till this bodie die? meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to haue such power as he had. And surely, (in my opinion) I am perswaded that Brutus might indeed haue come to haue bene the chiefest man of ROME, if he could haue contented himselfe for a time to haue bene next vnto Cæsar, and to haue suffered his glorie and authoritie, which he had gotten by his great victories, to consume with time. But Cassius being a cholericke man, and hating Cæsar priuatly, more then he did the tyrannie openly; he incensed Brutus against him. It is also reported, that Brutus could euill away with the tyrannie, and that Cassius hated the tyrant: making many complaints for the iniuries he had done him; and amongst others, for that he had taken away his Lions from him. Cassius had prouided them for his sports, when he should be Ædilis, and they were found in the citie of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calenus, and Cæsar kept them. The rumor went, that these lions did maruellous great hurt to the MEGARIANS: for when the city was taken, they brake their cages where they were tyed vp, & turned thē loose, thinking they wold haue done great mischiefe to the enemies, and haue kept them from setting vpon them: but the lions (contrarie to expectation) turned vpon themselues that fled vnarmed, and did so cruelly teare some in peeces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause, (as some do report) that made Cassius conspire against Cæsar. But this holdeth no water: for Cassius euen from his cradle could not abide any manner of tyrants, as it appeared when he was but a boy, and went vnto the same schoole that Faustus, the son of Sylla did. And Faustus bragging among other boyes, highly boasted of his fathers kingdom: Cassius rose vp on his feet, and gaue him two good whirts on the eare. Faustus gouernors would haue put this matter in sute against Cassius: but Pompey would not suffer them, but caused the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them, how the matter came to passe. Then Cassius (as it is written of him) said vnto the other: Go too Faustus, speake againe and thou darest, before this Nobleman here, the same words that made me angrie with thee, that my fistes may walke once againe about thine eares. Such was Cassius hote stirring nature. But for Brutus, his friends and countrimen, both by diuers procurements, and sundrie rumours of the citie, and by many bils also, did openly call and procure him to do that he did. For vnder the image of his auncestor Iunius Brutus, (that draue the kings out of ROME) they wrote: O, that it pleased the gods thou wert now aliue, Brutus! and againe, That thou wert here among vs now! His tribunall or chaire, where he gaue audience during the time he was Prætor, was full of such billes: Brutus thou art asleepe, and art not Brutus indeed. And of all this, Cæsars flatterers were the cause: who beside many other exceeding and vnspeakeable honours they daily deuised for him, in the night time they did put Diademes vpon the heades of his images, supposing thereby to allure the common people to call him King, in steade of Dictator. Howbeit, it turned to the contrarie, (as we haue written more at large in Iulius Cæsars life.) Now when

Caſsius felt his friends, and did ſtirre them vp againſt Cæſar: they all agreed and promiſed to take part with him, ſo Brutus were the chiefe of their conſpiracie. For they told him, that ſo high an enterpriſe and attempt as that, did not ſo much require men of manhood, and courage to draw their ſwords: as it ſtood thē vpon to haue a man of ſuch eſtimation as Brutus, to make euery man boldly thinke, that by his onely preſence the fact were holy and iuſt. If he tooke not this courſe, then that they ſhould go to it with fainter hearts, and when they had done it, they ſhould be more fearefull: becauſe euery man would thinke that Brutus would not haue refuſed to haue made one with them, if the cauſe had bene good and honeſt. Therefore Caſsius conſidering this matter with himſelfe, did firſt of all ſpeake to Brutus, ſince they grew ſtraunge together for the ſute they had for the Prætorſhip. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had embraced one another; Caſsius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate houſe, the firſt day of the moneth of March, becauſe he heard ſay that Cæſars friendes ſhould moue the councell that day, that Cæſar ſhould be called King by the Senate. Brutus anſwered him, he wold not be there. But if we be ſent for (ſayed Caſsius) how then? For my ſelfe then (ſayed Brutus) I meane not to hold my peace, but to withſtand it, and rather die then loſe my libertie. Caſsius being bold, and taking hold of this word: Why, (quoth he) what ROMAINE is he aliue that will ſuffer thee to dye for the libertie? What, knoweſt thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkeſt thou that they be coblers, tapſters, or ſuch like baſe mechanicall people, that write theſe billes and ſcrolles which are found daily in thy Prætors chaire, and not the nobleſt men and beſt citizens that do it? No, be thou well aſſured, that of other Prætors they looke for gifties, common diſtributions amongſt the people, & for common playes, and to ſee fencers fight at the ſharp, to ſhew the people paſtime: but at thy hands, they ſpecially require (as a due debt vnto them) the taking away of the tyrannie, being fully bent to ſuffer any extremitie for thy ſake, ſo that thou wilt ſhew thy ſelfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. Thereupon he kiſſed Brutus, and embraced him: and ſo each taking leaue of other, they went both to ſpeake with their friends about it. Now amongſt Pompeys friends, there was one called * Caius Ligarius, who had bene accuſed vnto Cæſar for taking part with Pompey, and Cæſar diſcharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cæſar ſo much for his diſcharge, as he was offended with him, for that he was brought in daunger by his tyrannicall power. And therefore in his heart he was alway his mortall enemie, and was beſides very familiar with Brutus, who went to ſee him being ſicke in his bed, and ſayed vnto him: Ligarius, in what a time art thou ſicke? Ligarius riſing vp in his bed, and taking him by the right hand, ſaid vnto him: Brutus (ſaid he) if thou haſt any great enterpriſe in hand worthie of thy ſelfe, I am whole. After that time they began to feele all their acquaintance whom they truſted, and layed their heads together conſulting vpon it, and did not onely picke out their friends, but all thoſe alſo whom they thought ſtout enough to attempt any deſperate matter, and that were not affraid to loſe their liues. For this cauſe they durſt not acquaint Cicero with their conſpiracie, although he was a man whom they loued dearely, and truſted beſt: for they were affraid that he being a coward by nature, and age alſo hauing increaſed his feare, he would quite turne and alter all their purpoſe, and quench the heate of their enterpriſe the which ſpecially required hote and earneſt execution, ſeeking by perſwaſion to bring all things to ſuch ſafetie, as there ſhould be no perill. Brutus alſo did let other of his friends alone, as Statilius EPICVRIAN, and Faonius, that made profeſſion to follow Marcus Cato: becauſe that hauing caſt out words a farre off, diſputing together in Philoſophie to feele their minds: Faonius anſwered, That ciuill war was worſe then tyrannicall gouernment vſurped againſt the law. And Statilius told him alſo, That it were an vnwiſe part of him, to put his life in daunger, for a ſight of ignorant fooles and aſſes. Labeo was preſent at this talke, and maintained the contrarie againſt them both. But Brutus held his peace, as though it had bene a doubtfull matter, and a hard thing to haue bene decided. But afterwardes, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priuie to his intent; who very readily offered himſelfe to make one. And they thought good alſo to bring in another Brutus to ioyne with him, ſurnamed Albinus: who was no man of his handes himſelfe, but becauſe he was able to bring good force of a great number of ſlaues, and fencers at the ſharpe, whom he kept to ſhew the people paſtime with their fighting, beſides alſo that Cæſar had ſome truſt in him. Caſsius and Labeo told Brutus Albinus of it at the firſt, but he made them no aunſwer. But when he had ſpoken with Brutus himſelfe alone, and that Brutus had told him he was the chiefe ring-leader of all this conſpiracie: then he willingly promiſed him the best aide he could. Furthermore, the onely name and great calling of Brutus, did bring on the most of them to giue consent to this conspiracie: who hauing neuer taken othes together, nor taken or giuen any caution or assurance, nor binding themselues one to another by any religious othes: they all kept the matter so secret to themselues, and could so cunningly handle it, that notwithstanding, the gods did reueale it by manifest signes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of sacrifices: yet all this would not be beleeued. Now Brutus, who knewe very well, that for his sake all the noblest, valiantest, and most couragious men of ROME did venture their liues, weighing with himselfe the greatnesse of the daunger: when he was out of his house, he did so frame and fashion his countenance and lookes, that no man could discerne he had any thing to trouble his mind. But when night came that he was in his owne house, then he was cleane chaunged: for, either care did wake him against his will when he would haue slept, or else oftentimes of himselfe he fell into such deepe thoughts of this enterprise, casting in his mind all the daungers that might happen: that his wife lying by him, found that there was some maruellous great matter that troubled his mind, not being wont to be in that taking, and that he could not well determine with himselfe. His wife Porcia (as we haue told you before) was the daughter of Cato, whom Brutus maried being his cousin, not a mayden, but a young widow after the death of her first husband Bibulus, by whome she had also a young sonne called Bibulus, who afterwardes wrote a booke of the actes and gestes of Brutus, extant at this present day. This young Ladie being excellently well seene in Philosophie, louing her husband well, and being of a noble courage, as she was also wise: because she would not aske her husband what he ayled before she had made some proofe by her selfe: she tooke a little razour such as Barbers occupie to pare mens nayles, and causing her maydes and women to go out of her chamber, gaue her selfe a great gash withall in her thigh, that she was straight all of a goare bloud: and incontinently after, a vehement feauer tooke her, by reason of the paine of her wound. Then perceiuing her husband was maruellously out of quiet, and that he could take no rest: euen in her greatest paine of all, she spake in this sort vnto him: I being, ô Brutus, (said she) the daughter of Cato, was maried vnto thee, not to be thy bed-fellowe and companion in bedde and at boord onely, like a harlot, but to be partaker also with thee, of thy good and euill fortune. Now for thy selfe, I can find no cause of fault in thee touching our match: but for my part, how may I shew my dutie towardes thee, and how much I would do for thy sake, if I cannot constantly beare a secret mischaunce or griefe with thee, which requireth secrecie and fidelitie? I confesse, that a womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a secret safely: but yet (Brutus) good education, and the companie of vertuous men, haue some power to reforme the defect of nature. And for my selfe, I haue this benefite moreouer, that I am the daughter of Cato, and wife of Brutus. This notwithstanding, I did not trust to any of these things before: vntil that now I haue found by experience, that no paine nor griefe whatsoeuer can ouercome me. With those wordes she shewed him her wound on her thigh, and told him what she had done to proue her selfe. Brutus was amazed to heare what she sayed vnto him, and lifting vp his handes to heauen, he besought the goddes to giue him the grace he might bring his enterprise to so good passe, that he might be found a husband, worthie of so noble a wife as Porcia: so he then did comfort her the best he could. Nowe, a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cæsar would not faile to come: the conspiratours determined then to put their enterprise in execution, because they might meete safely at that time without suspition, and the rather, for that all the noblest and chiefest men of the citie would be there: who when they should see such a great matter executed, would euery man then set too their handes, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the councell should be kept, was chosen of purpose by diuine Prouidence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of seates for men to sit in, where also was set vp the image of Pompey, which the citie had made and consecrated in honour of him: when he did beautifie that part of the citie with the Theater he built, with diuerse porches about it. In this place was the assembly of the Senate appointed to be, iust on the fifteenth day of the moneth of March, which the ROMAINES call, Idus Martias: so that it seemed some god of purpose had brought Cæsar thither to be slaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his house with a dagger by his side vnder his long gowne, that no bodie saw nor knew, but his wife

wife onely. The other conſpiratours were all aſſembled at Caſsius houſe, to bring his ſonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilis, and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porch, looking that Cæſar would ſtraight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull aſſured conſtancie of theſe conſpirators, in ſo daungerous and waightie an enterpriſe as they had vndertaken. For many of them being Prætors, by reaſon of their office, whoſe dutie is to miniſter iuſtice to euery bodie: they did not onely with great quietneſſe and courteſie heare them that ſpake vnto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gaue them attentiue eare, as if they had no other matter in their heads: but moreouer, they gaue iuſt ſentence, and carefully diſpatched the cauſes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine ſumme of money, refuſed to pay it, and cryed out, that he did appeale vnto Cæſar. Then Brutus caſting his eyes vpon the conſpiratours, ſaid: Cæſar ſhall not let me to ſee the lawe executed. Notwithſtanding this, by chance there fell out many misfortunes vnto them, which was enough to haue marred the enterpriſe. The firſt and chiefeſt, was Cæſars long tarying, who came very late to the Senate: for, becauſe the ſignes of the ſacrifices appeared vnluckie, his wife Calphurnia kept him at home, and the Soothſayers bad him beware he went not abroad. The ſecond cauſe was, when one came vnto Caſca being a conſpiratour, and taking him by the hand, ſaid vnto him: O Caſca, thou kepteſt it cloſe from me, but Brutus hath told me all. Caſca being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and ſayed: Why, how now, how commeth it to paſſe thou art thus rich, that thou doeſt ſue to be Ædilis? Thus Caſca being deceiued by the others doubtfull wordes, he told them it was a thouſand to one, he blabbed not out all the conſpiracie. Another Senatour called Popilius Læna, after he had ſaluted Brutus and Caſsius more friendly then he was wont to do: he rounded ſoftly in their eares, and told them: I pray the goddes you may goe through with that you haue taken in hand; but withall, diſpatch I reade you, for your enterpriſe is bewrayed. When he had ſayed, he preſently departed from them, and left them both affrayed that their conſpiracie would out. Now in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men poſt haſt vnto him, and told him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being very carefull and penſiue for that which was to come, and being too weake to away with ſo great and inward griefe of mind: ſhe could hardly keepe within, but was frighted with euery litle noyſe and crye ſhe heard, as thoſe that are taken and poſſeſt with the furie of the Bacchantes, asking euery man that came from the market place, what Brutus did, and ſtill ſent meſſenger after meſſenger, to know what newes. At length Cæſars comming being prolonged, (as you haue heard) Porciaes weakeneſſe was not able to hold out any longer, and thereupon ſhe ſodainely ſwounded, that ſhe had no leyſure to goe to her chamber, but was taken in the middeſt of her houſe, where her ſpeech and ſenſes failed her. Howbeit ſhe ſoone came to her ſelfe againe, and ſo was layed in her bed, and tended by her women. When Brutus heard theſe newes, it grieued him, as it is to be preſuppoſed: yet he left not off the care of his countrie and commonwealth, neither went home to his houſe for any newes he heard. Nowe, it was reported that Cæſar was comming in his Litter: for he determined not to ſtay in the Senate all that day (becauſe he was affrayed of the vnluckie ſignes of the ſacrifices) but to adiourne matters of importance vnto the next Seſſion and Councell holden, fayning himſelfe not to be well at eaſe. When Cæſar came out of his Litter, Popilius Læna (that had talked before with Brutus and Caſsius, and had prayed the goddes they might bring this enterpriſe to paſſe) went vnto Cæſar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cæſar gaue good eare vnto him. Wherefore the conſpiratours (if ſo they ſhould be called) not hearing what he ſaid to Cæſar, but coniecturing by that he had told them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the very diſcouerie of their conſpiracie: they were affrayed euery man of them, and one looking in anothers face, it was eaſie to ſee that they all were of a mind, that it was no tarying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they ſhould kill themſelues with their owne handes. And when Caſsius and certaine other clapped their hands on their ſwordes vnder their gownes to drawe them; Brutus marking the countenance and geſture of Læna, and conſidering that he did vſe himſelfe rather like an humble and earneſt ſuter, then like an accuſer: he ſayed nothing to his companion (becauſe there were many amongeſt them that were not of the conſpiracie) but with a pleaſaunt countenance encouraged Caſsius. And immediately after, Læna went from Cæſar, and kiſſed his hand: which ſhewed plainely that it was for ſome matter concerning himſelfe, that he had held him ſo long in talke. Now all the Senatours being entred firſt into this place or chapter house where the councell should be kept, all the other conspiratours straight stood about Cæsars chaire, as if they had had had something to say vnto him. And some say, that Cassius casting his eyes vpon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aliue. * Trebonius on the other side, drew Antonius aside, as he came into the house where the Senate sate, and held him with a long talke without. When Cæsar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honour him at his comming in. So when he was set, the conspiratours flocked about him, and amongest them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble suite for the calling home againe of his brother that was banished. They all made as though they were intercessours for him, and tooke him by the handes, and kissed his heade and breast. Cæsar at the first, simply refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwardes, perceiuing they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Cæsars gowne ouer his shoulders, and Casca that stood behind him, drew his dagger first, & strake Cæsar vpon the shoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Cæsar feeling himselfe hurt, tooke him straight by the hand he held his dagger in, & cryed out in Latin: O traitor Casca, what dost thou? Casca on the other side cried in Greeke, and called his brother to helpe him. So diuers running on a heape together to flie vpon Cæsar, he looking about him to haue fled, saw Brutus with a sword drawne in his hand ready to strike at him: then he let Cascaes hand goe, and casting his gowne ouer his face, suffered euery man to strike at him that wold. Then the conspirators thronging one vpon another, because euery man was desirous to haue a cut at him, so many swords and daggers lighting vpon one body, one of them hurt another, and among them Brutus caught a blow on his hand, because he would make one in murthering of him, and all the rest also were euery man of them bloudied. Cæsar being slaine in this maner, Brutus standing in the middest of the house, would haue spoken, and stayed the other Senatours that were not of the conspiracie, to haue told them the reason why they had done this fact. But they as men both affrayed and amazed, fled one vpon anothers necke in hast to get out at the doore, and no man followed them. For it was set downe, and agreed betwene them, that they should kill no man but Cæsar onely, and should intreate all the rest to looke to defend their libertie. All the conspiratours, but Brutus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, because he was a wicked man, and that in nature fauoured tyrannie: besides also, for that he was in great estimation with souldiers, hauing bene conuersant of long time amongst them: and specially hauing a mind bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authoritie at that time, being Consull with Cæsar. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he said it was not honest: secondly, because he told them there was hope of change in him. For he did not mistrust, but that Antonius being a noble minded and couragious man (when he should know that Cæsar was dead) would willingly help his countrey to recouer her libertie, hauing them an example vnto him, to follow their courage and vertue. So Brutus by this meanes saued Antonius life, who at that present time disguised himselfe, and stale away: but Brutus and his consorts, hauing their swords bloudie in their hands, went straight to the Capitoll, perswading the ROMAINES as they went, to take their libertie againe. Now, at the first time when the murther was newly done, there were sudden outcries of people that ranne vp and downe the citie, the which indeed did the more increase the feare and tumult. But when they saw they slue no man, neither did spoile or make hauock of any thing: then certaine of the Senators, and many of the people imboldening themselues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being assembled together one after another, Brutus made an oration vnto them to win the fauour of the people, and to iustifie that they had done. All those that were by, said they had done well, and cried vnto them, that they should boldly come downe from the Capitoll: wherupon Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The rest followed in troupe, but Brutus went formost, very honorably compassed in round about with the noblest men of the citie, which brought him from the Capitoll, through the market place, to the pulpit for oratiõs. Whẽ the people saw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehels of all sorts, and had a good will to make some stirre: yet being asshamed to do it, for the reuerence they bare vnto Brutus, they kept silence to heare what he would say. Whẽ Brutus began to speake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they shewed that they were not all contented with the murther. For when another called Cinna would haue spoken, and beganne to accuse Cæsar: they fell into a great vprore among them, and marueilously reuiled him. Insomuch that the conspiratours returned againe into the Capitoll. There Bru- tus being affrayed to be beſieged, ſent backe againe the Noblemen that came thither with him, thinking it no reaſon, that they which were no partakers of the murther, ſhould be partakers of the daunger. Then the next morning the Senate being aſſembled, and holden within the temple of the goddeſſe Tellus, to wit, the Earth: and Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero, hauing made a motion to the Senate in that aſſembly, that they ſhould take an order to pardon and forget all that was paſt, and to ſtabliſh friendſhip and peace againe: it was decreed, that they ſhould not only be pardoned, but alſo that the Conſuls ſhould referre it to the Senate what honours ſhould be appointed vnto them. This being agreed vpon, the Senate brake vp, and Antonius the Conſull, to put them in heart that were in the Capitoll, ſent them his ſonne for a pledge. Vpon this aſſurance, Brutus and his companions came downe from the Capitoll, where euery man ſaluted and embraced each other, among the which, Antonius himſelfe did bid Caſſius to ſupper to him: and Lepidus alſo bad Brutus, and ſo one bad another, as they had friendſhip and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to councell, did firſt of all commend Antonius, for that he had wiſely ſtayed and quenched the beginning of a ciuill warre: then they alſo gaue Brutus and his conſorts great prayſes, and laſtly they appointed them ſeuerall gouernments of prouinces. For vnto Brutus, they appointed CRETA; AFRICKE vnto Caſſius; ASIA vnto Trebonius: BITHYNIA, vnto Cimber; and vnto the other Decius Brutus Albinus, GAVLE on this ſide the Alpes. When this was done, they came to talke of Cæſars will and teſtament, and of his funerals and tombe. Then Antonius thinking good his teſtament ſhould be read openly, and alſo that his bodie ſhould be honorably buried, and not in hugger mugger, leſt the people might thereby take occaſion to be worſe offended if they did otherwiſe: Caſſius ſtoutly ſpake againſt it. But Brutus went with the motion, and agreed vnto it: wherein it ſeemeth he committed a ſecond fault. For the firſt fault he did, was when he would not conſent to his fellow conſpirators, that Antonius ſhould be ſlaine: and therefore he was iuſtly accuſed, that thereby he had ſaued and ſtrengthened a ſtrong and grieuous enemy of their conſpiracie. The ſecond fault was, when he agreed that Cæſars funerals ſhould be as Antonius would haue them, the which indeed marred all. For firſt of all, when Cæſars teſtament was openly read among them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto euery citizen of ROME, 75. Drachmes a man; and that he left his gardens & arbors vnto the people, which he had on this ſide of the riuer of Tyber, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, & were maruellous ſorie for him. Afterwards, when Cæſars body was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funeral Oration in praiſe of the dead according to the auncient cuſtome of ROME, and perceiuing that his words moued the common people to compaſſion: he framed his eloquence to make their harts yerne the more, and taking Cæſars gowne all bloudy in his hand, he layed it open to the ſight of them all, ſhewing what a number of cuts and holes it had vpon it. Therewithall the people fell preſently into ſuch a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongſt the common people. For ſome of them cryed out, Kill the murtherers: others plucked vp formes, tables, and ſtalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funerals of Clodius, and hauing laid them all on a heape together, they ſet them on fire, and thereupon did put the body of Cæſar, and burnt it in the midſt of the moſt holy places. And furthermore, when the fire was throughly kindled, ſome here, ſome there, tooke burning firebrands, and ran with them to the murtherers houſes that killed him, to ſet them a fire. Howbeit, the conſpiratours foreſeeing the daunger before, had wiſely prouided for themſelues, and fledde. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had bene no partaker of the conſpiracie, but was alway one of Cæſars chiefeſt friends: he dreamed the night before, that Cæſar bad him to ſupper with him, and that he refuſing to go, Cæſar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, ſo that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruellouſly affrayed, he was driuen to follow him in ſpite of his heart. This dreame put him all night into a feauer, and yet notwithſtanding, the next morning when he heard that they caried Cæſars bodie to buriall, being aſhamed not to accompanie his funerals: he went out of his houſe, and thruſt himſelfe into the preaſe of the common people that were in a great vprore. And becauſe ſome one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thinking he had bene that Cinna, who in an oration he made, had ſpoken very euill of Cæſar; they falling vpon him in their rage, ſlue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affraid then any other thing, next vnto the chaunge of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of ROME, and kept at the firſt in the city of ANTIVM, hoping to returne

againe to Rome, when the furie of the people was a litle asswaged. The which they hoped would be quickely, considering that they had to deale with a fickle and vnconstant multitude, easie to be caried, and that the Senate stood for them: who notwithstanding made no enquirie of them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but caused them to be sought for and apprehended, that went with firebrands to set fire of the conspiratours houses. The people growing wearie now of Antonius pride and insolencie, who ruled all things in manner with absolute power: they desired that Brutus might returne againe, and it was also looked for, that Brutus would come himselfe in person to play the playes which were due to the people, by reason of his office of Prætorship. But Brutus vnderstanding, that many of Cæsars souldiers which serued vnder him in the warres, and that also had lands and houses giuen them in the cities where they lay, did lye in waite for him to kill him, and that they daily by small companies came by one and by one into Rome: he durst no more returne thither, but yet the people had the pleasure and pastime in his absence, to see the games and sports he made them, which were sumptuously set foorth and furnished with all things necessarie, sparing for no cost. For he had brought a great number of straunge beastes, of the which he would not giue one of them to any friend he had, but that they should all be employed in his games: and went himselfe as farre as Byzantivm, to speak to some players of comedies and musitians that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Canutius an excellent player, that whatsoeuer they did, they should intreat him to play in these playes. For (said he) it is no reason to compell any Grecian, vnlesse he will come of his owne goodwill. Moreouer, he wrote also vnto Cicero, and earnestly prayed him in any case to be at these playes. Now the state of Rome standing in these tearmes, there fell out another chaunge and alteration, when the young man Octauius Cæsar came to Rome. He was the sonne of Iulius Cæsars Neece, whom he had adopted for his son, and made his heire, by his last will and testament. But when Iulius Cæsar his adopted father was slain, he was in the city of Apollonia (where he studied) tarying for him, because he was determined to make war with the Parthians: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned againe to Rome, where to begin to currie fauour with the common people, he first of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, and made distribution among them of the money which his father had bequeathed vnto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius sorely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers souldiers together, that had serued in the wars with him. And Cicero himself, for the great malice he bare Antonius, did fauour his proceedings: but Brutus maruellously reproued him for it, and wrote vnto him, that he seemed by his doings not to be sorie to haue a maister, but only to be afraid to haue one that should hate him: and that all his doings in the commonwealth did witnesse, that he chose to be subiect to a mild and curteous bondage, sith by his words and writings he did commend this young man Octauius Cæsar, to be a good and gentle Lord. For our predecessors (said he) would neuer abide to be subiect to any Maisters, how gentle or mild soeuer they were: and for his owne part, that he had neuer resolutely determined with himselfe to make war, or peace; but otherwise, that he was certainly minded neuer to be slaue nor subiect. And therefore he wondred much at him, how Cicero could be afraid of the danger of ciuill wars, and would not be affraid of a shamefull peace: and that to thrust Antonius out of the vsurped tyrannie, in recompence he went about to stablish yong Octauius Cæsar tyrant. These were the contents of Brutus first letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now the citie of Rome being deuided in two factions, some taking part with Antonius, other also leaning vnto Octauius Cæsar, and the souldiers making port sale of their seruice to him that would giue most: Brutus seeing the state of Rome would be vterly ouerthrowne, he determined to goe out of Italie, and went a foote through the countrey of Lvke, vnto the citie of Elea, standing by the sea. There Porcia being readie to depart from her husband Brutus, and to returne to Rome, did what she could to dissemble the griefe and sorrow she felt at her heart: but a certaine painted table bewrayed her in the end, although vntill that time she shewed alwaies a constant and patient mind. The deuise of the table was taken out of the Greeke stories, how Andromachè accompanied her husband Hector, when he went out of the citie of Troy to go to the warres, and how Hector deliuered her his litle sonne, and how her eyes were neuer off him. Porcia seeing this picture, and likening her selfe to be in the same case, she fell a weeping: and comming thither oftentimes in a day to see it, she wept still. Acilius one of Brutus friends perceiuing that, rehearsed the verses Andromache speaketh to this purpose in Homer:

Brutus playes and sports at Rome in his absence.

Octauius Cæsars comming to Rome.

Brutus reproued Cicero, for taking part with Octauius Cæsar.

Porcias sorrowfull returne to Rome for the absence of her husband Brutus.

The storie of Hector and Andromachè, set foorth in painted tables.

Thou Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother,
And husband eke, and all in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus ſmiling, anſwered againe: But yet (ſaid he) I cannot for my part ſay vnto Porcia, as Hector anſwered Andromachè in the ſame place of the Poet:

Tuſh, meddle thou weighing duly out
Thy maydes their taske, and pricking on a clout,

For indeed the weake conſtituion of her bodie, doth not ſuffer her to performe in ſhew, the valiant actes that we are able to do: but for courage and conſtant mind, ſhe ſhewed her ſelfe as ſtout in the defence of her countrey, as any of vs. Bibulus the ſonne of Porcia, reporteth this ſtorie thus. Now Brutus embarking at ELEA in LYKE, he ſayled directly towards ATHENS. When he arriued there, the people of ATHENS receiued him with common ioyes of reioycing, and honorable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whom he went daily to heare the Lectures of Theomneſtus the Academick Philoſopher, and of Cratippus the Peripatetick, and ſo would talke with them in Philoſophie, that it ſeemed he left all other matters, and gaue himſelfe only vnto ſtudie: howbeit, ſecretly notwithſtanding, he made preparation for warre. For he ſent Heroſtratus into MACEDON, to win the Captaines and ſouldiers that were vpon thoſe marches, and he did alſo entertaine all the young Gentlemen of the ROMAINES, whom he found in ATHENS ſtudying Philoſophie: amongſt them he found Ciceroes ſon, whom he highly praiſed and commended, ſaying: That whether he waked or ſlept, he found him of a noble mind and diſpoſition, he did in nature ſo much hate tyrants. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being aduertiſed that there came out of ASIA a certaine fleet of ROMAINE ſhippes that had good ſtore of money in them, and that the Captaine of thoſe ſhips (who was an honeſt man, & his familiar friend) came towards ATHENS: he went to meete him as far as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and hauing ſpoken with him there, he handled him ſo, that he was contented to leaue his ſhips in his hands: whereupon he made him a notable banquet at his houſe, becauſe it was on his birth day. When the feaſt day came, and that they began to drinke luſtily one to another; the gueſtes dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the libertie of the ROMAINES. Brutus therfore to encourage them farther, called for a bigger cup, and holding it in his hand, before he dranke ſpake this aloud:

How Brutus beſtowed his time at Athes.

Brutus preparith himſelfe to warre.

Brutus commendeth Ciceroes ſonne.

My deſtinie and Phœbus are agreed,
To bring me to my finall end with ſpeed.

And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that the ſame day he fought his laſt battell by the citie of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his tent, he gaue him for the word and ſignall of battell, Phœbus: ſo that it was thought euer ſince, that this his ſodaine crying out at the feaſt, was a prognoſtication of his misfortune that ſhould happen. After this, Antiſtius gaue him of the money he caried into ITALIE, fiftie Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys ſouldiers that ſtraggled vp and downe THESSALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna alſo, fiue hundred horſemen, which he caried into ASIA, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by ſea vnto the citie of DEMETRIADE, and there tooke a great deale of armour and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had bene made and forged there by Iulius Cæſars commaundement, for the wars againſt the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortenſius Gouernor of MACEDON, did reſigne the gouernement thereof vnto him. Beſides, all the Princes, Kings and Noblemen thereabouts, came and ioyned with him, when it was told him, that Caius (Antonius brother) comming out of ITALIE, had paſſed the ſea, and came with great ſpeed towards the citie of DYRRACHIVM, and APOLLONIA, to get the ſouldiers into his hands, which Cabinius had there. Brutus therefore to preuent him, went preſently with a fewe of his men in the middeſt of winter when it ſnewe hard, and tooke his way through hard and foule countries, and made ſuch ſpeede indeede, that he was there long before Antonius ſumpters, that caried the victuals. So that when he came neare vnto DYRRACHIVM, a diſeaſe tooke him, which the Phiſitians call Βουλιμία, to ſay, A cormorant and vnſatiable appetite to eate: by reaſon of the cold and paines he had taken. This ſickneſſe chaunceth often, both to men and beaſtes, that trauell when it hath ſnowen: either becauſe the naturall heate being retired into the inward partes of the bodie, by the coldneſſe of the aire hardening the skinne, doth ſtraight digeſt and conſume the meate: or elſe becauſe a ſharpe ſubtil wind coming by reaſon of the ſnow when it is molten, doth pierce into the bodie, and drieth out the naturall heate which was caſt outward. For it ſeemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall comming out of the skinne of the bodie: cauſeth

the ſweates that follow the diſeaſe. But hereof we haue ſpoken at large in other places. Brutus being very faint, and hauing nothing in his campe to eate: his ſouldiers were compelled to go to their enemies, and comming to the gates of the citie, they prayed the warders to helpe them to bread. When they heard in what caſe Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requitall whereof, afterwards when he wanne the citie, he did not onely intreate and vſe the citizens thereof curteouſly, but all the inhabitants of the citie alſo for their ſakes. Now when Caius Antonius was arriued in the citie of Apollonia, he ſent vnto the ſouldiers thereabouts to come vnto him. But when he vnderſtoode that they went all to Brutus: and furthermore, that the Citizens of Apollonia did fauour him much: he then forſooke that citie, and went vnto the city of Bythrotvs, but yet he loſt three of his enſignes by the way, that were ſlaine euery man of them. Then he ſought by force to winne certaine places of ſtrength about Byllis, and to driue Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therfore to obtaine his purpoſe, he fought a battell with Cicero, the ſonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whom he was ouercome. For Brutus made the younger Cicero a Captaine, and did many notable exploites by his ſeruice. Shortly after, hauing ſtolen vpon Caius Antonius in certaine marriſhes farre from the place from whence he fled: he would not ſet on him with furie, but only rode round about him, commaunding his ſouldiers to ſpare him and his men, as reckoning them all his owne without ſtroke ſtriking: and ſo indeed it happened: for they yeelded themſelues and their Captaine Antonius, vnto Brutus: ſo that Brutus had now a great army about him. Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his office, and neuer took frō him the markes and ſignes of his Conſulſhip, although many of his friends, and Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he ſaw Antonius ſecretly practiſed with his Captaines to make ſome alteration: then he ſent him into a ſhip, and made him to be kept there. When the ſouldiers whom Caius Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the citie of Apollonia, and ſent from thence vnto Brutus to come vnto them: he made them anſwer, That it was not the manner of Romaine Captaines to come to the ſouldiers, but the ſouldiers to come to the Captaine, and to craue pardon for their offences committed. Thereupon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to goe into Asia, newes came vnto him of the great chaunge at Rome: for Octauius Cæſar was in armes, by commanndement and authoritie from the Senate, againſt Marcus Antonius. But after that he had driuen Antonius out of Italie, the Senate then began to be affraid of him, becauſe he ſued to be Conſull, which was contrarie to the lawe, and kept a great armie about him, when the Empire of Rome had no neede of them. On the other ſide, Octauius Cæſar perceiuing the Senate ſtayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of Italie, and that they appointed him the gouernment of certaine Prouinces: then he began to be affraid for his part, and ſent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendſhip. Then coming on with his army neare to Rome, he made himſelfe to be choſen Conſull, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a ſtripling or ſpringall of twentie yeares old, as himſelfe reporteth in his owne Commentaries. So when he was Conſull, he preſently appointed Iudges to accuſe Brutus and his companions, for killing of the nobleſt perſon in Rome, and chiefeſt Magiſtrate, without lawe or iudgement: and made L. Cornificus accuſe Brutus, and M. Agrippa Caſſius. So the parties accuſed were condemned, becauſe the Iudges were compelled to giue ſuch ſentence. The voice went, that when the Herauld (according to the cuſtome after ſentence giuen) went vp to the chaire or pulpit for orations, and proclaimed Brutus with a loude voyce, ſummoning him to appeare in perſon before the Iudges: the people that ſtoode by ſighed openly, and the Noblemen that were preſent hung downe their heades, and durſt not ſpeake a word. Among them the teares fell from Publius Scticius eyes: who ſhortly after, was one of the proſcripts or outlawes appointed to be ſlaine. After that, theſe three Octauius Cæſar, Antonius and Lepidus made an agreement betweene themſelues, and by thoſe articles deuided the Prouinces belonging to the Empire of Rome among themſelues, and did ſet vp billes of proſcription and outlawrie, condemning two hundred of the nobleſt men of Rome to ſuffer death, & among that number, Cicero was one. Newes being brought thereof into Macedon: Brutus being then inforced to it, wrote vnto Hortenſius, that he ſhould put Caius Antonius to death, to be reuenged of the death of Cicero, and of the other Brutus, of the which the one was his friend, and the other his kinſman. For this cauſe therfore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortenſius at the battell of Philippes, he made him to be ſlaine vpon his brothers tombe. But when Brutus ſaid, that he was more aſhamed of the cauſe for the which Cicero was ſlaine, ſlaine, then he was otherwiſe ſorie for his death: and that he could not but greatly reproue his friends he had at Rome, who were ſlaues more through their owne fault, then through their valiantneſſe or manhood which vſurped the tyrannie: conſidering that they were ſo cowardly and faint hearted, as to ſuffer the ſight of thoſe things before their eyes, the report whereof ſhould onely haue grieued them to the heart. Now when Brutus had paſſed ouer his armie (that was verie great) into Asia, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of ſhips together, as well in the coaſt of Bithynia, as alſo in the citie of Cyzicvm, becauſe he would haue an armie by ſea: and himſelfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things, and giuing audience to Princes and noble men of the countrey that had to do with him. Afterwards he ſent vnto Caſſius in Syria, to turne him from his iourney into Ægypt, telling him that it was not for the conqueſt of any kingdome for themſelues, that they wandred vp and downe in that ſort, but contrarily, that it was to reſtore their countrey againe to their liberty: and that the multitude of ſouldiers they gathered together, was to ſubdue the tyraunts that would keepe them in ſlauerie and ſubiection. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpoſe and intent, they ſhould not be farre from Italie, as neare as they could poſſible, but ſhould rather make all the haſt they could, to helpe their countrimen. Caſſius beleeued him, and returned. Brutus went to meete him, and they both met at the citie of Smyrna, which was the firſt time that they ſaw together ſince they tooke leaue each of other, at the hauen of Piræa in Athens: the one going into Syria, and the other into Macedon. So they were maruellous ioyfull, and no leſſe couragious, when they ſaw the great armies together which they had both leauied: conſidering that they departed out of Italie, like naked and poore baniſhed men, without armour and money, nor hauing anie ſhip readie, nor ſouldier about them, nor any one towne at their commaundement: yet notwithſtanding, in a ſhort time after they were now met together, hauing ſhips, money and ſouldiers enough, both footmen and horſemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Caſſius would haue done Brutus as much honour, as Brutus did vnto him: but Brutus moſt commonly preuented him, and went firſt vnto him, both becauſe he was the elder man, as alſo for that he was ſickly of body. And men reputed him commonly to be very skilfull in warres, but otherwiſe maruellous chollericke and cruell, who ſought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenitie: and on the other ſide he was too familiar with his friends, and would ieſt too broadly with them. But Brutus in contrary maner, for his vertue and valiantneſſe, was welbeloued of the people and his owne, eſteemed of noble men, and hated of no man, not ſo much as of his enemies: becauſe he was a maruellous lowly and gentle perſon, noble minded, and would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleaſure and couetouſneſſe, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would neuer yeeld to any wrong or iniuſtice, the which was the chiefeſt cauſe of his fame, of his riſing, & of the goodwill that euery man bare him: for they were all perſwaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainely beleeue, that if Pompey himſelfe had ouercome Cæſar, he would haue reſigned his authorie to the law: but rather they were of opinion, that he would ſtill keepe the ſoueraignetie and abſolute gouernement in his hands, taking onely, to pleaſe the people, the title of Conſull, or Dictator, or of ſome other more ciuill office. And as for Caſſius, a hote, chollericke and cruell man, that would oftentimes be caried away from iuſtice for gaine: it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put himſelfe into ſundrie dangers, more to haue abſolute power and authority, then to defend the liberty of his countrey. For, they that will alſo conſider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marius, and Carbo: it is out of doubt that the end and hope of their victorie, was to be Lords of their countrey: and in manner they did all confeſſe, that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lords of the Empire of Rome. And in contrary manner, his enemies themſelues did neuer reproue Brutus for any ſuch change or deſire. For, it was ſayd that Antonius ſpake it openly diuerſe times that he thought, that of all them that had ſlaine Cæſar, there was none but Brutus onely that was moued to do it, as thinking the act commendable of it ſelfe: but that all the other conſpirators did conſpire his death, for ſome priuate malice or enuie, that they otherwiſe did beare vnto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not truſt ſo much to the power of his armie, as he did to his owne vertue: as it is to be ſeene by his writings. For approching neare to the inſtant danger, he wrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his affaires had the beſt hap that could be. For, ſayd he, either I will ſet my countrey at libertie by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certaine and aſſured of all things elſe, this one thing

onely was doubtfull to them: whether they ſhould liue or dye with liberty. He wrote alſo that Antonius had his due paiment for his folly. For where he might haue bin a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Caſsius, and Cato, and haue made one with them: he liked better to chuſe to be ioyned with Octauius Cæſar alone: with whō, though now he be not ouercome by vs, yet ſhal he ſhortly after alſo haue war with him. And truly he proued a true Prophet, for ſo came it indeed to paſſe. Now whileſt Brutus and Caſsius were together in the city of SMERNA: Brutus prayed Caſsius to let him haue ſome part of his money whereof he had great ſtore, becauſe all that he could rap and rend of his ſide he had beſtowed it in making ſo great a number of ſhips, that by meanes of them they ſhould keepe all the ſea at their commandement. Caſsius friends hindered this requeſt, and earneſtly diſſwaded him from it: perſwading him, that it was no reaſon that Brutus ſhould haue the money which Caſsius hath gotten together by ſparing, and leauied with great euill will of the people their ſubiects, for him to beſtow liberally vpon his ſouldiers, and by this meanes to win their goodwils, by Caſsius charge. This notwithſtanding, Caſsius gaue him the third part of this totall ſumme. So Caſsius and Brutus then departing from each other, Caſsius tooke the city of RHODES, where he too diſhoneſtly and cruelly vſed himſelfe: although when he came into the city, he anſwered ſome of the inhabitants, who called him Lord and King, that he was neither Lord nor King, but he only that had ſlaine him, that would haue bene Lord and King. Brutus departing from thence, ſent vnto the LYCIANS to require money, and men of war. But there was a certaine Orator called Naucrates, that made the cities to rebell againſt him, inſomuch that the countrimen of that countrey kept the ſtraights and litle mountaines, thinking by that means to ſtop Brutus paſſage. Wherfore Brutus ſent his horſemen againſt them, who ſtale vpon them as they were at dinner, and ſlue ſixe hundred of them: and taking all the ſmall townes and villages, he did let all the priſoners he tooke, go without payment of ranſome, hoping by this his great courteſie to win them, to draw all the reſt of the countrey vnto him. But they were ſo fierce and obſtinate, that they would mutine for euery ſmall hurt they receiued as they paſſed by their countrey, and did deſpiſe his curteſie and good nature: vntill that at length he went to beſiege the city of the XANTHIANS, within the which were ſhut vp the cruelleſt and moſt warlike men of LYCIA. There was a riuer that ranne by the wals of the city, in the which many men ſaued themſelues, ſwimming betweene two waters, and fled: howbeit they layd nets ouerthwart the riuer, and tied litle bels on the top of them, to ſound when any man was taken in the nets. The XANTHIANS made a ſally out by night, and came to fire certaine engines of battery that beate downe their wals: but they were preſently driuen in againe by the ROMAINES, ſo ſoone as they were diſcouered. The wind by chance was maruellous bigge, and increaſed the flame ſo ſore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the city, that the next houſes vnto them were ſtraight ſet on fire thereby. Wherefore Brutus being afraid that all the city would take on fire, he preſently commanded his men to quench the fire, and to ſaue the towne if it might be. But the LYCIANS at that inſtant fell into ſuch a frenſie, and ſtraunge and horrible deſpaire, that no man can well expreſſe it: and a man cannot more rightly compare or liken it, then to a franticke and moſt deſperate deſire to die. For all of them together, with their wiues and children, maiſters and ſeruants, and of all ſorts of age whatſoeuer, fought vpon the ramper of their wals, and did caſt downe ſtones and fire-workes on the ROMAINES, which were very buſie in quenching the flame of the fire, to ſaue the citie. And in contrary manner alſo, they brought faggots, drie wood, and reeds, to bring the fire further into the citie as much as might be, increaſing it by ſuch things as they brought. Now when the fire had gotten into all parts of the city, and that the flame burnt bright in euery place: Brutus being ſorie to ſee it, got vpon his horſe, and rode round about the wals of the citie, to ſee if it were poſſible to ſaue it, and held vp his hands to the inhabitants, praying them to pardon their citie, and to ſaue themſelues. Howbeit they would not be perſwaded, but did all that they could poſſible to caſt themſelues away, not only men and women, but alſo litle children. For ſome of them weeping and crying out, did caſt themſelues into the fire: others headlong throwing themſelues downe from the wals, brake their neckes: others alſo made their neckes bare, to the naked ſwords of their fathers, and vndid their cloaths, praying them to kill them with their owne hands. After the citie was burnt, they found a woman hanged vp by the necke, holding one of her children in her hand dead by her, hanged vp alſo: and in the other hand a burning torch ſetting fire on her houſe. Some would haue had Brutus to haue ſeene her, but he would not ſee ſo horrible and tragicall a ſight: but when

when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and cauſed a Herauld to make proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that he would giue a certaine ſumme of money, to euery ſouldier that could ſaue a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) aboue fiftie of them ſaued, and yet they were ſaued againſt their wils. Thus the XANTHIANS hauing ended the reuolution of their fatall deſtiny, after a long continuance of time: they did through their deſperation, renew the memory of the lamentable calamities of their Auncеſtors. Who in like manner, in the warres of the PERSIANS, did burne their citie, and deſtroyed themſelues. Therefore Brutus likewiſe beſieging the citie of the PATAREIANS, perceiuing that they ſtoutly reſiſted him: he was alſo afraid of that, and could not well tell whether he ſhould giue aſſault to it, or not, leſt they would fall into the deſpaire and deſperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit hauing taken certain of their women priſoners, he ſent them backe againe, without payment of ranſome. Now they that were the wiues and daughters of the nobleſt men of the citie, reporting vnto their parents, that they had found Brutus a mercifull, iuſt, and courteous man: they perſwaded them to yeeld themſelues and their citie vnto him, the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded themſelues, diuerſe other cities alſo followed them, and did the like: and found Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they ſhould haue done, but ſpecially farre aboue Caſsius. For Caſsius, about the ſelfe ſame time, after he had compelled the RHODIANS euerie man to deliuer all the readie money they had in gold and ſiluer in their houſes, the which being brought together, amounted to the ſumme of eight thouſand talents: yet he condemned the citie beſides, to pay the ſumme of fiue hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrarie manner, after he had leauied of all the country of LYCIA but a hundred and fiftie talents onely: he departed thence into the countrie of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Now Brutus in all this iourney, did many notable actes and worthie of memorie, both for rewarding, as alſo in puniſhing thoſe that had deſerued it: wherefore among the reſt, I will tell you of one thing, of the which he himſelfe, and all the Noblemen of the ROMAINES were maruellous glad. When Pompey the Great (hauing loſt the battell againſt Iulius Cæſar, in the fields of PHARSALIA) came and fell vpon the coaſt of ÆGYPT, hard by the citie of PELVSIVM: thoſe that were protectours to the young king Ptolomie, being then but a child, ſate in councell with his ſeruants and friendes, what they ſhould determine in that caſe. They were not all of one minde in this conſultation: for ſome thought it good to receiue Pompey: others alſo, that they ſhould driue him out of ÆGYPT. But there was a certaine Rethoritian called Theodotus, that was borne in the Iſle of CHIO, who was the kings ſchoolemaiſter to teach him Rethoricke. He being called to this councell for lacke of ſufficient men, ſayed, That both the one and the other ſide went awrie, aſwell thoſe that were of opinion to receiue Pompey, as the other that would haue had him driuen away: and that the beſt way was (conſidering the preſent time) that they ſhould lay hold on him, and kill him; adding withall this ſentence, That a dead man biteth not. The whole councell ſtucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey: Pompey the Great was ſlaine, by the motion and counſell of this wicked Rethoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwards did himſelfe boaſt of it. But when Iulius Cæſar came afterwards into ÆGYPT, the wicked men that conſented to this counſell, had their payment according to their deſerts: for they dyed euery man of them a wicked death, ſauing this Theodotus, whome fortune reſpighted a litle while longer, and yet in that time he liued a poore and miſerable life, neuer tarying long in any one place. So Brutus going vp and downe ASIA, Theodotus could hide himſelfe no longer, but was brought vnto Brutus, where he ſuffered paines of death: ſo that he wanne more fame by his death, then euer he did in his life. About that time, Brutus ſent to pray Caſsius to come to the citie of SARDIS, and ſo he did. Brutus vnderſtanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There both their armies being armed, they called them both Emperors. Now (as it commonly happeneth in great affaires betweene two perſons, both of them hauing many friendes, and ſo many Captaines vnder them: there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with any other matter, they went into a litle chamber together, and bad euery man auoid and did ſhut the dores to them. Then they began to powre out their complaints one to the other, and grew hot and loud, earneſtly accuſing one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber, hearing them loud within, and angry betweene themſelues, they were both amazed and afraid alſo, leſt it would grow to further matter: but yet they were commanded, that no man ſhould come to them. M. Thaonius a follower of Cato.

Phaonius, that had bene a friend and follower of Cato while he liued, & tooke vpon him to counterfeit a Philosopher, not with wisdome and discretion, but with a certaine bedlem and franticke motion: he would needs come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boote to let Phaonius, when a madde mood or toy tooke him in the head: for he was a hote hasty man, and sudden in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all. Now, though he vsed this bold maner of speech after the profession of the Cynicke Philosophers (as who would say, Dogs) yet his boldnesse did no hurt many times, because they did but laugh at him to see him so mad. This Phaonius at that time, in despite of the doore-keepers, came into the chamber, and with a certaine scoffing and mocking gesture which he counterfeited of purpose, he rehearsed the verses which old Nestor sayd in Homer:

Cynicke Philosophers, counted doggets.

My Lords, I pray you hearken both to me,
For I haue seene moe yeares then suchie three.

Cassius fell a laughing at him: but Brutus thrust him out of the chamber, and called him dogge, and counterfeit Cynicke. Howbeit his comming in brake their strife at that time, and so they left each other. The selfe same night Cassius prepared his supper in his chamber, and Brutus brought his friends with him. So when they were set at supper, Phaonius came to sit downe after he had washed. Brutus told him aloud, no man sent for him, and bad them set him at the vpper end: meaning indeed at the lower end of the bed. Phaonius made no ceremony, but thrust in amongst the middest of them, and made all the company laugh at him: So they were merry all supper time, and full of their Philosophie. The next day after, Brutus, vpon complaint of the SARDIANS, did condemne and note Lucius Pella for a defamed person, that had bene a Prætor of the ROMAINES, and whom Brutus had giuen charge vnto: for that he was accused and conuicted of robbery, and pilferie in his office. This iudgement much misliked Cassius: because he himselfe had secretly (not many dayes before) warned two of his friends, attainted and conuicted of the like offences, and openly had cleared them: but yet he did not therefore leaue to employ them in any manner of seruice as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproued Brutus, for that he would shew himselfe so straight and seuere in such a time, as was meeter to beare a litle, then to take things at the worst. Brutus in contrarie manner answered, that he should remember the Ides of March, at which time they slue Iulius Cæsar: who neither piled nor polled the countrey, but onely was a fauourer and suborner of all them that did rob and spoile, by his countenance & authoritie. And if there were any occasion wherby they might honestly set aside iustice and equitie: they should haue had more reason to haue suffered Cæsars friends, to haue robbed and done what wrong and iniurie they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then sayd he, they could but haue sayd they had bene cowards: and now they may accuse vs of iniustice, beside the paines we take, and the danger we put our selues into. And thus may we see what Brutus intent and purpose was. But as they both prepared to passe ouer againe out of ASIA into EVROPE: there went a rumour that there appeared a wonderfull signe vnto him. Brutus was a carefull man, and slept very litle, both for that his diet was moderate, as also because he was continually occupied. He neuer slept in the day time, and in the night no longer, then the time he was driuen to be alone, and when euery body else tooke their rest. But now whilest he was in warre, and his head euer busily occupied to thinke of his affaires, and what would happen: after he had slumbered a little after supper, he spent all the rest of the night in dispatching of his waightiest causes, and after he had taken order for them, if he had any leisure left him, he would reade some booke till the third watch of the night, at what time the Captaines, petty Captaines and Colonels, did vse to come to him. So, being ready to go into EVROPE, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet rest) as he was in his tent with a litle light, thinking of waightie matters: he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the doore of his tent, that he saw a wonderfull straunge and monstrous shape of a bodie comming towards him, and sayd neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a god or a man, and what cause brought him thither. The spirit aunswered him, I am thy euill spirit, Brutus: and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Brutus being no otherwise afraid, replied againe vnto it: Well, then I shall see thee againe. The spirit presently vanished away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who told him that they heard no noise, nor saw any thing at all. Thereupon Brutus returned againe to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the day brake, he went vnto Cassius, to tell him what vision had appeared vnto him in the night.

night. Cassius being in opinion an EPICVRIAN, and reasoning thereon with Brutus, spake to him touching the vision thus. In our sect, Brutus, we haue an opinion, that we do not alwayes feele, or see, that which we suppose we do both see & feele: but that our senses being credulous, and therefore easily abused (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne obiects) are induced to imagine they see and coniecture that, which they in truth do not For, our mind is quicke and cunning to worke (without either cause or matter) any thing in the imagination whatsoeuer. And therefore the imagination is resembled to clay, and the mind to the potter: who without any other cause then his fancie and pleasure, chaungeth it into what fashion and forme he will. And this doth the diuersitie of our dreames shew vnto vs. For our imagination doth vpon a small fancie grow from conceipt to conceipt, altering both in passions and formes of things imagined. For the mind of man is euer occupied, and that continuall mouing is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you. For you being by nature giuen to melancholicke discoursing, and of late continually occupied: your wits and senses hauing bene ouer-laboured, do easilier yeeld to such imaginations. For, to say that there are spirits or angels, and if there were, that they had the shape of men, or such voyces, or any power at all to come vnto vs: it is a mockerie. And for mine owne part, I would there were such, because that we should not onely haue souldiers, horses, and ships, but also the aide of the gods, to guide and further our honest and honourable attempts. With these words Cassius did somewhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they raised their campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a maruellous force, lighted vpon two of the foremost ensignes, and alwayes followed the souldiers, which gaue them meate, and fed them, vntill they came neare to the citie of PHILIPPES: and there one day onely before the battell, they both flew away. Now Brutus had conquered the most part of all the people, and nations of that countrey: but if there were any other citie or Captaine to ouercome, then they made all cleare before them, and so drew towards the coasts of THASSOS. There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the straights, by another place called SYMBOLON (which is a port of the sea) Cassius and Brutus compassed him in in such sort, that he was driuen to forsake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in danger beside to haue lost all his army. For, Octauius Cæsar could not follow him because of his sickenesse, & therfore stayed behind: wherupon they had taken his army, had not Antonius aide bene, which made such wonderfull speed, that Brutus could scant beleeue it. So Cæsar came not thither of ten dayes after: & Antonius camped against Cassius, and Brutus on the other side against Cæsar. The ROMAINS called the valley between both camps, the PHILIPPIAN fields: and there were neuer seene two so great armies of the ROMAINES, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brutus army was inferior to Octauius Cæsars, in number of men: but for brauery & rich furniture, Brutus army far excelled Cæsars. For the most part of their armours were siluer and gilt, which Brutus had bountifully giuen thē: although in all other things he taught his captaines to liue in order without excesse. But for the brauery of armor, & weapon, which souldiers should cary in their hands, or otherwise weare vpon their backes: he thought that it was an encouragement vnto them that by nature are greedy of honor, & that it maketh them also fight like diuels that loue to get, and to be afraid to lose: because they fight to keepe their armor and weapon, as also their goods and lands. Now when they came to muster their armies, Octauius Cæsar tooke the muster of his armie within the trenches of his camp, & gaue his men only a litle corne, & fiue siluer Drachmaes to euerie man to sacrifice to the gods, and to pray for victorie. But Brutus scorning this misery and nigardlinesse, first of all mustered his army, and did purifie it in the fields, according to the maner of the ROMAINS: and then he gaue vnto euery band a number of weathers to sacrifice, and fifty siluer Drachmaes to euery souldier. So that Brutus & Cassius souldiers were better pleased, & more coragiously bent to fight at the day of battel, then their enemies souldiers were. Notwithstanding, being busily occupied about the ceremonies of his purification, it is reported that there chanced certaine vnlucky signes vnto Cassius. For one of his Sergeants that caried the rods before him, brought him the garland of flowers turned backwards, the which he shold haue worne on his head in the time of sacrificing. Moreouer it is reported also, that another time before, in certaine sports and triūph where they caried an image of Cassius victory of cleane gold, it fell by chance, the man stumbling that caried it. And yet further, there were seene a maruellous number of fowles of prey, that feed vpon dead carcasses: and Bee-hiues also were found, where Bees were gathered together in a certain place within the trenches of the camp: the which place the Soothſayers thought good to ſhut out of the precinct of the campe, for to take away the ſuperſtitious feare and miſtruſt men would haue of it. The which began ſomewhat to alter Caſsius mind from Epicurus opinions, and had put the ſouldiers alſo in a maruellous feare. Therupon Caſsius was of opinion not to try this war at one battell, but rather to delay time, & to draw it out in length, conſidering that they were the ſtronger in mony, and the weaker in men and armors. But Brutus in contrary maner, did alway before and at that time alſo, deſire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of battell, as ſoone as might be poſſible: to the end he might either quickly reſtore his countrey to her former liberty, or rid him forthwith of this miſerable world, being ſtill troubled in following and maintaining of ſuch great armies together. But perceiuing that in the daily skirmiſhes and bickerings they made, his men were alway the ſtronger, and euer had the better: that yet quickened his ſpirits againe, and did put him in better heart. And furthermore, becauſe that ſome of their own men had already yeelded themſelues to their enemies, and that it was ſuſpected moreouer diuerſe others would do the like: that made many of Caſsius friends, which were of his mind before (when it came to be debated in councell whether the battell ſhould be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus mind. But yet was there one of Brutus friends called Atellius, that was againſt it, and was of opinion that they ſhould tary the next winter. Brutus asked him what he ſhould get by tarying a yeare longer? If I get nothing elſe, quoth Atellius againe, yet haue I liued ſo much longer. Caſsius was very angry with this anſwer: & Atellius was maliced & eſteemed the worſe for it of all men. Therupon it was preſently determined they ſhold fight battell the next day. So Brutus all ſupper time looked with a chearful coũtenance, like a man that had good hope, & talked very wiſely of Philoſophy, & after ſupper went to bed. But touching Caſsius, Meſſala reporteth that he ſupped by himſelf in his tent with a few of his friends, and that all ſupper time he looked verie ſadly, & was full of thoughts, although it was againſt his nature: & that after ſupper he tooke him by the hand, & holding him faſt (in token of kindneſſe as his maner was) told him in Greeke: Meſſala, I proteſt vnto thee, & make thee my witneſſe, that I am compelled againſt my mind and will (as Pompey the great was) to ieopard the libertie of our country, to the hazard of a battell. And yet we muſt be liuely, & of good corage, conſidering our good fortune, whom we ſhould wrong too much to miſtruſt her, although we folow euill counſell. Meſſala writeth, that Caſsius hauing ſpoken theſe laſt words vnto him, he bad him farewell, & willed him to come to ſupper to him the next night folowing, becauſe it was his birth day. The next morning by breake of day, the ſignall of battell was ſet out in Brutus and Caſsius campe, which was an arming ſcarlet coate: & both the Chieftaines ſpake together in the midſt of their armies. There Caſsius began to ſpeake firſt, and ſayd: The gods grant vs, ô Brutus, that this day we may win the field, and euer after to liue all the reſt of our life quietly, one with another. But ſith the gods haue ſo ordained it, that the greateſt and chiefeſt things amongſt men are moſt vncertaine, and that if the battell fall out otherwiſe to day then we wiſh or looke for, we ſhall hardly meet againe: what art thou then determined to do, to flie, or die? Brutus anſwered him, being yet but a yong man, and not ouer greatly experienced in the world: I truſt (I know not how) a certaine rule of Philoſophie, by the which I did greatly blame and reproue Cato for killing himſelfe, as being no lawfull nor godly act, touching the gods: nor concerning men, valiant, not to giue place and yeeld to diuine prouidence, and not conſtantly and patiently to take whatſoeuer it pleaſeth him to ſend vs, but to draw backe and flie: but being now in the middeſt of the danger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God, that this battell fall out fortunate for vs: I will looke no more for hope, neither ſeeke to make any new ſupply for war againe, but will rid me of this miſerable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my countrey in the Ides of March, for the which I ſhall liue in another more glorious world. Caſsius fell a laughing to heare what he ſayd, & imbracing him, Come on then (ſaid he) let vs go & charge our enemies with this mind. For either we ſhall conquer, or we ſhall not need to feare the conquerors. After this talke, they fell to conſultation among their friends for the ordering of the battell. Then Brutus prayed Caſsius he might haue the leading of the right wing, the which men thought was farre meeter for Caſsius: both becauſe he was the elder man, and alſo for that he had the better experience. But yet Caſsius gaue it him, and willed that Meſſala (who had charge of one of the warlikeſt legions they had) ſhould be alſo in that wing with Brutus. So Brutus preſently ſent out his horſemen, who were excellently well appointed, and his footemen alſo were as willing and readie to giue charge. Now Antonius men did caſt a trench from the marriſh by the which they

they lay, to cut off Caſsius way to come to the ſea: and Cæſar, at the leaſt his armie ſtirred not. As for Octauius Cæſar himſelfe, he was not in his campe, becauſe he was ſicke. And for his people, they little thought the enemies would haue giuen them battell, but onely haue made ſome light skirmiſhes to hinder them that wrought in the trench, and with their darts and ſlings to haue kept them from finiſhing of their worke: but they taking no heed to them that came ful vpon them to giue them battell, maruelled much at the great noiſe they heard, that came from the place where they were caſting their trench. In the meane time Brutus that led the right wing, ſent little bils to the Colonels and Captaines of priuate bands, in the which he wrote the word of the battell: and he himſelfe riding a horſe-backe by all the troupes, did ſpeake to them, and encouraged them to ſticke to it like men. So by this meanes very few of them vnderſtood what was the word of the battell, and beſides, the moſt part of them neuer taried to haue to haue it told them, but ranne with great furie to aſſaile the enemies: whereby through this diſorder, the legions were maruelloutly ſcattered and diſperſed one from the other. For, firſt of all Meſſalaes legion, and then the next vnto them, went beyond the left wing of the enemies, and did nothing, but glaunce by them, ouerthrew ſome as they went, and ſo going on further, fell right vpon Cæſars campe, out of the which (as himſelfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conueyed away a litle before, through the counſell and aduiſe of one of his friends called Marcus Artorius: who dreaming in the night, had a viſion appeared vnto him, that commanded Octauius Cæſar ſhould be caried out of his camp. Inſomuch as it was thought he was ſlaine, becauſe his litter (which had nothing in it) was thruſt through and through with pikes and darts. There was great ſlaughter in this campe. For amongſt others, there were ſlaine two thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS, who were arriued but euen a litle before, comming to aide Cæſar. The other alſo that had not glanced by, but had giuen a charge full vpon Cæſars battell: they eaſily made them flie, becauſe they were greatly troubled for the loſſe of their camp, and of them there were ſlaine by hand three legions. Then being very earneſt to follow the chaſe of them that fled, they ranne in amongſt them hand ouer head into their campe, and Brutus among them. But that which the conquerours thought not of, occaſion ſhewed it vnto them that were ouercome: and that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked, and vnguarded of them of the right wing, who were ſtrayed too farre off, in following of them that were ouerthrowne. So they gaue a hot charge vpon them. But, notwithſtanding all the force they made, they could not breake into the middeſt of their battell, where they found them that receiued them, and valiantly made head againſt them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrew the left wing where Caſsius was, by reaſon of the great diſorder among them, and alſo becauſe they had no intelligence how the right wing had ſped. So they chaſed them, beating them into their campe, the which they ſpoiled, none of both the Chiefetaines being preſent there. For Antonius, as it is reported, to flie the furie of the firſt charge, was gotten into the next marriſh: and no man could tell what became of Octauius Cæſar, after he was caried out of his campe. Inſomuch that there were certaine ſouldiers that ſhewed their ſwords bloudied, and ſaid that they had ſlaine him, and did deſcribe his face, and ſhewed what age he was of. Furthermore, the voward and the middeſt of Brutus battell, had alreadie put all their enemies to flight that withſtood them, with great ſlaughter: ſo that Brutus had conquered all on his ſide, and Caſsius had loſt all on the other ſide. For nothing vndid them, but that Brutus went not to help Caſsius, thinking he had ouercome them, as himſelfe had done: and Caſsius on the other ſide taried not for Brutus, thinking he had bene ouerthrowne, as himſelfe was. And to proue that the victorie fell on Brutus ſide, Meſſala confirmeth it: that they wan three Eagles, and diuers other enſignes of their enemies, and their enemies wan neuer a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chaſe, after he had ſlaine and ſacked Cæſars men: he wondred much that he could not ſee Caſsius tent ſtanding vp high as it was wont, neither the other tents of his camp ſtãding as they were before, becauſe all the whole camp had bin ſpoiled, and the tents throwne downe, at the firſt comming of the enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whoſe ſight ſerued them better, told him that they ſaw a great gliſtering of harneſſe, and a number of ſiluered targets, that went and came into Caſsius camp, and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to guard the camp: and yet that they ſaw not ſuch a number of dead bodies, & great ouerthrow, as there ſhould haue bin, if ſo many legions had bene ſlaine. This made Brutus at the firſt miſtruſt that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the camp of his enemy which he had taken, and cauſed his men to be ſent for that yet followed the chaſe, and gathered them together, thinking to leade them to aide Caſſius, who was in this ſtate as you ſhall heare. Firſt of all he was maruellous angrie to ſee how Brutus men ran to giue charge vpon their enemies, and taried not for the word of the battell, nor commaundement to giue charge: and it grieued him beſide, that after he had ouercome them, his men fell ſtraight to ſpoile, and were not carefull to compaſſe in the reſt of the enemies behind. But with tarying too long alſo, more then through the valiantneſſe or forcſight of the Captaines his enemies: Caſſius found himſelfe compaſſed in with the right wing of his enemies armie. Whereupon his horſmen brake immediatly, and fled for life towards the ſea. Furthermore, perceiuing his footmen to giue ground, he did what he could to keepe them from flying, and tooke an enſigne from one of the enſigne-bearers that fled, and ſtucke it faſt at his feete: although with much ado he could ſcant keepe his owne guard together. So Caſſius himſelfe was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, vnto a litle hill, from whence they might eaſily ſee what was done in all the plaine: howbeit Caſſius himſelfe ſaw nothing, for his ſight was very bad, ſauing that he ſaw (and yet with much ado) how the enemies ſpoiled his campe before his eyes. He ſaw alſo a great troupe of horſmen, whom Brutus ſent to aide him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he ſent Titinnius, one of them that was with him, to go and know what they were. Brutus horſemen ſaw him comming a farre off, whom when they knew that he was one of Caſſius chiefeſt friends, they ſhouted out for ioy: and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horſes, and went and embraced him. The reſt compaſſed him in round about a horſe-back, with ſongs of victorie and great ruſhing of their harneſſe, ſo that they made all the field ring againe for ioy. But this marred all. For Caſſius thinking indeed that Titinnius was taken of the enemies, he then ſpake theſe words: deſiring too much to liue, I haue liued to ſee one of my beſt friends take, for my ſake, before my face. After that, he got into a tent where no body was, and tooke Pindarus with him, one of his freed bondmen, whom he reſerued euer for ſuch a pinch, ſince the curſed battell of the PARTHIANS, where Craſſus was ſlaine, though he notwithſtanding ſcaped from that ouerthrow: but then caſting his cloke ouer his head, and holding out his bare necke vnto Pindarus, he gaue him his head to be ſtriken off. So the head was found ſeuered from the body: but after that time Pindarus was neuer ſeene more. Whereupon, ſome tooke occaſion to ſay that he had ſlaine his maiſter without his commaundement. By and by they knew the horſmen that came towards them, and might ſee Titinnius crowned with a garland of triumph, who came before with great ſpeed vnto Caſſius. But when he perceiued by the cries and teares of his friends which torméted themſelues, the misfortune that had chanced to his Captaine Caſſius, by miſtaking: he drew out his ſword, curſing himſelf a thouſand times that he had taried ſo long, & ſo ſlue himſelfe preſently in the field. Brutus in the meane time came forward ſtill, and vnderſtood alſo that Caſſius had bin ouerthrowne: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came very neare to his campe. So when he was come thither, after he had lamented the death of Caſſius, calling him the laſt of all the ROMAINES, being vnpoſſible that Rome ſhould euer breed againe ſo noble and valiant a man as he: he cauſed his bodie to be buried, and ſent it to the citie of THASSOS, fearing leſt his funerals within the campe ſhould cauſe great diſorder. Then he called his ſouldiers together, and did encourage them againe. And when he ſaw that they had loſt all their cariage, which they could not brooke well: he promiſed euery man of them two thouſand Drachmaes in recompence. After his ſouldiers had heard his oration, they were al of them pretily cheared again, wondring much at his great liberalitie, & waited vpon him with great cries when he went his way, praiſing him, for that he onely of the foure Chieftaines was not ouercome in battel. And to ſpeake the truth, his deeds ſhewed that he hoped not in vaine to be conquerour. For with few legions, he had ſlaine and driuen all them away that made head againſt him: and yet if all his people had fought, and that the moſt of them had not out gone their enemies to runne to ſpoile their goods: ſurely it was like enough he had ſlaine them all, and had left neuer a man of them aliue. There were ſlaine of Brutus ſide about eight thouſand men, counting the ſouldiers ſlaues, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the enemies ſide, as Meſſala writeth, there were ſlaine as he ſuppoſeth, more then twiſe as many moe. Wherefore they were more diſcouraged then Brutus, vntill that very late at night, there was one of Caſſius men called Demetrius, who went vnto Antonius, and caried his maiſters clothes, whereof he was ſtripped not long before, and his ſword alſo. This encouraged Brutus enemies, and made them ſo braue, that the next morning betimes they ſtood in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus ſide, both his campes ſtood wauering, and that in great daunger. For his owne campe being full full of prisoners, required a good guard to looke vnto them: and Cassius campe on the other side tooke the death of their Captaine very heauily; and beside, there was some vile grudge betweene them that were ouercome, and those that did ouercome. For this cause therefore Brutus did set them in battell ray, but yet kept himselfe from giuing battell. Now for the slaues that were prisoners, which were a great number of them, and went and came to & fro amongst the armed men, not without suspition: he commanded they should kill them. But for the free men, he sent them freely home, and said, that they were better prisoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them, they were slaues and seruants: and with him, they were free men and citizens. So when he saw that diuers captaines and his friends did so cruelly hate some, that they would by no meanes saue their liues: Brutus himselfe hid them, and secretly sent them away. Among these prisoners, there was one Volumnius a iester, and Sacculio a common player, of whom Brutus made no account at all. Howbeit his friends brought them vnto him, and did accuse them, that though they were prisoners, they did not let to laugh them to scorne, and to iest broadly with them. Brutus made no answer to it, because his head was occupied otherwayes. Whereupon Messala Coruinus said, that it were good to whip them on a scaffold, and then to send them naked, well whipped, vnto the Captaines of their enemies, to shew them their shame, to keepe such mates as those in their campe, to play the fooles, to make them sport. Some that stood by, laughed at his deuise. But Publius Casca, that gaue Iulius Cæsar the first wound when he was slaine, said then: It doth not become vs to be thus merrie at Cassius funerals: and for thee Brutus, thou shalt shew what estimation thou madest of such a Captaine thy compeere, by putting to death, or sauing the liues of these blouds, who hereafter will mocke him and defame his memorie. Brutus answered againe in choller: Why then do you come to tell me of it, Casca, and do not your selues what you thinke good? When they heard him say so, they tooke his answer for a consent against these poore vnfortunate men, to suffer them to do what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, and slue them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promise he had made to the souldiers, and gaue them the two thousand Drachmaes a peece, but yet he first reproued them, because they went and gaue charge vpon the enemies at the first battell, before they had the word of battell giuen them: and made them a new promise also, that if in the second battel they fought like men, he would giue them the sacke and spoile of two cities, to wit, THESSALONICA and LACEDÆMON. In all Brutus life there is but this onely fault to be found, and that is not to be gainesaid: though Antonius and Octauius Cæsar did reward their souldiers farre worse for their victorie. For when they had driuen all the naturall ITALIANS out of ITALY, they gaue their souldiers their lands and townes, to the which they had no right: and moreouer, the only marke they shot at in all this warre they made, was but to ouercome and raigne. Where in contrary maner they had so great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voice and opinion of the world would not suffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to saue himselfe, otherwise then iustly and honestly, and specially after Cassius death; whom men burdened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great crueltie. But now, like as the mariners on the sea after the rudder of their ship is broken by tempest, do seeke to naile on some other peece of wood in liew thereof, and do helpe themselues to keepe them from hurt, as much as may be vpon that instant danger: euen so Brutus, hauing such a great armie to gouerne, and his affaires standing very tickle, and hauing no other Captaine coequal with him in dignitie and authoritie; he was forced to employ them he had, and likewise to be ruled by them in many things, and was of mind himselfe also to graunt them any thing, that he thought might make them serue like noble souldiers at time of need. For Cassius souldiers were very euil to be ruled, and did shew themselues very stubborne and lustie in the camp, because they had no Chieftaine that did commaund them: but yet ranke cowards to their enemies, because they had once ouercome them. On the other side, Octauius Cæsar and Antonius were not in much better state: for first of all they lacked victuals. And because they were lodged in low places, they looked to abide a hard and sharp winter, being camped as they were by the marish side; and also for that after the battell there had fallen plentie of raine about the autumne, where through, all their tents were full of myre and durt, the which by reason of the cold did freeze incontinently. But beside all these discommodities, there came newes vnto them of the great losse they had of their men by sea. For Brutus ships met with a great aide and supply of men, which were sent them out of ITALY, and they ouerthrew them in such sort, that there scaped but few of them: and yet they were so famished, that they were compelled to eate the tackle & sailes of their ships. Therupon they were very desirous to fight a battell againe, before Brutus should haue intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chanced so, that the battell was fought by sea, on the selfesame day it was fought by land. But by il fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the captaines, this victory came not to Brutus eare till twentie daies after. For had he known of it before, he would not haue bene brought to haue fought a second battell, considering that he had excellent good prouision for his armie for a long time; and besides, lay in a place of great strength, so as his camp could not be greatly hurt by the winter, nor also distressed by his enemies: and further, he had bene a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by sea, as he was also by land. This would haue maruellously encouraged him. Howbeit the state of Rome (in my opinion) being now brought to that passe, that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lords, but required one onely absolute Gouernour: God, to preuent Brutus that it should not come to his gouernment, kept this victorie from his knowledge, though indeed it came but a litle too late. For the day before the last battell was giuen, very late in the night came Clodius, one of his enemies into his camp, who told that Cæsar hearing of the ouerthrow of his armie by sea, desired nothing more then to fight a battell before Brutus vnderstood it. Howbeit they gaue no credit to his words, but despised him so much, that they wold not vouchsafe to bring him vnto Brutus, because they thought it was but a lie deuised, to be the better welcome for this good news. The selfsame night, it is reported that the monstrous spirit which had appeared before vnto Brutus in the citie of Sardis, did now appeare again vnto him in the selfesame shape and forme, and so vanished away, and said neuer a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a graue and wise Philosopher, that had bin with Brutus frō the beginning of this war, he doth make no mention of this spirit, but saith: that the greatest Eagle and ensigne was couered ouer with a swarme of bees, and that there was one of the captaines, whose arme so dainly fel a sweating, that it dropped oile of roses from him, and that they oftentimes went about to dry him, but all would do no good. And that before the battel was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both armies, and all the time they fought, there was a maruellous great silence all the valley ouer, both the armies being one before the other, marking this fight betweene them; and that in the end, the Eagle towards Brutus gaue ouer and flew away. But this is certaine, and a true tale, that when the gate of the campe was open, the first man the standard-bearer met that caried the Eagle, was an Æthiopian, whom the souldiers for ill luck mangled with their swords. Now after that Brutus had brought his army into the field, and had set them in battel ray, directly against the vward of his enemy, he pausd a long time before he gaue the signall of battell. For Brutus riding vp and downe to view the bands and companies, it came in his head to mistrust some of them; besides, that some came to tell him so much as he thought. Moreouer, he saw his horsemen set forward but faintly, and did not go lustily to giue charge, but stil staid to see what the footmen would do. Then sodainly, one of the chiefest knights he had in all his army called Canulatius, and that was alway maruellously esteemed of for his valiantnes, vntil that time: he came hard by Brutus on horseback, and rode before his face to yeeld himselfe vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruellous sorie for it; wherfore partly for anger, and partly for feare of greater treason and rebellion, he sodainly caused his armie to march, being past three of the clocke in the after noone. So in that place where he himselfe fought in person, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of his enemies, which gaue him way, through the help of his horsemen that gaue charge with his footmen, when they saw the enemies in a maze and afraid. Howbeit, the other also on the right wing, when the Captaines would haue had them to haue marched; they were affraid to haue bin compassed in behind, because they were fewer in number then their enemies, and therfore did spread themselues, and leaue the middest of their battell. Whereby they hauing weakened themselues, they could not withstand the force of their enemies, but turned taile straight and fled. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight vpon it to compasse Brutus behind, who in the middest of the conflict, did all that was possible for a skilful captaine and valiant souldier; both for his wisedome, as also his hardinesse, for the obtaining of victorie. But that which wanne him the victorie at the first battell, did now lose it him at the second. For at the first time the enemies that were broken and fled, were straight cut in peeces: but at the second battell, of Cassius men that were put to flight, there were few slaine: and they that saued themselues by speed, being affraid because they had bene ouercome, did discourage the rest of the armie when they came to ioyne with them, and filled all the armie with feare and disorder. There was the sonne of Marcus Cato slaine, valiantly fighting among the lustie youths. For, notwithstanding that he was very weare

wearie and ouer-harried, yet would he not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling aloud his name, and alſo his fathers name, at length he was beaten downe amongſt many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had ſlaine round about him. So there were ſlaine in the field, all the chiefeſt Gentlemen and Nobilitie that were in his armie: who valiantly ranne into any danger to ſaue Brutus life. Amongſt them there was one of Brutus friends called Lucilius, who ſeeing a troupe of barbarous men making no reckoning of all men elſe they met in their way, but going all together right againſt Brutus, he determined to ſtay them with the hazard of his life, and being left behind, told them that he was Brutus: and becauſe they ſhould beleeue him, he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he ſaid he was affraid of Cæſar, and that he did truſt Antonius better. Theſe barbarous men being very glad of this good hap, and thinking themſelues happie men; they caried him in the night, and ſent ſome before vnto Antonius, to tel him of their comming. He was maruellous glad of it, and went out to meete them that brought him. Others alſo vnderſtanding of it, that they had brought Brutus priſoner: they came out of all parts of the campe to ſee him, ſome pitying his hard fortune, and others ſaying, that it was not done like himſelf ſo cowardly to be taken aliue of the barbarous people, for feare of death. When they came neare together, Antonius ſtaid awhile bethinking himſelf how he ſhould vſe Brutus. In the meane time Lucilius was brought to him, who ſtoutly with a bold countenance ſaid: Antonius, I dare aſſure thee, that no enemie hath taken nor ſhall take Marcus Brutus aliue: and I beſeech God keepe him from that fortune. For whereſoener he be found, aliue or dead: he will be found like himſelfe. And now for my ſelfe, I am come vnto thee, hauing deceiued theſe men of armes here, bearing them downe that I was Brutus: and do not refuſe to ſuffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius words made them all amazed that heard him. Antonius on the other ſide, looking vpon all them that had brought him, ſaid vnto them: My companions, I thinke ye are ſorie you haue failed of your purpoſe, and that you think this man hath done you great wrong: but I do aſſure you, you haue taken a better bootie, then that you followed. For in ſtead of an enemy, you haue brought me a friend: and for my part, if you had brought me Brutus aliue, truly I can not tell what I ſhould haue done to him. For, I had rather haue ſuch men my friends, as this man here, then enemies. Then he embraced Lucilius, and at that time deliuered him to one of his friends in cuſtodie; and Lucilius euer after ſerued him faithfully, euen to his death. Now Brutus hauing paſſed a litle riuer, walled in on either ſide with high rockes, and ſhadowed with great trees, being then darke night, he went no further, but ſtaid at the foote of a rocke with certaine of his Captaines and friends that followed him: and looking vp to the firmament that was full of ſtarres, ſighing, he rehearſed two verſes; of the which Volumnius wrote the one, to this effect:

The fidelitie of Lucilius vnto Brutus.

Brutus flying

Let not the wight from whom this miſchiefe went

And ſaith, that he had forgotten the other. Within a litle while after, naming his friends that he had ſeene ſlaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater ſigh then before, ſpecially when he came to name Labio and Flauius, of the which the one was his Lieutenant, and the other captain of the pioners of his camp. In the meane time one of the companie being a thirſt, and ſeeing Brutus a thirſt alſo: he ran to the riuer for water, and brought it in his ſallet. At the ſelfſame time they heard a noiſe on the other ſide of the riuer. Wherupon Volumnius tooke Dardanus, Brutus ſeruant with him, to ſee what it was: and returning ſtraight againe, asked if there were any water left. Brutus ſmiling, gently told them all was drunke, but they ſhall bring you ſome more. Thereupon he ſent him againe that went for water before, who was in great danger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly ſcaped, being ſore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought that there was no great number of men ſlaine in battel, and to know the truth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promiſed to go through his enemies (for otherwiſe it was impoſſible to go ſee their camp) and from thence if all were well, that he would lift vp a torch-light in the aire, and then returne againe with ſpeed to him. The torch-light was lift vp as he had promiſed, for Statilius went thither. Now Brutus ſeeing Statilius tarie long after that, and that he came not againe, he ſaid: if Statilius be aliue, he will come againe. But his euill fortune was ſuch, that as he came backe, he lighted in his enemies hands and was ſlaine. Now the night being far ſpent, Brutus as he ſate bowed towards Clitus one of his men, and told him ſomewhat in his eare: the other anſwered him not, but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proued Dardanus, and ſaid ſomewhat alſo to him: at length he came to Volumnius himſelf, and ſpeaking to him in Greeke, prayed him for the ſtudies ſake which brought them acquainted together, that he would helpe him to put his hand to his ſword, to thruſt it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his requeſt, and ſo did many others: and amongſt the reſt, one of them ſaid, there was no tarying for them there, but that they muſt needs flie. Then Brutus riſing vp, we muſt flie indeed ſaid he, but it muſt be with our hands, not with our feet. Then taking euery man by the hand, he ſaid theſe words vnto them with a chearefull countenance. It reioyceth my heart, that not one of my friends hath failed me at my need, and I do not complaine of my fortune, but onely for my countries ſake: for, as for me, I thinke my ſelfe happier then they that haue ouercome, conſidering that I leaue a perpetuall fame of our courage and manhood, the which our enemies the conquerors ſhall neuer attaine vnto by force or money; neither can let their poſteritie to ſay, that they being naughtie and vniuſt men, haue ſlaine good men, to vſurpe tyrannicall power not pertaining to them. Hauing ſaid ſo, he prayed euery man to ſhift for them ſelues, and then he went a litle aſide with two or three onely, among the which Strato was one, with whom he came firſt acquainted by the ſtudie of Rhetoricke. He came as neare to him as he could, and taking his ſword by the hilt with both his hands, and falling downe vpon the point of it, ranne himſelfe through. Others ſay, that not he, but Strato (at his requeſt) held the ſword in his hand, and turned his head aſide, and that Brutus fell downe vpon it; and ſo ran himſelfe through, and died preſently. Meſſala, that had bene Brutus great friend, became afterwards Octauius Cæſars friend. So, ſhortly after, Cæſar being at good leiſure, he brought Strato, Brutus friend vnto him, and weeping ſaid: Cæſar, behold, here is he that did the laſt ſeruice to my Brutus. Cæſar welcomed him at that time, and afterwards he did him as faithfull ſeruice in all his affaires, as any Grecian elſe he had about him, vntill the battell of Activm. It is reported alſo that this Meſſala himſelfe anſwered Cæſar one day, when he gaue him great praiſe before his face, that he had fought valiantly, and with great affectiō for him at the battell of Activm: (notwithſtanding that he had bene his cruel enemie before, at the battel of Philippes, for Brutus ſake) I euer loued, ſaid he, to take the beſt and iuſteſt part. Now Antonius hauing found Brutus bodie, he cauſed it to be wrapped vp in one of the richeſt coate-armors he had. Afterwards alſo, Antonius vnderſtanding that this coate-armor was ſtolne, he put the theefe to death that had ſtolne it, and ſent the aſhes of his bodie vnto Seruilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife; Nicolaus the Philoſopher, and Valerius Maximus do write, that ſhe determining to kill her ſelfe (her parents and friends carefully looking to her to keepe her from it) tooke hote burning coles and caſt them into her mouth, and kept her mouth ſo cloſe, that ſhe choked her ſelfe. There was a letter of Brutus found written to his friends, complaining of their negligence, that his wife being ſicke, they would not helpe her, but ſuffered her to kill her ſelfe; chuſing to die, rather then to languiſh in paine. Thus it appeareth that Nicolaus knew not well that time, ſith the letter (at the leaſt if it were Brutus letter) doth painely declare the diſeaſe and loue of this Ladie, and alſo the manner of her death.

THE COMPARISON OF

TO come now to compare theſe two noble perſonages together, it is certaine that both of them hauing great gifts in them (and ſpecially Dion) of ſmall occaſions they made themſelues great men: and therefore Dion of both deſerueth chiefeſt praiſe. For he had no co-helper to bring him vnto that greatneſſe, as Brutus had of Caſſius: who doubtleſſe was not comparable vnto Brutus, for vertue and reſpect of honour, though otherwiſe in matters of warre, he was no leſſe wiſe and valiant then he. For many do impute vnto Caſſius, the firſt beginning and originall of all the warre and enterpriſe: and ſaid it was he, that did encourage Brutus to conſpire Cæſars death. Where Dion furniſhed himſelfe with armor, ſhips, and ſouldiers, and wanne thoſe friends and companions alſo that did helpe him to proſecute his warre. Nor he did not as Brutus, who roſe to greatneſſe by his enterpriſes, and by warre got all his ſtrength and riches: but he in contrary maner, ſpent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his countrie, and diſburſed of his owne money that ſhould haue kept him in his baniſhment. Furthermore, Brutus and Caſſius were compelled of neceſſitie to make warres, becauſe they could not haue liued ſafely in peace, when they were driuen out of Rome: for that they were condemned to death, and purſued by their enemies. And for this cauſe therefore they were driuen to hazard themſelues in warre, more for their owne ſafetie, then for the libertie of their countrie men. Whereas Dion on the other ſide, liuing more merily and ſafely in his baniſhment, then the tyrant Dionyſius himſelfe that had baniſhed him: did put himſelfe to that danger, to deliuer Sicile from bondage. Now the matter was not alike vnto the Romaines, to be deliuered from the gouernement of Cæſar: as it was for the Syracvsans, to be rid of Dionyſius tyrannie. For Dionyſius denied not, that he was not a tyrant, hauing filled Sicile with ſuch miſerie and calamitie. Howbeit, Cæſars power and gouernement when it came to be eſtabliſhed, did indeed much hurt at his firſt entrie and beginning vnto thoſe that did reſiſt him: but afterwards, vnto them that being ouercome had receiued his gouernment, it ſeemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyrant, then otherwiſe that he was ſo indeed. For there neuer followed any tyrannicall or cruell act, but contrarily, it ſeemed that he was a mercifull Phyſitian, whom God had ordained of his ſpeciall grace to be Gouernour of the Empire of Rome, and to ſet all things againe at quiet ſtay, the which required the counſell and authoritie of an abſolute Prince. And therefore the Romaines were maruellous ſorie for Cæſar after he was ſlaine, and afterwards would neuer pardon them that had ſlaine him. On the other ſide, the cauſe why the Syracvsans did moſt accuſe Dion, was, becauſe he did let Dionyſius eſcape out of the caſtle of Syracvsa, and becauſe he did not ouerthrow and deface the tombe of his father. Furthermore, touching the warres, Dion alway ſhewed himſelfe a Captaine vnreproueable, hauing wiſely and skilfully taken order for thoſe things, which he had enterpriſed of his owne head and counſell: and did amend the faults others committed, and brought things to better ſtate then he found them. Where it ſeemeth, that Brutus did not wiſely to receiue the ſecond battell, conſidering his reſt ſtood vpon it. For after he had loſt the battell, it was vnpoſſible for him euer to riſe againe: and therefore his heart failed him, and ſo gaue vp all, and neuer durſt ſtriue with his euill fortune as Pompey did, conſidering that he had preſent cauſe enough in the field to hope of his ſouldiers, and being beſide a dreadfull Lord all the ſea ouer. Furthermore, the greateſt reproch they could obiect againſt Brutus, was, that Iulius Cæſar hauing ſaued his life, and pardoned all the priſoners alſo taken in battell, as many as he had made requeſt for, taking him for his friend, and honouring him aboue all his other friends: Brutus notwithſtanding had imbrued his hands in his bloud, wherewith they could neuer reproue Dion. For on the contrarie ſide, ſo long as Dion was Dionyſius friend and kinſeman, he did alway helpe him to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was baniſhed his countrey, and that his wife was forcibly maried to another man, and his goods alſo taken from him: then he entred into iuſt and open warres againſt Dionyſius the tyrant. But in this point they were contrary together. For wherein their chiefeſt praiſe conſiſted, to wit, in hating of tyrãts & wicked men: it is moſt true that Brutus deſire was moſt ſincere of both. For hauing no priuate cauſe of complaint or grudge againſt Cæſar, he ventred to kill him, only to ſet his countrie againe at libertie. Where if Dion had not receiued priuate cauſe of quarrell againſt Dionyſius: he would neuer haue made warre with him. The which Plato proueth in his Epiſtles, where is plainely ſeene, that Dion being driuen out of the tyrants court againſt his will, and not putting himſelfe to voluntarie baniſhment, he draue out Dionyſius. Furthermore, the reſpect of the commonwealth cauſed Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemy, to become his friend; and enemy vnto Cæſar, that before was his friend: onely referring his friendſhip and enmitie, vnto the conſideration of iuſtice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Dioniſius ſake and benefit, all the while he truſted him: and when he began to miſtruſt him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherfore all his friends did not beleeue, but after he had driuen out Dionyſius, he would ſtabliſh the gouernement of himſelfe, flattering the people with a more courteous and gentle title then the name of a tyrant. But for Brutus, his very enemies themſelues confeſſed, that of all thoſe that conſpired Cæſars death, he onely had no other end and intent to attempt his enterpriſe, but to reſtore the Empire of Rome againe to her former ſtate and gouernement. And furthermore, it was not al one thing to deale with Dionyſius, as it was to haue to do with Iulius Cæſar. For no man that knew Dionyſius, but would haue deſpiſed him, conſidering that he ſpent the moſt part of his time in drinking, dicing, and in haunting leud womens companie. But to haue vndertaken to deſtroy Iulius Cæſar, and not to haue ſhrunke backe for feare of his great wiſedome, power, and fortune, conſidering that his name onely was dreadfull vnto euery man; and alſo not to ſuffer the kings of Parthia and India to be in reſt for him: this could not come but of a maruellous noble mind of him, that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his courage. And therefore, ſo ſoone as Dion came into Sicile, many thouſands of men came and ioyned with him againſt Dionyſius. But the fame of Iulius Cæſar did ſet vp his friends againe after his death, and was of ſuch force, that it raiſed a yong ſtripling Octauius Cæſar (that had no meanes nor power of himſelfe) to be one of the greateſt men of Rome: and they vſed him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will ſay, that Dion draue out the tyrant Dionyſius with force of armes, and ſundrie battels: and that in contrarie maner Brutus ſlue Cæſar, being a naked man, and without guard: then do I anſwer againe, that it was a noble part, and of a wiſe Captaine, to chuſe ſo apt a time and place, to come vpon a man of ſo great power, and to find him naked without his guard. For he went not ſodainly in a rage and alone, or with a ſmall companie to aſſaile him: but his enterpriſe was long time before determined of, and that with diuers men, of all the which, not a man of them once failed him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he choſe them honeſt men, or elſe that by his choiſe of them, he made them good men. Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wiſe choiſe in truſting of euill men; or elſe becauſe he could not tell how to vſe them he had choſen, of good men he made them become euill: ſo that neither the one nor the other could be the part of a wiſe man. For Plato himſelfe reproueth him, for that he had choſen ſuch men for his friends, that he was ſlaine by them: and after he was ſlaine, no man would then reuenge his death. And in contrary maner, of the enemies of Brutus, the

the one (who was Antonius) gaue his bodie honourable buriall: and Octauius Cæsar the other, reserued his honours and memories of him. For at MILLAN (a citie of GAVLE on ITALIE side) there was an image of his in brasse, very like vnto him: the which Cæsar afterwards passing that way, beheld very aduisedly, for that it was made by an excellent workeman, and was very like him, and so went his way. Then he staid sodainly againe, and called for the Gouernors of the citie, and before them all told them that the citizens were his enemies, and traitors vnto him, because they kept an enemie of his among them. The Gouernours of the citie at the first were astonied at it, and stoutly denied it: and none of them knowing what enemie he meant, one of them looked on another. Octauius Cæsar then turning him vnto Brutus statue, bending his browes, said vnto them: this man you see standing vp here, is he not our enemie? Then the Gouernours of the citie were worse affraid then before, and could not tell what answer to make him. But Cæsar laughing and commending the GAVLES for their faithfulnesse to their friends, euen in their aduersities: he was contented Brutus image should stand still as it did.

CHRISYPPVS the Philosopher (my friend Polycrates) being afraid as it seemeth of the euill sound of an auncient prouerb not rightly as it was spoken, and in vse, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this manner:

What children do their aunce stors commend,
But those whom fortune fauours to the end?

But Dionysodorus TROEZENIAN reprouing him, doth rehearse the prouerb rightly as indeed it is:

What children do their aunce stors commend,
But those whose life is vertuous to the end?

Saying, that this prouerb stoppeth their mouthes, who of themselues are vnworthie of praise, and yet are still boasting of the vertues of their aunce stors, whose praise they highly extoll. But before those that (as Pindarus saith)

Do match their noble aunce stors in prowesse of their owne,
And by their fruites commend the stocke whence they themselues are growne.

(As thy selfe that conformest thy life vnto the examples and maners of thy vertuous ance stors:)

The example of our auncestors, wherein profitable to their posteritie.

it is no small good hap for them, often to remember the noble deeds of their parents in hearing them spoken of, or otherwise for themselues oftentimes to remember some notable doings of their parents. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praise and glorie: but in ioyning their owne vertues, to the vertues of their auncestors, they do increase their glorie, as inheriting their vertuous life, as chalenging their discent by bloud. Therefore, hauing written the life of Aratus thy countriman, and one of thy auncestors, whose glorie and greatnesse thou doest not blemish, I do send it vnto thee, not that I thinke but that thou hast more diligently then any man else searched out all his deeds and sayings: but yet, because that thy two sonnes, Polycrates and Pythocles, reading and still hearing something reported, might be brought vp at home by the example of their auncestors, whose deeds shall lie before them to follow. For he loueth himselfe more, then he regardeth perfect vertue, or his credite: that thinketh himselfe so perfect, as he need not follow any others example.

The common-weale of the Sicyonians conuerted into tyrannie.

The citie of SICYONE, after it fell from her first gouernement of the optimacie and nobilitie, which is proper to the citie of the DORIANS: like an instrument out of tune, it fell into ciuill warres and seditious practises, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceased to be plagued with those troubles and miseries, alway changing new tyrants, vntill that Cleon being slaine, they chose Timoclidas and Clinias their Gouernours, two of the noblest men and of greatest authoritie in all the citie. Now when the common-wealth began to grow to a certaine state of gouernement, Timoclidas died: and Abantidas the sonne of Paseas, pretending to make himselfe Lord of the citie, he slue Clinias, and put to death some of his parents and friends, draue away others, and sought also to put his sonne Aratus to death, that was then but seuen yeare old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers house, among them that ranne away, and wandring vp and downe the citie, being scared and afraid, finding no man to helpe him: by good fortune he got into a womans house, called Soso, which was Abantidas sister, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble mind, and iudging that the child Aratus by Gods prouidence fled vnto her; hid him in her house, and in the night secretly sent him vnto the citie of ARGOS. Now after that Aratus had scaped, and was safe from this danger: from that time there bred in him a vehement malice against tyrants, the which still increased in him as he grew in yeares. So he was vertuously brought vp in the citie of ARGOS, with his fathers friends: and perceiuing with himselfe that he waxed bigge and strong, he disposed his bodie to diuers exercises, and became so excellent in them, that he contended in fiue manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images and statues, he appeared in face full and well liking, as one that fed well, and the maiestie of his countenance argueth that he vsed such exercise: and such commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not giue himselfe so much to pleading, as peraduenture was requisite for a Gouernour of a common-wealth. Howbeit, some do iudge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloquenter tongue then seemed vnto some: because he wrote them in haste, hauing other businesse in hand, and euen as things came first into his mind. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Logician slue Abantidas, who did commonly vse to sit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and oportunitie to worke their feate they did. After Abantidas death, his father Paseas possessed the tyrannie: whom Nicocles afterwards slue also by treason, and made himselfe tyrant in his place. It is reported that this Nicocles did liuely resemble the countenance of Periander, the sonne of Cypselus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like vnto Alcmæon, the sonne of Amphiaraus: and another young LADEDÆMONIAN, vnto Hector of TROIA, whom Myrsillus writeth, was troden vnder mens feete, through the ouer-great preasse of people that came to see him, when they heard of it. This Nicocles was tyrant foure moneths together, in the which he did wonderfull great hurt to the citie, and had almost lost it; the ÆTOLIANS comming on a sodaine, who were like to haue taken it. Now Aratus was come to the state of a stripling, and was greatly esteemed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they found in him, which was no such matter: and besides that, he had a maiestie in his countenance, being wiser then was looked for in a yong man of his yeares: therefore the banished men from the citie of SICYONE, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicocles for his part also was not careless of his doings, but had an eye euer to see what Aratus intended, although he little mistrusted any such bold enterprise, nor so daungerous an exploit of him: but did only onely coniecture that he did ſtirre vp the Kings which had bene his dead fathers friends. And ſo indeed Aratus tooke that courſe. But when he ſaw that Antigonus ſtill delayed his promiſes, and did alwayes tract time, and that the hope of aide from King Ptolomie of ÆGYPT was to farre off: at length he determined to vndertake to deſtroy the tyrant himſelfe. So he firſt conſulted with Ariſtomachus and * Ecdelus: of the which, the one was baniſhed from SICYONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, a Philoſopher, and a valiant man of his hands, and had bene ſcholler to Arceſilaus the Academicke, in the citie of ATHENS. Theſe two men being contented to ioyne with Aratus, he practiſed with other of the baniſhed men alſo: of the which there were ſome that were aſhamed, not to be partakers of his hope and noble attempt, and ſo did alſo ioyne with him. Howbeit the moſt part of them did not onely refuſe to enter into that practiſe, but further, went about to diſſwade Aratus from his enterpriſe, ſaying: that for lack of knowledge and experience, he vnderſtood not the daunger in vndertaking ſuch a matter, altogether ſo vnlikely. Now, as Aratus was thinking in his mind to keepe a certaine place in the territorie of SICYONE, from whence they might make warre with the tyrants: there came a priſoner vnto them out of the citie of ARGOS, that had broken priſon from the tyrant of SICYONE, and was brother vnto Xenocles, one of the baniſhed men. He being brought by the ſame Xenocles vnto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he ſaued himſelfe, the ground within was almoſt as high as the top of the wall, the which in that part ioyned vnto high ſtonie places: and that without the wall the height was not ſo great, but that it was eaſily ſcalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he ſent two of his men, Seuthas and Technon, with Xenocles to view the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to proue ſecretly to execute his pretended enterpriſe, and quickly to put it to a venture: then to begin a long warre, and to prepare an open armie, he being a priuate man, to go againſt the power of a tyrant. Xenocles being returned againe to Aratus, after he had meaſured the height of the wall: he reported that the place was not vnſcalable, but yet very hard to come to it vndiſcouered, becauſe of certaine litle curſt curres a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would neuer leaue barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leaue off his enterpriſe ſo. Now it was not ſtrange to ſee euery man prepare themſelues of armour and weapon, becauſe at that time there were great robberies and cruell murthers committed by high wayes, and one would aſſault another: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not ſticke to make them openly, becauſe his common occupation did take away all ſuſpition why they were made. For this carpenter was himſelfe alſo a baniſhed man from SICYONE, as the reſidue were. Furthermore, Aratus friends he had in ARGOS, of thoſe few men they had, did euery man of them lend him ten men, and armed thirtie of his owne men: beſide them, Aratus himſelfe alſo did hire ſome pretie number of ſouldiers, by the practiſe of Xenophilus, whom the captaines of the theeues did furniſh. They were giuen to vnderſtand that they ſhould be led to the territorie of SICYONE, to take a prey of cattell and coltes of the King: and they were ſent before, ſome one way, ſome another, with commaundement, all to meete together at the tower of Polygnotus, where they ſhould tarie. So he ſent Capheſias alſo before, without any weapons, with foure companions with him: who ſhould come to this gardiners houſe in the night, like ſtrangers and trauellers, to lie in his houſe, and to locke him vp and his dogges, becauſe they had no other deuice to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were certaine ſpials of Nicocles the tyrant diſcouered, that walked vp and downe the citie (making no countenance of any matter) to ſee what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his houſe early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the market place with his friends. Then he went to the ſhew place (or place of exerciſes) and there ſtripped himſelfe, annointed him, and wreſtled, and in the end tooke certaine of the yong gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merrie, and to paſſe the time away with him: and immediatly after, one of his ſeruants was ſeene in the market place, carying garlands of flowers: another was ſeene alſo buying of linkes and torches, and another hiring of theſe common dauncing and ſinging women, which follow feaſts and banquets with their inſtruments. Nicocles ſpials ſeeing that, were deceiued: for one of them laughing on another ſaid, that they might eaſily ſee by that, there was nothing more feareful and timorous then a tyrant: conſidering that Nicocles being Lord of ſo great a citie, was afraid of a yong ſtripling, that ſpent all that he could rap and rend to keepe him in his baniſhment, vpon vaine bankets and feaſts at noone dayes. And thus were the tyrants ſpials finely mocked. Aratus ſelfe departed immediatly after dinner out of ARGOS, and went vnto his ſouldiers, whom he had appointed before to meet him at the tower of Polignotus, and led them ſtraight vnto NEMEA. There he told them openly his ful intent and purpoſe, hauing before made an Oration vnto them to encourage them, and alſo made them maruellous faire promiſes. Then he gaue them for their watch-word, Apollo fauourable, and ſo went directly to the citie of SICYONE, marching with great ſpeed at the firſt becauſe of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwards ſlackned his pace a litle, ſo that they had Moone-light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardiners houſe that was hard by the wall. So Capheſias, whom he had ſent before vnto the gardiners houſe, came to meete with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, becauſe they ranne away: howbeit that he had made faſt the gardiner in his owne houſe. This diſcouraged the moſt part of all the companie, who would needes haue him in any caſe to returne backe againe. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promiſed that he would leade them backe againe, if it chanced that the dogges were too buſie with them: and therewithall preſently cauſed the ladder men to go before, whom Ecdelus and Mnaſitheus led, and he himſelfe came faire and ſoftly after. The dogges made a foule barking, and were baying about Ecdelus and his company. This notwithſtanding, they came ſafe to the wall, and did ſet vp their ſcaling ladders. But euen as the firſt men got vp on them, the Captaine of the watch that had giuen place to him that ſhould ward in the morning, came by chance, and paſſed hard by them, viſiting the ſouldiers with a litle bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great noiſe of men that followed him. They that were vpon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe, and ſtirred not: and thereby the ſouldiers that paſſed by them, could not ſee them. But now the new morning watch came towards them alſo, which did put them in great danger to be diſcouered: but yet they once againe ſcaped them, and were not diſcouered, becauſe the ſecond watch went beyond them, and ſtayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnaſitheus immediatly ſcaled the wall, and ſent Technon with all poſſible ſpeed vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the haſte he could to come to them. Now there was no great diſtance betwixt the garden where the dogs were, and the wall, and a litle tower where they kept a great greyhound to keepe watch: but the greyhound neuer heard their comming, either becauſe he was a cowardly curre of nature, or elſe for that he had bin ouer-courſed and wearied the day before. But the gardiners litle curres that balled and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhound with their barking, who at the firſt began to anſwer them with a ſoft girning: but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked out aloud, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Inſomuch, that the skout which was farther off, called aloud to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made ſuch a barking, and whether there were any thing ſtirring or not that angred him. The hunt within the tower anſwered, that it was nothing, but that his dog was naked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that paſſed by, and at the noiſe of the bell. This made Aratus ſouldiers a great deale the bolder: becauſe they thought that the hunt had bene made priuie to their enterpriſe, and that he went about to hide their ſecret attempt, and hoped alſo that there were many other within the citie that would further their enterpriſe. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height and very daungerous, becauſe the ladders ſhooke and bowed, by reaſon of the weight of the men, vnleſſe they did come vp faire & ſoftly one after another. Furthermore, the time did put them in ſome peril, becauſe the cockes began to crow, and the countrie folke that brought things to the market to ſell, beganne to come a pace to the towne out of euery quarter. And therefore Aratus made haſte to get vp, hauing onely fortie men aboue with him, and looked for ſome beſides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly towards the tyrants pallace, where his hired ſouldiers kept watch and ward: and comming ſodainly vpon them, laid hold of euery man of them, and ſlue not one. Then he ſent into the citie to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. Thereupon they ranne out of euery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to breake, and ſtraight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, becauſe of the noiſe and ſtirre they heard in the citie, not knowing what the matter meant: vntill at length an Herauld proclaimed with open voice that it was Aratus the ſonne of Cliniæs, who called his countrie men and citizens to the recouerie of their libertie. Then they perſwading themſelues, that the thing which they long wiſhed and looked for, was now come to paſſe: they ranne all in a troupe together to the tyrants houſe, and ſet it a fire. But the flame roſe ſo high and great after the fire had taken it in euery part, that it was ſeene to the citie of CORINTH: inſomuch that the CORINTHIANS wondring what the matter ſhould be, were in mind to haue gone to helpe it.

Aratus dangers, in deliuering of his countrey from the tyrannie of Nicocles.

Aratus vvan the citie of Sicyone without bloudſh.d.

Now

Now for Nicocles, he ſaued himſelfe, and got out of the city by ſecret vaults he had made vnder the ground. The ſouldiers on the other ſide quenching the fire with the helpe of the Citizens, did ſacke all they found in the tyrants pallace: the which Aratus hindred not, but did moreouer make all the reſt of the tyrants goods common amongſt them. So his enterpriſe had ſo good ſucceſſe, that there was none of his owne companie ſlaine he brought with him, neither any of their enemies that were within the citie, fortune kept this exploit ſo pure and cleane from any bloudſhed. Then Aratus reſtored foureſcore men vnto their lands and goods againe, whom the tyrant Nicocles had baniſhed: and others alſo, that had bene baniſhed by former tyrants, to the number of fiue hundred men, who had bene wel-neare fiftie yeares ſpace baniſhed out of their countrey. Now the moſt of them being come home poore and needie, would haue entred on their goods and lands they enioyed before: and ſo, entring againe vpon their lands in their countrey, and their houſes in the citie, they amazed Aratus withall, ſeeing Antigonus on the one ſide practiſe all the meanes he could to winne SICYONE being now free, and they all in an vprore and mutinie in the citie. Therefore, following the beſt councell he could thinke vpon and deuiſe, cõſidering the daunger of the preſent time: he ioyned the citie in league and friendſhip with the ACHAIANS, and of them all made but one bodie. And becauſe the Citizens of SICYONE were DORIANS, they were glad to ſubmit themſelues to be gouerned & protected by the name of the ACHAIANS, who were at that time of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in litle villages, and had no great bounds of lands, neither were they very ſpeciall good, for that they ſtood vpon the ſea ſide, where was no maner of hauen nor port, but ſtones and rockes good ſtore: and the ſea beating vpon them, did eate into the maine land. This notwithſtanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of GREECE when it was vnited and gouerned by good policy was of great force, and almoſt inuincible. For the ACHAIANS being in compariſon of the ancient force of GREECE, of no regard, and but a part of one city enfeebled with ciuill and forreine warre; ſo long as they could ſubmit themſelues to be ruled by the wiſedome and vertue of their Captaine, and not enuy nor malice his proſperity and ſoueraignty: they did not only maintaine themſelues as free men, in the middeſt of the ſeruitude of ſo many great cities, large and mighty, but did alſo deliuer many other people of GREECE from their tyrants. Now, for Aratus maners: he was one that in nature loued ciuill gouernement, and equality among citizens in one ſelfe city: he was nobly minded, and more painefull about the affaires of the commonweale, then carefull of his owne buſineſſe, and hated tyrants to the death, and imployed his good or euill will wholy for the ſeruice of the commonwealth. And therefore he ſeemed not to be ſo found a friend, as he was a gentle and mercifull enemy: framing himſelfe in either of both, as time ſerued for the comonwealth. To be ſhort, it was a generall and common voyce among all the cities confederates, in priuate company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue, and honeſty; that in open wars he was not ſo valiant and couragious, as he was crafty & ſubtile, to take a city on the ſudden. Furthermore, though he was valiant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he wold neuer haue brought to paſſe: yet it ſeemeth he left many things poſſible vndone, the which he might eaſily haue done, for that he durſt not venter on them. For as there be beaſts whoſe ſight is perfecteſt by night, and by day they can ſee nothing, becauſe the ſubtilty of the humor and moiſture in their eyes is dried vp, and cannot abide the bright light of the day: euen ſo, men that otherwiſe by nature are very wiſe, are eaſily afraid of danger, when they muſt venter on it at noone dayes: where contrarily they are bold in ſecret enterpriſes, ſuddenly to attempt any thing. Now, this contrariety and difference in men well brought vp, groweth through ignorance and lacke of inſtruction of Philoſophy, which of it ſelfe doth noriſh vertue, as fruit that ſpringeth vp without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is beſt diſcerned by examples. So Aratus hauing ioyned himſelfe and his city SICYONE vnto the ACHAIANS, and ſeruing in perſon as a man of armes among the reſt: he was maruellouſly beloued of his Generals, that ſaw him ſo obedient. For, notwithſtanding that he had made ſo large a contribution as the eſtimation of himſelfe, and the force of his city vnto the commonwealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was as ready to obey & execute the commandements of the Generals, as the pooreſt and meaneſt ſouldier, were he of DYMA, or of TRITA, or of any other ſmall village whatſoeuer. Furthermore, a great ſumme of money being ſent him from king Ptolomie for a gift, amounting to twenty and fiue talents, he tooke it, but foorthwith diſpoſed it amongſt his poore countrimen, both to relieue their want, as alſo to redeeme priſoners. This notwithſtanding the baniſhed men

ſtill vexed and troubled them that had their goods and lands, to haue them out of their hands, and otherwiſe would be ſatisfied by no meanes. Their commonwealth therefore being in great danger to fall into ciuill warre, Aratus perceiuing there was no other way to helpe this miſchiefe, but by Ptolomies liberality: he determined to go vnto him, to pray him to helpe him with money, to pacifie this grudge and tumult. So he imbarked at the hauen of METHONA, aboue the foreland of MALEA, to ſaile from thence into ÆGYPT: howbeit he had ſuch a contrary wind, and the ſea roſe ſo high, that the maſter of the ſhip was driuen to let her go whither ſhe would to take ſea roome. So being driuen quite from his direct courſe, with great danger he got to the city of ADRIA, which was his enemy: becauſe Antigonus kept it, and had a garriſon in it. But Aratus did wiſely preuent it, going a ſhoare, and wandred farre from the ſea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wood, whereby they had an euill nights reſt. He had not gone far after he had left his ſhip, but the Captaine of the garriſon came, and ſought for him. Notwithſtanding, his ſeruants had mocked him finely (being before inſtructed by Aratus what anſwer they ſhould make) ſaying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of EVBOEA. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garriſon ſtayed the ſhip, his men, and all things elſe ſhe had in her, and tooke her for a good prize. Within few daies after, Aratus being maruellouſly troubled, and at a ſtraight with himſelfe what he ſhould do: there happily arriued a ROMAINE ſhip hard by the place where he kept moſt, partly to hide himſelfe, and partly alſo to ſee if he could diſcouer any thing. This ſhip was bound for SYRIA. So he had dealt with the maiſter of the ſhip in that ſort, that he tooke him aboord, and promiſed he would deliuer him in CARIA, and ſo he did. But he was in as much daunger this ſecond iourney againe by ſea, as he was in the firſt he made towards ÆGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into ÆGYPT, and ſpake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus fed him ſtill by ſending of him paſſing faire tables, and pictures of GREECE, of excellent workmanſhip. And indeed hauing a ſingular good wit, he alwayes got together, and brought the excellenteſt painted pictures he could get, but ſpecially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to ſend them vnto the king. For learning flouriſhed yet in the city of SICYONE, and they eſteemed the painting of tables in that city, to be the perfecteſt for true colours, and fine drawing, of all other places. Inſomuch as Apelles (though he was then of a maruellous fame for painting) went thither, and gaue to theſe two excellent painters a talent, to remaine a while in their company: not ſo much to attaine to the perfection of the art, as thereby to win himſelfe fame. And therefore when Aratus had reſtored his city againe to liberty, he cauſed all the images of the tyrants to be defaced and plucked downe: howbeit he ſtood doubtfull a long time, whether he ſhould deface Ariſtratus picture, or not, who raigned in the time of Philip. For he was painted with the hands of all the ſcholers of Melanthus, being by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victory, and as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a paſſing peece of worke to ſee to, ſo that Aratus at the firſt yeelded, and was contented to ſaue it for the excellency of the workmanſhip: yet in the end, ouercome with the extreame hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it ſhould be defaced. Now it is reported alſo, that Nealces the painter being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon ſuch a notable peece of worke. But when he ſaw Aratus ſo hard harted that he would not grant it: he told him it was good reaſon to make war with tyrants, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (quoth he) leaue the chariot of triumph and victory, and I will make thee ſee Ariſtratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was contented to let him haue his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Ariſtratus, and in place thereof drew onely a palme tree, and durſt adde nothing elſe to it of his owne deuice. Some ſay, that vnder the chariot were conueied Ariſtratus feet defaced. So Aratus by meanes of theſe tables and pictures, was maruellouſly well beloued of king Ptolomie. But after he was acquainted with him, and knew his conuerſation: he loued him then better then before. Inſomuch that he gaue him a hundred and fifty talents to helpe his city withall: of the which, he caried forty away with him vnto PELOPONNESVS, and the king afterwards ſent him the reſt at ſundry times. Now this was a maruellous matter of him to get ſuch a maſſe of money together for his citizens: conſidering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouernors of free cities, for a litle ſumme of mony only which they haue taken of Kings and Princes, haue bin corrupted & betrayed their townes & country. But this was a more wonder, that by meanes of this mony he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and rich: and furthermore, ſaued vpright all the people of SICYONE, where he ſhewed himſelfe maruellous wiſe and temperate, being of that great great power and authority he was. For after they had chosen him arbitrator to iudge, compound and absolutely to decide all quarels and strife betweene the banished men: he would neuer vndertake it himselfe alone, but tooke fifteene other of the chiefest citizens with him, and with them, with great paines and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his citizens, & made them good friends one with another. Therefore, not only all the inhabitants and citizens of SICYONE together, did not onely decree publike honors meet for him: but also the banished men themselues did priuatly cast his image in brasse, and set it vp, vnder the which they caused this inscription to be grauen:

Thy prowesse and thy feats of armes, thy counsell sage and wise,
Not onely are among the Greekes extolled to the skies,
But also to the vtmost straights of Marroke blowne by fame.
And we that through thy goodnesse home into our countrey came,
Haue set this image vp to thee Aratus, as a signe
Of our deliu'rance through thy loue, and through the power diuine.
For thy good nature furthred by good fortune doth restore
Vs countrey, lawes, and liberty, bereft vs quite before.

Aratus hauing done all these things, he suppressed the enuie of the citizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigonus being angrie with Aratus in his mind, and seeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be mistrusted of Ptolomie: he did him many other great curtesies, Aratus neuer seeking them at his hands. But one day specially aboue the rest, as he did sacrifice vnto the gods at CORINTH, he sent Aratus part of his weathers he had sacrificed, vnto SICYONE. And at the feast of his sacrifice in the hearing of many noble men that were bidden guests, he sayd openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this yong SICYONIAN could not but haue a liberall mind, louing the liberty of his country and countrimen: but I perceiue now he is a man that can iudge of Princes maners and affaires. For heretofore he made no account of vs, because his hope was out of his countrey, and he greatly esteemed the riches of ÆGYPT, hearing talke of so many Elephants, of such a great fleete of ships, and of such a sumptuous Court, as king Ptolomies Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a smoake and vaine pompe, he is come ts vs: and for my part, he is welcome to me, and I wil haue you all to take him for my friend. These words of king Antigonus, were straight taken at bound of certaine enuious men, and caried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man striuing who should write all the euill they could against him: so that Ptolomie thereupon sent a messenger of purpose vnto him, to reproue him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, betweene the earnest loue of these Princes and Kings, that contended with each other who should haue Aratus. Furthermore, the first time that Aratus was chosen Lieutenant generall of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, he forraged and spoiled the countrey of LOCRIDE, which lieth directly ouer against ACHAIA, and CALYDONIA also. Howbeit he came not time inough to aide the BOEOTIANS, in the battell which they lost before the city of CHÆRONEA, against the ÆOLIANS: where Abœocritus, gouernour of BOEOTIA was slaine in the field, with a thousand other BOEOTIANS. Howbeit the next yeare following, he being the second time chosen Lieutenant generall, he attempted to winne the castell of CORINTH againe, being an enterprise which not onely concerned the priuate benefit of SICYONE it selfe, and the tribe of the ACHAIANS, but also of all GREECE besides. For, he was fully bent to driue the garrison of the MACEDONIANS thence, the which seemed euen a very yoke that held all the GRECIANS noses to the grindstone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the ATHENIANS, hauing in a certaine conflict, discomfited the kings Lieutenants, wrote vnto the ATHENIANS that had won a victory halfe sister to the victorie of MARATHON: euen so me thinkes it were no disgrace to say, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrãts, which was done by Pelopidas THEBAN, and Thrasybulus ATHENIAN, sauing that this last act was more famous, because it was not against GRECIANS, but against strangers and forreine power and gouernment, vpon whom it was executed. For the Isthmus or barre of PELOPONNESVS, which separateth the sea Ægeum from the sea Ionium, doth come and ioyne the firme land of the rest of GREECE, with the PRESCHE an Iland of PELOPONNESVS. Euen so likewise the mountaine called Acrocorinth, on the which the castell standeth, rising vp in the middest of GREECE, when there is any garrison of men of war in it, it cutteth off all traffike and passage by, of any armies of them which inhabit within the ſtraight: for them that are without the ſtraight, both by ſea and by land, and maketh him only Lord of the countrey that keepeth the caſtell. So that it was not for ſport, but for truth, and in good earneſt, that Philip the young king of MACEDON was wont to call the citie and caſtell of CORINTH, the ſtockes and giues of GREECE. And therefore was this caſtell maruellouſly wiſhed and deſired of euery man, but ſpecially of Kings and Princes. But the deſire Antigonus had of it was ſo vehement, that it differed nothing from the paſſions of a franticke louer. For he did nothing elſe continually but ſtudy and deuiſe how he might winne it vpon the ſudden, from them that kept it: becauſe otherwiſe by open force, it was impoſſible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that caſtell, being poiſoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practiſe, the caſtell being left in the hands of his wife Nicæa, who gouerned the ſtate of CORINTH, & did carefully cauſe the Acrocorinth to be kept: he immediatly ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, and put Nicæa in good hope to marry her with this yong Prince: a thing that pleaſed this Ladie well, though ſhe was very old. So, for her ſelfe ſhe was wonne ſtraight, by meanes of his yong ſonne Demetrius, whom he vſed as a ſtale to intrap her. Howbeit Nicæa for all this goodly offer, forſooke not her caſtell, but alwayes made it ſtraightly to be looked vnto. Antigonus ſeemed to make no account of it, but daily gaue himſelfe to make ſumptuous ſacrifices, feaſts, and playes to the gods, within the city of CORINTH for the mariage: as though he had meant no other thing, but banquetting and iollity all that might be. When the houre was come to ſee theſe ſports, and that the Muſitian Amœbeus began to ſing: he himſelfe made as though he would accompany Nicæa vnto the Theater, being conueyed thither in a ſumptuous rich litter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honour, and thought nothing leſſe then of that which happened her. But when Antigonus came to the end of a ſtreete that turned to go vp the hill towards the caſtell, he bad her keepe on ſtill to the Theater: and himſelfe in the meane time left Amabeus there with his ſinging, and all the feaſt of the mariage, and went ſtraight vp to the caſtell, forcing himſelfe aboue his ſtrength and yeares. When he was at the top of the hill, and found the gates ſhut, he knocked with his ſtaffe, and commanded the garriſon to open him the gates. They wondring to ſee him there in perſon, did let him in. When he was gotten into the caſtell, he was ſo exceeding ioyfull of it, that he had no reaſon to moderate his ioy, but would banquet in the middeſt of ſtreetes, and in the market place, hauing minſtrels to play vpon their inſtruments at his table, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads for ioy, and did ſo fondly and lightly behaue himſelfe, as if he had bene a light yong man (and not as he was) an old man: who had proued ſuch ſundry changes of fortune, and yet ſuffered himſelfe to be thus caried away with pleaſure, that he embraced, and ſpake to euery man he met. Whereby it is eaſie to iudge, that ioy poſſeſſing a man without wit or diſcretion, it maketh him beſides himſelfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then paine or feare. Now Antigonus hauing won the caſtell of the Acrocorinth, as you haue heard, he put it into the hands of thoſe he truſted beſt, to be ſafely kept: and therfore made Perſæus the Philoſopher, Captaine of the caſtell. But indeed Aratus was in mind to haue attempted the taking of the caſtell, in Alexanders life time: yet he let it alone, becauſe he ioyned himſelfe with the ACHAIANS. But at that time there was offered him an other occaſion againe to attempt it, and this it was. At CORINTH, there were foure brethren borne in SYRIA, of the which, one of them being called Diocles, was a ſouldier of the caſtell: and the reſt hauing robbed the kings treaſure, went ſtraight vnto SICYONE, to Ægias the banker, whom Aratus imployed in his facultie. Theſe three brethren immediatly ſold him part of the gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them (called Erginus) comming often to ſee him, by litle and litle ſold him all the reſt. By this meanes Ægias fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garriſon of the caſtell of the Acrocorinth. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp thoſe ſteepe and high rockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the caſtell, which was verie low. Ægias hearing that, aunſwered him ſmiling: Alas, my friend, what meane you to ſteale a little peece of gold to hinder the king, when in one houres ſpace you can ſell ſuch a great maſſe of money together? For as well ſhall you die if you be apprehended for this fellonie, as if you were otherwiſe attainted for treaſon. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promiſed that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly truſt his other brethren. So, returning ſhortly after, he bargained with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fifteene foote high, promiſing that he would helpe him to execute the reſt, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promiſed then to giue him fiftie talents, if he brought his enterprise to passe: and if he failed, that he would then giue either of them, a house, & a talent. Erginus would haue the whole fifty talents put into Ægias the bankers hands. Aratus had not so much readie money, and besides, he would not take it vp at vsury, for feare of giuing cause to suspect his enterprise. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and siluer, and his wiues iewels, and layed them to gage to Ægias, to disburse the sayd summe. But Aratus had so great & noble a mind in him, and was so bent to do notable acts: that knowing how Phocion and Epaminondas had bene esteemed for the iustest and honestest men of GREECE, because they had refused great gifts that were offered them, and would neuer sell nor staine their honour for money: he yet surpassing them, was contented to spend his owne, to bring any good enterprise to passe, and did put his life in danger for the common benefit of his countrey men, they themselues knowing nothing of his enterprise, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie & courage of such a man, and that will not euen now as it were, be willing to aide him, considering how dearely he bought so great a danger of his person, and how he layed his plate and all the riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middest of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of such a noble enterprise, and nothing else? But now, though the enterprise of it selfe was dangerous, an error chancing through ignorance at the first, made it yet more dangerous. For Aratus had sent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the wall. This Technon had neuer spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his mind what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had giuen him of him: that he had a blacke curled haire, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Now Technon being come to the place where Erginus sayd he would be with Diocles: he stayed before the towne in a place called ORNIS. So whilest he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles (called Dionysius, who knew nothing of the enterprise, nor was made acquainted withall, & looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chance. Technon being moued by the markes he saw in him, like vnto those he was told of: asked him if he were nothing a kin vnto Erginus. The other answered, he was his brother. Then Technon perswading himself it was certainly Diocles that spake to him, without asking him his name, or making other enquirie of him: he tooke him by the hand, & began to talke with him of the practise he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Dionysius taking the matter vpon him, and feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the city, holding him on still with talke, Technon mistrusting nothing. But euen as Dionysius was ready to take him fast by the coller: his brother Erginus came. Who, perceiuing how Technon had mistaken the matter, and the danger he was in: beckned to him with his head to flie, and so they both ran for life vnto Aratus, to saue themselues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more discouraged for this, but sent Erginus straight to cary his brother Dionysius money, and to pray him not to be acknowne of any thing: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him sure for starting: for they bound him, and locked him vp fast in a chamber, whilest they went about their enterprise. So when all things were readie, Aratus commanded the rest of his armie that they should tarie behind, armed all night: and he himselfe with foure hundreth of the best men he had (not knowing themselues whether they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the gates of the citie, passing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middest of summer, when the Moone was at the full, and the element very cleare without clouds: insomuch that they were afraid their armors would glister by Moone-light, and bewray them. But as the foremost of them came neare vnto the city, there arose clouds out of the sea that darkned all the city and places thereabouts, and shadowed them. Then all of them sitting downe on the ground, plucked off their shooes, both because they should make lesse noise, as also for that their footing should be surer, and that they should slip lesse vpon the ladders. But Erginus, and seuen other companions with him like men that trauell, came secretly into the gate of the citie, and slue the porter and warders there. At that very instant, Aratus caused the ladders to be set vp against the wals, and made an hundreth of his souldiers get vp on them: and sent also to command the rest, that they should follow him with all possible speed. Then drawing vp his ladders after him, as fast as he could, he went through the city with his hundred men toward the castell, with such a ioyfull cheare, as if he had had it already in his hand; for that he saw he was not discouered. But as he went on, he saw foure of the watch comming with a light against them. They saw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies saw them plainly a farre of. Aratus and his men therefore ſtood vp cloſe againſt old wals to tarrie their comming, and at the firſt onſet, ſlue three of them: but the fourth hauing a blow on his head with a ſword, ranne away, making an out-cry, that the enemies were in the city. The trumpets forthwith ſounded the allarme, all the citie was in an vprore, the ſtreetes were ſtraight full of people running vp and downe, and of lights in euerie corner, both beneath the citie, as alſo in the caſtell, and the noiſe was great euerie where. Aratus in the meane time forced to get vp the high rockes faire and ſoftly at the firſt, and with great paine and difficulty, being out of his path he ſhould haue found, which he miſſed being very deepe into the rockes, and with many crooks and crankes went to the foot of the caſtell: but ſuddenly, euen as it had bene by miracle, the moone appearing through the clouds, when they were in their worſt way, it gaue them light, and brought them to that part of the wall where they ſhould be, and ſtraight the Moone was ſhadowed againe. Now the three hundreth ſouldiers whom Aratus had left by the gate of the temple of Iuno, when they were come into the citie being full of lights and in vprore, and beſides could not find the path by the which their Captaine Aratus went before them: they ſtood cloſe together vnder a rocke that ſhadowed them, ſorowfully looking to heare ſome newes of Aratus: who was then fighting with the garriſon of the caſtell, the which made head againſt him with all the force and power he could. Vnder the caſtell there was a great noiſe heard of men that fought, but yet the noiſe was ſo confuſed by the ſound rebounding againſt the rockes and mountaine, that they could not deuiſe whence it ſhould come. So they being in this perplexity, not knowing which way to turne themſelues: Archelaus, Captaine of king Antigonus men, hauing a good number of ſouldiers with him, went vp the hill with great cries and noiſe of trumpets to ſet vpon Aratus and his company behind. But after he was paſſed by theſe three hundred ſouldiers of Aratus band, they gaue charge vpon him, as if they had bene layd there in ambuſh of purpoſe, and ſlue the firſt they encountred withall, and made the others ſo afraid, and Archelaus himſelfe, that they diſperſed them, and made ſome flie one way, ſome another way. So, as they were ouerthrowne, Erginus came to theſe three hundred men, comming immediatly from them that fought, and brought them newes that Aratus and them of the caſtell, were come to the ſword together, and valiantly defended themſelues, luſtily fighting for the wall, and therefore it was time for them to helpe him quickly. Then the ſouldiers bad him bring them thither ſtraight, and ſo he did. So they climing vp the hil, did ſignifie by their cries to their men, that they came to aide him. Furthermore, the Moone being then at the full, and ſhining on their harneſſe, made their enemies in the caſtell thinke that they were a greater number then indeed they were, becauſe of the long way they had to make to get vp vpon the rockes: and alſo becauſe of the ſound in the night, that made their cry ſeeme to be of a greater number then they were. At length they ioyning with Aratus, they fought it out ſo luſtily, that they draue the garriſon out of the wals, and by breake of day wanne the caſtell. So that their exploit was diſcouered by the riſing of the Sunne, and beſides, all the reſt of their armie that came from the citie of Sicyone: whom the Corinthians verie gladly receiued, and did ſet open their gates vnto them, and aided them to take King Antigonus men. Afterwards, when they thought that all was ſafe, then Aratus ranne from the caſtell vnto the Theater of the citie, whither repaired an infinite number of people, as well for the deſire they had to ſee him, as alſo to heare him ſpeake vnto the Corinthians. So, hauing placed the Achaians of either ſide, at the comming into the Theater: Aratus being armed went vp into the chaire or pulpit for Orations, hauing his face quite chaunged, both for the great paines he had taken, and alſo for lacke of ſleepe: ſo that his bodie being ouer-wearied, his ſpirits were euen done. Now when all the aſſembly of the people (ſeeing him in the chaire) did humble themſelues to ſhew him all the honour and kindneſſe they could poſſible: he tooke his ſpeare out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and bodie ſomewhat, he leaned vpon it, and ſo ſtood a great while in this manner before he ſpake, receiuing the cryes of ioy and clapping of hands which the people made, praiſing his valiantneſſe, and bleſſing his good hap and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an Oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and commonwealth of the Achaians, meet for the enterpriſe from whence he came: and perſwaded them to ioyne to the Achaians. So therewithall, they preſently deliuered him the keyes of their citie, the which were neuer before that time in their power, ſince the raigne of king Philip. Now touching the other Captaines of king Antigonus: Aratus hauing taken Archelaus priſoner, he let him go, but put Theophraſtus to

to death, becauſe he would not go out of CORINTH. Perſæus (Captaine of the caſtle) ſeeing the caſtle but loſt: he ſecretly ſaued himſefe, and fled vnto the citie of CENCHREES. And it is reported, that as he was afterwards in talke of Philoſophie, where one maintaining, that a man could not be a good Captaine, vnleſſe he were a perfect wiſe man: This (quoth he) is one of Zenoes opinions rightly, the which heretofore pleaſed me beſt: but now this yong SICYONIAN Aratus, hath made me of another mind. Many writers do report this ſaying of Perſæus. Furthermore, Aratus wan preſently the temple of Iuno, and the hauen of LECHÆVM, where he took fiue and twentie ſhips of king Antigonus, and fiue hundred horſe of ſeruice for the war, and foure hundred SYRIANS, which he ſold euery one of them. The ACHAIANS left within the caſtell of the Acrocorinth, a garriſon of foure hundred footmen, and fiftie dogges, and as many hunts, all the which were kept for the watch of the caſtell. Now, the ROMAINES wondring at the valiantneſſe of Philopœmen, they called him the laſt of the GRECIANS. Euen ſo might I alſo (in my opinion) ſay, that this act is the laſt and moſt famous of all the GRECIANS, and deſerueth to be equall, aſwell for valiantneſſe, as alſo good ſucceſſe, with the greateſt exploites of the moſt famous auncients: as that which followed immediatly after, doth amply declare. For the MEGARIANS reuolting from king Antigonus, did ſtraight ioyne with Aratus: and the TROEZENIANS alſo with the EPIDAVRIANS, did likewiſe enter into leagu and friendſhip with the ACHAIANS. So at the firſt inuaſion he made, he went to ſpoile the country of ATTICA, and croſſed ouer to the Iſle of SALAMINA, and ſpoiled and deſtroyed it, euen as if he had deliuered the power and force of the ACHAIANS out of priſon, to ſerue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he ſent home the ATHENIAN priſoners without paying of ranſome: and all of pollicie to make them deſirous to rebell againſt the MACEDONIANS. Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a friend and confederate of the ACHAIANS, with condition, that he ſhould be Lieutenant generall both by ſea & by land. For theſe reſpects Aratus was of maruellous eſtimation and credite with the ACHAIANS: inſomuch that where they could not yearely chuſe him their Generall, being contrary to their lawe; they choſe him at the leaſt euery ſecond yeare: but in effect, all was done by his aduice & counſell. For they ſaw plainely, that it was neither honor, nor riches, nor friendſhip of kings & princes, nor the priuate benefit of his owne city wherin he was born, nor any other thing elſe that he preferred, before the glory and increaſe of the commonwealth of the ACHAIANS. For he was of opinion, that cities by themſelues were but weake, and being ioyned together with the chaine of cõmon benefit, they were a ſtrength one to preſerue the other. And in like maner, euen as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beaſts, haue life and ſuſtenance, being ioyned and knit together, and ſtraight ſo ſoone as there is any ſeparation of them the one from the other, they liue no more and putrifie: euen ſo cities alſo were brought to decay by them that did diſperſe their ſocietie among them; & in contrary maner did then againe increaſe, when ioyning with any other great body & city, they were gouerned with wiſdome and good councell. So Aratus ſeeing the chiefeſt cities therabouts enioy their lawes and liberties: thought it a ſhamefull thing to leaue the AROIVES in ſlauery & bondage. Wherfore he practiſed to kil the tyrant Ariſtomachus that gouerned thẽ, both to ſhew himſelf thankfull to the city for his bringing vp there: as alſo to ioyne that great & mightie city vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Now there were diuers men, that had the hearts & courage to vndertake to do it, of the which the chiefeſt were Æſchylus & Charimenes the Soothſayer, but they had no ſwords: for they were ſtraightly forbidden by the tyrant, and grieuous puniſhments ordained for them that ſhould be found with their ſwords. Aratus therefore cauſed litle ſhort daggers to be made at CORINTH for them, the which he ſowed vp in packes caried on certaine beaſtes loden with other baggage and ſtuffe. But the Soothſayer Charimenes did impart this enterpriſe vnto a third man, and made him one of the conſpiracie with them. Æſchylus being very much offended with it, began therefore to enter into practiſe by himſelfe, and left their companie. Charimenes perceiuing that, tooke ſuch a toy in his head in a mad mood, that he bewrayed them as they went about to execute their enterpriſe. This notwithſtanding, the moſt part of the conſpiratours ſaued themſelues, and fled to CORINTH. So the tyrant Ariſtomachus was ſlaine ſhortly after by his owne men. But then another tyrant Ariſtippus, a crueller man then the firſt, made haſt to take the tyrannie before he could be reſiſted. This notwithſtanding, Aratus with all the young men of the ACHAIANS able to ſerue in the field, went ſodainely thither with aide, hoping to find them of the city very glad to recouer their liberty. Howbeit the people being acquainted, & of long time vſed patiently to beare the yoke of bondage: there was not a man of thẽ that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe and did nothing, ſauing that thereby the Achaians were accuſed, becauſe that in open peace they had made war, and therefore they were put in ſute before the Mantinians, at Ariſtippus requeſt, tyrant of Argos. The matter was pleaded in Aratus abſence, and the Achaians were condemned to pay the ſumme of thirty Minaes. After this proofe and attempt of Aratus, Ariſtippus being affraid of Aratus, and hating him to the death, ſought waies to kill him, with the helpe of Antigonus, who did aide him in it: and almoſt there were ſpials in enery corner, that did nothing elſe but lye in waite to execute Ariſtippus mind. Now, there is no ſurer guard vnto a Prince, then the perfect loue and goodwill of his ſubiects. For after that the Nobilitie and common people haue bene vſed to feare, not him, but thoſe that for him commaund them: he then ſeeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares and knoweth what is done farre off. Here therefore I will a litle digreſſe from my hiſtorie, to ſhew you the manner of Ariſtippus life the tyrant, wherunto he was brought by this ſo much deſired tyrannicall gouernment, and ſmoke of ſeigniorie, ſo eſteemed of all men. Nowe, though Ariſtippus had king Antigonus his friend, and that he kept a great guard of ſouldiers about him for the ſafetie of his perſon, & that there was not an enemie of his left aliue in all the city: yet he made his ſouldiers watch and lye without his pallace, vnder the cloiſters and galleries thereabouts, and after ſupper turned all his men out of the doores, and then ſhut his court gates to him, and locked himſelf alone with his concubine, in a litle high chamber with a trap doore, and ſet his bed vpon it, and ſo ſlept, as one that continually was affraid of himſelfe. Then, after he was come vp, his concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in another chamber: and ſo did let it downe againe the next morning, and called this trimme tyrant, that went downe out of his chamber, like a ſnake that ſhould haue crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrarie manner not hauing obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue a continuall gouernement, being ſimply apparelled with a poore gowne of ſmall price, and ſhewing himſelfe a mortall enemy vnto all ſorts of tyrants: hath left a race and noble offspring among the Grecians, which remaine yet vntill this preſent day. Contrarily alſo, there are few tyrants that do vſurpe the caſtels of free cities, that keepe ſo many ſouldiers in pay, that make ſuch prouiſion for armor and weapó, and haue ſo many gates and draw-bridges for the ſaftie of their perſons, that in the end can keepe themſelues from violent death, no more then hares: neither do leaue alſo any poſteritie, houſe, or graue, why their memorie ſhould be honored after their death. So Aratus hauing diuerſe waies made ſundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwiſe, ſuddenly to take the city of Argos, and to thruſt out the tyrant Ariſtippus: he euer failed of his purpoſe, but ſpecially one night among the reſt, when he entred the citie very dangerouſly, with a few ſouldiers with him, & ſlue the ſouldiers that came to giue ſupply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, & that the tyrant with all his forces came to ſet vpon him; the Argiues ſtirred not at all, as if Aratus had not fought for their libertie, but as though they had bene Iudges appointed to ſit to ſee the ſports of the games Nemee, to iudge the game vnto the conqueror without partialitie, and with indifferencie. Aratus in the meane time fighting like a valiant man, was thruſt at with a pike, and runne through the thigh. This notwithſtanding, at length he wan that part of the city where he fought and was not thruſt out till night, what force ſoeuer the enemies made vpon him: and if he could poſſibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtained his purpoſe: for the tyrant looked for none other but to flie, and had already ſent diuers of his goods to the ſea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratus any newes of it, beſides alſo lacking water, and for that he could not helpe himſelfe becauſe of his wound, he was driuen to lead his men away, and failed of his purpoſe. So, deſpairing that he could euer take it by ſtealth, he went thither with open wars, & ſpoiled and deſtroyed all the country of Argos: and hauing fought a great battell againſt the tyrant Ariſtippus, by the riuer of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he forſooke the victory, & cowardly retired out of the battell. For the reſt of his army doubtleſſe had the better, and had followed the enemies farre in chaſe: when he fled being afraid, not compelled by his enemies, but miſtruſting his fortune, and retired to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chaſe of their enemies were offended, for that they hauing put them to flight, and alſo ſlaine a great number more of them, then they had loſt of theirs, and yet for cowardlineſſe ſhould ſuffer their enemies (whom they had ouercome and put to flight) to ſet vp markes of triumph in token of victorie: Aratus being aſhamed of it, determined to fight once againe, for the markes of triumph. Whereupon reſting his men but one day, he lead them againe into the field, and ſetting his

his armie in battell raye, offered to fight once more. This notwithſtanding, when he ſawe a great ſupply comming to his enemie, and that the tyrants men came to fight more luſtily, and with better courage then before: Aratus durſt not abide them, but retired, and ſent to demaund leaue to take away his dead men to burie them, yet he could ſpeake ſo courteouſly, and behaue himſelfe ſo wiſely, by the experience he had in gouernement, and alſo for the goodwill they bare him: that they forgate the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of CLEONES vnto the ACHAIANS, where he cauſed the feaſtes of the games of Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the CLEONEIANS, then vnto the ARGIVES. This notwithſtanding, the ARGIVES did keepe it alſo, and then was the firſt time that the ſanctuarie and priuiledge was broken, which was wont to be graunted vnto all them that came to play for the games: becauſe the ACHAIANS did make them priſoners that fought in ARGOS, as they returned through their countrey, and ſold them as enemies. So marueilouſly did Aratus and the ACHAIANS hate all ſorts of tyrants, without reſpect of pardon. Shortly after he was aduertiſed, that the tyrant Ariſtippus did lye in wayte to ſpie oportunitie, to take the citie of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was affrayed of it, becauſe he remained at that time in CORINTH. So Aratus ſtraight ſent out commaundement into euery place, to aſſemble the armie of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, and that they ſhould bring victuals with them for many daies: and ſo craftily came downe to the citie of CENCHREES, to intice Ariſtippus, by his going away ſo farre off, that in his abſence he ſhould attempt to ſet vpon the CLEONEIANS, as indeede he did. For he failed not preſently to goe thither with his armie. But Aratus returning from CENCHREES vnto CORINTH, very late in the night, and hauing layed good watch euerie waye: he ſodainely brought the armie of the ACHAIANS vnto CLEONES with ſuch ſpeede and quietneſſe, that they were not ſeene as they came, but entred into the citie of CLEONES by night, and were readie to fight with the tyraunt, before he knewe they were come. So the gates of the citie were ſet open by breake of day, and the ſignall of battell giuen by ſound of trumpets: and ſo ſetting vpon the tyraunts men with great cryes, they ſuſpecting nothing, they were preſently put to flight. And becauſe the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, had many turnings: Aratus following the chaſe, tooke the way which he thought the tyrant fled in. The chaſe continued to the citie of MYCENES: there the tyrant was ouertaken by a CRETAN called Tragiſcus, (as Dinias reporteth) who ſlue him: and there were ſlaine of his men alſo aboue fifteene thouſand. But now Aratus hauing wonne ſuch a famous victorie, and loſt neuer a man: he could not yet winne the citie of ARGOS, nor ſet it againe at libertie. For one Ægias, and another Ariſtomachus, got into the towne with the kings armie, and kept it: but notwithſtanding, by this noble victory Aratus did race out a great part of the reproch that they gaue him, and of the ſcoffes and ſlents the flatterers of the tyrants deuiſed of him: who to pleaſe them, reported, that when they ſhould come to fight indeed, the Generall of the ACHAIANS had the wind collike in his belly, and a dimneſſe in his eyes, with a guydineſſe in his head, when he heard but the ſound of the trumpets. And furthermore alſo, when he had ſet his men in battell ray, and giuen them the word of battell: he asked the Generals if he ſhould neede to be there in perſon, becauſe he was hurt in the heele, and then would get him as farre off as he could, to ſee the end of the battell. This talke was ſo common, that the Philoſophers themſelues diſputing of it, to wit, whether to tremble and chaunge colour in preſent daunger and perill, be ſignes of a faint heart, or of an ill complexion and coldneſſe of bodie: they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valiant Captaine, and yet when he began to fight, he was euer in that taking. So when he had ouercome Ariſtippus, he ſought means alſo to deſtroy Lyſiadas MEGALIPOLITAN, who as abſolute Lord and king of the countrey, kept the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. Notwithſtanding he had no baſe mind in him, neither was he caried away with a cruell deſire of tyrannie to liue at his pleaſure, nor through extreame couetouſneſſe, as moſt Princes be: but being a young man, and pricked forward with deſire of honor and fame, and hauing vnaduiſedly conceiued in his mind, (which was great and highly bent) the vaine reaſons he heard men talke of principality, as of a ſtate moſt bleſſed, and worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make himſelfe Lord of his country. But afterwards he was ſoone weary of the dangers and troubles ſuch maner of gouernment bringeth with it, and deſired to follow Aratus, whom he ſaw proſper, and of great honor. Furthermore alſo, fearing his ſecret practiſes againſt him, he tooke hold of a noble deuice: firſt to rid himſelfe of the malice and feare of the priſon and guard of his ſouldiers: and laſtly, to be a benefactor to his countrie. So he ſent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and deliuered vp his citie to the tribe of the ACHAIANS. They ſo extolled him for this acte, that they choſe him their Lieutenant generall of all their tribe. Wherefore, Lyſiadas ſtriuing at the firſt to excell Aratus in honour, attempted diuerſe things which were not very needefull: as among others, to make warre with the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Aratus was very much againſt him in that, though ſome think it was for enuie. Thereupon they choſe Lyſiadas Generall of the ACHAIANS the ſecond time: although Aratus openly both ſpake and made what meanes he could to the contrarie, and would haue had another to haue bene choſen. For he himſelfe was euery other yeare Generall. So Lyſiadas was choſen againe Generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with euery bodies goodwill: and Aratus and he had abſolute power and gouernement by turnes, one after the other. But when they ſawe that Lyſiadas became open enemie vnto Aratus, and did ſtill accuſe him in all their councels & aſſemblies: they fell in ſuch miſliking with him, that they reiected him. For they thought his but a counterfeit vertue, to contend with the perfectneſſe of Aratus vertue. Much like vnto one of Æſopes fables, ſaying, That litle birds did anſwer the cuckow on a time, asking them why they did flie from her: Becauſe we are affraid (ſaid they) thou wilt be a ſparhawke one day. Euen ſo it ſeemeth, that there was a certaine ſuſpition in mens minds of Lyſiadas tyrannie, which made them miſtruſt that he went not from his tyrannie with goodwill. Nowe Aratus on the other ſide, wanne as great praiſe and honour by his doings againſt the ÆTOLIANS. For when the ACHAIANS would needes haue fought vpon the confines of the territorie of the MEGARIANS, and that Agis king of LACEDÆMON, being come with his armie to the campe of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, did perſwade them hardily to giue battell: Aratus was ſtoutly againſt it, and did abide many mockes and taunts they gaue him, ſaying, That it was for cowardlineſſe he would not go. This notwithſtanding, he would not leaue his wiſe and ſafe determination, for all that open ſhame: but ſuffered the enemies to paſſe ouer the mountaine Gerania, and to inuade PELOPONNESVS, and would neuer fight with them. But afterwards, when he ſaw that at their firſt comming they had taken the citie of PALLENA: he then chaunged his mind, and would deferre time no longer to tarie till all his power were come together, but marched foorthwith againſt his enemies, with thoſe few he had, who maruellouſly weakened themſelues by their inſolencie and diſorder after their victorie, keeping no watch nor ward. For after they had entred the citie of PALLENA, the ſouldiers ran into euery houſe, one thruſting in anothers necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Captaines alſo fell to rauiſhing of maides, & the PALLENIANS wiues, and put their burganets and morrions vpon their heades, that none other ſhould take them, becauſe that by the ſame the ſouldiers ſhold know whoſe they were, and to whom the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and iolitie, newes came ſuddenly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they ſawe they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all vnderſtood of the daunger by their ſudden ſetting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting alreadie within the ſuburbes and gates of the citie, againſt the firſt that reſiſted, whom they ſlue. They being broken and put to flight, made the reſt ſo afraid that were gathered together to aide them, that they wiſt not what to do. In this tumult and hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a priſoner, that was the daughter of Epigethes one of the nobleſt men of the citie, and ſhe a maruellous goodly woman, and paſſing faire: who being ſet in the temple of Diana, whither a Captaine had brought her that had choſen her for himſelfe, and had put his burganet on her head: ſhe ſuddenly ranne to the gate of the temple with the burganet on her head, when ſhe heard the noiſe of them that fought, to ſee them fight. The Citizens ſeeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maieſtie, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other ſide were ſo affraid to ſee her, thinking ſhe had bene ſome ſpirit: that not a man of them durſt once defend themſelues. So the PALLENIANS ſay, that the image of Diana all the reſt of the time is kept locked vp, and no bodie toucheth it, and that when the Nunne that keepeth it doth carie it elſe where, no man dare looke on it, but euery man turneth his eyes away: becauſe the ſight of it is not onely fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it alſo killeth the fruite of the trees it paſſeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cauſe that then troubled the ÆTOLIANS mindes ſo much, becauſe the Nunne remouing the image of the goddeſſe Diana, ſhe turned it towards them. Howbeit Aratus in his Commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth, that when he had defeated the ÆTOLIANS, following them in chaſe, he entred hand ouer head with them that fled into the citie, out of the which he draue them, and

and slue seuen hundred of them. This noble victorie hath bene esteemed amongest the chiefest afterwards: and the paynter Timanthes hath drawne and set it foorth in table very liuely. This notwithstanding, because diuerse Princes and people did immediatly prepare force against the ACHAIANS: Aratus presently made peace with the ÆTOLIANS by the practise of Pantalcon, who bare great sway and authoritie amongst them. Furthermore, Aratus being desirous to set the ATHENIANS at libertie, he sodainly attempted to take the hauen of PIREA: for the which the ACHAIANS reproued him, because he had broken the peace they had made with the MACEDONIANS. But Aratus in his Commentaries doth stoutly deny that it was he, and layeth the fault vpon Erginus, by whose meanes he wanne the castell of the Acrocorinth: saying, that it was he, that of his owne mind did set a scaling ladder to the wall, and that his ladder breaking vnder him, he fled vpon it, and perceiuing he was followed neare by the enemies, he still cryed out, Aratus, as if he had bene there; and by this pollicie mocked his enemies, and saued himselfe. Howbeit, me thinketh this aunswer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a priuate souldier, and a SYRIAN borne, should haue so great an enterprise in his head, vnlesse it had bene by Aratus consent and commaundement, who had giuen him men, time and meanes to vndertake it. And this appeared plainely afterwardes: for, Aratus did not attempt it twise or thrise only, but oftener then so (as those that extreamely desire a thing) to take the hauen of PIREA on the sodaine, not giuing ouer for once failing, but rather emboldening himselfe againe with good hope, because he missed it but litle, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another time also amongest others, flying through the plaine of THRIASIA, he brake his legge, and was driuen to make many incisions to heale it: so that he was a long time together caried in his lytter vnto the warres. After that king Antigonus was dead, and that Demetrius his sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome: he attempted then more earnestly then euer before, to set the citie of ATHENS at libertie, making small account of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus therefore being ouerthrowne in battell neare vnto PHYLACIA, by King Demetrius Lieutenaunt, called Bithys, and the rumour running straight abroade, that Aratus was dead, or at the least that he was taken prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the hauen of PIREA, wrote a letter vnto CORINTH, and commaunded the garrison of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliuer the towne, for Aratus was dead. But he by chaunce was at the selfe same time in CORINTH: so that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the companie merrie. Furthermore, King Demetrius himselfe sent a Galley out of MACEDON, to bring Aratus bound vnto him. The ATHENIANS themselues also, to please the MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightnesse of flatterie, wore garlands on their heades a whole day together, in token of common ioye, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was so mad in his minde to heare this, that he brought his armie presently against them, euen to the very suburbes of the Academie. Notwithstanding at their earnest requestes, he did no hurt there. And afterwardes the ATHENIANS acknowledging his valiantnesse, when king Demetrius dyed: it tooke them in the heades to recouer their libertie againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bedde lying sicke of a long disease: yet to further this, he was caryed vnto ATHENS in a lytter, and so perswaded Diogenes, (Captaine of the Garrison there) that for the summe of an hundred and fiftie talents (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twentie talents) he made him deliuer to the ATHENIANS the hauen of PIREA, the castell of MVNYCHIA, the Isle of SALAMINA, and the castell of SVNIVM. After this, the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the most part of ARCADIA it selfe, did presently ioyne with the ACHAIANS: so that the MACEDONIANS being occupied with warres at that time in other places against their neighbours, the power of the ACHAIANS marueilously encreased, hauing also the ÆTOLIANS their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his ould promise, and being angrie to see the citie of ARGOS (being so neare neighbour vnto them) yet kept in bondage: he sent vnto Aristomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his citie againe at libertie, and to ioyne it to the tribe of the ACHAIANS, as Lysiadas had done his towne of MEGALIPOLIS, and rather to like to be made a Generall with honour and prayse of so great and famous a state as the ACHAIANS, then tyraunt of one onely Citie, hated, and euery houre of the night and daye in daunger of his life. Aristomachus gaue eare to his perswasions, and sent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talentes to discharge the souldiers he had about him. The money was straight prepared. And Lysiadas that was at that time Generall of the Achaians, and that maruellously desired this matter might be brought to passe by his meanes: he secretly sent vnto Aristomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed how he had bene alwaies a mortall enemie vnto tyrants, and therefore counselled him rather to put himselfe into his hands, as indeede he did. For Lysiadas brought Aristomachus vnto the councell of the Achaians. There all the councell plainely shewed their good wils, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he spake against it, that they should not receiue Arstomachus, they reiected him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was won, and that he began to moue the contrarie to the councell; they straight agreed to receiue the Argives, and the Phliasians in league with them, and also the next yeare following they chose Aristomachus Lieutenant generall of all their tribe. Aristomachus seeing himselfe in credit now with the Achaians, would needes inuade the countrie of Laconia with a maine armie, and sent for Aratus being then at Athens. Aratus wrote vnto him, and wished him in any wise not to meddle with that iourney, because he would not haue the Achaians to deale with Cleomenes king of Lacedæmon, that was a couragious and stout young Prince, and maruellously growne in short time. Howbeit, Aristomachus being self-willed in that point, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in person all that iourney. So Cleomenes being come to them vpon the sodaine with his armie, neare vnto the citie of Palantivm: Aristomacus would needs fight with him; but Aratus disswaded him from it. Wherupon Lysiadas afterwards accused him to the Achaians, and the next yeare following he contended with him, suing to be Generall: howbeit he was reiected by most voices, and Aratus chosen Generall the twelfth time. The selfe same yeare he was ouerthrowne in battell by Cleomenes, neare vnto the mountaine Lycæum, and being fled, wandred vp and down in the night, that euery man thought he had bene slaine, and it ran for good payment among all the Grecians. Howbeit, he saued himselfe, and hauing gathered his men together againe, not contenting him that he had escaped with life, but wisely taking the oportunitie and occasion offered, no man knowing it, nor mistrusting his comming: he suddenly went to assaile the Mantineans, which were confederates of Cleomenes, and hauing taken the city of Mantinea, he left a great garrison in it, and made the strangers that were there, free of the citie. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being ouercome, wan the Achaians that which they themselues could scarcely haue won if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards, the Lacedæmonians inuading the territories of the Megalipolitans with a great armie, Aratus sodainly went thither to aide thē, but would hazard battel no more, nor giue Cleomenes vantage, who desired only to fight, and still constantly resisted the Megalipolitans, that prouoked him to come into the field. For besides that in nature he was not meete for a set battell, at that time also he was the weaker in men, and had to do with a venturous young man, that was all fire: where his courage and ambition on the other side was coole, and quiet enough. Furthermore, he considered, that as king Cleomenes sought honour by valiant venturing, which he had not before: euen so it was his part wisely to keepe that which he had long since gotten, and to stand vpon his guard and safetie. This notwithstanding, the light armed men being put out into the field, and hauing chased the Lacedæmonians euen into their campe, and entring in with them hand ouer head: Aratus would neuer bring out his citizens, but stayed them in a great valley that lay between them both, and would not let them come on any farther. Wherwithall Lysiadas being mad with himselfe, and falling out with Aratus; he called for the horsmen, and said that he would yet helpe them that followed the chase, and prayed them not to lose the victorie so cowardly, of the which they were so sure: nor to forsake him at a pinch, fighting for the defence of their country. So hauing gotten a great number of choise horsemen together, he went with great furie, and gaue charge on the right wing of his enemies battell, and hauing dispersed them, and put them to flight, he vnaduisedly followed thē with great courage, into euill fauored crooked waies, among trees and great broad ditches. Wherupon Cleomenes came, and so lustily set on him, that he slue him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending himselfe. The other men of armes flying also, rushed in againe, into the battell of the footmen, and so disordered their rankes, that they made all their armie flie for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, because he had forsaken Lysiadas: and being enforced vnto it by the Achaians that went without his leaue, he followed them at length, and fled himselfe also vnto the citie of Ægivm. There the Achaians sitting in councell, they decreed that they wold furnish Aratus with no more mony, neither would they pay his strangers any more: and bad him pay them at his owne charge, if he would entertaine them for the warre.

The loue and faith of the Achaians vnto Aratus.

Aratus ouerthrowne in battell by king Cleomenes, hard by the mountaine Lycæum. Aratus tooke the citie of Mantinea.

The death of Lysiadas. Aratus once againe ouerthrowne by Cleomenes.

Aratus perceiuing that they did him great wrong, ſtood euen indifferent to deliuer vp his commiſſion of Lieutenancie, and to diſcharge himſelf of his office: but after he had bethought himſelfe better, he bare it patiently, and led the ACHAIANS directly to the citie of ORCHOMENE. There he valiantly fought with Megiſtonus, king Cleomenes father in law, and had the vpper hand of him: for he ſlue three hundred of his men, and tooke Megiſtonus ſelfe priſoner. Furthermore, where before euery ſecond yeare they did vſe to chuſe him their Lieutenant generall: when his turne came about againe, they called him to giue him the office, but he refuſed it, and Timoxenus was choſen in his roome. Now the cauſe alleadged for his refuſall, was ſaid to be, for that he miſliked of the common people. But that ſoundeth like a lye: for the truth of it, to my ſeeming was, for that he ſaw the ſtate of the ACHAIANS to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more faire and ſoftly as he did at the firſt, when he was controlled and bridled by the Ephori: but hauing ſlaine them, and equally deuided the lands through LACEDÆMONIA, and made the ſtrangers free citizens of SPARTA, being then abſolute Lord of LACEDÆMON: he ſtraight ſet vpon the ACHAIANS with all the power he could, and ſought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deſerueth iuſt reproofe, for that he forſooke his countrie in ſuch extreme trouble and danger, that being as the maiſter of a ſhip, he gaue another the ſterne to ſteare, when it had bene moſt honorable and meeteſt for him to haue taken it in hand (though they would not haue giuen it him) to haue ſaued his countrie. Or otherwiſe, if he had indeed vtterly diſpaired of the good ſucceſſe of the ACHAIANS, he ſhould then haue put it rather into Cleomenes hands, and not to haue poiſoned PELOPONNESVS again, with the maners of the barbarous people (bringing in as he did, the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS, filling the caſtle of the Acrocorinth with GAVLES and ILLYRIAN ſouldiers, and making them his Lords and Maiſters, whom he had ſo often ouercome in wars, and deceiued of their gouernement, and of whom he alſo ſpake ſo much euill in his Commentaries) nor to haue put them into townes, and calling them friends and confederats, to think thereby to colour and diſguiſe his wicked practiſe. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tyrant, and a cruell man (if I ſhould ſo tearme him) yet came he of the bloud of Hercules, and was born in SPARTA: from whence they ſhould rather haue choſen the meaneſt man Gouernor, then the greateſt king of MACEDON, and thoſe ſpecially that prefer the honor and glorie of GREECE, before ſtrangers. Yet king Cleomenes required no more of all the ACHAIANS, but the name only to be their Lieutenant generall: and ſo they would graunt him that honor, he promiſed he would be very good vnto the cities confederates to ACHAIA. Where Antigonus notwithſtanding, when they had choſen him their Lieutenant generall with abſolute power and authoritie both by ſea and alſo by land, refuſed the charge, vnleſſe they would let him haue the caſtell of the Acrocorinth for his hire. The which was euen like to Æſopes hunter, that bridled his horſe: for he would not get vp vpon the ACHAIANS that requeſted him, and that by their Ambaſſadours and decrees of councell, did referre all vnto himſelfe: before he had firſt ſadled and bridled them, by the garriſon he made them receiue, and the pleadges he cauſed them to giue him, and yet he ſpake as much as might be to cleare himſelfe of the accuſation againſt him, bearing them in hand that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius writeth: that long time before he was cõpelled, being afraid of Cleomenes valiantneſſe, he had ſecretly practiſed that with Autigonus, which he was openly ſeene in afterwards: and that he had entiſed the MEGALIPOLITANS (who were the firſt that moued it to the councell of the ACHAIANS) to call king Antigonus to their aide, becauſe they were neareſt neighbors to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes warre, that alwaies knocked at their gates to come and ſpoile them. Thus much is affirmed by Philarchus in his hiſtorie, who were hardly to be credited notwithſtanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loued Cleomenes ſo well, that it ſeemed he was rauiſhed with ſome ſpirit as often as he ſpake of him: and frameth his hiſtorie, as a common counſeller that ſhould pleade a caſe in law before the Iudges, ſtill accuſing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS loſt the citie of MEGALIPOLIS againe, the which king Cleomenes tooke of them, and ouercame them in a great battell by Hecatombæon. Wherewithall they were ſo amazed, that they ſent Ambaſſadors preſently vnto him, and prayed him to come to the citie of ARGOS, and there they would make him their Lieutenant generall. But when Aratus heard he came indeed, and that he was not far from the citie of LERNA with his armie: being affraid, he ſent other Ambaſſadours to tell him that he ſhould ſafely come with three huudred men onely, as vnto his friends and confederates: and yet if he miſtruſted craft and euill dealing, that then they would giue him pledges for the ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes answered him, That was a plaine mockerie, and an iniurie they offered him. Wherefore he presently departed thence, and sent a letter before to the Councell of the Achaians, full of foule words and reproches he gaue vnto Aratus: who likewise replyed to him againe, bitterly taunting each other, that they came to talke of their mariage and wiues. After this letter, Cleomenes sent defyance by an Herald vnto the Achaians, and proclaimed open war against them: insomuch as he had almost gotten the citie of Sicyone by practise of traitors. Howbeit, failing of his purpose he returned sodainly, and went vnto the city of Pallena, which he tooke, and draue out the Generall of the Achaians thence, and immediatly after he wan the cities also of Phenea, & Pentelion. After that, the Argives and Phliasians willingly yeelded vnto him, so that of all that which the Achaians had conquered, and ioyned vnto their tribe, they could recken of nothing else of certainty vnto them. Then Aratus was maruellously troubled in his mind, to see all Peloponnesvs in tumult and vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by those that practised change and alteration. For no man was contented with the state and gouernment at that time, but diuerse of the Sicyonians and Corinthians both were bewrayed which had secretly practised with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the gouernement of the Achaians, desiring themselues to be Lords and Gouernors of their cities. Aratus hauing full commission and authoritie from the councell of the Achaians, to make inquirie of them, and to put thē to death, without further triall of law: he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faulty in the citie of Sicyone. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at Corinth, he made inquirie of them, and put them to death: whereby he made the common people very angrie with him, who otherwise of themselues were weary of the gouernment and subiection of the Achaians. The Corinthians therefore gathering together in the temple of Apollo, they sent for Aratus, intending to make him prisoner before they would openly enter into actuall rebellion. Aratus went thither, to shew that he neither feared nor mistrusted them, but yet he held his horse in his hand following of him. Then many rose vp against him, and did both reproue and iniuriously intreate him. But Aratus with stayed countenance and gentle words, prayed them to keepe their places, and not to crie out in such rage vpon their feete, and withall, caused them also to come in that were at the temple doore. But as he spake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backe out of the presse, as though he meant to haue giuen his horse to some bodie to hold. So being gotten out of the presse, he gently spake without any feare vnto the Corinthians he met, and bad thē go to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the castell, he then sodainely tooke his horse backe, and commaunded Cleopater, Captaine of the garrison of the Achaians there, to look wel to the safe keeping of the castell. Then he set spurres to his horse, and galloped towards the citie of Sicyone for life, being followed onely by thirty of his souldiers, all the rest hauing forsaken him, and dispersed themselues here and there. Shortly after, the Corinthians vnderstanding that Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could neuer ouertake him: whereupon they straight sent for king Cleomenes, and deliuered the citie of Corinth into his handes, the gaine whereof pleased him not so much, as he was sorie for the losse of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomenes ioyning vnto him all the people dwelling alongest the sea coast, commonly called the riuer of Corinth, who yeelded vp themselues, holdes and townes into his handes: he then intrenched in the castell of the Acrocorinth with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of Sicyone, many of the Achaians gathered about him, and holding a councell and assemblie, he was chosen their Lieutenant generall, hauing absolute power and authoritie to do what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to guard his person. So, he hauing managed the affairs of the state and commonwealth of the Achaians, the space of three and thirtie yeares together, and hauing all that time bene counted of all men the chiefest man of power and authoritie in Greece: he then found himselfe in poore estate, forsaken, and in great miserie, as in the shipwracke of his countrey beaten with storme, and in great daunger of himselfe. For when he sent vnto the Ætolians for aide, they flatly denyed him, and would send him none. Furthermore, the Athenians being very desirous to send aide for Aratus sake, were disswaded from it through the practise of Euclidas and Micion. Aratus also had a house in Corinth, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the first medled not withall, neither wold suffer any other to touch it, but sent for his friends and officers, and charged them to looke well to it, to giue Aratus a good account of it afterwardes. Furthermore, he priuately sent Tripylus vnto him, and his father in lawe Megistonus, and offered him great giftes, and specially cially an annual penſion of twelue talents, which was double as much as king Ptolomie gaue him, who ſent him yearely ſixe talents. Beſides, he only prayed the ACHAIANS, that they would make him their Lieutenant generall, and alſo that the garriſon in the caſtell of Acrocorinth, might be deuided in common betweene them. Aratus made anſwer, that he had no abſolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a deuiſe and excuſe of Aratus, he preſently inuaded the country of the SICYONIANS, and deſtroyed all as he came, and continued the ſpace of three moneths. Aratus in the meane time ſtood doubtfull how to determine, whether he ſhould receiue king Antigonus or not: becauſe Antigonus would not aide him, before he deliuered him the caſtell of the Acrocorinth into his hands. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the citie of ÆGIVM to conſult vpon it, they ſent for Aratus thither. Howbeit, it was daungerous comming thither, becauſe Cleomenes campe lay hard by the citie of SICYONE: beſides alſo that the citizens kept Aratus, and held him by force, ſaying, That they would not let him venture himſelfe in ſuch apparant danger, their enemies being ſo neare vnto them. Moreouer, the women and litle children hung about him, weeping, and compaſſing him about, as their common father and ſauiour. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be affraid, and ſo tooke his horſe, with ten of his friends and his ſonne (that was a young ſtripling growne) and went towards the ſea, and imbarked in certaine ſhips that rode at anker. Thence he ſailed vnto ÆGIVM, where the diet or parliament was kept: and there it was reſolued, that they ſhould ſend for Antigonus, and deliuer the caſtell of the Acrocorinth into his hands. And ſo it was performed: for Aratus ſent thither his owne ſonne among the other hoſtages. The CORINTHIANS were ſo ſore offended withall, that they made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his houſe he had in CORINTH vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwards on his way come into PELOPONNESVS with his army, bringing with him twentie thouſand footmen all MACEDONIANS, and foure hundred horſemen: Aratus with the greateſt ſtates and officers of the ACHAIANS, vnwitting to their enemies, went to meete him as farre as the citie of PEGES, hauing no great truſt nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembred very wel, that he came firſt to his greatneſſe, by the iniuries he had offered them: and how that the chiefeſt cauſe of his riſing, was the malice he bare vnto old Antigonus. Howbeit making vertue of neceſſitie, & weighing the inſtant occaſion of their preſent extremitie: (of Gouernors, to be driuen to be ſubiects) he put himſelfe in aduenture. So, when Antigonus was told that Aratus was come in perſon to him: hauing with good countenance after a common ſort ſaluted thoſe that came in his company: to Aratus ſelfe at his firſt comming he gaue him an honorable welcome and entertainement. Afterwardes alſo, finding him a good and diſcreete man, he fell into inward friendſhip and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely skilfull to giue direction in matters of ſtate touching good order and gouernment: but moreouer, his companie and conuerſation was very pleaſant, to entertaine a Princes leaſure with. Wherfore though Antigonus was but yong at that time, yet ſeeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and eſteemed about a Prince: he vſed his counſell and aduice more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely touching the affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS alſo. And ſo all things came to paſſe, which the gods had promiſed in their ſacrifices. For in a beaſt that was ſacrificed, there were two galles wrapped in one ſelf cawle: the which the Soothſayers interpreted did prognoſticate, that two which before were mortall enemies, ſhould now become aſſured friends. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did alſo giue any credite to the ſacrifices, but truſted rather to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwardes hauing good ſucceſſe, and Antigonus making a feaſt in the citie of CORINTH, where he had bidden many gueſts: he would needes haue Aratus lye vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commaunded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a cold. Aratus anſwered him, It freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neare him, and when the ſeruants brought a couerlet for the king, they caſt it ouer them both. Then Aratus remembring the ſacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the king what a wonder he had ſeene in the ſacrifice, & what interpretation the Soothſayers made of it. This was long after. So, Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the citie of PEGES, they were ſworne brethren together: and then went both with all ſpeed againſt the enemies. Thus there fell out hote skirmiſhes betweene them, hard by the citie of CORINTH. For Cleomenes was very well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valiantly defended themſelues. In the meane time, Ariſtoteles of ARGOS (Aratus friend) ſecretly ſent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came himselfe with any number of souldiers, Aratus told it vnto king Antigonus, who gaue him fifteene hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and passed ouer with great speede from the Isthmus (or barre in the straight) vnto the citie of EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit, the ARGIVES taried not Aratus comming, but were all vp before he came, and did set vpon king Cleomenes men, and had driuen them into the castell. Cleomenes being aduertised of it, and fearing least his enemies (keeping the citie of ARGOS) should cut off his way from returning into his countrey againe with safetie, if he were driuen to a straight: he forsooke the castell of the Acrocorinth, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the citie of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrew certaine of his enemies. But shortly after, Aratus and king Antigonus both being come thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driuen to flie to the citie of MANTINEA. After the recouerie againe of the citie of ARGOS, all the residue of the cities of PELOPONNESVS did againe returne to the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus tooke the castell of the Acrocorinth. So Aratus being chosen Generall by the ARGIVES, he counselled them to present Antigonus with all the tyrants goods, and those that had bene traitours to the common wealth. And after they had cruelly tormented the tyrant Aristomachus in the citie of CENCHREES, in the end they cast him into the sea, and drowned him. Aratus was maruellously reproued for his death, that would suffer the poore man to be so vilely handled, that was a good man; and one that had done him great pleasure: who through his perswasion willingly resigned vp his tyrannie, and deliuered the citie of ARGOS vnto the ACHAIANS. But besides this, they blamed him for many other things elsse: for that the ACHAIANS through his meanes had put the citie of CORINTH into Antigonus handes, as though it had bene some meane village: for that when they had sacked the citie of ORCHOMENE, they suffered him to place a garrison of the MACEDONIANS there: for that they had enacted by parliament, that they should neither write, nor send Ambassadours any whither, without Antigonus priuitie and consent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to giue pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made sacrifices, feastes, and games vnto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god, following the example of Aratus citizens, who were the first that began, and had receiued Antigonus into the citie by the perswasion of Aratus, that lodged and feasted him in his owne house. With all these faultes they burdened Aratus, and considered not, that after they had put the reynes of the gouernement into Antigonus hand, Aratus himselfe (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the swing of the vnbridled Prince, hauing no other meanes to stay it, but only the libertie of speech to admonish him: and that also was not to be exercised, without apparant and great danger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Aratus mind: as amongst others, that Antigonus caused the tyrants images of ARGOS to be set vp, which he had before pulled downe: and also that he made them to be onerthrowne, which Aratus had set vp for those that had taken the castell of CORINTH, and only left Aratus one statue, notwithstanding all the earnest intreatie Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no graunt of any thing he requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS dealt not so friendly with the MANTINEANS, as became GRECIANS one to another. For they hauing the citie in their hands by Antigonus meanes, did put all the noblest & chiefest men of MANTINEA to death, others they sold as slaues, and sent the rest into MACEDON with irons on their legges, and brought the poore women and children into bondage, and sold them for slaues: and of the mony they got by spoile, they deuided the third part among themselues, and left the other two parts vnto the MACEDONIANS. Now surely it cannot be said, but this was done for some cruell reuenge. For though it was an ouer-great crueltie, in rage and passion of mind, to handle people of one selfe bloud and language in this lamentable sort: yet Simonides saith, When men are driuen and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great stomackes enflamed with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwardes vnto the citie, no man can excuse Aratus, nor say, that he was either driuen to it by necessitie, or that he had otherwise any honest occasion to do it. For king Antigonus hauing giuen the citie of MANTINEA vnto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colonie, and chose Aratus their Generall: who made a decree, that thencefoorth the citie should no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTIGONIA, as it beareth name vnto this day. Thus it seemeth that gentle MENTINEA (for so the Poets called it) was vtterly destroyed, and bare the name of another citie through Aratus means, preferring the name of him that destroyed the citie, and did put all the inhabitaunts of the first to death. After that, king Cleomenes being ouerthrown in a great battel by the city of SELLASIA, he left left the citie of SPARTA, and fled into ÆGYPT. So Antigonus hauing vſed Aratus with all kind of honourable curteſie, he returned againe into MACEDON. There falling ſicke, he ſent Philip that ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome (being a yong ſtripling growne) into PELOPONNESVS, and ſtraightly charged him ſpecially to follow Aratus counſell, and to employ him when he would ſpeake vnto the cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus hauing receiued him in that ſort, made him ſo well affected and louing towards him, that he ſent him againe into MACEDON, being througly determined to make warres with GRECE. So after the death of Antigonus, the ÆTOLIANS began to deſpiſe the careleſneſſe and cowardlineſſe of the ACHAIANS (becauſe that they being acquainted to be defended by ſtraungers, and hauing bene altogether gouerned by the armies of the MACEDONIANS, they liued very idlely and diſſolutely) wherupon they tooke vpon them to make themſelues Lords of PELOPONNESVS. So they aſſembled an armie, and by the way as they went, they only tooke ſome prey & ſpoile vpon the lands of the PATRÆIANS, and the DYMÆIANS: but inuading the territorie of MESSINA with all their armie, they deſtroyed the whole country before them. Aratus being angry withall, and perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was General of the ACHAIANS) did ſtill tract and delay time in vaine, becauſe he was vpon his going out of his yere: he being appointed General for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fiue dayes before, to go and aide the MESSINIANS. Wherefore leauing an armie of the ACHAIANS, whoſe perſons were now neither exerciſed in armes, nor yet had any deſire to go to the warres: he was ouerthrowne by the citie of CAPHYES. Nowe, becauſe it was thought that he went ſomwhat too hotely and couragiouſly to the wars, he ſo extreamely cooled againe, and left things in ſuch caſe, that all hope being caſt aſide, he ſuffered the ÆTOLIANS in manner to treade PELOPONNESVS vnder their feet before his eyes, with all the inſolencie and crueltie that might be poſſible, notwithſtanding that they ſundrie times gaue him great aduantages of them. Thus were the ACHAIANS once againe forced to pray aide out of MACEDON, and to ſend for young king Philip to make warres in GRECE: hoping for the loue he bare vnto Aratus, and the great truſt he had in him, that he would vſe them gently, and do as they would haue him. But then firſt of all beganne Apelles, Megareus, and a fewe other Courtiers to accuſe Aratus: vnto whom King Philip giuing eaſie eare, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was choſen Generall by the ACHAIANS. Howbeit, this new Generall Epiratus being extreamely hated by the ACHAIANS, and Aratus alſo leauing to deale any more with matters of ſtate; no act was done to any purpoſe. Whereupon king Philip finding his fault, returned againe vnto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires proſpered in all things he went about, he then let him alone with all, as from whome came all his honour and greatneſſe. Thereupon euery man eſteemed Aratus a wiſe Gouernour, not onely to rule a Common-wealth, but alſo a whole Realme and kingdome. For his manners, intent, and chiefeſt purpoſe appeared, in the deedes of this young king, as a rich colour that did ſet foorth and beautifie them. For the clemencie this young Prince Philip vſed to the LACEDÆMONIANS, that had offended him, the great courteſie he ſhewed to the CRETANS, whereby in fewe daies he wanne all the Iſle of CRETA: and the iourney he made againſt the ÆTOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great exploite, wanne the Prince great fame, for following good councell, and Aratus accounted to be a wiſe Gouernour, and of deepe vnderſtanding. Nowe the kings flatterers enuying Aratus more then before, and perceiuing that they got no good by ſecret backe-biting of him: they then beganne with open mouth very inſolently to reuile him at the table, and with great deriſion: inſomuch as one night going home to his tent after ſupper, they pelted him with ſtones all the way as he went. King Philip when he knewe it, was ſo offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the ſumme of twentie talents: and afterwards alſo, becauſe they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philip in the end being puffed vp with the good fortune and ſucceſſe of this warre, which proſpered as he would haue it: he then grew to be couetous, and beganne to ſhewe his naughtie nature, and to bewray his diſſimulation wherewith he diſguiſed himſelfe: and by litle and litle to make his vices plainely to appeare. For firſt of all, he abuſed young Aratus wife, which was kept ſecret a long time, becauſe he lay in their houſe, and began daily to grow more ſeuere and cruell to the common weales: and then the world ſawe plainely, that he cared no more for Aratus. For the firſt ſuſpition and beginning of the miſtruſt he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at MESSINA. For the MESSINIANS being fallen together by the eares, and in great ciuill warres one with another

The Achaians ſent for king Philip Antigonus ſonne.

Aratus a wiſe counſeller. Enuie, the cõpanion of vertue.

The beginning of diſpleaſures betwixt Aratus & Philip.

Aratus went thither to make peace betweene them. Howbeit, king Philip came thither the next day following, and in ſteade of pacifying the quarrell, he ſet them further out together then they were before. Firſt, he asked the Gouernours of the citie, and if they had no lawes to bridle the inſolencie and ſtomacke of the common people, and priuately alſo talked with the heades of the faction of the people, and asked them if they had not handes to defend themſelues from tyrantes. So both the one and the other faction truſting to king Philip, the Gouernours would haue layed holde of the Oratours of the citie: but they riſing with the common people, ſlue of their Nobilitie and Magiſtrates, well neare two hundred of them. Aratus that came ſoone after this facte, ſhewed that he was greatly offended with King Philip, and cauſed his ſonne with open mouth ſhamefully to reprooue him. Nowe it ſeemed that this young Aratus was in loue with King Philippe before: but then he tolde him before all the people, that for this ſhamefull acte hee had done, he thought him nowe no more fayre of face, but the fowleſt creature that could be. Philippe made no aunſwere to it, although euery man looked he would haue aunſwered him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reprooued him, he bitte it in with his teethe: but as if he had not bene offended at all with the bigge wordes his ſonne had ſpoken againſt him, for that he was a ciuill man, and myld of nature, he tooke Aratus the father by the hand, and caryed him out of the Theater where the aſſemblie was kept, to the caſtell of Ithome, to do ſacrifice there to Iupiter, and to ſee the forte. This forte was of no leſſe ſtrength, then the caſtell of the Acrocorinth: and when any garriſon is in it, it keepeth all the countrey about it in obedience: and beſides it is very hard to driue them out of it. Nowe Philip being gotten vppe into that caſtell, he did ſacrifice there: and when the Soothſayer had brought him the intralles of the oxe which they had ſacrificed, he tooke it himſelfe with both his handes and ſhewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius PHALERIAN, nowe turning to the one, then vnto the other, and asked them what they iudged of theſe ſignes of the ſacrifice: whether he ſhould keepe the caſtell to himſelfe, or elſe deliuer it to the MESSINIANS. Demetrius ſmiling, aunſwered him: If thou beeſt of the Soothſayers mind, then thou ſhalt deliuer it vp: but if thou haſt a Kings minde in thee, thou ſhalt then hold the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he meant the country of PELOPONNESVS: & moreouer, that if he kept both theſe caſtels of Ithome, and the Acrocorinth, all PELOPONNESVS were wholy at his commandement.) Aratus ſtill held his peace, and ſaid not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to ſpeake, he ſaid: In CRETA, and in the countrie of the BOEOTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many ſtrong caſtels ſituated on high hils from the vallies. Moreouer, there are alſo many places of great ſtrength in the marches of the ACARNANIANS, both within maine land, as alſo vpon the ſea coaſt: of all the which thou haſt not taken one of them by force, and yet they all do willingly obey thee notwithſtanding. It is for theeues to hide their heades in high rockes and mountaines, but a King can haue no ſtronger caſtell, then the loue, faith, and goodwill of men. That is it, that opened the ſea of CRETA. That is it, that hath brought thee into PELOPONNESVS. Thoſe are the meanes which haue made thee being ſo young a man, ſome of them to chooſe thee their Captaine, and others alſo to make thee their abſolute Lord and Maiſter. Aratus going on with his tale, Philip gaue the intralles againe to the Soothſayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand (as if by force he had caſt him out of the caſtell, and had alſo taken the citie of MESSINA from him) ſayed vnto him: Come on then, let vs euen take that courſe. But after that time, Aratus came as litle to the court as might be, and ſo by little and litle left Philips companie. For when he went to make warre in the Realme of EPIRVS, he was earneſtly in hand with Aratus to goe that iourney vnto him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excuſed, and ſo remained at home, being affrayed to be brought into an euill name with Philips doings. For Philip afterwards hauing ſhamefully loſt his armie by ſea againſt the ROMAINES; and beſides, hauing had alſo very euill ſucceſſe in all other his affaires: he returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, and thought once more to haue deceiued the MESSINIANS. But when they found his practiſe, then he beganne with open force to ſpoile their countrey. Aratus then flatly fell out with Philip, and vtterly refuſed his friendſhip, for that he perceiued then the iniurie he had done his ſonnes wife, the which grieued him to the heart, but yet he made not his ſonne priuie to it: becauſe he could get no other amends, then to know what iniurie had bene done to him, conſidering that he had no waye nor meanes to be reuenged. For, king Philip was maruellouſly chaunged, and from a curteous and chaſt young Prince, become a vitious and cruell tyrant: the which to ſpeake truely, was not a chaunge or alteration in nature, but a manifeſt declaration (when he was no more afraid of any man) of his wicked and diueliſh mind, the which through feare had of long time bene kept ſecret. Now, to proue that Philips firſt loue & goodwill he bare vnto Aratus, was alſo mingled with feare & reuerence: that which he did afterwards vnto him did plainly ſhew it. For he being deſirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking himſelfe free ſo long as he liued, neither king, nor tyrant: he durſt not go about to kill him himſelfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, and commanded him to make him away as ſecretly as he could poſſible, & ſpecially with poyſon, in his abſence. This Taurion fell in friendſhip with Aratus, and poyſoned him with no violent poyſon, but ſo tempered and qualified it, as it did by litle and litle heate the body, and procure a prety coffe which brought him into a conſumption. Aratus knew he was poyſoned: but becauſe he ſaw it booted not to bewray it, he bare it patiently, and made no words of it, as if he had had ſome naturall diſeaſe about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefeſt friends being in his chamber with him, who wondred to ſee him ſpit bloud as he did: he told him, Friend Cæphalon mine, this is the reward of a kings loue. So he died of this poyſon in the city of Ægivm, being the ſeuenteenth time choſen General of the Achaians: who wold haue had him buried in the ſelfe ſame place, & haue made ſome honorable monument for him, worthy of his noble life. But the Sicyonians thinking themſelues diſhonored, if his body were buried any where elſe but in their owne city: they ſo perſwaded the councell of the Achaians, that they ſuffered them to take Aratus body with them. Yet was there an ancient law that forbad buriall within the wals of the city, of any manner of perſon whatſoeuer: and beſides that law, they had a certaine ſuperſtitious feare in them that made them they durſt not. Whereupon they ſent to Apolloes temple at Delphes, to aske counſell of his Nunne that gaue the Oracles; who made them this anſwer:

Aratus poyſoned by king Philips meanes.

A Kings friendſhip dangerous. The death of Aratus.

The Oracle for Aratus buriall.

Thou happie ſoile of Sicyon, Aratus natiue place,
Whereas thou askeſt counſell in that noble Captaines caſe,
For keeping of a yeare mind and for making feaſtfull dayes
In honor of that worthy wight, to laſt henceforth alwayes:
If any hinder your intent through fondneſſe or through ſpite,
Both ſea and land and heauen it ſelfe will puniſh that ſame wight.

This Oracle being brought, all the Achaians were maruellous glad of it, but the Sicyonians ſpecially: who preſently changing their mourning into publike ioy, they caried the body from the citie of Ægivm, and brought it home as in maner of proceſſion, in white robes, and garlands of flowers on their heads, ſinging hymnes and ſongs of ioy, and danſing, till they came to the citie of Sicyone. And there they choſe out the chiefeſt place, and buried him as their founder, father, and ſauiour of their city: and the place is called at this preſent time, Arativm. There they yearely make two ſolemne ſacrifices, the one the fift of Nouember, at which time he deliuered the city of Sicyone from tyranny, and they call this ſacrifice Soteria, as much to ſay, as The feaſt of health: and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the firſt ſacrifice, that was done by the Prieſt of Iupiter the ſauiour. The ſecond ſacrifice alſo was done by Aratus ſon, who was girt about with a cloth, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the ſacrifice, they ſong hymnes vpon the Harpe in praiſe of him, and the maiſter of the Muſitians made a proceſſion round about, being accompanied with boyes, and yong men of the citie, after whom followed the Senate crowned with garlands of flowers, and other citizens that were diſpoſed to go a proceſſion. Howbeit the moſt part of the honours that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left off by proceſſe of time, and change of things that followed afterwards. Thus you ſee what the life of Aratus the father hath bene, as we find in hiſtories. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, cauſed his ſon Aratus alſo to be poyſoned, not with a deadly poyſon, but with ſuch a poyſon as troubleth a mans wits ſo, that through their diueliſh receit, he becometh a ſtarke foole without any wit at all, & maketh him to attẽpt ſtrange and abhominable things, and to haue certaine ſhamefull and deteſtable deſires: inſomuch as his death (though he died in the prime of his youth) could not be thought miſerable, but rather a happy deliuerance to him of all his miſeries and miſhaps. But Philip afterwards, ſo long as he liued, payed vnto Iupiter (protector of all iuſtice and friendſhip) the puniſhment his wicked life deſerued. For, after he was ouercome in battell by the Romaines, he was compelled to yeeld himſelfe to their mercie; by whom he was depriued from all the reſt of his lands and dominions he had, and of all his ſhips, but fiue onely, and condemned beſides to pay a thouſand talents for a fine, and to giue his ſonne in hoſtage: and they onely left him for pities ſake, the kingdome of MACEDON, with all the appertenances. And there he daily putting to death the chiefeſt of his nobility, and neareſt of bloud vnto him: he filled his realme with cruelty and mortall hate againſt him. Furthermore, amongſt ſuch a heape of euils, hauing but one onely ioy, to haue a vertuous ſonne: he put him to death, for ſpite and malice that he ſaw the ROMAINES honor him, and left his other ſonne Perſeus ſucceſſor of his realme: who, as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten ſonne, but taken for his ſonne, and borne of a tailors wife called Gnathenium. It is that Perſeus, whom Paulus Æmylius ouercame and lead in triumph in ROME: and at him, the race of the kings diſcended from Antigonus, failed. THE LIFE OF Galba.

IPhicrates the ATHENIAN Captaine ſaid, that a mercenary ſouldier ſhould be couetous, a louer, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleaſure, he ſhould be the valianter, & readier to put himſelfe into any danger. But moſt men thinke, that ſouldiers ſhould be as one entire ſtrong body, that ſtirreth not of it ſelfe without the mouing of the Generall. And to approue this opinion, it is ſaid that Paulus Æmylius arriuing in MACEDON, & finding the ſouldiers full of words and curioſity (euery man medling with the affaires of the Generall) he made open proclamation, no man ſo hardy to meddle with his office and affaires; but euery man only to keepe his ſword ſharpe, & to be quicke of hand againſt the enemy: and for the reſt, to referre all to him, who would take ſufficient order for things of his charge and gouernment. Therfore Plato ſaith, that it litle preuaileth to haue a good and wiſe Captaine, if the ſouldiers alſo be not wiſe & obedient, thinking it as requiſite for the vertue of obedience, to haue men of a noble mind & good education, as otherwiſe it is meet for a Captaine to know how to direct & command wel, conſidering it is that which with lenity & mildneſſe doth mitigate all fury and choler: he hath diuerſe other examples and ſufficient proofes to proue his words true, and namely, the great miſeries and calamities which came to the ROMAINS after the death of Nero, do plainly ſhew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, thē a great army liuing licentiouſly & diſorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexander the Great, compared Alexanders army, vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: conſidering how blindly & looſely they

they were gouerned. Howbeit the Empire of ROME being deuided into ſundry factions at one ſelfe time,& riſing againſt it ſelfe in many places, it fell into the like misfortunes & calamities fained of the Poets by the TITANS: not ſo much through the ambitiouſneſſe of the Emperors,as by meanes of the couetouſneſſe and inſolency of the ſoldiers,who draue the Emperors out of their Imperiall ſeats one after another,as one naile driueth out another. And Dionyſius alſo the tyrant of SICILE, was wont to call Pheræus (who had bene onely tyrant of THESSALIE ten moneths ſpace) a tyrant in a play,deriding his ſo ſudden change of ſtate. But the Imperial houſe of the Cæſars at ROME receiued foure Emperours, in leſſe then ten moneths ſpace,the ſouldiers now putting in one,& then taking out another,as if they had bene in a play on a ſcaffold. So that the ROMAINES being thus grieuouſly oppreſſed,had yet this comfort: that they needed not to ſeeke to be reuenged of them that did oppreſſe them. For they ſaw one of them murther another, and him firſt and moſt iuſtly of all other murthered, that had firſt of all corrupted the ſouldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the change of Emperours: and ſo deprauing a worthy deed of it ſelfe, which was their forſaking of Nero: and mingling it with bribery, made it plaine treaſon. For Nymphidius Sabinus,being a Captaine of the Emperours guard, which are called the Prætorian ſouldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he ſaw Nero in diſpaire of himſelfe and of his eſtate, and that he was ready to flie into ÆGYPT: he perſwaded the guard they ſhould call Galba Emperor, as if Nero had not bene at ROME, but fled and gone, and promiſed euery one ſeuen thouſaud fiue hundred Drachmaes a peece: and to the reſt of the ſouldiers that were diſperſed vp and downe in garriſon vpon the prouinces,twelue hundred and fifty Drachmaes a man. For the leauying of which ſumme, they could not poſſibly do it, but they muſt needs commit ten thouſand times more extortion to euery body, then Nero had done. This large promiſe made them preſently put Nero to death, & ſhortly after him,Galba himſelfe alſo. For the ſouldiers forſooke Nero, for the hope they had to receiue this promiſed gift: and ſhortly after they ſlue the ſecond,which was Galba,becauſe they receiued not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards alſo, in ſeeking who ſhould ſtill feed them with like gifts, before they could obtaine their wiſhed hope,one of them deſtroyed another by treaſon & rebellion. But now to ſet downe all things particularly which hapned at that time, it were to write one whole entire hiſtory: and therefore, I will content my ſelfe, not to paſſe ouer with ſilence the notableſt deeds and lamentable calamities which happpned at that time vnto the Cæſars.

The hope of gifts deſtroyed the Empire of Rome.

It is manifeſtly known to all men,that Sulpitius Galba of a priuate man,was the richeſt & wealthieſt that came to be in the number of the Cæſars: who, though he came of a very noble houſe; deriuing himſelfe from the race & family of the Seruij: yet he was honored the more,becauſe he was a kin vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue & eſtimation, was one of the chiefeſt men of his time,albeit that otherwiſe,he willingly reſigned his authority and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was ſomewhat a kin vnto Liuia, the wife of Auguſtus Cæſar,and therefore for her ſake he came out of the Emperors pallace,whē he went to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhip. Moreouer, it is reported,that whē he had charge of the army in GERMANY,he did valiantly behaue himſelf. And in the gouernment of LYBIA alſo, where he was Viceconſull, he did as honorably behaue himſelfe,as any man whatſoeuer. Howbeit his meane and ſimple ordinary of diet, voide of all exceſſe, was reputed miſery and niggardlineſſe in him, when he was proclamed Emperor: becauſe the praiſe of ſober & temperate diet which he wold haue brought in vſe, was then ſo raw a thing, that it was taken for a new & ſtrange deuice. He was ſent gouernour alſo into SPAINE by Nero,before he had learned to be afraid of the citizens of great authority: howbeit,beſides that he was of a curteous & gentle nature,his age moreouer increaſed the opinion they had of him, that he was timerous & fearfull. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe & torment the prouinces, & that it lay not in Galba any way to helpe them: yet was it ſome cōfort to them, which were iudged & ſold as ſlaues by the officers, to ſee that Galba did lament the miſeries and calamities they endured, as if they had bene done vnto himſelfe. So when any ſlanderous rimes were made againſt Nero, which were ſong vp and downe in euery place,he would neither forbid them,nor yet was offended,as Neroes officers were. Therefore he was maruellouſly beloued in the country, with them that were acquainted with him: becauſe he was then in the eight yeare of his gouernment as Proconſull amongſt them, at which time Iunius Vindex being Proprætor of GAVLE,rebelled againſt Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred into open action of rebellion. But Galba, did neither beleeue him,nor alſo accuſe & bewray him, as diuerſe others which were gouernors of armies & prouinces did: who ſent Vindex letters vnto Nero which he himſelfe had written vnto them, and ſo did as much as in them lay to hinder the enterpriſe, who afterwards being of the conſpiracy did cõfeſſe they were traytors to themſelues, as much as vnto him. Howbeit, when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed open war againſt Nero, he wrote againe vnto Galba, & prayed him to take the Imperiall crowne vpon him, & to become the head of a ſtrong and mighty body (which were the GAVLES) that lacked nothing but a head and gouernor, being a hundred thouſand fighting men ready armed, & might alſo leauie a great number more of them. Then Galba conſulted thereupon with his friends, & among them ſome were of opinion that he ſhould ſtay a while, to ſee what change and alteration would grow at ROME vpon this ſtirre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, ſaid vnto him: O Galba, what meaneth this ſo doubtful a deliberatiõ? Be not we wiſe men to call in queſtion, whether we ſhall allow of Vindex friendſhip, or accuſe him; yea, and with armes perſecute him, that deſired rather to haue the Emperor, then Nero tyrant ouer the eſtate of ROME? Afterwards Galba by bils ſet vp euery where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchize ſuch as would make ſute for it. This rumor flying ſtraight abroad, he gathered a great number of ſouldiers together, that were very willing to rebell: & he was no ſooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of ſtate, but all the ſoldiers did ſalute him, by the name of Emperor. Howbeit he was not cõtent with this name at the firſt, but accuſing Nero, and lamenting the deaths of the nobleſt men whom he had cruelly put to death: he promiſed that he would imploy his beſt wit and diſcretion to the ſeruice & benefit of his countrey, neither naming himſelfe Cæſar, nor Emperour, but onely Lieutenant to the Senate, and ſtate of ROME. Now, that Vindex did wiſely to call Galba to be Emperor, Nero himſelfe in his doings doth witneſſe it. Who hauing alwayes made a countenance as though he paſſed not for Vindex, & that he waighed not the rebelliõ of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperor, he being then at ſupper, for ſpite he ouerthrew the table. Moreouer, though the Senate had iudged Galba an enemy, yet Nero to be pleaſant with his friends, made as though he was nothing afraid of it, & ſayd, this newes made all for him, becauſe he ſtood in need of mony, and alſo that it was a happy occaſion offered him to helpe him withall. For ſayd he, we ſhal ſoone haue all the GAVLES goods, as the ſpoile of a iuſt war, after we haue once againe ouercome & conquered them: and moreouer, Galbaes goods alſo would quickly be in his hands, that he might ſell them, conſidering that he was become his open enemy. So he preſently commanded Galbaes goods ſhould be openly ſold, to them that would giue moſt. Galba vnderſtanding that, did alſo by ſound of trumpet ſell all Neroes goods he had in all the prouince of SPAINE, and did alſo find more men readier to buy, then there were goods to ſel. Daily men roſe againſt Nero in euery country, who tooke Galbaes part, Clodius Macer only excepted in AFRICK, & Verginius Rufus in GAVLE, both of them hauing charge of legions appointed for the ſafe keeping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow ſeuerall directions by themſelues, varying in mind & intent. For Clodius Macer hauing robbed much, & put diuerſe men alſo to death through his cruelty and couetouſneſſe: he ſhewed plainly, that he ſwam betweene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, nor yet keepe it. Verginius alſo on the other ſide, being generall ouer great and mighty legions, who had ſundry times called him Emperor, & did in maner force him to take vpon him the name & Empire: he notwithſtanding did euer anſwer them, that he neither minded to take the Empire vpon him, nor yet to ſuffer any other to do it, then ſuch as the Senate ſhould chuſe and call vnto the ſame. This at the firſt ſomewhat amazed Galba. But when both the armies of Vindex and Verginius, in ſpite of their Captaines (who could not ſtay nor keepe them backe, no more then coach-men can keep backe the horſe with their bridles) were ioyned in a great battell together, where were ſlaine 20000 GAVLES in the field, and Vindex alſo ſlue himſelfe ſhortly after: it was giuen out, that the conquerors after ſo great a victory obtained, would compell Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperour, or elſe that they would take Neroes part againe. Then Galba being not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perſwaded him to ioyne with him, to hold vp the Empire & liberty of the ROMAINS, and thereupon fled ſtraight into a city of SPAINE called* COLONIA, rather repenting him of that he had done, & wiſhing for his wonted peaceable and quiet life wherwith he was brought vp: then otherwiſe occupying himſelfe about any neceſſary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterpriſe. Now it was about the beginning of ſommer, & one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of his ſlaues enfranchiſed, a SICILIAN borne, that was come from ROME in ſeuen daies: who vnderſtanding that Galba was alone, went went presently to his chāber doore & opened it,& cōming in against the wils of the groomes of the camber that stood at the doore, he told him that Nero being yet aliue, but seene no more, first the people of Rome, & then the Senate, had proclaimed him Emperor,& that immediatly after,news came that Nero was dead: the which he hardly beleeuing notwithstāding,wēt thither himself,saw his body layd out vpō the ground,& thē made towards him with all speed to bring him these news. The news maruellously reuiued Galba,& a multitude of men thronged straight about his doore,which began to be coragious,seeing him lively again,although the speed of the messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two daies after,Titus also arriued,with certaine others of the campe,who told Galba particularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalfe. So,this Titus was called to great honor: and the slaue enfranchised had priuiledge giuen him to weare rings of gold,& he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the enfrāchised bondmē,became the chiefest man about his master Galba. In the meane time, Nymphidius Sabine begā at Rome, not couertly,but with open force,to take vpon him the absolute gouernmēt of the Empire, perswading himselfe that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought in a litter vnto Rome, being at the least 73 yeares old: besides also, that the army of the Prætorians which were in Rome,did beare him goodwill of long time,& thē acknowledged none other Lord but him only,for the large promise he had made them,for the which he receiued the thanks,& Galba remained the debter. So he presently commanded Tigellinus,his companion & Captaine with him of the army of the Prætorians,to leaue off his sword: and disposing himselfe to banquetting and feasting,he sent for all those that had bene Consuls,Prætors,or Proconsuls of prouinces,& made them all to be inuited in the name of Galba. So,there were certaine souldiers gaue out this rumor in the campe, that they should do well to send Ambassadors vnto Galba, to pray him that Nymphidius might be their only Captaine still,without any cōpanion ioyned with him. Furthermore, the honor & goodwill the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, & going daily to visite him in his house,procuring him to be author of all their decrees passed in Senate, & that he should authorise them: this made him high minded, and the bolder by much;in so much that shortly after,they that came to honor him in this sort, did not onely hate and mislike his doings, but moreouer he made them afraid of him. Furthermore,when the Consuls had giuen to common pursuants any commissions vnder seale,or letters pattents signifying the decrees of the Senate,to cary them to the Emperour(by vertue of which letters pattents, when the officers of the city do see the seale, they straight prouide the pursuants of coaches and fresh horses to further their speed and hasty iourney:) Nymphidius was very angry with them,because they did not also come to hime for his letters, sealed by him and his souldiers, to send likewise to the Emperour. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to haue deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing themselues vnto him, and crauing pardon, did appease his anger. And to please the commons also, he suffered them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could meet withall. Among other, they slue a fencer called Spicillus,whom they put vnder Neroes statues, which they dragged vp and downe the citie. Another also called Aponius,one of Neroes accusers, they threw him to the ground, and draue carts ouer him loden with stones. And diuerse others also, whom they slue in that maner: of the which some had done no manner of offence. Hereupon one Mauriscus, one of the noblest men of the citie and so esteemed, sayd openly in the Senate: I feare me we shall wish for Nero againe, before it be long. So Nymphidius being come in maner to the fulnesse of his hope: he was very glad to heare that some repined at him, because he was the sonne of Caius Cæsar,that was the next Emperour after Tiberius. For this Caius Cæsar, when he was a yong man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bene a faire yong woman, and the daughter of one Callistus,one of Cæsars enfranchised bondmen,whom he had gotten of a laundres he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Cæsar could know his mother: and men thought that he was begotten by a fencer called Martianus, with whom his mother Nymphidia fell in fancie,for that he had a great name at that time in Rome;and indeed Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor,then vnto any other. So, he confessed that he was the son this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascribe the glory of the death of Nero vnto himselfe,& thought himselfe not sufficiently recompenced with the honors they gaue him, neither also with the goods he enioyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus whom Nero loued so dearly, whom he sent for to Neroes funerals whilest his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife,and called him Poppæus. Furthermore,all this did not content him, but yet ſecretly he aſpired to be Emperor, partly practiſing the matter in Rome it ſelfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were ſecretly his friends: and partly alſo through one Gellianus, whom he ſent into Spaine, to ſee how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things proſpered with Galba, ſauing Verginius Rufus only, who ſtood doubtfull yet, & made him ſorely miſtruſt him, for that he was afraid (beſides that he was Generall ouer a great and puiſſant army, hauing alſo newly ouerthrowne Vindex, & ſecretly ruling the beſt part of the Empire of Rome, which was all Gavle, and then in tumult and vprore, ready to rebell) leſt he would harken vnto them that perſwaded him to take the Empire to himſelfe. For there was no Captaine of Rome at that time ſo famous, and of ſo great eſtimation as Verginius, and that deſeruedly, for that he had done great ſeruice to the Empire of Rome in time of extremitie, hauing deliuered Rome at one ſelfe time from a cruell tyrannie, and alſo from the danger of the warres of the Gavles. This notwithſtanding, Verginius perſiſting ſtill in his firſt determination, referred the election of the Emperor vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly knowne, the common ſort of ſouldiers were earneſtly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the ſouldiers (otherwiſe called a Colonell of a thouſand men) went into his tent with a ſword drawne in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, or elſe to looke to haue the ſword thruſt into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, captaine of a legion, was ſworne vnto Galba, & that he had receiued letters from Rome, aduertiſing him of the ordinance and decree of the Senate: in the end, with much ado, he perſwaded the ſouldiers to proclaime Galba Emperor, who ſent Flaccus Ordeonius to ſucceed him, vnto whom he willingly gaue place. So, when Verginius had deliuered vp his army vnto him, he went to meet with Galba, on whom he waited, comming on ſtill towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither ſhewed him euill countenance, nor yet greatly eſteemed of him, Galba himſelfe being cauſe of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but ſpecially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius, thinking to hinder his riſing, did vnwittingly indeed further his good hap, and deliuered him occaſion to draw him out of the ciuill warres and miſchiefes (the which lighted afterwards vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambaſſadors were ſent from the Senate, & met with Galba at Narbona, a city of Gavle: where after they had preſented their humble duty, they perſwaded him to make all the haſt he could poſſible to ſhew himſelfe to the people of Rome, who were maruellous deſirous to ſee him. Galba receiued them very gratiouſly & curteouſly, & made them great cheare, howbeit very modeſtly notwithſtanding. For notwithſtanding that Nymphidius had ſent him diuerſe officers, and ſtore of Neroes mouables: yet he would neuer be ſerued with any of them, at any feaſts or banquets he made, with other then his owne ſtuffe, wherein he ſhewed his noble mind, and how he could maiſter all vanity. But Titus Iunius ſhortly after told Galba, that this noble mind & ciuill moderation, without pride or pompe, was too lowly a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine reſpect of honeſty that knew not it ſelfe, and became not his greatneſſe and maieſtie. So, he perſwaded him to vſe Neroes mony and ſtuffe, and to be ſumptuous & Princely in his feaſts, without niggardlineſſe. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainely to ſhew, that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who aboue all other was extreme couetous, and beſides too much giuen to women. For when he was a yong man, the firſt time he went to the warres vnder Caluiſius Sabine, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good fellowſhip) diſguiſed like a ſouldier into the campe, into his Generals tent (which the Romaines called Principia) and there was ſomewhat bold with her: Wherefore Caius Cæſar committed him to priſon, but he eſcaped at his death. Another time, when he ſupped with Clodius Cæſar, he ſtole a ſiluer pot. Clodius hearing of it, bad him againe to ſupper the next night: but he commanded his men they ſhould giue him drinke in an earthen cruſe. Thus this theft (through Cæſars pleaſantneſſe) ſeemed rather a matter of ſport, then of anger: howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extreme couetouſneſſe of money (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the ſway about him) gaue vnto ſome iuſt cauſe, and vnto others apparant colour of tragicall miſchiefes, and grieuous calamities. For Nymphidius, ſo ſoone as Gellianus was returned out of Spaine, whom he had ſent thither to ſee what Galba did: he enforming him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the guard and houſe of the Emperor, and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could neuer be ſuffered to come neare Galba, nor to ſpeake with him apart, becauſe thoſe which were about Galba did miſtruſt him, and euer had an eye to him to ſee what he did; he was maruellouſly perplexed perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and petie Captaines of the campe of the Prætorian armie, and perſwaded them that Galba touching his owne perſon, was a good old and diſcreete man, howbeit that he did not follow his owne aduiſe and counſell, but was ruled altogether by Iunius and Lacon, who marred all: and therfore, that it were good (before they came to be of greater power, and to haue ſuch great authoritie in managing the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before) to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Emperour in the name of all the camp, to tell him that in putting thoſe two men from about him, he ſhould be the better welcome vnto ROME, and to all men elſe beſides. The Captaines vtterly miſliked this deuiſe. For they thought it too ſtrange, and beyond all reaſon, to ſeeme to teach an old Emperour, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: and to appoint him what ſeruants and friends he ſhould keepe, and whom he ſhould truſt or miſtruſt. Nymphidius perceiuing this, tooke another courſe, and wrote letters vnto Galba to terrifie him; one time ſending him word that he was maruellous euill beloued of many in ROME, and that they were readie to rebell againſt him: another time alſo, that the legions of GERMANIE were reuolted, and that he vnderſtood the like from the legions of IVRIE and SYRIA: and another time alſo that Clodius Macer in AFRICKE ſtayed all the ſhips fraughted with corne that were bound for ROME. But in the end, finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings: he determined firſt of all to ſet vpon him. Howbeit Clodius Celſus, borne in the citie of ANTIOCH, a wiſe man, and his faithfull friend, diſſwaded him maruellouſly not to do it: declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one houſe nor family in ROME that would call Nymphidius, Cæſar. Howbeit in contrarie manner, diuers others mocked Galba, and ſpecially one Mithridates of the Realme of PONT, that ſaid he was a bald writhen man. For the ROMAINES (ſaid he) haue him indeed now in ſome eſtimation: but when they haue once ſeene him, they wil thinke it a perpetuall ſhame and reproch to our time, that he was called Cæſar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about midnight into the camp, and there openly to proclaime him Emperor. Howbeit the chiefe Tribune of the ſouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his ſouldiers together in the night, and before them all did firſt openly reproue himſelfe, and then them, for that they had ſo often turned and changed in ſo ſhort time, without any wit or diſcretion, hauing no iudgement to chuſe the beſt way, but to be pricked forward and caried headlong in that ſort by ſome wicked ſpirit, which brought them out of one treaſon into another. And yet (ſaid he) our firſt change had ſome countenance of reaſon, to wit, the horrible vices and faults of Nero: but now wherein can we accuſe Galba, to haue any countenance to falſifie our faith vnto him? hath he ſlaine his mother? hath he put her to death? hath he ſhamefully played the tumbler or common player vpon a ſcaffold in the Theater? And yet for all theſe vile parts, we neuer durſt once begin to forſake Nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius words, who told vs that Nero had firſt forſaken vs, and that he was fled into ÆGYPT. What ſhall we do? ſhall we kill Galba after Nero? what, ſhall we kill him that is akin vnto Liuia, to make the ſonne of Nymphidia Emperor, as we haue alreadie ſlaine the ſonne of Agrippina? or ſhall we rather kill him that hath raſhly entred into this enterpriſe, and thereby to reuenge the death of Nero, and to ſhew our ſelues faithfull ſouldiers vnto Galba? All the ſouldiers yeelded ſtraight to the Colonels words, and therewith went to their other companions to perſwade them to keepe their faith and promiſe they auowed vnto the Emperor: ſo that they made many of them reuolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereupon the noiſe and cries being great, Nymphidius ſuppoſing (as ſome thought) that the ſouldiers did call for him, or elſe hoping betimes to quench this tumult, to ſtay ſuch as were yet wauering: he went thither himſelfe with great ſtore of torch-light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without book to ſpeake vnto the ſoldiers. But when he found the gates of the camp ſhut, and ſaw diuers men armed vpon the wals, he began to be afraid: and comming nearer, asked them what they meant by it, and by whoſe commandement they had armed themſelues as they did. Anſwer was made him by them al, that they did acknowledge no other Emperor but Galba: the which he ſeemed to like of, and alſo commaunded them that followed him to do the like, and therewithall drew nearer. Wherupon certaine of the ſouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and ſuffered him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit as ſoone as he was come in, firſt there was a dart throwne at him, the which one Septimius that went before him receiued vpon his ſhield: and then others alſo came with their ſwords drawne in their hands to ſet on him, and followed him as he fled into a ſouldiers cabine, where they ſlue him.

Then they layed his bodie in an open place, and railed it about, that euery man that would, might the next day see it. So Nymphidius being slaine in this sort, Galba vnderstanding of his death, commanded that all Nymphidius friends and confederators that had not bin slaine at that time, should for his sake be put to death, as indeed they were. Amongst them they slue Ciconius that had made the oration for Nymphidius, and Mithridates also of PONT. Howbeit, though indeed they had deserued it, yet men thought it a very cruell part to commaund these men to be put to death in that sort, which were men of such qualitie and calling as they were, without due forme and order of law. For euery man stood in good hope vpon the comming in of this new Emperour, to haue seene another manner of gouernement, then they had yet seene: howbeit they were deceiued of their hope at the first chop. But yet they misliked this most of all, when he commaunded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had bene Consull, because he was Neroes faithfull friend. But now for the death of Clodius Macer, whom Trebonianus slue in AFRICKE by his commandement, and for Fonteius that was also slaine in GERMANIE by Valens: he had some reason to feare them, because they were in armes, and commanded great armies. But for Tertullianus that was an old man, naked and vnarmed: truly he should haue put him to his triall by law, if he would haue ministred iustice, the which he promised to keepe at his first comming to the Imperial crowne. Herein they greatly reproued Galba. Now when he drew neare to ROME within fiue and twentie furlongs, he was compassed about with a multitude of mariners and sea-faring men, that kept the high way on euery side, wandring vp and down in euery place. These were the men whom Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the oare and made them souldiers. So they were come thither to be suters to him, that he would allow them still to be souldiers, and they so pressed arrogantly vpon him, that they would not suffer those which came to the new Emperor, to see him nor speake with him: but they fel to tumult and vprore, crying out to haue ensignes for their legion, and to be appointed a place to lie in, in garrison. Galba referred them ouer to another time, and bad them they should then let him vnderstand their demaund. They told him againe, that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thereupon fell to plaine mutinie, and followed him with great cries: insomuch that some of them stucke not to draw out their swords. Then Galba commaunded the horsemen he had about him, to set vpon them. So there was not a man of them that resisted, but some of them were ouerthrowne, and troden vnder their horse feete: and others also slaine as they fled. This was a very euill signe and presage for him, to enter into ROME with such bloudshed, vpon so many poore dead mens bodies, as lay slaine on the ground. Howbeit, where some before did despise and mocke him for an old feeble man, euery man then was afraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, because he would shew a great change and alteration from the vnreasonable vaine gifts and expences of Nero: it seemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Canus an excellent plaier on the recorder, had plaid al supper time, because it was a maruellous sweet musick to heare: he praised and commended it maruellously, and commanded one to bring him his casket, out of the which he tooke a few crownes, and put them into his hand, saying; that it was not mony of the common treasure, but of his owne. Furthermore, he gaue straight commaundement that they should require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had giuen and bestowed vpon common players, minstrels, wrestlers, and people of such kind of facultie and profession, and to leaue them onely the tenth part. But he got litle by this deuise. For the most part of those that had gifts giuen them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that liue without any rule or order, and spent at night that which they get in the day: and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them restore it againe. But this was an endlesse worke, for things had bene so conueyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinit number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonor returned to Galba himselfe, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who only made the Emperour straight laced to all others, whilest he himself tooke vnreasonably of all men, making port-sale of euery thing that came to hand. For Hesiodus the Poet saith:

Cornelius Tacitus calleth him Turpilianus.

Galba entred Rome with murther.

The vilenesse of Galba.

As well when the vessell is full that it spill,
As when it is emptie, thirst craueth drinke still.

Hesiodus saying.

But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be old and feeble, would wisely take his fortune and time while time serued, supposing it almost to be at an end, so soone as he began to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much dishonour the poore old man, ouer-greatly abusing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefest and weightiest matters, in reprouing, or altogether hindring those,

the which the Prince himselfe had a good desire to deale vprightly in, as to punish the officers of Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruellously reioyced, and cried out as they went to execution through the market place, that it was a goodly and blessed procession, and required Tigellinus of the gods and men, that had bene chiefe maister and guide of all Neroes tyrannie. Howbeit the trim man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Iunius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, and had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of his wicked parts he played when he was aliue. Whereas he that made Nero worthy of death, and that afterwards had also betrayed him: he was left alone, and nothing said vnto him, being a manifest proofe to all others, that they should not doubt to hope to obtaine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, so they fed him with gifts. For the common people of Rome neuer desired thing so much, as to see Tigellinus to be caried to execution: and they neuer left crying out to demaund him in all assemblies of the Theater or shew place, vntill such time as the Emperor Galba did forbid them by proclamation, the which declared that Tigellinus would not liue long, because he was sick of a consumption of the lungs, which by litle and litle did weare him to nothing: and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloudie. The people were much offended with this, but yet they seemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did sacrifice to the gods for his health and safetie, and prepared a sumptuous feast. Where Iunius rising from supper, being set by the Emperour, went vnto Tigellinus to be merrie with him, and tooke his daughter being a widow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offered her a gift of fiue and twentie Myriades of siluer: and commaunded one of his chiefest concubines to take a carcanet from her necke she wore, and to giue it the other, being worth fifteene Myriades. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done vprightly and with iustice, were reproued and taken in euill part: as the thing that was graunted to the Gavles, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the subsidies and taxes they were wont to pay, nor that they were made free of Rome, so much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the souldiers still liued in good hope, for the gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promised them, they should yet enioy as much as Nero had giuen them. But Galba vnderstanding that they complained of him, he spake a word meet for so noble and worthy a Prince as he was: that he vsed to chuse souldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the souldiers, it bred a maruellous mortall hatred in them against him: because they thought it was not only to take the gift away from them which they hoped presently to haue receiued, but that it was also a president to teach the Emperors that should come after him, what they should do. Howbeit the rebelling minds of the Prætorian guard at Rome appeared not yet, but was secretly kept in for the reuerence they bare vnto the maiesty and person of Galba, who kept them that were desirous to rebell, because they saw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did somewhat smother and keep in the shew of their wicked intent. But they which had before serued vnder Verginius, and were at that time vnder Flaccus in Germanie, thinking themselues worthy of great reward for the battell they had won against Vindex, and hauing nothing giuen them in recompence: they would not be pleased with any thing their Captaine said vnto them, neither did they make any account of Flaccus, because he could not stirre himselfe, he was so plagued with the gout, and besides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine sports were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonels and Captains (according to the maner of the Romaines) made praiers vnto the gods for the health & prosperitie of the Emperor Galba: there were diuers of them that made a noise at the first, and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their prayers, in the end the soldiers answered: If he be worthy. The legions in like maner vnder Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vse such insolent parts: whereof Galbaes officers did aduertise him by letters. Wherfore Galba being afraid, and mistrusting that they did not only despise him for his age, but also because he had no children: he determined to adopt some yong gentleman for his son, of the noblest house of the citie of Rome, and to proclaime him his successor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but euer giuen to sensualitie and pleasure from his cradle, as much as any Romaine could be. And as Homer oftentimes doth cal Paris the husbād of the faire Helen, naming him by the name of his wife, becauſe he had no other commendable vertue in him: euen ſo Otho came to be knowne in Rome, by marying Poppæa, whom Nero loued when ſhe was Criſpinus wife: howbeit, bearing ſome reſpect to his wife, and being affraid alſo of his mother, he had intiſed Otho to be his baud vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearely, and much delighted in his companie, becauſe he was ſo good a fellow and free of his fleſh: and was very glad ſometime to heare how he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was nointing himſelfe with precious oyles and perfumes, he caſt a litle vpon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feaſt in his houſe, where ſodainy were thruſt into the hall, diuers veſſels of gold and ſiluer full of this perfumed oile, that ran out of them like conduit water, & did wet all the hall. So Otho hauing firſt poſſeſſed Poppæa, and abuſed her vnder hope of Neroes loue: he perſwaded her to be diuorced from her husband. The which ſhe did, and he receiued her home to his owne houſe, as his lawfull wife: not being ſo well pleaſed to haue part, as he was ſorie and angrie alſo to let another enioy her. Now Poppæa her ſelfe (as it is reported) did not miſlike this his iealouſie, for ſometimes ſhe would ſhut her doore againſt Nero, though Otho were not within: either becauſe ſhe would keepe Nero in breath, and in loue-liking ſtill, or elſe as ſome thought, becauſe ſhe would not haue Cæſar to her husband; and likewiſe that ſhe would not refuſe him for her friend, becauſe ſhe was wantonly giuen. But ſo it is, Otho was in danger of his life by marying of Poppæa: and ſo was it alſo a ſtrange thing, that Nero hauing put his wife and ſiſter to death, only to mary Poppæa, he did yet pardon Otho, and ſaued his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes ſake that was his friend, through whoſe perſwaſion he was ſent to the fartheſt part in Spaine alongſt the Ocean ſea, to be Gouernor of Lvsitania. And there he gouerned ſo wiſely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troubleſome vnto the countrie: knowing that this honorable charge was giuen him, only to mitigate and hide his baniſhment. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the firſt of all the Gouernors of the prouinces that ioyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both gold and ſiluer, vnto the mynt maiſter, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and ſo to be conuerted into currant coine. Moreouer, he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, thoſe which he thought the meeteſt men to ſerue a Prince: and otherwiſe when he was tried, he ſhewed himſelfe as faithfull and skilfull in matters of ſtate, as any one that followed the Emperors traine. Inſomuch as all the way he went many dayes iorney in coach with Galba himſelf, and did maruellouſly curry fauor with Titus Iunius, beſtowing great gifts vpon him, and alſo entertaining him with pleaſant ſpeeches: but ſpecially, becauſe he willingly gaue him the vpper hand, whereby he was aſſured to be the ſecond perſon in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Iunius, for that he granted mens ſutes frankly and freely without one penie taking, and was beſides eaſie to be ſpoken with of euery mã that had any ſute to him: but ſpecially of the ſouldiers, whom he did greatly help and further, and cauſed diuers alſo to be called to honourable office, he himſelfe partly mouing the Emperor for them, without any labour or ſute made vnto him, and partly alſo obteining them at Iunius hands, and of the two infranchiſed bondmẽ of Galba, Icellus, and Aſiaticus. For theſe three men did beare all the ſway and credit about the Emperour in the court. Moreouer, alwaies when he inuited the Emperor to his houſe, he bribed the Prætorian guard that waited vpon him, and gaue euery ſouldier a crowne. Now this in ſight, ſeemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with: though indeed it was a fine deuiſe to ouerthrow him, to bribe the ſouldiers in that ſort as he did. So Galba conſulting whom he ſhould make his ſucceſſor: T. Iunius preferred Otho vnto him: the which he did not ſimply of himſelf, nor without reward, but only with promiſe that Otho ſhould mary his daughter, if Galba did adopt him his ſon, and proclaime him ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit, Galba did alway ſpecially regard the common wealth before his priuate liking, and ſought to adopt ſuch a one, as ſhould not ſo much pleaſe himſelfe, as otherwiſe ſhould be profitable and meet for the Empire. But ſurely in my opiniõ, Galba would not make Otho his heire of his goods, conſidering what an vnreaſonable ſpender he was, and how ſumptuous in all his things, and beſides, far gone in debt: for he ought aboue fiue thouſand Myriades. So when he had heard Iunius counſel about this adoption, he gently without other anſwer, did put ouer his determination vntil another time, and made Otho only Conſul at that time, and T. Iunius Conſul with him: whereby it was ſtraight ſuppoſed, that at the beginning of the new yeare, he would proclaime him his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Which was the thing the ſouldiers moſt deſired of all other. But now, delaying ſtill his determination, the legions of the Romaines in Germany, did riſe and rebell againſt him all at an inſtant. For he was generally hated of all his ſouldiers, becauſe he paid them not

not the gift he had promiſed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alleaged for their cauſe of riſing, that he had diſhonourably reiected Verginius Rufus: and that the GAVLES which had fought againſt them, were rewarded with great and rich priuiledges, and they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuouſly puniſhed and put to death. Moreouer, that Galba did onely honour Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his good will vnto him, offering publike oblations and funerall ſacrifices for him, as if by him onely he had bene proclaimed Emperour. Now ſuch ſpeeches and rumors ran through the camp amongſt them, when the firſt day of the yeare came, which the ROMAINES call the calends of Ianuary, on which day when Flaccus had called the ſouldiers together, to ſweare them to the Emperour according to the cuſtome: they plucked downe Galbaes images, and ſware onely in the name of the people and Senate of ROME. The Captaines ſeeing what courſe they tooke, were as much afraid of the danger to be without a head, as they ſtood doubtfull of the miſchiefe of their rebellion. So there ſtept vp one amongſt them and ſaid: My fellowes in armes, what do we meane? we neither chuſe any other Emperor, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperor at this preſent: whereby we ſhew plainly, that we do not onely refuſe Galba, but alſo all other to be our head and Emperor that may command vs. Now for Flaccus Ordeonius, that is but Galbaes ſhadow and image: I would wiſh we ſhould let him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, Gouernor of the lower GERMANY, he is not farre from vs, but one daies iorney onely, whoſe father was Cenſor at ROME, and thrice alſo Conſull, and that was in a maner a Peere and companion of Clodius Cæſar in the gouernement of the Empire: whoſe pouertie if any man miſlike in him, is a manifeſt proofe of his goodnes and magnanimitie. Him therefore let vs chuſe, and let the world know that we can tell how to chuſe an Emperour, better then the SPANIARDS or LVSITANIANS. Some of the ſouldiers that ſtood by, confirmed theſe words, but others alſo miſliked of them: inſomuch that among the reſt there was an enſigne-bearer that ſtale ſecretly out of the campe to carie Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great ſupper, and had great ſtore of good companie with him. Theſe news running ſtraight through his campe, Fabius Valens Colonell of a legion, came the next morning with a great number of horſemen, and was the firſt man that named Vitellius Emperor, who before ſeemed to refuſe that name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of ſo great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full of wine and meate, he came out among them, and accepted the name of Germanicus which they gaue him, and refuſed the name of Cæſar. But therewithall incontinently after, Flaccus ſouldiers leauing their goodly popular oath which they had ſworne in the name of the people and Senate, they all then tooke their othes faithfully to do what it ſhould pleaſe the Emperour Vitellius to commaund them. Thus Vitellius was choſen Emperour in GERMANIE. So Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to deferre time any longer for the adoption he had intended, wherefore certainly vnderſtanding that thoſe whom he truſted moſt about him, were parties in this matter, ſome taking part with Dolabella, and the moſt part of them with Otho, he neither liking the one nor the other, ſodainly without any word ſpoken to any man, he ſent for Piſo (that was the yonger ſonne of Craſſus and Piſo, whom Nero had put to death) a yong man fairer conditioned, and ſhewed by his graue and modeſt countenance he had by nature, that he was indued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe preſently from his pallace, and went ſtraight to the campe to proclaime Piſo Cæſar, and his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit at his ſetting out of his pallace, there appeared many great ſignes in the firmament which followed him. And moreouer, when he was alſo come into his campe, and that he began to ſay without booke part of his oration, and partly alſo to reade it: it lightned all the while he ſpake, and there fell ſuch a great ſhower of raine vpon it, and a maruellous thicke miſt in the campe, and ouer all the citie, that men might eaſily ſee the gods did not like this adoption, and that it would not proſper. The ſouldiers themſelues ſhewed their diſcontentment by their heauy lookes, and the rather, becauſe at that time there was no ſpeech of reward or liberalitie. And furthermore, they that were preſent alſo, maruelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Piſo) that Piſo nothing reioyced at this great fauour, although he lacked not wit and vnderſtanding otherwiſe to ackowledge it. And on the other ſide alſo, they found eaſily by Othoes lookes, many ſignes and proofes that he was maruellouſly offended in his mind, to ſee that he was thus deceiued of his hope. For he being the man that was firſt ſpoken of, and thought moſt worthie of all other, and being come alſo ſo neare vnto it: now to ſee himſelfe thus wiped out of it, he ſuppoſed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, and that he maliced him in his heart, ſo that after that time he ſtil ſtood in feare of his life. For he being afraid of Piſo, hating alſo Galba, and being grieuouſly offended with T. Iunius: he went his way full of diuers thoughts in his mind. For the Soothſayers, Aſtronomers, and Chaldeans, which he euer kept about him, they did perſwade him not to be diſcoraged for this, and to caſt all hope aſide: but ſpecially one Ptolomy, in whō he had great confidence, becauſe he had oftentimes before foretold and aſſured him, that Nero ſhould not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero ſhould die firſt, and he himſelf ſuruiue him, & ſhould become Emperor of ROME. Whereby Ptolomie hauing proued his firſt prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, and feare not that to come. But now beſides him, thoſe that ſecretly complained vnto him, did pricke him forward the more, ſighing to ſee him ſo euill dealt with by Galba, and diuers of them chiefly, which bare great authoritie and credit about Tigellinus and Nymphidius: who being then caſt off, and diſcountenanced, came all vnto him, and ſtirred him vp the more. As amongſt others, Veturius and Barbius chiefly, of the which the one had bene Optio, and the other Teſſerarius: (for ſo the ROMAINES call thoſe that be their meſſengers, ſpials, & officers to the captaines) who with an infranchiſed bondman of his called Onomaſtus, went vnto the camp, and there corrupted ſome ſouldiers with readie mony, and other ſome with faire words, being of themſelues euill inclined, and expected but occaſion to vtter their malice. For otherwiſe, had the ſouldiers bin all of one mind, it had not bin an enterpriſe to haue bene brought to paſſe in foure dayes ſpace (being no more betwixt the adoption and murther) to make a whole camp rebel in that ſort. For they were ſlaine the fifteenth day of Ianuary, on which day Galba did ſacrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his friends. But at that time the Soothſayer called Ombricius, when he had the intrails of the beaſts ſacrificed in his hands, and had looked vpon them: he ſpake not doubtfully but plainely, that he ſaw ſignes of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour was in preſent danger of great treaſon. Whereby it plainely appeared, that the gods had put Galba into Othoes hands: for he ſtood at that time behind Calba, and both heard and ſaw all that the Soothſayers did. So he ſeeming to be grieued withall in his mind, and his colour changing oft for the feare he was in: his infranchiſed bondman Onomaſtus came and told him that the maſons and chiefe carpenters were come to ſpeake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch-word agreed vpon betweene them, at which time Otho ſhould then go vnto the ſouldiers. Then Otho ſaid, that he went to looke to an old houſe, he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would ſhew it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius houſe, into the market place, where the golden piller ſtandeth, where alſo the greateſt high wayes of all ITALIE do meete together. There certaine met him that firſt called him Emperour, which were not in all aboue three and twentie perſons. Thereupon, though Otho was not vnconſtant as it appeared (notwithſtāding he was ſo fine and effeminate a man) but rather reſolute and ſtout in inſtant danger: yet feare ſo oppreſſed him at that time, that he would faine haue left his enterpriſe. Howbeit the ſouldiers would not ſuffer him, but compaſſing his litter round about with their armes, and their ſwords drawne in their hands, they commaunded the litter men to go forward. So Otho as he went haſtening on his driuers, he often muttered to himſelfe, I am but dead. Some hearing him as they paſſed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwiſe troubled, to ſee ſuch a ſmall number of men about him, that they durſt venter vpon ſo hard an enterpriſe. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withal by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three and by foure in a companie: all the which came and ioyned with him, and cried Cæſar, Cæſar, hauing their ſwords drawne in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to guard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conſpiracie, but being amazed and afraid with their ſodaine comming, he ſuffered them to come in. So when Otho was come in, he found no man that reſiſted him. For they that knew nothing of the practiſe, being compaſſed in with thoſe that were made priuy to it, and had knowne it of long time being found ſtragling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the reſt for feare at the firſt, and afterwards for good will. This was brought ſtraight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothſayer being yet buſie about this ſacrifice: inſomuch that they which before gaue no credite to thoſe diuinations, began then to maruell much at this heauenly ſigne. Then there ran immediatly a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Thereupon Iunius and Lacon, and certaine other of Galbaes infranchiſed bondmen, ſtood to guard Galbaes perſon with their ſwords drawne in their hands. Piſo alſo went out to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers that guarded the Emperors perſon.

Moreouer,

Moreouer, becauſe the ILLYRIAN legion lay out of the camp in a place called Vipſanus: they diſpatched away Marius Celſus with al ſpeed, a very honeſt man, to get that place. Galba in the meane time ſtood in doubt whether he ſhould come out of the pallace or not: for Iunius would not let him go, but Celſus and Lacon perſwaded him to go out: inſomuch as they fell at great words with Iunius, that went about to diſſwade him from it. In this ſtirre there ranne a rumor that Otho was ſlaine in the field. Immediatly after came Iubius Atticus, one of the nobleſt men of all the Emperours guard, and ſhewed his ſword drawne, crying that he had ſlaine Cæſars enemie: and thruſt through the preaſe, and got to Galba, and ſhewed him his ſword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who cõmanded him to do it. The ſoldier anſwered him: the faith and oath he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that ſtood by cried out, it was nobly done of him, and clapped their hands for ioy. Then Galba taking his litter, went out of his pallace to do ſacrifice to Iupiter, and alſo to ſhew himſelfe openly. Howbeit he was no ſooner come into the market place, but he heard contrary newes, that Otho was Lord and maſter of the whole camp and army. Then as it happeneth in ſo great a preaſe of people, ſome cried out to him to returne back againe, others would haue him to go forward: others bad him be afraid of nothing, & others willed him to looke to himſelfe. So his litter being thus turmoiled to and fro, as toſt vpon the ſea, ſometime borne back, otherwhile caried forward: firſt of all they ſaw certaine horſemen, and then footmen alſo armed, comming from Pauls pallace, al of them together crying out with loud voice, Hence, hence, priuate man. Then all the people ſet vpon a running, not flying diſperſedly, but in heapes vpon porches and ſtals in the market place, as it had bene to haue ſeene ſome fight or ſport. Then one called Attilius * Sarcello, ouerthrew one of the images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of open warres. Others round about threw darts on euery ſide of him againſt his litter. But when they ſaw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his litter with their ſwords drawne in their hands, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, ſauing one man onely, whom the Sunne ſaw that day, amongſt ſo many thouſands of men, worthy of the Empire of ROME: and he was called * Sempronius. He hauing receiued priuately no manner of pleaſure at Galbaes hands, but onely to diſcharge his oath and dutie: ſtepped before the litter, and lifting vp a vine braunch he had in his hand (with the which the ROMAINE Captaines do vſe to beate their ſouldiers that haue offended) he fell out with them that did ſet vpon him, and prayed them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he ſaw they would not leaue, but that they fell to it in good earneſt: he then drew his ſword, and bare off the blowes as well as he could, vntill they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galbaes litter being ouerthrowne right in the place called Curtius lake: Galba lay on the ground armed in his curaces. The traiterous ſouldiers flew vpon him, and gaue him many a wound: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bad them ſtrike hardily, if it were to do their countrey good. So he had many wounds on his armes and his thighes, as it is reported: howbeit the ſouldier that ſlue him, was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others do report that it was one Terentius, other alſo ſay Arcadius: and ſome other do call him Fabius Fabulus: who hauing ſtriken off his head, wrapped it in the lap of his gowne, becauſe he could not otherwiſe take hold of it, for that he was al bald. Howbeit his fellowes and conſorts would not ſuffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done ſhould be ſeene. Therefore he ſet it vpon the point of his launce, and ſo ſhaking the face of this poore old man, (a wiſe and temperate Prince, and chiefe Biſhop, and Conſull) he ranne vp and downe (like mad women poſſeſſed with the ſpirit and furie of Bacchus at the feaſts of Bacchus) bowing downe his launce being all of a goare bloud. When his head was brought to Otho, it is ſaid he cried out aloud: Tuſh, my fellowes, this is nothing: vnleſſe you bring me alſo Piſoes head. So not long after, they brought him his head alſo. For the yong man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who ſlue him hard by the temple of Veſta. So did they alſo kill Titus Iunius: who openly confeſſed that he was one of the conſpiracie againſt Galba, and cried out to them that ſlue him, that Otho did not know that they did kill him. This notwithſtanding, the ſouldiers ſtrake off his head and Lacons alſo, and brought them both to Otho to receiue the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilocus ſaith:

Of ſeuen peraduenture ſlaine dead on the ground,
A thouſand will ſay, that they all gaue the wound.

So there were diuers men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloudied all their hands and ſwords, and ſo ſhewed them bloudied to haue reward alſo: but Vitellius not-withſtanding made inquirie of them afterwards, and cauſed them to be put to death. There came into the field alſo, one Marius Celſus, whom diuers men accuſed to haue perſwaded the ſouldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bad he ſhould be put to death. Howbeit Otho would not ſuffer them to kill him: and yet being afraid to contrary the ſouldiers minds, he told them they ſhould not kill him ſo raſhly, becauſe he was firſt to learne ſome things more of him. So he commaunded them to bind him, and deliuered him to be kept of thoſe he truſted moſt. Afterwards, the Senate were preſently aſſembled: who, as if men had bene ſodainly changed from them they were, or as if there had bene new gods, they all ſware by the name of Otho, (the which oath he himſelfe had before ſworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him beſides, Auguſtus and Cæſar, the bodies of them that were ſlaine lying yet headles on the ground in the market place, all in their Conſuls robes. And as for their heads, the ſouldiers after they could tell no more what to do with them, they ſold the head of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter, for the ſumme of two thouſand fiue hundred Drachmaes. And for Piſoes head, his wife through intreatie, begged it of one Veranius. On the other ſide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patrobius and Vitellius ſeruants: who, after they had vſed it as vilely as they could deuiſe, they threw it at length in a place where their bodies are caſt, whom the Cæſars put to death, the which they call Seſtertium. Now for his bodie, Heluidius Priſcus, through Othoes ſufferance, caried it away, and Argius, one of his infranchiſed bondmen, buried it by night. Thus haue you heard the hiſtorie of Galba, a man that in nobilitie and wealth, was inferior to few Romaines, and in them both was the chiefeſt man of all his time, and had alway liued in honorable fame and eſtimation, in the raigne of fiue Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him, and not through his owne force and power. For of them that ſtroue to make themſelues Emperours at that time, ſome found no man that thought them worthy of it: others did put forth themſelues, as thinking themſelues worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vſing his name againſt Vindex boldnes: whereby he procured, that his riſing (which before was called innouation and rebellion) was then called ciuill warre, after that his faction came to haue a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperour. And therefore he did not ſo much deſire to be Emperor for himſelfe, as to do good to his countrey and common-wealth. But yet he erred, in ſeeking to commaund the ſouldiers, whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had ſpoiled by their flatteries: euen as in old time Scipio, Fabricus, and Camillus did commaund the ſouldiers of the Empire of Rome at that time. So he being now a very old man, ſhewed himſelfe a good Emperour and after the old ſort, in his behauiour towards the ſouldiers onely: but in all other things elſe, being caried away with the couetouſneſſe of Titus Iunius and Laco, and of other his infranchiſed bondmen, he left none deſirous to be gouerned by him, but many that were ſorie for his death.

THE LIFE OF Otho.

THE next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the Capitoll, and sacrificed, and there sent for Marius Celsus to come vnto him, whom he curteously saluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cause of his imprisonment, then to remember his deliuerie. Marius Celsus made him a wise and noble answer againe, and said, that the matter for the which they would haue accused him vnto him, did witnesse his behauiour, shewing himselfe faithfull vnto Galba, who neuer did him any pleasure. These words of them both did maruellously please the people: and so did they like the souldiers also wonderfully well. Moreouer, after he had very fauourably and graciously taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Consull, he employed partly about Verginius Rufus, and did also establish them Consuls in their place and decree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honoured the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation with certaine priesthoods. Besides all this, he restored vnto all those Senators that were banished by Nero, and called home againe all their goods yet vnsold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrates and Noble men of the citie that quaked before for feare, supposing that he was not a man, but rather a diuell or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour: they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling and gracious raigne they were so lately entred into. Moreouer, nothing pleased all the ROMAINES together more, nor wanne him the good wil of all men so much, as that he did vnto Tegellinus: for it was punishment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the punishment euery man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his bodie was infected withall. Now, though the Noble men thought his vnreasonable insolencie and lust of the flesh (following naughtie packes and common strumpets, burning still in filthie concupiscence) an extreme punishment, comparable to many deaths, and being also no better then a dead man in maner, still following pleasure and sensualitie as long as he could: this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they should see such a wicked creature as he liue, that had put so many Noble men to death. So Otho sent for him, who liued very pleasantly at his houses in the countrey, by the citie of SINVESSA, and had ships euer readie vpon the sea coast, to flie if necessitie draue him to it. Thereupon he first sought to bribe him with money, which was sent with commission to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him scape: but when he saw he could not frame him to his mind, yet he refrained not to giue him gifts, and prayed him to giue him leaue to ſhaue his beard. The other graunted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razer, and did cut his owne throate. So Otho hauing pleaſed the people thus well, he ſought not otherwiſe to be reuenged of his priuate iniuries. Moreouer, to curry fauour with the common people, he refuſed not to be called Nero, in any open aſſemblies at the Theaters. Alſo when certaine priuate men had ſet vp Neroes images in open ſight, Otho was not offended withall: but moreouer, Clodius Rufus writeth, that the letters pattents and commiſſions were ſent into SPAINE by poſts, ſubſcribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Otho. Howbeit, when it came to his eares that the noble men of ROME miſliked of it: he left it off, and would write it no more in his letters. So Otho hauing begun in this ſort to ſtabliſh his Empire, the ſouldiers maruellouſly troubled him. For they continually perſwaded him to take heed to himſelfe, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neare vnto him: the which they did, either for that indeed they bearing him good will, were afraid ſome trecherie or treaſon would be ſecretly practiſed againſt him, or elſe it was ſome feined deuiſe to ſet all together by the eares, and to bring it to ciuil warre. For when Otho himſelfe had ſent Criſpinus with his ſeuenteenth legion to bring him certaine priſoners, and that Criſpinus was readie before day, going to performe the effect of his commiſſion, hauing loden carts with armor and weapon for his ſouldiers: the deſperateſt and boldeſt men among them, began to crie out, and ſaid that Criſpinus meant no good in his hart, and that the Senate went about to make ſome change and ſtirre, and that his armor and weapons were not for Cæſar, but againſt him. Theſe words moued many mens conſciences, and made them to rebell: ſo that ſome layed hold vpon the carts to ſtay them, others ſlue two Centurions out of hand, and Criſpinus himſelfe alſo that would haue ſtaid them. Thereupon all of them together, one encouraging another went directly to ROME, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, vnderſtanding that there were foure ſcore Senators at ſupper with the Emperour, they ranne ſtraight to the pallace, crying out that it was a good occaſion offered them to kill all Cæſars enemies at a clap. Hereupon all ROME was ſtraight in armes, looking immediatly after to be ſacked and ſpoiled of all that euer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, Otho himſelfe alſo being in great feare and diſtreſſe. For men might eaſily ſee he was afraid, becauſe of his gueſts he had bidden, not for himſelfe, ſeeing them all amazed with the matter for feare, not ſpeaking a word vnto him, but ſtaring on him ſtill, and ſpecially thoſe that came and brought their wiues with them to ſupper. So Otho ſodainly ſent the Captaines vnto the ſouldiers, and commaunded them to ſpeake with them, and to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithal he made them take away the boord, and conueyed his gueſts out of his pallace by ſecret poſternes. So they ſaued themſelues, paſſing through the ſouldiers, a litle before they entred into the hall where the feaſt was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cæſars enemies. So the Emperour riſing from his bed, he pacified them with gentle words, the teares ſtanding in his eyes, and thereby at length he ſent them all away. The next morning he liberally beſtowed vpon euery ſouldier, a thouſand two hundred and fiftie Drachmaes: and then he went into the market place, and there gaue great commendation vnto the common people for their readie good wils they had ſhewed vnto him: howbeit, he ſaid there were ſome among them, that vnder colour and pretext of honeſtie, did commit many leud parts, and made his goodneſſe and grace towards them to be euill ſpoken of, and their conſtancie and faith alſo to be miſliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offendors might be puniſhed. They all confirmed his words, and bad him aloud he ſhould do it. So Otho thereupon cauſed two of them onely to be apprehended, ſuppoſing no man would be greatly offended with the puniſhment of them, and then went his way. Thoſe that loued and truſted him, maruelled much to ſee this change. Other were of opinion, that it ſtood him vpon to do ſo, to winne the ſouldiers hearts, becauſe of the warre at hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all parts, that Vitellius had taken vpon him the authoritie to be Emperour, and poſtes came to him one in anothers neck, to tell him that numbers of people came in daily to ſubmit themſelues vnto Vitellius. Others told him alſo, how the legions remaining in PANONIA, DALMATIA, and MYSIA, had choſen Otho. Immediatly after, friendly letters were brought him alſo from Mutianus and Veſpaſianus, the one of them being in SYRIA, and the other in IVDÆA, with great and mighty armies. Whereupon Otho giuing credite vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius and bad him beware how he medled with any deeper enterpriſe, then became a priuate ſouldier: and that that he would giue him gold and ſiluer enough, and a great citie, where he might liue quietly, and take his pleaſure. Vitellius gently anſwered him at the firſt, and ſported with him: but afterwards they falling out one with another, ſpitefull letters were ſent betwixt either parties, one of them reproching another, not falſly but fondly, and fooliſhly detecting each others vices. For indeed it was hard to iudge, which of them two was moſt licentiouſly giuen, moſt effeminate, leaſt skilfull, poorer, or moſt indebted before. Now at that time they talked of wonderfull ſignes that had bene ſeene: howbeit they were but flying tales; and there was no man to iuſtifie them. But in the Capitoll there was the image of Victory ſet vp in a triumphing chariot: the which euery body ſaw did let ſlacke the reines of the bridles of the horſes which ſhe had in her hands, as though ſhe could not ſtay them any more. The ſtatue of Caius Cæſar alſo within the Iland, which ſtandeth in the middeſt of the riuer of Tyber at ROME, without any earthquake or ſtorme of wind, turned of it ſelfe from the Weſt to the Eaſt: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Veſpaſian began to take vpon him to be Emperour. Many alſo tooke the ouerflowing of the riuer of Tyber for an ill ſigne. For indeed it was at that time of the yeare when riuers do ſwell moſt, yet was it neuer ſo great before, neither had it euer done ſo much hurt as it did at that time. For it had ouerflowne her bankes, and drowned the moſt part of the citie, and ſpecially the corne-market: inſomuch that they ſuffered famine many dayes after in ROME. In all this ſtirre, newes came that Cecinna and Valens (two of Vitellius captains) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreouer in ROME, Dolabella a noble man, was ſuſpected by the Prætorian ſouldiers, that he practiſed ſome treaſon. Now Otho, either becauſe he was afraid of him, or of ſome other: he ſent him to the citie of AQVINVM, promiſing him he ſhould haue no other hurt. Then chooſing the choiſeſt Gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, and did not depriue him of any iot of his honour and dignitie. Moreouer, he was very carefull to ſee his wife and mother ſafe, that they ſhould not be afraid of themſelues. Beſides all this, he appointed Flauius Sabinus, Veſpaſians brother, gouernor of ROME in his abſence: and did it for Neroes ſake, who had before giuen him the ſame honor and authoritie, the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Veſpaſian ſee, that he loued and truſted him. So he taried behind at BRESSELLE, a citie ſtanding vpon the riuer of Po: and ſent his armie before vnder the conduct of Marius Celſus, of Swetonius Pauliuus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great perſonages: howbeit they could not haue their wils to rule the armie as they would, becauſe of the inſolencie and ſtubbornneſſe of the ſouldiers, who would haue no other Captaines but the Emperour onely, ſaying, that he and none other ſhould commaund them. Indeed, the enemies ſouldiers alſo were not much wiſer, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and luſtie vpon the ſelfe ſame occaſion: howbeit they had this aduantage ouer the other, that they could tel how to fight, and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardneſſe, and neuer ſhrunke from it. Whereas the Prætorian ſouldiers that came from ROME, were fine meale-mouthed men, becauſe they had bene long from the warres, and had liued at eaſe in ROME, and taken their pleaſure in banqueting and playes: and therefore in a braueric and iolitie, they would needs haue men thinke, that they diſdained to do what their Captaines commaunded them, as men that were too good to do it, and not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that, when Spurina would haue compelled them, he was in danger of death, and ſcaped very narrowly that they ſlue him not. For they ſtucke not to reuile him, and giue him as foule words as they could: calling him traitor, and curſing him, ſaying that he marred all Cæſars affaires. Yea, and there were ſome of them, that hauing their full cups, went in the night to his tent, to aske him leaue to depart, ſaying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flout they had giuen them by their enemies about that time, hard by the citie of PLACENTIA, did ſtand Spurina and his affaires to great purpoſe. For Vitellius ſouldiers comming hard to the wals of the citie, did mocke Othoes men that were at the cranewes of the ſame, and called them fine dauncers, and goodly ſtage-players, that had ſeene nothing but playes and feaſts: and that for feates of armes, and battels, they knew not what it meant: and that the greateſt act they euer did, was for that they ſtrake off the head of a poore naked old man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the field before men, their hearts were in their heeles. Theſe vile words galled them to the heart, and made them ſo mad withall, that they came of themſelues to pray Spurina to commaund them what he thought good, promiſing that from thenceforth they would neuer refuſe any paines or daunger he would put them to. Thereupon there was a hote assault giuen to the citie of PLACENTIA, with great store of sundrie engines. Howbeit Spurinaes men had the better, and hauing with great slaughter repulsed the assailants, they sacked one of the goodliest, the greatest, and most flourishing cities of all ITALIE. So Othoes Captaines were farre more familiar, curteous, and ciuill to deale with cities and priuate men, then Vitellius souldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna was nether for person nor manners accompaniable for the people: but strange, monstrous, and troublesome to see him onely a mightie made man, wearing gally gascoignes, and coates with sleeues, after the fashion of the GAVLES, and spake in this attire vnto the ensigne-bearers, and Captaines of the ROMAINES. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted on horseback, gallantly apparelled, and accompanied with a troupe of the choisest men of armes of all the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was so couetous, that no spoile of enemies, no polling of subiects, nor bribes taken of their friends and confederates, could quench or satisfie his vnsatiable couetousnesse: whereby it seemeth that was the let, that comming on so slowly, he was not at the first battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecinna for it, that made too much hast, for the desire he had to haue the onely honour of the victorie to himselfe: and this was the cause, that besides his other light faults, he also made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and season, and when it came to the point indeed, yet he fought it out not valiantly, so that he had almost cast all away. For when he had the repulse from PLACENTIA, he went vnto CREMONA another great citie. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was besieged in the citie of PLACENTIA: when he heard by the way that the PLACENTINES had the better, and that the CREMONENSES were in great danger and distresse: he marched thither with his armie, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that also, the other Captaines of either side came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna hauing layed a great number of his best souldiers well armed in ambush, in certaine thicke groues and woods: he commaunded his horsemen to march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they should retire litle and litle, making as though they fled, vntil they had drawne them within his ambush. So there were certaine traitors that bewrayed the ambush vnto Marius Celsus, who came against them with his choise men of armes, and did not follow them ouer rashly, but compassed in the place where the ambush lay, the which he raised, and in the meane time sent to his campe with all possible speed to his footmen to make hast thitherward: and it seemeth, that if they had come in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched vpon the bellies of all Cecinnaes armie, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should haue done. But Paulinus being come too late to aide them, for that he came so slowly: he was burdened that he did not the dutie of a Captaine, that bare the name and countenance he caried. Furthermore, the common souldiers accused him of treason vnto Otho, and stirred vp their Emperour against him, and spake very big words of themselues, saying, that they had ouercome for their owne parts, had not the cowardlinesse of their owne Captaines bene, who put them by the victorie. So Otho did not trust him so much, that he would not make him beleeue but that he mistrusted somewhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the camp, and Proclus with him, Captaine of the Prætorian guard, who indeed commaunded all, but in sight Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenant. Marius Celsus and Paulinus followed after, bearing the name of Counsellers and friends onely: howbeit otherwise they medled with nothing, neither had any authoritie giuen them. On the other side, the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially, whom Valens led. For when news was brought of the conflict that was betweene them in this ambush, they were angrie with him, because they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to help their men that were slaine: insomuch that he had much ado to pacifie and quiet them, they were so readie to haue flown vpon him. So Valens at length remoued his camp, and went and ioyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his camp at the towne of BEBRIACVM, which is a litle towne hard by CREMONA: he consulted with his Captaines whether he should giue battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gaue him counsell to fight, considering that the souldiers were very willing to it, by reason of the late victorie they had wonne, and wished him not to deferre it: for thereby he should but discourage his armie, which was now willing to fight, and also giue their enemies leysure to stay for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came himselfe out of GAVLE. But Paulinus in contrarie maner alleaged, that the enemies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for another armie out of

of Mysia and Pannonia, as great an army as his enemies had already, so that he could tary his time, and not serue his enemies turne: and also, that if the souldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they should then be much more encouraged, when they should haue greater company, aud should also fight with better safety. Furthermore he perswaded them, that to delay time was for their auaile, considering that they had plenty and store of all maner of prouision: where the enemies on the other side being also in their enemies countrey, their victuals would quickly faile them. Marius Celsus liked very well of these perswasions. And so did Annius Gallus, who was not present at this councell (but gone from the campe, to be cured of a fal he had from his horse) but he was written to by Otho to haue his opinion also. So Annius Gallus returned answer, that he thought it not best to make hast, but to stay for the army that came out of Mysia, considering they were onwards on their way. Howbeit Otho would not hearken to this counsell, but followed their minds that concluded of battell: for the which were alleadged diuerse occasions. But the chiefest and likeliest cause of all was, that the souldiers which are called the Prætorian guard (being the daily guard about the Emperours person) finding then in effect what it was to professe to be a souldier, and to liue like a souldier: they lamented their continuing in Rome, where they liued at ease and pleasure, feasting and banquetting, neuer feeling the discommodities and bitter paines of war, and did therfore so earnestly cry out to fight, that there was no staying of them, as if they should at their first cry and setting forward, haue ouerthrowne their enemies. Moreouer, it seemed also that Otho himselfe could no more away with the feare & doubt of the vncertaine successe to come, neither could any longer abide the grieuous thoughts of the danger of his estate, he was so effeminate, and vnacquainted with sorow and paines. This was the cause that caried him on headlong, as a man that shutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and so to put all at aduenture. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, & Othoes secretary. Others also do report, that both armies had diuerse determinations and minds: as to ioyne all together in one campe, and ioyntly to chuse among them, if they could agree, the worthiest man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to assemble the whole Senate in a place together, and there to suffer the Senators to chuse such a one Emperour, as they liked best of. And sure it is very likely it was so, considering that neither of them both which were then called Emperors, was thought meet for the place they had: and therefore that these counsels & considerations might easily fall into the Romane souldiers heads (who were wise men and expert souldiers) that indeed it was a thing for them iustly to mislike, to bring themselues into the like miserable time and calamitie, which their predecessors before them had caused one another to suffer, first for Sylla and Marius sakes, and afterwards for Cæsar and Pompey, & now to bestow the Empire of Rome either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkennesse & glutonie: or else vpon Otho, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moued Celsus to delay time, hoping to end the wars without trouble & danger: & that caused Otho to make the more hast, being afraid of the same. Howbeit Otho returning backe again into Bresselles, he committed another fault, not only because he tooke his mens goodwils from them to fight, the which his presence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but because also he caried away with him for the guard of his person, the valiantest souldiers and most resolute men of al his host. About that time there chanced a skirmish to fal out by the riuer of Po, because Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they saw they preuailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and dry wood, all rubbed ouer with brimstone and pitch, and setting them on fire, then sent them downe the streame. When the barges were in the middest of the streame, there suddenly rose a wind out of the riuer, which blew vpon this wood-stacke they had prepared to cast among the enemies workes of this bridge, that first made it smoke, and immediatly after fell all on a flame, which did so trouble the men in the barges, that they were driuen to leape into the riuer to saue themselues: and so they lost their barges, and became themselues also prisoners to their enemies, to their great shame and mockerie. Furthermore, the Germaines vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othoes fencers, which of them should win a litle Iland in the middest of the riuer: they had the vpper hand, and slue many of the fencers. Thereupon Othoes souldiers which were in Bebriacvm, being in a rage withall, and would needs fight: Proclus brought them into the field, and went and camped about fiftie furlongs out of the city, so fondly, and to so litle purpose, that being the spring of the yeare, and all the countrey thereabout full of brookes and riuers, yet they notwithstanding lacked water. The next morning they raised their campe to meete with their enemies the same day, and were driuen to march aboue a hundred furlong. Now Paulinus perswaded them to go faire and softly, and not to make more hast then needed, and would not so soone as they should come (being wearied with their iourney and trauell) set vpon their enemies that were well armed, & besides had leisure & time inough to set their men in battell ray, whilest they were comming so long a iourney with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of diuerse opinions about this matter, there came a horseman from Otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commanded them to make all the hast they could, and to loose no time, but to march with all speed towards the enemie. So when the letters were read, the Captaines presently marched forward with their army. Cecinna vnderstanding of their comming, was astonied at the first, and suddenly forsooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he found the most part of his souldiers ready armed, and Valens had giuen them their signall and word of battell. And in the meane time, whilest the legions were taking their places to set themselues in battell ray: they sent out before the choisest horsemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cause) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on Othoes side in battell. Insomuch that when these men of armes came neare to meet with the vowarde of Othoes army: Othoes men did speake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other side tooke this salutation in euill part, and answered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight. Insomuch that those that had spoken to them, were quite discouraged: and the residue also began to suspect their companions which had spoken to them, and mistrusted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their disorder, being ready to ioyne battell. Furthermore, on the enemies side also, all was out of order: for the beasts of cariage ran in amongst them that fought, and so did put them maruellously out of order. Besides that also, the disaduantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, because of sundry ditches & trenches that were betweene them, wherby they were compelled to fight in diuerse companies together. So there were but two legions only, the one of Vitellius, called the Deuourer: & the other of Otho, called the Helper: which getting out of these holes and ditches a part by themselues, in a good plaine euen ground, fought it out so a long time together in good order of battell. Othoes souldiers were men of goodly personages, strong, & valiant of their hands, howbeit they had neuer serued in the wars, nor had euer foughten battell but that. And Vitellius men on the other side, were old beaten souldiers, & had serued all their youth, & knew what wars and battels meant. So when they came to ioyne, Othoes men gaue such a lusty charge vpon the first onset, that they ouerthrew, & slue all the first ranke, and also wan the ensigne of the Eagle. Vitellius men were so ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke hart againe vnto them, and ran in so desperately vpon their enemies, that at the first they slue the Colonell of all their legion, & wan diuerse ensignes. And furthermore, against Othoes fencers (which were accounted the valiantest men, and readiest of hand) Varus Alphenus brought his men of armes called the Battavii, which are Germaines in the lower part of Germanie, dwelling in an Iland compassed about with the riuer of Rhein. There were few of his fencers that stucke by it, but the most of them ran away towards the riuer, where they found certaine ensignes of their enemies set in battell ray, who put them all to the sword, and not a man of them scaped with life. But aboue all other, none proued more beasts & cowards, then the Prætorian guard. For they would not tary till the enemies came to giue them charge, but cowardly turned their backes, and fled through their owne men that were not ouerthrowne: and so did both disorder them, and also make them afraid. This notwithstanding, there were a great number of Othoes men who hauing ouerthrown the vowarde of them that made head against them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were conquerours, and so valiantly returned backe into their campe. But of their Captaines, neither Proclus nor Paulinus, durst returne backe with them, but fled another way, being afraid of the fury of the souldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus receiued them into the city of Bebriacvm, that came together after this ouerthrow, and told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celsus gathering the noble men and gentlemen together that had charge in the army, he fell to cõsultation what they should do in so great a calamity, and extreame slaughter of the Romaine citizens. For if Otho himselfe were an honest man, he should ſhould no more attempt fortune: conſidering that Cato and Scipio were both greatly blamed for that they were the cauſe of caſting away of many men in AFRICKE to no purpoſe (though they fought for the liberty of the ROMAINES) and only of ſelfe-will, for that they would not yeeld to Iulius Cæſar after he had won the battell of PHARSALIA. For though fortune in all other things haue power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, ſhe cannot preuent them to determine the beſt for their ſafety. Theſe perſwaſions ſtraight caried away the Captains, who went preſently to feele the minds of the priuate ſouldiers, whom they found all of them deſirous of peace. So Titianus perſwaded them to ſend Ambaſſadours vnto the enemies to treate of peace: and Celſus and Gallus tooke vpon them the charge to go thither, to breake to matter vnto Cecinna, and Valens. But by the way they met with certaine Centurions, who told them how all the army of the enemies were coming onwards on their way, to come directly to the city of BEBRIACVM, and that their Chieftaines had ſent before to offer treatie of peace. Celſus and his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions that they would returne with them vnto Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celſus was in great danger of his life: becauſe the men of armes which he had ouerthrowne certaine dayes before in an ambuſh, coming before, when they ſpied him, they flew vpon him with great ſhouts. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his company, ſtepped before him, and cloſed him in: and ſo did the other Captaines that cried vnto them they ſhould do him no hurt. Cecinna vnderſtanding what the matter was, rode thither, and pacified the tumult of theſe men of armes: and then ſaluting Celſus very courteouſly, he went with him towards BEBRIACVM. But now Titianus in the meane time, repenting himſelfe that he had ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the enemies, he placed the deſperateſt ſouldiers he had vpon the wals of the citie, and incouraged the reſt alſo to do the like, and to ſtand to the defence. But Cecinna came to the wall, and being on horſe-backe, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more reſiſtanee, but thoſe that were vpon the wals, ſaluted the ſouldiers: & they that were within the city opened the gates, and thruſt in amongſt Vitellius men, who receiued them, and did no man any hurt, but courteouſly imbraced them, and ſaluted each other. Then they all ſware and tooke their oaths to be true to Vitellius, and ſo yeelded themſelues vnto him. So do the moſt part of thoſe that were at this battell, report the ſucceſſe thereof: graunting notwithſtanding, that they knew not euery thing that was done, becauſe of the great diſorder among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was ſtriken, with Metrius Florus that had bin Conſull: he ſhewed me an old man that when the field was fought in that place, was yong, & againſt his will was at the ſame battel on Othoes part. Who told vs, that after the battell was fought, he came into the field to ſuruey the number of thoſe that were dead: and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of thoſe that came to view them. And ſayd moreouer, that he made inquirie of the matter, but he neither could imagaine it himſelfe, nor be ſatisfied by others. Now indeed it is likely, that in ciuill wars betweene countrimen of one ſelfe city, where one of the two armies is ouerthrown, that there ſhould be greater ſlaughter among them, then againſt the other enemies, becauſe they take no priſoners of either ſide: for thoſe they ſhould take, would ſerue them to no good purpoſe. But after they were ſlaine, one to be layed on heapes ſo by another, that is a hard thing to iudge. But now to the matter. The newes of this ouerthrow came firſt but obſcurely vnto Otho, a common thing in a matter of ſo great importance: but afterwards, when ſome that were hurt came and brought him certaine newes of it, it was no maruell then to ſee Othoes friends & familiars to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good cheare, and not to be diſcouraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and goodwill which the priuate ſouldiers ſhewed vnto him at that time, did paſſe and exceed all ſpeech and expectation. For they forſooke him not, neither went they to ſubmit themſelues to their enemies the conquerors, neither tooke they any regard of themſelues, to ſee their Emperor in that diſpaire: but all of them ioyntly together went vnto his lodging, and called him their Emperor. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men repreſented in a triumph lying on the ground, & kiſſed his hands, with the teares running downe their cheekes, and beſought him not to forſake and leaue them to their enemies, but to commaund their perſons whileſt they had one drop of bloud left in their bodies to do him ſeruice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongſt others, there was a poore ſoldier drawing out his ſword, ſayd vnto him: Know, ô Cæſar, that all my companions are determined to die in this ſort for thee, and ſo ſlue himſelf. But all theſe lamentable things did neuer melt Othoes hart: who looking with a ſtout countenance round about him, and caſting his eyes euery where, ſpake vnto them in this maner. I thinke this a more happy day for me, my felowes, then that in the which you firſt choſe me Emperor: to ſee you loue me ſo well, and do me ſuch honor, with ſo great ſhew of loyalty. But yet I beſeech you not to deny me of a greater fauour, which is: To die valiantly and honorably, for the ſafety of ſo many honeſt men as you be, and ſo good citizens of Rome. If by your election you made me worthie to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne: I muſt now needs ſhew my ſelfe an Emperor, not ſparing to ſpend my life for your and my countries ſafety. I am certaine that the victorie is not altogether mine enemies. For newes are come vnto me, that our armies of Mysia and Pannonia are in their way comming to vs, and that they are not farre off from the Adriaticke ſea. Asia, Syria, and Ægypt, and the legions that made warre in Ivrie, are all ours. The Senate taketh our part, and our enemies wiues and children be in our hands. But this warre is not againſt Hannibal, nor Pyrrhus, nor againſt the Cimbres, to fight who ſhould be owners of Italie: but it is againſt the Romaines themſelues. For in this ciuill war, both the Conquerour and vanquiſhed do offend their countrey: for where the Conquerours haue benefit, the countrey and commonwealth alwayes receiueth loſſe. Aſſure your ſelues I had rather die then raigne Emperor: conſidering alſo that my life with victorie cannot ſo much benefit the Romaines, as the ſacrifice of the ſame may do my countrey good, for the peace and quietneſſe of my countrimen, keeping Italie thereby from ſeeing ſuch another battell, as this hath bene. So when he had made this Oration vnto them, and put thoſe by, that would haue diſſwaded him the contrary: he commaunded all the Senators and his friends that were preſent, to auoid. Then he wrote letters to them that were abſent, and alſo vnto the cities wherethrough they paſſed, to vſe them very courteouſly, and to ſee them ſafely conueyed. Then came his nephew Cocceius to him, who was yet but a young boy, and he did comfort him, and bad him not be afraid of Vitellius, for he had ſafely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as carefull of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his ſonne though he was deſirous to do it, vntill ſuch time as he ſaw the end of this warre: to the end that if he ouercame, he ſhould quietly raigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouercome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cauſe of his death. But this one thing onely, I command and charge thee, my ſonne, euen as the laſt commaundement that I can giue thee: that thou do not forget altogether, neither ouer-much remember, that thine Vncle hath bene Emperor. When he had told him this tale, he heard a noiſe at his doore: they were the ſouldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him, and would kill them, if they did not remaine with him, but would forſake their Emperor. Vpon this occaſion he came out once againe among them, being afraid leſt the ſouldiers would do the Senators ſome hurt, and made the ſouldiers giue backe, not by intreating of them, nor ſpeaking courteouſly to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage: inſomuch that they all ſhrunke backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was a thirſt, and dranke a litle water: and hauing two ſwords, he was prouing a great while which had the beſt edge. In the end, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his ſeruants, and liberally to giue out his mony among them, to ſome more, to ſome leſſe, not prodigally throwing it away without diſcretion, as being another mans mony: but diſcreetly gaue to euerie man according to his deſert. Then, after he had diſpatched them away, he layd him downe to ſleepe all the reſt of the night, and the groomes of his chamber heard him ſnort, he ſlept ſo ſoundly. In the morning he called one of his enfranchiſed bondmen, whom he had commanded to helpe to ſaue the Senators, and ſent him to ſee if they were all ſafe, and gone. So when he vnderſtood that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: Come on, ſayd he then vnto him, looke to thy ſelfe I read thee, and take heed the ſouldiers ſee thee not, if thou wilt ſcape with life, for ſure they will kill thee, thinking thou haſt holpen me to kill my ſelfe. So, aſſoone as his infranchiſed bondman was gone out of his chamber, he tooke his ſword with both his hands, and ſetting the point of it to his breſt, he fell downe vpon it, ſeeming to feele no other paine, ſauing that he fetched a ſigh: whereby they that were without, knew that he had done himſelfe hurt. Thereupon his friends made ſtraight an out-cry, & all the campe and city was incontinently full of teares and lamentation. The ſouldiers ſuddenly ranne with a great noiſe to his gates, where they bitterly bewailed, and lamented his death, falling out with themſelues that they were ſuch villaines ſo ſlenderly to haue guarded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing himſelfe for their ſakes. So there was not a man of them that left his bodie, though

though the enemies were hard at hand: but hauing honorably buried him, and prepared a great ſtacke of wood, they conueyed him armed to the fire of his funerals, euery man thinking himſelf happie, that could firſt ſet his ſhoulders to the coffin to helpe to cary him. Others comming to it, kneeled downe on their knees, and kiſſed his wound. Others tooke and kiſſed his hands. Others that could not come neare him, honored him, and did reuerence him a farre off, and ſome there were alſo that after the ſtacke of wood was ſet on fire, ſlue themſelues hard by the fire: who had neuer receiued benefit by him that was dead (at the leaſt to any mans knowledge) neither had they any occaſion to be afraid of him that was conquerour. And truly me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was ſo ambitiouſly giuen to raigne, as they vehemently deſired to be commanded by Otho, and to obey him: conſidering that their deſire left them not euen after his death, but was ſo liuely rooted in their minds, that in the end, it turned to a deadly hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will ſpeake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes aſhes, they did ſet vp a tombe for him, neither for magnificence of building, nor for glorious Epitaph, ſubiect vnto enuy. For I haue ſeene his tombe in the city of Bresselles, a meane thing, and the Epitaph vpon it tranſlated out of Latine, ſaith no more but this: This is the tombe of Marcus Otho. He died being but ſeuen and thirty yeares old, and was Emperour but three moneths: and there was as famous men that commended his death, as they that reproued his life. For though he liued not much more honeſter then Nero, yet he died farre more honorably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would haue compelled his ſouldiers preſently to haue taken their oaths to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and vnderſtanding that there were yet remaining ſome Senators, they would not meddle with them, but only troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his doores armed, and called him by his name, and commanded him to take charge of them, and to go as Ambaſſador to intreat for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were already ouercome: conſidering he refuſed it when they had ouercome: and alſo he was afraid to go Ambaſſour to the Germaines, becauſe he had compelled them to do things againſt their wils. Therefore he went out at his backe-doore, and ſaued himſelfe. So when the ſouldiers heard of it, they were at length contented to be brought to be ſworne vnto Vitellius: and ſo ioyned themſelues with Cecinnaes ſouldiers, ſo they might be pardoned for all that was paſt.

THE LIVES OF HANNIBALL AND SCIPIO AFRICAN:

Tranſlated into French by Charles de la Sluce, and Engliſhed by Sir Thomas North.

Hannibal.

The parentage of Hannibal.

IF we do call to mind the firſt PVNICKE war the CARTHAGINIANS had with the ROMAINES: we ſhall find many Captaines, who by the glory of their noble deeds, haue left great fame and renowme vnto their poſteritie. Howbeit amongſt all the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, none are found more worthie of fame, and ſo commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilcar, Hannibals father, otherwiſe ſurnamed Barcha, a valiant man doubtleſſe, and in his time a skilfull ſouldier as any was. The ſame Hamilcar, firſt of all made warre with the ROMAINES, a longer time in SICILE then was looked for, who had done great hurt to his countrey and commonwealth. After that alſo in the warres of AFRICKE (at what time the mercenarie ſouldiers through their rebellion did put the country of CARTHAGE in great danger) he did ſo valiantly appeaſe the inſurrection: that to euery mans iudgement, he was reputed the onely preſeruer of his countrey. Then he was ſent Gouernour and Captaine into SPAINE, and caried with him at that time (as it is reported) his ſonne Hannibal, being but a young boy, where he did noble ſeruice. In fine, in the ninth yeare of his aboad there in that prouince, he died fighting valiantly againſt the VETHEONS. After his death, Haſdruball his ſonne in law, whom the CARTHAGINIANS through the ayde and friendſhip of the BARCINIAN faction had made Generall of all their armie) remained Gouernour there the ſpace of eight yeares. This Haſdruball ſent for Hannibal into SPAINE, after

after his father Hamilcars death, against the minds of the chief of the contrarie faction, to the end that as he had bene trained from his youth in the discipline of wars in his father Hamilcars life: euen so in like manner, that now being come to mans state, he should the better harden his bodie, to away with the paines and daungers of the warres. Now although at the first, the remembrance of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and goodwill of the souldiers: yet he himselfe afterwards, through his diligence and industrie so handled the matter, that the old souldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they onely desired to choose him (and none other) for their gouernor. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wished for in a noble Captaine or Generall. He had a present and readie wit to giue counsell what was to be done, in greatest attempts: and besides, he lacked neither manhood nor industrie to put it in execution. He had a valiant and inuincible mind, euen in greatest dangers and aduersities of body: the which are wont to stay others from performing their indeuors and dutie. He would watch and ward as any priuate souldier, and was quicke and readie to do any kind of seruice, either like a valiant souldier or a good Captaine. In this sort Hannibal continued in seruice in the warres, the space of three yeares, vnder the conduct of Hasdrubal. In that time he so wan the hearts of all the army, that immediatly after Hasdrubals death, he was chosen to be Lieutenant generall, with the common consent of all the souldiers: and this honor was laid vpon him without contradiction of any of the CARTHAGINIANS through the friendship and goodwil of the BARCINIAN faction. Hannibal was now sixe and twentie yeares old, when the souldiers made him their Lieutenant generall. For at what time his father Hamilcar brought him into SPAINE, he was then but nine yeares old: and from that time vnto Hasdrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it was seuenteene yeares moe. So he was no sooner made Lieutenant generall of all the campe, and his countrey: but he bent himselfe to make war with the ROMAINS, hauing long before determined it. For first of all, he chiefly maintained almost a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS against the ROMAINES, because of the losse of SICILE and SARDINIA. Besides also, he bare thē a secret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilcar: who of all the Captains the CARTHAGINIANS euer had, was the mortallest enemie vnto the ROMAINES. And it is written also, that at what time Hamilcar made his preparation to go into SPAINE, he compelled Hannibal (being but a boy) to sweare in a sacrifice he made, that he would be a mortall enemy to the ROMAINES, assoone as euer he came to the state of a man. So, the remembrance of these things were still fresh in the young mans mind, as the Idea (or image) of his fathers hate, and still prouoked him to spie out all the meanes he could, how to destroy the Empire of ROME. Besides also, the BARCINIAN faction neuer left to pricke him forward vnto it, because by wars he might raise himselfe to greatnes, and so increase his estate. These causes, as well common as particular, inticed Hannibal to attempt war against the ROMAINES, and gaue the stout young man occasion by these means to practise innouation. There was a people at that time called the SAGVNTINES, who confined indifferently betwixt the ROMAINES and CARTHAGINIANS: and were left free by the former peace concluded. These SAGVNTINES euer after tooke part with the ROMAINES, and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the ROMAINS alwaies found them very true and faithfull to the Empire of ROME. Hannibal therefore thought with himselfe, he could not deuise to make a better match to anger the ROMAINS withall, and to kindle the fire of his malice also against them, then to make war with the SAGVNTINES their confederates. Howbeit, before he would be openly seene to set vpon them, he first determined to lead his army against the OLCADES, and other people on the other side of the riuer of Iberus: and after he had ouercom thē, then to find occasion to molest the SAGVNTINES, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begunne by them, then purposely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the OLCADES, he did set vpon the VACCEIANS, spoiled their country, besieged many cities, and took HERMANDICE, and ARBOCOLE, great and rich cities. Now he had in manner ouercome all the whole countrey, when diuerse fugitiues from the citie of HERMANDICE, encouraging one another, conspired against him, leauied men, and inticed the OLCADES that were fled, to take their part. Then they perswaded the CARPENTANIANS their neighbours, that they would all agree so dainely to set vpon Hannibal at his returne. They being a people that desired nothing more thē to fight, and considering also that they had receiued iniuries by Hannibal, did easily hearken vnto that counsell: and thereupon leauying a great number of men, to the nūber of a hundred thousand, they went to assaile Hannibal at his returne from the VACCEIANS, by the riuer of Tagus.

When the CARTHAGINIANS diſcouered their armie, they ſtayd vpon it, and were maruellouſly affraid. And doubtleſſe they had had a great ouerthrow, if they had fought with thoſe ſo fierce people, being affraid of their ſodaine comming, and alſo loden as they were with ſo great ſpoils: the which Hannibal deepely conſidering, like a wiſe Captain as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his campe in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he paſſed his armie ouer the riuer with as litle noiſe as he could, leauing the paſſage where the enemies might eaſilieſt come ouer, vnguarded: becauſe vnder pretence of diſſembled feare, he might intice the barbarous people to paſſe ouer the riuer, to take the oportunitie and occaſion offered them. Now indeed as he was the ſubtilleſt Captaine, and had the fineſt ſtratagemes of any other Captaine of his time: ſo his pollicie was not in vaine, and his purpoſe to good effect, in abuſing of the enemy: for the wild barbarous people repoſing too great truſt in the multitude of their men, ſuppoſing the CARTHAGINIANS had bene affraid, with great furie entred the riuer to paſſe it ouer. So they being greatly troubled, and out of order by this meanes, and ſpecially before they could paſſe all ouer the riuer, they were ſet vpon by the CARTHAGINIANS: firſt by certaine horſemen, and afterwards with the whole armie, ſo that there was a great number of them ſlaine, and the reſidue were put to flight. After this victorie, all the people inhabiting about the riuer of Iberus, yeelded themſelues vnto him, ſauing the SAGVNTINES: who, though they ſaw Hannibal at hand comming towards them, truſting to the friendſhip of the ROMAINES, they prepared to defend themſelues againſt him: and therewithall ſent Ambaſſadors preſently to ROME, to ſhew the Senat in what great danger they were, and alſo to pray aide againſt their ſo great enemy, that made wars ſo hotely with them. The Ambaſſadors that were ſent to ROME, were ſcant gone out of SPAINE, when Hannibal made open war on them with all his army, and pitched his camp before the city of SAGVNTVS. When this matter was reported at ROME, and conſulted of for the wrongs that had bene done to their confederates: the Senators dealt but ſlackly in it, & by decree only ſent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Pamphilus vnto Hannibal, to will him to raiſe his ſiege from SAGVNTVS: and if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they ſhould thence repaire to CARTHAGE, and to pray them to deliuer their general Hannibal vnto them, becauſe he had broke the peace. Polybius writeth, that Hannibal did heare theſe Ambaſſadors, howbeit, that he made them a ſlender anſwer. Liuius writeth in contrary maner, that they were neuer heard, nor came at any time to his campe. Howbeit, they both agree thus far, that they came into SPAINE, and afterwards went into AFRICKE, & from thence came to CARTHAGE, where after they had deliuered their meſſage vnto the councel, the BARCINIAN faction were ſo much againſt them, that they diſhonorably returned to ROME, and obtained not their deſire. Now, in the Senate of CARTHAGE there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the firſt tooke his beginning from the gouernment of Hamilcar, ſurnamed Barca, & ſo deſcended as it were by ſucceſſiō to his ſon Hannibal, and grew afterwards vnto ſuch greatneſſe, that that faction (as well abroad as at home) ruled all matters iudiciall. The ſecond faction came of Hanno, a graue man, and of great authoritie in the ſame commonwealth: howbeit, a man more giuen to imbrace peace & quietnes, then otherwiſe diſpoſed to war and trouble. It is he only (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambaſſadors of the ROMAINS came to CARTHAGE, to complaine of the iniuries done to their confederates: that did then in maner againſt the will of all the whole Senat, counſell them to keepe peace with the ROMAINES, & to beware of wars, the which one day might peraduenture vtterly deſtroy their countrey. Doubtleſſe, if the CARTHAGINIANS would haue followed the graue counſell of Hanno, rather then to haue giuen place to their deſires, and had followed the Authour of peace, and not to haue bene ruled by them that gaue councell to make warres: they had not taſted of thoſe miſeries which their country afterwards came vnto. But giuing place to the furie and ambitious mind of a yong man, they heaped ſuch miſchiefes on their heads, as afterwards fell out vpon them. Therfore it is very meete for wiſe magiſtrates & gouernors of commōweales, alwaies rather to haue an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end: & euer to decide all matters by aduiſe & councel, before they ſhould take any wars in hand. Now the SAGVNTINES ſeeing themſelues beſieged by Hannibal, & that againſt all reaſon & equitie he made wars vpon them: they notwithſtanding valiantly defended the ſiege many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Hannibal had many mo men then they (hauing a hundred and fiftie thouſand men in his camp) & that the moſt part of their rampars were battered and ouerthrown: they liked rather to abide the ſacke of their citie, then to yeeld themſelues to the mercie of their mortall mortall enemie. So ſome do report, that SAGVNTVS was taken the eight moneth after ſiege was laid vnto it. But Liuie ſeemeth not to agree to that, neither to ſet downe any certaine time of the continuance of the ſiege. Now the taking of this ſo wealthie a citie, was a great furtherance diuerſe wayes to Hannibals enterpriſes. For many cities taking example of the ſacke of SAGVNTVS, who before miſliking to be ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, were readie to rebell: they kept themſelues quiet, and the ſouldiers alſo waxed liuely and couragious: ſeeing the rich ſpoiles that were deuided in the campe. So Hannibal ſent great preſents of the ſpoiles of the SAGVNTINES vnto CARTHAGE, whereby he wanne the chiefeſt men of the citie, and made them like the better of warres: whom he determined to leade with him againſt the ROMAINES, not in SPAINE as many ſuppoſed, but into ITALIE it ſelfe. Whileſt theſe matters were in hand, the Ambaſſadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the ſlender anſwer they had receiued, in manner at the ſelfe ſame time when they had intelligence of the ſacke of SAGVNTVS. Hereupon the ROMAINES greatly repented themſelues (though ſomewhat too late) for that they aided not their friendes and confederates in ſo great a daunger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very ſorie for it, and therewith alſo maruellouſly offended, they deuided the prouinces vnto the Conſuls, to wit, SPAINE vnto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICKE and SICILE alſo vnto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certaine of the nobleſt men of the citie were ſent Ambaſſadors vnto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senat for breach of the peace, and alſo to denounce vnto them the cauſe of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaime open warre againſt them, after they had declared the occaſion thereof to come of themſelues. This was as brauely receiued of the CARTHAGINIANS, as luſtily offered vnto them: but therein they were not ſo well aduiſed, as the ſucceſſe of that warre in the end ſufficiently proued it to them. Now Hannibal being aduertiſed how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with himſelfe that it was time to go into ITALIE, as he had determined frō the beginning: he made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to prepare his ſhippes and things ready, and ſo required aide of the cities that were his beſt friends and confederates, and commaunded that all the bandes ſhould meete him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good garriſons in places moſt conuenient, in AFRICKE and SPAINE, which he thought aboue all things elſe to be moſt neceſſarie: becauſe that when he ſhould go into ITALIE, the ROMAINES ſhould not win it from him. Therfore he ſent into AFRICKE, twelue hundred horſmen, and thirteene thouſand footmen, all SPANIARDS: and beſides, he brought out of diuers parts of AFRICKE foure thonſand ſouldiers, and placed them in garriſon in CARTHAGE, obtaining both hoſtages and ſouldiers by this meanes. So he left the gouernment of SPAINE to his brother Haſdrubal, and gaue him an army of fiftie ſhips of war, two thouſand horſmen, & twelue thouſand footmen. Theſe were the garriſons he left in both thoſe prouinces. Now he thought them not ſufficient to withſtand the power of the ROMAINS, if they bent their warres into SPAINE or AFRICKE: but becauſe he thought thē ſtrong inough to ſtay the enemy from ouerrunning of the country, vntill that hauing brought his army by land, he had ſet foot in ITALY. Moreouer, he knew that the CARTHAGINIANS were ſtrong inough to leauie a new army if they liſted, and if need ſo required, to ſend him aide alſo into ITALY. For, after that they had driuen away this ſo daungerous a warre, procured againſt them through the ſpite of the mercenarie ſouldiers hauing euer after obtained victorie: firſt vnder the conduct of Hamilcar: ſecondly, vnder Haſdrubal: and laſtly, vnder Hannibal: they were grown to ſuch greatnes & ſtrength, that at what time Hannibal came into ITALY, their Empire and dominions were maruellouſly enlarged. For they had al the coaſt of AFRIKE, which lyeth ouer againſt the ſea Mediterranēū, from the altars of the Philenians, which be not far from the great Syrte, vnto Hercules pillars: and containeth in length *two thouſand paces. So after they had paſſed the ſtraight which deuideth AFRICKE from EVROPE, they poſſeſſed almoſt all SPAINE, to the mountaines Pirenei, which doe deuide SPAINE from GAVLE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICKE and SPAINE: Hannibal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his armie was readie for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his men together, and encouraging them with great and large promiſes, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALY: & made great account vnto them of the friendſhip of the GAVLES, and in the end he bad them be of good courage, and ſet luſtily forward. Thereupon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and brought his army all alongſt the coaſt, vnto the riuer of Iberus. It is reported, that the next day following, Hannibal dreamed he ſaw a yong man, of a maruellous terrible looke & ſtature, who bad him follow him into ITALY: but afterwards, that he ſaw a ſnake of a wonderfull greatnes, making a maruellous noiſe: and being deſirous to vnderſtand what the ſame might ſignifie, it was told him, that it betokened the deſtruction of ITALIE. It is not to be maruelled at, though the great care and thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALIE, made his mind to run of ſuch fancies in the night, as dreaming of victorie or deſtruction, or ſuch other calamities of war. For they are things that happē often, as Cicero the Orator ſaith: that our thoughts and words do beget ſuch things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homer: to wit, like to thoſe his mind moſt ran on, or that he talked of moſt. Now, after Hannibal had paſſed ouer the monntaines Pirenei, and that he had alſo won the GAVLES hearts with bountifull gifts: in few daies he came to the riuer of Rhone. The head of the riuer of Rhone, is not far from the heads of the riuers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENVA. Then it runneth from thence towards the weſt, and deuideth the GAVLS a pretie way: and then being increaſed by the riuer of Arar (called in French, Saone) and with other riuers, in the end it falleth into the ſea with diuers heads, betwixt the VOLSCES and the CAVARIANS. The VOLSCES at that time inhabited both the ſides of the riuer of Rhone, and were ful of people, and the richeſt of al the other GAVLS. They hauing vnderſtanding of Hannibals comming, paſſed ouer the riuer, and armed themſelues, and prepared on the other ſide to ſtoppe the CARTHAGINIANS, that they ſhould not paſſe ouer. Nowe, though Hannibal had won all the other GAVLES, yet thoſe he could neuer win neither by gifts, nor threates, to cauſe them rather to proue the friendſhip of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Hannibal perceiuing he was to handle ſuch enemies rather by pollicie, he commanded Hanno the ſon of Bomilcar, ſecretly to paſſe ouer the riuer of Rhone, with part of the army, and ſo to ſet vpon the GAVLES on the ſodaine. Thereupon Hanno (as he was commanded) made a long iourney, and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer at paſſable foords: he ſhewed himſelfe hard by the enemies campe before they ſaw him, or that they knew what it was. The GAVLES hearing their ſhouts and cries behind thē, and hauing their hands full of Hannibal before them', who had many boats readie to paſſe ouer his men: they hauing no leyſure to conſult of the matter, neither to arme themſelues to ſtand to defence, left their campe and fled for life. So they being driuen from the other ſide of the riuer, the reſt of the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS paſſed ouer it with ſafetie. In the meane time, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a litle before was come vnto MASSILIA, ſtill heard newes of Hannibals armie. Wherefore, to be more aſſured of the matter, he ſent a band of choice horſemen to diſcouer what the enemies intent was: who making great ſpeede as they were commaunded, met by chaunce with fiue hundred horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, whom Hannibal had alſo ſent to bring him word of the ROMAINES armie. So, they firſt ſodainly gaue charge vpon the NVMIDIANS, and after a hote and valiant conflict betweene both the parties, in the end the ROMAINS ouercomming them, they made them flie, but with great loſſe of their men: howbeit the greateſt loſſe and ſlaughter fell vpon the enemies. So Hannibal by this meanes found where the ROMAINES lay, and ſtood in a great doubt with himſelfe, whether he ſhould keepe on his way into ITALIE, or elſe lead his army againſt the Conſull that then was, and ſo to proue his hap and ſucceſſe. At length debating many waies in his mind, and vncertaine which way he would determine: the Ambaſſadors of the BOIANS perſwaded him to leaue all other deuiſes, and to go on into ITALIE. For before that Hannibal had paſſed ouer the mountains Pirenei, the BOIANS hauing by craft taken the ROMAINS Ambaſſadors, and done great miſchiefe vnto Manlius the Prætor, & intiſed the INSVBRIANS alſo: they were reuolted from the ROMANES, and took part with Hannibal, and only becauſe the ROMAINES had repleniſhed the cities of PLACENTIA, and CREMONA with people, and had made them Colonies to ROME. So Hannibal being ruled by their counſell, raiſed his campe, and keeping the riuers ſide, ſtill going againſt the riuer: in few daies he came to the place which the GAVLES do call the Iland, the which the riuer of Arar and Rhodanus comming from diuers mountaines do make there. So at this preſent, there is the famous citie of LION in GAVLE, which they ſay was built long time after by Plancus Munatius. From thence he came to the countrey of the ALLOBROGES, and hauing pacified the variance betwixt two brethren for the realme, he came through the countrie of the CASTINIANS and VOCONTIANS, to the riuer of Durance. The heade of this riuer commeth from the Alpes, and from thence running with a ſwift ſtreame, falleth into the riuer of Rhone: & as it oftentimes changeth her courſe, ſo hath it in manner no paſſable ford. Yet Hannibal hauing paſt it ouer, he led his army vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine countries, as farre as he could: howbeit, as he paſſed through them, he had great loſſes, as it is reported. Inſomuch that ſome that were liuing at that time, did affirme, that they heard Hannibal himſelfe ſay, that he had loſt aboue thirtie thouſand men, and the moſt part of his horſemen. For he was forced not onely to fight with the inhabitants of the mountaines, but alſo compelled to make wayes through the ſtraights: ſo that in certaine places of the higheſt rockes, he was driuen to make paſſages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had paſſed the Alpes in fifteene dayes ſpace, he came downe into the valley, not farre from the citie of TVRINE. Whereby it ſeemeth to me, that he paſſed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one ſide of it hath the riuer of Druentia, and on the other ſide it goeth downe to the citie of TVRINE. Now it is hard to ſay truely, what number of men he had when he was come into ITALIE, becauſe of mens diuerſities of opinions. For ſome write, that he had a hundred thouſand footmen, and twenty thouſand horſemen: others alſo write, that he had twentie thouſand footmen, and ſixe thouſand horſemen, all AFRICANS and SPANIARDS. But others reckoning the GAVLES and LIGVRIANS, doe count foureſcore thouſand footemen, and ten thouſand horſemen. Yet is not credible, that his armie was ſo great, as the firſt men report, and ſpecially hauing paſſed through ſo many countries, and alſo receiued ſuch loſſe as he had: neither alſo could his number be ſo ſmall, as the ſecond reporters do make it, if a man will conſider the famous exploites and great enterpriſes he did afterwardes. So that I like their opinions beſt, which keepe the meane betweene them both: conſidering that he brought into ITALIE, the better part of foureſcore thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand horſmen, the which he had leauied in SPAINE: as it is manifeſtly knowne alſo, that a great number of the LIGVRIANS and GAVLES came to ioyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMAINES, that gaue no place nor grouud vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Hannibal being come from TVRINE, into the countrey of the INSVBRIANS: he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull ſpeede from MASSILIA, and hauing paſſed the riuers of Po and Teſin, he camped not farre from the enemie. So ſhortly after, both the Generals being come into the fielde to view each others campe, the horſemen of either ſide grew to skirmiſh, which continued long, and was not to be diſcerned which of them had the better. Howbeit, in the end the ROMAINES ſeeing the Conſuil hurt, and alſo that the horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compaſſe them in: they were driuen to giue ground, and ſo pretily retired, defending the Conſull the beſt they could to ſaue him, and ſo at length recouered their campe. It is reported, that Publius Cornelius Scipio, was ſaued at that time through his ſons helpe, who afterwardes was called AFRICAN, and at that time was but a yong ſtrippling: whoſe prayſe, though it was wonderfull in ſo greene a youth, yet it is likely to be true, becauſe of the famous and valiant actes that he did afterwardes. Now Scipio hauing prooued how much his enemie was ſtronger then himſelfe in horſemen: he determined to place his campe ſo, as his footmen might be in beſt ſafetie, and alſo fight with greateſt aduantage. And therefore the next night following he paſſed the riuer of Po, and made as litle noiſe as he could, and went vnto PLACENTIA. The like ſhortly after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had bene reſtored frō baniſhment by the Senate, and ſent for out of SICILE: becauſe both the Conſuls ſhould gouerne the cōmon wealth by one ſelfe authoritie. Hannibal alſo followed them both with all his armie, and pitched his campe neare vnto the riuer of Trebia: hoping that becauſe both campes lay ſo neere together, ſome occaſion would be offered to fight, the which he chiefly deſired, both becauſe he could not long maintaine war for lacke of victuals, as alſo that he miſtruſted the fickleneſſe of the GAVLES. Who like as they ſoone fell in league and friendſhippe with him, drawne vnto it with hope of chaunge, and with the fame alſo of his victorie obtained: ſo he miſtruſted that vpon any light occaſion (as if the war ſhould continue any long time in their country) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the ROMAINS againſt him, as the onely authour of this warre. For theſe reſpects therefore, he deuiſed all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time Sempronius the other Conſull, met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with ſpoile, ſtraggling vp and downe the fieldes, whom he charged and put to flight. So, imagining the like ſucceſſe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall: he had good hope of victorie, if once both the armies might come to fight. Therefore being maruellous deſirous to doe ſome noble enterpriſe before Scipio were recouered of his hurt, and that the new Conſull ſhould be choſen: he determined to ioyne battell againſt the wil of his other colleague and fellow Conſul Scipio, who thought nothing could be to leſſe purpoſe, then to put all the ſtate and commonwealth in ieopardie, ſpecially hauing all the whole GAVLES in maner in the field againſt him. Now Hannibal had ſecret intelligence of all this variance, by ſpials he had ſent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politicke and ſubtill as he was, found out a place ſtraight betweene both campes, couered ouer with buſhes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lie in ambuſh, with a companie of choſen men. Then he commaunded the horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, to ſcurrie to the trenches of the ROMAINS, to intice them to come to battell: & thereupon made the reſidue of his armie to eate, and ſo put them in very good order of battell, to be readie vpon any occaſion offered. Now the Conſull Sempronius, at the firſt tumult of the NVMIDIANS, ſodainely ſent his horſemen to encounter them, and after them put out ſixe thouſand footmen, and in the end came himſelfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middeſt of winter, and extreame cold, and ſpecially in the places incloſed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Now the NVMIDIANS as they were commaunded, intiſed the ROMAINES by litle and litle on this ſide the riuer of Trebia, vntill they came to the place where they might diſcerne their enſignes: and then they ſodainly turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NVMIDIANS, oftentimes to flie of ſet purpoſe, and then to ſtay vpon the ſodaine when they ſee time, to charge their enemie more hotely and fiercely then before. Whereupon Sempronius incontinently gathered his horſemen together, and did ſet his men in battell ray, as time required, to giue charge vpon his enemie, that ſtayed for him in order of battell. For Hannibal had caſt his men into ſquadrons, readie vpon any occaſion. The skirmiſh beganne firſt by the light horſemen, and afterwards increaſed hoter by ſupply of the men of armes: howbeit, the ROMAINE Knights being vnable to beare the ſhocke of the enemies, they were quickly broken. So that the legions maintained the battell with ſuch furie and noble courage, that they had bene able to haue reſiſted, ſo they had fought but with footmen only. But on the one ſide, the horſmen and Elephants made them affraid, and on the other ſide the footemen followed them very luſtily, and fought with great furie againſt famiſhed and frozen men. Wherefore the ROMAINS notwithſtanding, ſuffering all the miſeries that vexed them on euery ſide, with an vnſpeakeable courage and magnanimitie, ſuch as was aboue their force and ſtrength: they fought ſtill, vntill that Mago comming out of his ambuſh, came and ſodainly aſſailed them with great ſhoutes and cries, and that the middle ſquadron of the CARTHAGINIANS alſo (through Hannibals commandement) flew vpon the CENOMANIANS. Then the ROMAINES ſeeing their confederates flie, their hearts were done, and vtterly diſcouraged. It is ſaid that there were ten thouſaud footmen of the ROMAINES got to PLACENTIA, and came through the enemies. The reſt of the armie that fled, were moſt part of them ſlaine by the CARTHAGINIANS. The Conſull Sempronius alſo ſcaped very narrowly from the enemies. The victorie coſt Hannibal the ſetting on alſo: for he loſt a great number of his men, and the moſt part of all his Elephants were ſlaine. After this battel, Hannibal ouercame all the countrie, and did put all to fire and ſword, and tooke alſo certaine townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the countrimen flie, that were diſorderly gathered together in battel. Then at the beginning of the Spring, he brought his armie into the field ſooner then time required: & meaning to go into THVSCAN, he was driuen backe by a great tẽpeſt at the very top of the height of the Appenine, and ſo cõpelled to bring his armie about PLACENTIA: howbeit, ſhortly after he put himſelfe againe into the fields for diuers vrgent & neceſſarie cauſes. For had he not ſaued himſelfe by that pollicie, he had almoſt bene taken tardie by the ambuſh of the GAVLES: who being angry with him that the war cõtinued ſo long in their countrie, they ſought to be reuenged of him, as the only author & occaſion of the war. Therfore perceiuing it was time for him to auoid this danger, he made all the haſt he could to lead his army into ſome other prouince. Furthermore, he thought it would increaſe his eſtimation much among ſtrangers, and alſo greatly encourage his owne people, if he could make the power of the CARTHAGINIANS to ſeeme ſo great, and alſo their Captaine to be of ſo noble a courage, as to dare to make war ſo neare to the citie of ROME. All things therfore ſet apart, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and ſo cõming through the countrie of the LIGVRIANS, he came into THVSCAN, by the way that bringeth them into the champion countrey, & to the mariſhes about the riuer of Arnus. The riuer of Arnus at that time was very high, & had ouerflowne all the fields thereabouts. Hannibal therefore marching with ſo great an armie as he had, could not auoide auoide it, but that he muſt needs loſe a number of his men and horſe, before he could get out of thoſe euill-fauoured mariſhes. Inſomuch that he himſelfe loſt one of his eyes, by reaſon of the great paines he had taken day and night without ſleepe or reſt, and alſo through the euill aire: though he was caried vpon a high Elephants backe, which onely was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Conſull, to whom the charge of Sempronius armie was giuen: he was come vnto ARETIVM againſt the Senates mind, who were maruellouſly offended with him, becauſe he left his companion Cn. Seruilius at ROME, and went vnto his prouince by ſtealth as it were, without the furniture of a Conſul & his officers. This was a very haſtie man of nature, & one that the people had brought to that dignitie & office: ſo that he was become ſo proud and inſolent, that men might ſee how he wold hazard all things without wit or iudgement. Hannibal hauing intelligence thereof, thought it the beſt way to anger the Conſul, and to do what he could poſſible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Conſull ſhould come to ioyne with him. Therfore he marching forward with his campe through the countrey of FESVLA and ARETIVM, he burnt & ſpoiled all the country therabouts, and filled them all with feare, neuer leauing to deſtroy all before him, vntill he came to the mountaine Cortonenſes, and ſo to the lake called Thraſimene. When he had viewed the place he went about to ſurpriſe his enemie by ſome ambuſh: wherupon he co nueyed certaine horſemen vnder the hils, hard by the ſtraight that goeth vnto Thraſimene, and behind the mountaines alſo, he placed his light horſemen. Then he himſelfe with the reſt of his army came downe into the field, ſuppoſing that the Conſull would not be quiet: and ſo it fell out. For hote ſtirring heads are eaſily intrapped, & fall into the enemies ambuſh, & oftentimes do put all in hazard, becauſe they will follow no counſell nor good aduice. C. Flaminius therfore ſeeing their country vtterly ſpoiled, the corne deſtroyed and cut down, & the houſes burnt: he made great haſt to lead his army againſt the enemy cõtrary to all mens minds, who would haue had him taried for his cõpanion Cn. Seruilius the other Conſul. So euen at Sun ſet, when he was come to the ſtraights of the lake of Thraſimene, he cauſed his campe to ſtay there, although his men were not wearie with the long iourney they had taken by the way. So the next morning by break of day making no view of the country, he wẽt ouer the mountaines. Then Hannibal (who long before was prepared for this) did but ſtay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he ſaw the ROMAINES come into the plaine, he gaue a ſignall vnto all his men to giue charge vpon the enemie. Therupon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on euery ſide, came before and behind, and on the flankes to aſſaile the enemie, being ſhut in betweene the lake and the mountaines. Nowe in contrarie manner, the ROMAINES beginning to fight out of order, they fought incloſed together, that they could not ſee one another, as if it had bene darke: ſo that it is to be wondred at, how, and with what minde they fought it out ſo long, conſidering they were compaſſed in on euery ſide. For they fought it out aboue three houres ſpace, with ſuch furie and courage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that preſent time, neither did they offer to flie or ſtirre a foot: vntill they heard that the Conſull C. Flaminius going from ranke to rancke to encourage his men, was ſlaine by a man of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had loſt their Generall, and being voide of all hope, they fled, ſome towardes the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which diuerſe of them flying, were ouertaken and ſlaine. So there were ſlaine* fifteene thouſand in the field, and there ſcaped about ten thouſand. Furthermore, the report went, that there were ſixe thouſand footemen which forcibly (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and there ſtayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Hannibals promiſe: but they were betrayed, and ſlaine euery mothers ſonne of them. After this great victory, Hannibal did let diuerſe ITALIAN priſoners go free without raunſome paying, after he had vſed them maruellous curteouſly: becauſe that the fame of his clemencie & curteſie ſhold be knowne vnto all nations, wheras indeed his own nature was contrarie to al vertues. For he was haſtie and cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in warres, and exerciſed in murther, treaſon and ambuſhes layed for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor ciuill gouernment. So by this meanes he became one of the cruelleſt Captaines, the moſt ſubtill and craftieſt to deceiue and intrap his enemie, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemie: ſo thoſe whom he could not ouercome in war by plaine force, he went about to intrap by ſleight & policie. The which appeareth true by this preſent battell, and alſo by the other he fought againſt the Conſull Sempronius, by the riuer of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leaue this talke till another time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow & death of the Conſull Flaminius was reported at ROME, hauing loſt the moſt part of his armie: there was great mone & lamentation made through all the city of ROME. Some bewailing the cõmon miſerie of the cõmonwealth, others lamenting their priuate particular loſſe, & ſome alſo ſorrowing for both together. But indeed it was a wofull ſight, to ſee a woild of men & women to run to the gates of the city, euery one priuatly asking for their kin & friends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very ſorie & penſiue, diſpairing of the ſafetie of their ſons, died ſodainly for the extreame ioy they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they ſaw their ſons aliue & ſafe. At the ſelfe ſame time, Cn. Seruilius, the other Conſull with C. Flaminius, did ſend him 4000 horſemen, not vnderſtanding yet of the battell that was fought by the lake of Thraſimene. But when they heard of the ouerthrow of their men by the way, & therfore thought to haue fled into VMBRIA: they were cõpaſſed in by the horſmen of the enemies, & ſo brought vnto Hannibal. Now the Empire of ROME being brought into ſo great extremitie & danger, becauſe of ſo many ſmall loſſes one in the necke of another: it was ordained, that an extraordinarie Gouernor or Magiſtrate ſhould be choſen, who ſhould be created Dictator: an office ſpecially vſed to be reſerued for the laſt hope and remedy in moſt extreame danger & perill, of the ſtate & cõmonwealth. But becauſe the Cõſull Seruilius could not returne at that time to ROME, all the waies being kept by the enemy: the people contrary to their cuſtome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the ſurname of Maximus, to ſay, Very great) who likewiſe did name M. Minutius, Generall of the horſemen. Now this Fabius was a graue & wiſe counſeller, and of great authority & eſtimation in the cõmonwealth: inſomuch as the citizens had all their hope & cõfidence in him only, perſwading thẽſelues, that the honor of ROME might be better preſerued vnder the gouernment & conduct of ſuch a Generall, rather then vnder the gouernment of any other man whatſoeuer. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefully and diligently giuen order for all things neceſſary: he departed from ROME, and when he had receiued the armie of the late Conſull Cn. Seruilius, he added vnto them two other legions, and ſo went vnto the enemy. Now Hannibal was gone frõ the lake of Thraſimene, and went directly towards the citie of SPOLETVM, to ſee if he could take it at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſaw that the townef-men ſtood vpon the rampers of their wals, and valiantly defended themſelues: he then left the towne and deſtroyed the countrey as he went, and burnt houſes and villages, and ſo went into APVLIA, through the marches of ANCÕNA, and the countrey of the MARSIANS and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the citie of ARPY, not farre from the campe of the enemie, to the end to draw out the warre at length. For the raſhneſſe and foole-hardines of the former Captains aforetime, had brought the ſtate of ROME into ſuch miſerie, that they thought it a victorie vnto them, not to be ouercome by the enemie, that had ſo often ouercome them. Whereby all things were turned ſtraight with the change and alteration of the Captaine: for though Hannibal had ſet his men in battell raye, and afterwards perceiuing his enemy ſtirred not, went and deſtroyed the countrey, hoping thereby to intice the Dictator to fight, when he ſhould ſee the countrey of his confederates ſo ſpoiled, as it was before his face: the Dictator, this notwithſtanding, was not mooued withall, but ſtill kept his men cloſe together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Hannibal was in a maruellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often remoued his campe, to the ende that going diuerſe wayes, ſome occaſion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemie, or elſe to giue battell. So when he had paſſed the mountaine Appenine, he came vnto SAMNIVM. But becauſe ſhortly after, ſome of CAMPANIA, who hauing bene taken priſoners by the lake of Thraſimene, had bene ſet at liberty without ranſome: they putting him in hope that he might take the city of CAPVA, he made his army march forward, and tooke a guide that knew the country, to bring him vnto CASINVM. Now the guide ouerhearing CASINVM, vnderſtood it CASILINVM, and ſo miſtaking the ſound of the word, brought the army a cleane contrary way vnto CALENTINVM and CALENVM, & from thence about STELLA. So when they came into a country enuironned about with mountaines & riuers, Hannibal knew ſtraight they had miſtaken their way, & ſo did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patiently, and was contented to giue Hannibal libertie to take his pleaſure which way he would: vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Caſilinum, where he placed his garriſon, being places of great aduauntage and commoditie. So the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS was in manner compaſſed in euery way, and they muſt needes haue dyed died for famine in that place, or elſe haue fled, to their great ſhame and diſhonour: had not Hannibal by this ſtratageme preuented the danger. Who knowing the daunger all his armie ſtood in and hauing ſpied a fit time for it: he commaunded his ſouldiers to bring foorth two thouſand oxen which they had gotten in ſpoile in the fieldes, hauing great ſtore of them, and then tying torches of fire-linkes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimbleſt men he had to light them, and to driue the oxen vp the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe of the firſt watch. All this was duely executed according to his commaundement, and the oxen running vp to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them faire and ſoftly. Now the ROMAINES that had long before placed a ſtrong garriſon vpon the mountaines, they were affraid of this ſtraunge ſight, and miſtruſting ſome ambuſh, they foorthwith forſooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius himſelfe miſtruſting alſo that it was ſome ſtratageme of the enemy, kept his men within the campe, and could not well tell what to ſay to it. In the meane time Hannibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Sweſſa, which the countrimen do call, The tower of the bathes, and brought all his armie ſafe into ALBA: and ſhortly after, he marched directly as though he would go to ROME, howbeit he ſodainly turned out of the way, and went preſently into APVLIA. There he tooke the citie of GLERENVM, a very rich and wealthie towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, and came and camped by LAVRINVM, not farre from the CARTHAGINIANS campe. So he being ſent for to ROME about waightie affaires of the ſtate, there was no remedie, but that he muſt needes depart from thence with all the ſpeede he could: howbeit before he went, he left Marcus Minutius Generall of the horſemen, his Lieutenant of all the armie, and commaunded him in his abſence not once to ſtirre nor to meddle with the enemies. For he was fully bent to follow his determination, which was: not to vexe the enemie, nor to fight with him, though he were prouoked vnto it. Howbeit Marcus Minutius litle regarding the Dictators commaundement, his backe was no ſooner turned, but he ſet vpon a companie of the enemies diſperſed in the field a foraging, and ſlue a great number of them, and fought with the reſt euen into their campe. The rumor of this skirmiſh flew ſtraight to ROME, and there was ſuch great account made of it, that it was eſteemed for a victorie: and the commonpeople were ſo ioyfull of it, that they ſtraight made the power of the Lieutenant equall with the Dictator Fabius, the which was neuer heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreame iniurie with a noble courage, hauing no way deſerued it, he returned againe into the campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one ſelf time, (a thing neuer ſeene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the armie betweene thē, either of them commaunded his armie apart, as the Conſuls were wont to do before. Marcus Minutius thereupon grew to ſuch a pride and haughtie mind, that one day he ventured to giue battell, and made not his companion Fabius a counſel withall: the which Hannibal hauing ſo often ouercome, durſt ſcantly haue enterpriſed. So he led his armie into ſuch a place, where the enemie had compaſſed them in: inſomuch that Hannibal ſlue them at his pleaſure, without any hope left them to eſcape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather reſpecting the honour of his countrey, then remembring the priuate iniurie he had receiued. For he comming freſh with his armie to the battell, made Hannibal affraid, that the ROMAINES legions had libertie to retire with ſafetie. Whereby Fabius wan great fame for his wiſedome and valiantnes, both of his owne ſouldiers, as alſo of the enemies themſelues. For it was reported that Hannibal ſhould ſay, (returning into his campe) That in this battell he had ouercome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was alſo ouercome by Fabius. And Minutius ſelfe alſo confeſſing Fabius wiſedome, and conſidering that (according to Heſiodus ſaying) it was good reaſon to obey a better man then himſelfe: he came with all his armie vnto Fabius campe, and renouncing his authority, came and humbly ſaluted Fabius as his father, and all that day there was great ioy, and reioycing among the ſouldiers. So both the armies being placed in garriſon for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Conſuls created, L. Paulus Æmylius, and C. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was brought to be Conſul. So they had libertie and commiſſion to leauie a greater armie then the Generals before them had done. Wherby the legions were newly ſupplyed, and alſo others added vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Conſuls were come into the armie, as they were of ſeuerall diſpoſitions, ſo did they alſo obſerue diuerſe manners in their gouernment. Lucius Paulus, who was a graue wiſe man, and one that purpoſed to follow Fabius counſell and fashions: he did desire to draw out the war in length, and to stay the enemy without fighting. Varro on the other side was a hastie man, and venturous, and desired nothing but to fight. So it chaunced, that not long after it was knowne, to the great cost and daunger of the citie of Rome, what difference there was betwixt the modestie of Æmylius, and the foole-hardinesse of Varro. For Hannibal being affraid of some stirre and tumult in his campe for lacke of victuals, he departed from Gerenvm, and going into the warmest place of Apvlia, came and camped with all his armie, by a village called Cannes. So he was followed with both the Consuls, who came and camped severally hard by him, but so neare one to another, that there was but the riuer of Aufide that parted them. This riuer (as it is reported) doth alone deuide the mountaine of the Appenine, and taketh his heade on that side of the mountaine that lyeth to the sea side, from whence it runneth to the sea Adriaticum. Now Lucius Paulus finding that it was impossible for Hannibal being in a straunge countrey, to maintaine so great an armie of such sundrie nations together: he was fully bent to tracte time, and to auoyde battell, perswading himselfe that it was the right and onely way to ouercome him, being as much to the enemies disaduantage, as also maruellous profitable and beneficiall for the common-wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Varro, had caried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Hannibals armie had bene ouerthrowne by the Romaines, without stroke striking. Howbeit, he had such a light head of his owne, and was so fickle minded, that he neither regarded wise counsell, nor Paulus Æmylius authoritie: but in contrarie manner would fall out with him, and also complained before the souldiers, for that he kept his men pent vp and idle, whilest the enemie did put foorth his men to the fielde in battell raye. So when his turne came, that he was absolutely to commaund the whole armie, (for they both had absolute power by turnes) he passed ouer the riuer of Aufide by breake of day, and gaue the signall of battell without the priuitie of his companion Æmylius, who rather followed him against his will then willingly, because he could doe none otherwise. So he caused a scarlet coate of armes to be put out very earely in the morning, for a signall of battell. Hannibal on the other side being as glad of it as might be possible, that he had occasion offered him to fight: (considering that the continuall delaying of battell did aulter all his purpose) hee passed his armie ouer the riuer, and had straight put them in very good order. For he had taken great spoyles of his enemies to furnish himselfe very brauely. Nowe the armie of the Romaines stoode South-ward, insomuch that the South winde (which the men of the countrey call Vulturnus) blewe full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrarie maner had the vauntage of the wind and Sunne vpon their backes, and their battell stoode in this manner. The Africans were placed in both the wings, and the Gavles and Spaniards set in a squadron in the middest. The light horsemen first beganne the skirmish, and after them followed the men of armes: and because the space betwixt the riuer and the footemen was very narrowe, so as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So, the horsemen of the Romaines being ouerthrowne, the footemen came with such a lustie courage to receiue the charge, that they thought they should not haue day enough to fight. Howbeit, the ouer-earnest desire they had to ouercome their enemies, made their ouerthrow more miserable, then their ioy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the Gavles and Spaniards, (who as we haue said before kept the battell) not being able any longer to withstand the force of the Romaines, they retired towards the Africans in the wings. The Romaines perceiuing that, ranne vpon the enemie with all the furie they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middest of them. Then the Carthaginians that were in both wings, came and compassed them in before they were aware. Moreouer, there were fiue hundred of the Nvmidian horsemen, that colourably fled vnto the Consuls, who receiued them very curteously, and placed them in the rereward of the armie. They seeing their time, shewed behind the enemies, and did sodainely giue them charge. Then the armie of the Romanes was vtterly ouerthrowne, and Hannibal obtained victorie. Liue writeth, that there were slaine in this battel* forty thousand footmen, & aboue two thousand seuen hundred horsemen. Polybius saith, that there were many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the Romaines had neuer greater losse, neither in the first war with Africke, nor in the second by the Carthaginians, as this ouerthrow that was giuen at Cannes. For there was slaine the Consul Paulus Æmylius himselfe, a man vndoubtedly deseruing great praise, and that serued his countrey and common-wealth euen to the hower of

of death: Cn. Seruilius, (Consull the yeare before) was also slaine there, and many other that had bene Consuls, Prætors, and others of such like dignitie, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other Senators and honest citizens, and that such a number of them, that the very cruelte it selfe of the enemy was satisfied. The Consull Terentius Varro, who was the onely authour of all this warre and slaughter, seeing the enemie victor euery way, he saued himselfe by flying. And Tutidanus a Chieftaine of a band, cõming through his enemies with a good companie of his men, he came vnto CANVSIVM. Thither came also about ten thousand men, that had escaped from their enemies, as out of a daungerous storme: by whose consent, the charge of the whole armie was giuen vnto Appius Pulcher, and also vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwardes did end this warre. Thus was the end of the battell fought by CANNES. Newes flew straight to ROME of this ouerthrowe, the which though they iustly filled all the citie with sorrow and calamitie, yet the Senate and people of ROME kept alwaies their countenance and greatnesse, euen in this extreame miserie. Insomuch they had not onely good hope to keepe their citie safe, but furthermore they leauied a new armie, and made young men to beare armor, and yet left not SICILE and SPAINE vnprouided in the meane time: so that they made the world to wonder at them, to consider these things, how they could in so great calamitie and trouble haue so noble hearts, and such wise counsell. But to let passe the former ouerthrowes, and great losses they sustained at Ticinum, at Trebia, and at the lake of Thrasimene: what nation or people could haue borne this last plague, whereby the whole force and power of the ROMAINES was in manner vtterly destroyed and ouerthrowne? and yet the people of ROME so held it out, and that with so great wisdome & counsell: that they neither lacked manhood nor magnanimity. Besides, to helpe them the more, Hannibal being conqueror, trifling time in taking his leysure, and refreshing his armie: he gaue the ROMAINES leysure that were ouercome to take breath againe, and to restore themselues. For doubtles, if Hannibal being conquerour, had immediatly after the victorie obtained, brought his armie directly to ROME, surely the ROMAINES had bene vtterly vndone, or at the least had bene cõpelled to haue put all in venture. So it is reported, that Hannibal oftentimes afterwards repented himself he followed not his victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counsell which wished him to let his soldiers rest, then Maharbals aduice, generall of his horsmen, who would haue had him gone straight to ROME, & so haue ended all this war. But he seeing Hannibals delay, told him (as it is reported) this that is now cõmon in euery mans mouth: Hannibal, thou knowest how to ouercom, but thou knowest not how to vse victory. But what? all things are not (as Nestor saith in Homer) giuen to men altogether. For some had no skill to ouercome, others knew not how to follow their victory, & some also could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES that made war with the ROMAINES, was one of the famousest Captaines that euer was: yet as men write of him, though he was maruellous fortunate to conquer realmes, he would neuer keepe them. Euen so in like maner, some Captaines haue bene indued with excellent vertues, & yet notwithstanding haue bene insufficient in martiall affairs deseruing praise in a captaine, as we may reade in diuers histories. Now after this battell fought by CANNES, the ATTELLANIANS, the CALATINIANS, the SAMNITES, after thẽ also the BRVTIANS, LVCANIANS and diuers other nations & people of ITALY, caried away with the fame of this great victorie: they all came and yeelded to Hannibal. And the citie of CAPVA also (which Hannibal was desirous to haue won long before) forsaking their old friends & confederates, made new league and friendship with Hannibal: the which wan him great estimation with other nations. For at that time the citie of CAPVA was very populous & of great power, and the chiefest city of estimation of all ITALIE next vnto ROME. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPVA, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the THVSCANS, the which was first called VVLTVRNVM, and after that CAPVA, by the name of their Gouernor called Capius: or otherwise, (as it is most likely) because of the fields round about it. For on euery side of it, there are goodly pleasant fields, ful of all kinds of fruits growing on the earth, called in Greeke, Kepi. Furthermore, all the countrey is confined round about with famous nations. Towards the sea there dwell the SVESSANIANS, the CVMANIANS, & the NEAPOLITANS. On firme land also towards the North, are the CALENTINIANS, & the CALENIANS. On the East & Southside, the DVNIANS and the NOLIANS. Furthermore, the place is of a strong situation, and on the one side is compassed in with the sea, and on the other side with great high mountains. Now the CAMPANIANS flourished maruellously at that time: and therefore seeing the ROMAINES in manner vtterly vndone by the battell they had lost at quickly tooke part with the ſtronger,as it cõmonly falleth out:and furthermore beſides that they made league with Hannibal,they receiued him into their citie with great triumph, hoping that the war being ended,they ſhold be the chiefeſt and wealthieſt of all ITALY.But marke how men are cõmonly deceiued in their expectation.Now,when Hannibal came into the citie of CAPVA, there was a world of people that went to ſee him,for the great fame they heard of him.For there was no other talke,but of his happy victories he had won of the enemie. So being come into the citie,they brought him vnto Pacuuius houſe, his very familiar friend, who was a man of great wealth and authoritie, as any among all the CAMPANIANS.Then he made him a notable banquet to the which no citizens were bidden, ſauing only Iubellius Taurea a ſtout man, and the ſonne of Pacuuius his hoſt: who through his fathers meanes with much ado,was reconciled to Hannibal, for that Hannibal hated him as he did, becauſe he followed Decius Magius, who alwaies tooke the ROMAINES part. But now let vs conſider a litle I pray you,how great men ſometimes vnwares are ſubiect to great dangers and misfortunes. For this yong man diſſembling his reconciliation with Hannibal, watching time & occaſion notwithſtanding to do him ſome diſpleaſure, in the time of this feaſt,while they were making merie, he tooke his father aſide into a ſecret corner of the houſe, and prayed him together with him,by a great good turne,to redeeme the fauor and goodwill againe of the ROMANES, the which they had loſt through their great wickedneſſe. Thẽ he told him how he was determined to kil Hannibal,the enemy of his country,& all ITALIE beſides.His father that was a man of great countenance and authority,was maruellouſly amazed withall, to heare what his ſonne ſaid: wherefore embracing him with the teares running downe his cheekes, he prayed him to leaue off his ſword, and to let his gueſt be ſafe in his houſe. The which his ſonne in the end yeelded to with great adoe. Thus Hannibal hauing before withſtood all the force of his enemies, the ambuſhes of the GAVLES, and hauing brought with him alſo a great armie from the ſea, and the fartheſt part of SPAINE, through ſo many great and mightie nations: he ſcaped killing very narrowly by the hand of a young man, whileſt he was at the table making merrie. The next morning Hannibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promiſes, and told them many things, which the CAMPANIANS eaſily beleeued, and therefore flattered themſelues,that they ſhould be Lords of all ITALIE: howbeit they reckoned beſide their hoſt. And to conclude, they did ſo cowardly ſubmit themſelues to Hannibal, that it ſeemed they had not only ſuffred him to come into their citie,but that they had alſo made him their abſolute Lord,like men that neither remembred,nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainely by one example I will ſhew you amongſt many. Hannibal willed them to deliuer him Decius Magius,the head of the cõtrarie factiõ to him. Wherunto the Senate not only obeyed with al humility,but worſt of al,ſuffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the preſence of all the people: who,becauſe he wold not forſake the ancient league & friendſhip with the ROMAINES,had ſhewed himſelfe a more faithfull citizen to his countrie and commonwealth,then vnto the barbarous people. Now whilſt theſe things paſſed thus in CAPVA, Mago (Hannibals brother) went to CARTHAGE,to report the newes of his happie victorie to his countrimen, which they had won of the enemies: and withall,before the Senate to declare the noble exploits of armes done by Hannibal.And to proue the words true he ſpake,he powred out at the coming in of the Senate houſe,the golden rings which had bene taken from the ROMANE Knights: of the which there were (as ſome do report) aboue a buſhell full, and as other ſome do write,aboue three buſhels full & a halfe.After that,he prayed a new ſupply for Hannibals armie: which was granted him by the Senat with greater ioy,then afterwards it was ſent.For the CARTHAGINIANS perſwaded themſelues by the things preſent,that the war would fall out as fortunate,as the beginning was faire: they thereupon decreed to continue the warre, and to aide Hãnibals attempts, by leauying of ſouldiers. Now no man withſtood this new ſupplie to be ſent to Hannibal, but Hanno a perpetuall enemie of the BARCINIAN faction. Howbeit,the CARTHAGINIANS weighed not his counſell and aduice then, though it tended to peace, and was good counſell for them,as oftentimes before he had vſed the like. So when Hannibal had made league with the CAMPANIANS,he led his camp before the city of NOLA, hoping they wold yeeld of thẽſelues without cõpulſion.And certainly ſo had it come to paſſe,had not the ſodaine coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in,pacified the ſedition,& repulſed the enemie that was comming into the citie, by a ſallie he made vpon him at three ſeuerall gates, chaſing and killing them euen to their campe with great loſſe. This is that noble Captaine and valiant valiant ſouldier Marcellus, who with a noble courage made the world know, that Hanniball was not inuincible. Hanniball perceiuing that there was no other way, but to let NOLA alone till another time: he came to ACERRES, and tooke and ſpoiled it without reſiſtance. Then going on further with greater power vnto CASILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win them that lay there in garriſon: but when he ſaw that neither his faire promiſes, nor otherwiſe his threats could preuaile, he left part of his army to beſiege the citie, and beſtowed the reſidue in garriſons before the winter ſeaſon. Howbeit, he choſe for his chiefeſt ſeate and ſtrength the city of CAPVA, which ſtood very pleaſantly, and had plenty of all things. There it was that Hannibals ſouldiers being vſed to lye hard, and eaſily to away with cold, hunger and thirſt, became then of valiant men, rancke cowards: of ſtrong men weakelings: and of ſeruiceable and readie men, timerous and effeminate perſons, through the daily pleaſures they enioyed at will. For ſweete intiſing pleaſures, do corrupt the ſtrength and courage of the mind, and mans diſpoſition vnto vertue: moreouer they ſpoile his wit, and take all good counſell from him, all which things are dangerous for men. And therefore Plato rightly calleth pleaſure, the baite of all euils. And doubtleſſe in this caſe, the pleaſures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS more then otherwiſe the higheſt Alpes, and all the armies of the ROMAINES did. For one onely winter paſſed ouer in ſuch pleaſure and wantonneſſe, was of ſuch great force to extinguiſh the vehement courage in the ſouldiers: that when they were brought into the field at the beginning of the ſpring, ſure you would rightly haue ſayd that they had forgotten all martiall diſcipline. Thus the winter being paſſed ouer, Hanniball returned againe to CASILINVM, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeeld vnto him, after they had abidden ſo long a ſiege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extreamitie, before they would yeeld to their ſo cruell an enemie, although they lacked victuals. Wherefore liuing firſt by ſpelt, or beere barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had receiued of the ROMAINES by the riuer of Vulturnus: they held it out ſo long, that Hanniball in the end being angrie with the countinuance of the ſiege, he was content to take the citie vpon compoſition, the which he had refuſed before. Now this warre in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwayes had great victories and good fortune, and receiued no loſſe worthie of memorie: began at that time to decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the new ayde and ſupplie that was ſent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSTANTIA, and of other cities of the countrey of the BRVTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other ſide, the great victories which the ROMAINES had won vpon the enemies of SPAINE, and SARDINIA, did greatly encourage them, and gaue them alſo good hope that their affaires would proſper better and better. They had alſo choſen three excellent Captaines Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man moſt worthy of praiſe for martiall diſcipline: who ſo wiſely gouerned the affaires of the ſtate, that Hannibal found he ſhould make warre with an enemy, no leſſe politike and wiſe, then hardy and valiant. For, firſt of all, he was driuen from the city of CVMES, with great ſlaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, & forced to raiſe his ſiege: and ſhortly after he was ouercome by Marcellus, in a battel he fought at NOLA. For there were ſlaine aboue a thouſand ROMAINES, and * 6000 CARTHAGINIANS ſlaine, and taken flying. Now it is eaſily ſeene what great importance that battell was of: becauſe Hanniball immediatly vpon it, raiſed his ſiege from NOLA, & went into APVLIA to winter his army there. By this meanes came the ROMAINES to recouer againe, as out of a great ſickneſſe, and ſent a great power againſt the enemy: and were not content only to keepe their owne, but they durſt alſo inuade others. So their chiefeſt intent was, to beſiege the city of CAPVA, for the iniurie they had but lately receiued of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the battell was fought at CANNES, they forſooke the ROMAINES, euen in their greateſt extremity & miſery, & tooke part with Hanniball that was conqueror, forgetting the great pleaſures their city had receiued in old time by the ROMAINES. On the other ſide the CAMPANIANS, knowing they had made a fault, & being afraid of this new preparation of the ROMAINES, they ſent to Hannibal into APVLIA, to pray him to come and aide their city (being of the number of the confederates) in their greateſt neceſſity. Hanniball departed out of APVLIA without delay, & came on with great iourneis into CAMPANIA, & cãped by TIFATA ouer CAPVA wherby he rather deferred till another time, thẽ preuented the plague hanging ouer the CAMPANIANS heads: ſo ſpoiling the countrey round about NAPLES, he began to take conceipt of a new hope, that he might take NOLA by treaſon.

The victories of the Romains againſt Hanniball

Two factions in Naples.

For in NOLA, the people and Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewise in diuers other cities of ITALY. The common people desirous of change, fauored Hannibal and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of ROME. So when Hannibal went to take the city of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his army in battel ray, as he had often done before, & failed not to fight with him, euen at the first meeting. There the ROMAINS ouercame, and draue the enemy with such manhood and readinesse: that if the horsemen which had taken another way had come in in time, as Marcellus commanded them: no question the CARTHAGINIANS had bene vtterly ouerthrowne. Hannibal after he had retired his army into his campe with great slaughter, he shortly after departed thence, & went into the country of the SALENTINIANS. For certaine yong TARENTINES that had bene taken prisoners in former battels, where the ROMAINS had bin ouerthrowne, and that were afterwards deliuered free without ransome: they to shew themselues thankful, had put Hannibal in hope to deliuer him the city of TARENTVM, so he wold bring his army before the city. Hannibal intised by their promises, did what he could to obtaine it, because he might haue some city vpon the sea in his power, the which he had desired of long time. And indeed, of all the cities vpon the sea coast, there was none so meete as TARENTVM, to bring ayd out of GRECE thither, & also to furnish the camp with many things that were to be occupied daily. So though this thing was drawn out in length, by the garrison of the ROMAINS that valiantly resisted: yet Hannibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprise, vntill that Nico and Philomenes the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the city into his hands. The ROMAINS kept only the castel, the which is in maner enuironed with the sea on three sides: & on the fourth side, that lay vpon the firme land, it was very strong with rampers & bulwarks. Hannibal perceiuing that he could do no good on that side, because of their great strength: he determined to shut vp the mouth of the hauen of TARENTVM, hoping that was the only way to make the ROMAINS yeeld, when their victuals should be cut from them. Yet the enterprise seemed very hard, because the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, & the ships also that should besiege the issue of the hauen, were shut vp in a narow litle place, and were to be drawne out of the hauen, at the foot of the castell, to bring them into the next sea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprise to passe: Hannibal himselfe perceiued that these ships might be drawne out of the hauen with certaine engines, and then to cart them through the city to the sea. So hauing his cunning workmen in hand with the matter, the ships within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, & caried into the sea, & then came & shewed before the bar of the hauen. Thus the city of TARENTVM being won againe, after the ROMAINS had kept it the space of a hundred yeares: Hannibal leauing the castell besieged both by sea and land, he returned into SAMNIVM. For the Consuls of the ROMAINES had spoiled and stripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forrage, & hauing brought their army before CAPVA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by siege. Wherfore Hannibal being very sory for the siege of CAPVA, he came with all his army against the enemy: & seeing shortly after that the ROMAINS did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward, & doubtlesse to fight, it wold haue proued a bloudy battell, had not Sempronius army seuered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA, vnder the cõduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the coũtry of LVKE. For they seeing this army far off, before they could know who they were, the ROMAINS & CARTHAGINIANS both were afraid and so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into seuerall countries, the one into LVKE, and the other towards CVMES, to make Hannibal remoue from CAPVA: who went into LVCANIA, and found occasion to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly and desperatly did hazard his army left him in charge, against a subtill and dangerous enemy. The battell being begun, M. Centenius was slaine valiantly fighting, and few other escaped. After this also there hapned another losse. For Hannibal returning shortly after into APVLIA, he met with another army of the ROMAINES, the which Fabius the Prætor led, who also entrapped that army by ambushes, and slue the most of them: so that of 20000 men 2000 scant scaped the edge of the sword. In the meane time the Consuls perceiuing that Hannibal was gone, they came with all their armie vnto CAPVA, and did besiege it round. This being come to Hannibals eare, he came with his army into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed: and at his first comming he set vpon the campe of the ROMAINES, hauing first willed the CAMPANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a sallie out on them. The ROMAINE Consuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betweene them, and went against them. The

CAMPANIANS were easily driuen againe into the city: howbeit against Hanniball, the battell was very bloudy. For if euer he proued himselfe a valiant Captaine or noble souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to surprise the ROMAINES by some stratagem. For as his men were about to breake into the ROMAINES campe, he sent one thither that had the Latine toung excellently well, who cried out by the commandement of the Consuls, that the ROMAINS should saue themselues in the next mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their campe & strength. This cry made on the sudden, had easily moued the that heard it, if the ROMAINS being throughly acquainted with Hannibals subtilties, had not found out his deceit. Wherfore one of them incouraging another, they made the enemy retire, and compelled him in despite of his beard to flie into his campe. When Hanniball had done what he could by all deuice and practise possible to raise his siege from CAPVA, & perceiuing all would not serue, being sory for the danger of his confederates: he then determined to call a councel, the which he had passed ouer a long time, hauing reserued it for the last refuge. For he trussed vp his cariage, and marched away with his army, & as quietly as he could, he passed ouer the riuer of Vulturnus, & coasting through the countries of the SIDICINIANS, ATIFANIANS, & CASSINIANS, he came to ROME with ensignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them raise their siege, being so earnestly bent to win CAPVA. This flying straight to ROME by curriers, they were so afraid there, as ROME was neuer in like feare it stood in then. For they saw their mortal enemy come to the with ensignes displaid, whom they had so often proued, almost to the vtter destruction of their Empire: and now they saw him present, whom they could not resist being absent, threatning to bring the Senate & people of ROME into subiection. So all ROME being in feare and tumult, it was ordained that Fuluius Flaccus (one of the Consuls lying before CAPVA) should be sent for home. And that the new Consuls Sulpitius Galba, & Cornelius Centumalus, should lie in campe out of the city: & that C. Calphurnius Prætor, should put a strong garrison into the Capitoll, and also that the citizens that had borne any office or dignity, should be appointed by their countenance and authority, to pacifie the sudden tumults that might happen in the city. So Hanniball marched forward without staying, till he came to the riuer of Anienes, & there camped within 24 furlongs of ROME: & shortly after that, he came with 2000 horse so neare vnto ROME, that riding from the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leisure to view at his pleasure, the situation and wals of so great a city. Fuluius Flaccus seeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certaine men at armes of the ROMAINES against him: who comming with great fury to giue charge vpon him as they were commanded, they easily sent him packing. The next morning Hannibal brought his army out of the campe, and did set them in battell ray, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the enemy to battell. The ROMAINES on the other side did the like. So, both armies marched one against the other with such life and courage, that to see them, they appeared men that feared no danger, so they might obtaine the victory that day. For on the one side, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in maner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended vpon this battell, as being the last they should fight. The ROMAINS in contrary maner, they were to fight for their country, liberty & their goods, to see whether they could keepe them, or that they should come to their enemies hands. Howbeit there fell out a thing worthy of memory. For as they were ready set in battell ray, tarying but for the signall of battell to giue charge: there fell such a wonderfull great shower and storme vpon them, that both of them were driuen in spite of their teethes, to bring backe their armie into their forts againe. The next day following in like manner, vnto the which it seemed the battell had bene deferred: when they had againe both of them set their men in battell ray, there fell the like storme vpon them, which did as much hurt the ROMAINS and CARTHAGINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to saue themselues, & not to thinke otherwise to fight. Hanniball perceiuing this, he turned to his friends and told the, that the first time he thought not to win ROME, and that at the second time the occasiō was taken from him. So there was a thing that greatly troubled Hanniball, and that was this. That though he came so neare to ROME, with an army of horsemen and footmen: yet he heard that the ROMAINES had sent aide into SPAINE, and that he had redeemed the country where he had bene, at a farre greater prise then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the goldsmithes and bankers shops of the ROMAINES citizens to be sold by the Cryer. But afterwards casting with himselfe, what a hard enterprise it was to take the citie of ROME, or else being afraid to lacke victuals (for he had stored himselfe onely but for ten dayes)

he raiſed his campe, & remouing thence came vnto the holy wood of the goddeſſe Feronia, and rifled the rich temple there, and afterwards went thence into the country of the BRVTIANS & LVCANIANS. The CAPVANS hauing intelligence thereof being left out of all hope: they yeelded vp their city vnto the ROMAINES. The city of CAPVA being thus yeelded vp, & brought againe to the ſubiection of the ROMAINES, it was of great importance to all the people of ITALIE, and withall brought a great deſire of change. Hannibal himſelfe alſo following euill counſell, did ſpoile and deſtroy many cities he could not keepe: whereby he did ſtirre vp the hearts of diuerſe nations againſt him. For where before when he was conquerour, he had often let priſoners go without ranſome paying, through which liberality he had won the harts of many men: euen ſo at that preſent time, his barbarous cruelty made diuers cities (miſliking to be ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS) to rebell againſt him, and to take part with the ROMAINES. Amongſt them was SALAPIA, the which was yeelded vp vnto the Conſul Marcellus, by Blacius meanes chiefe of all the ROMAINE faction: and a band alſo of choice horſemen which was left there in gariſon, were in maner ſlaine euery man of them. This is the city where Hannibal fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, & therefore they greatly reproue his immoderate luſt & laſciuiouſneſſe. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continency of this Captaine, ſay that he did neuer eate lying, and neuer dranke aboue a pint of wine, neither when he came to make war in ITALY, nor after that he returned into AFRICKE. Some there be alſo that ſay, Hannibal was cruell & vnconſtant, & ſubiect to diuerſe ſuch other vices: howbeit they make no maner of mention of his chaſtity or incõtinency. But they report that his wife was a SPANIARD, borne in CASTVLO, a good towne: and that the CARTHAGINIANS granted her many things, and truſted her very much, becauſe of the great faith and conſtancy of that nation. Now Hannibal after he had loſt (as we haue told you) the city of SALAPIA: he found the meanes to cry quittance, & to make the ROMAINS loſe more then he had loſt. For at the ſelfe ſame time Fuluius Viceconſull, lay beſieging of HERDONEA, hoping to win the city without reſiſtance. And becauſe he ſtood in no feare of any enemie round about him (for Hannibal was gone into the countrey of the BRVTIANS) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martiall affaires, contrary to the nature of the ROMAINE captaines. Hannibal being aduertiſed thereof by ſpials, would not loſe ſuch a goodly oportunity: and therfore coming into APVLIA with his army ready, he came ſo haſtily vnto HERDONEA, that he had almoſt ſtolne vpon Fuluius, vnprouided in his camp. Howbeit the ROMAINS valiantly receiued the firſt charge with ſuch courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithſtanding in the end, as the ROMAINS two yeares before that had bin ouercome not far from thence, with their Conſul Fuluius: euen ſo likewiſe vnder the conduct of this Fuluius Viceconſull, the ROMAINE legions were vtterly ouerthrowne, & their Captaine ſlaine, with the moſt part of his army. The Conſull Marcellus was at that time in the city of SAMNIVM, who being aduertiſed of this great ouerthrow, deſired to be euen with him: and though it ſeemed he came too late to helpe things paſt remedy, yet he brought his army into the countrey of the LVCANIANS, whither he vnderſtood Hannibal was gone after his victory, and came and campped directly ouer againſt his enemy, and ſoone after came to battell. The which the CARTHAGINIANS refuſed not, but gaue ſuch a fierce onſet on either ſide, that they fought it out till Sunne-ſet, and no man knew who had the better, and ſo the night parted them. The next morning the ROMAINS ſhewing againe in field in battell ray, made it knowne that the enemies were afraid of them. For Hannibal kept his men within the campe, and the next night following ſtole away without anie noiſe, and went into APVLIA. Marcellus alſo followed him foote by foote, and ſought to put all to hazard by ſome notable battell: for he bare himſelfe thus in hand, that of all the ROMAINE Captaines there was none matchable with Hannibal but himſelfe, either in councell, wit, or pollicy: or elſe in martiall diſcipline, or warlike ſtratagemes. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any ſet battell with the enemie: for after he had made a few light skirmiſhes, becauſe he would not trouble his ſouldiers any more in vaine, he beſtowed them in garriſon for the winter time. At the beginning of the next ſpring, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Conſuls for that yeare) and partly alſo through his owne diſpoſition: he brought out his garriſons ſooner then they were looked for, and came with his army againſt Hannibal, who lay at that time at CANVSIVM. Now it chanced, that through the neerneſſe of both their camps, and the good deſire they both had to fight: in few dayes they fought three ſeuerall times. The firſt battell, when they had fought it out till night, in maner like hope of both both sides, and that it could not be iudged which of them had the better: they both of purpose retired into their campe againe. The second day Hannibal was conqueror, after he had slaine almost two thousand seuen hundred enemies, and put the residue of the army to flight. The third day, the ROMAINES to recouer the shame and dishonor they had lost the day before: they were the first that prayed they might fight, & so Marcellus led them out to battell. Hannibal wondring at their valiantnesse, sayd vnto his people: that he dealt with an enemy that could neuer be quiet conqueror, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before: because the ROMAINES did their best to be reuenged of their losse, and the CARTHAGINIANS on the other side were mad in their minds, to see that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanquishers vnto battell. In the end, the ROMAINES being sharply reproued, and also perswaded by Marcellus to sticke to it valiantly like men, that the newes of their victory might come to ROME, before the newes of their ouerthrow: they flew in among the preasse of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thrise broken their enemies, they made them all flie. At the selfe same time Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, almost after the selfe same sort it was lost. This being reported vnto Hannibal, he sayd: The ROMAINES haue also their Hannibal. The next yeare folowing, Marcellus & Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put themselues in readinesse for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Hannibal dispairing that he was not able to resist thē in battell, he sought all the wits he had to deuise some way to intrap thē by subtilty, whom he could not ouercome by battell. So Hannibals head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for. Betweene both camps, there was a prety groue, in the which Hannibal layd certaine bands of the NVMIDIANS in ambush, to intrap the enemies passing too & fro. On the other side, the Consuls by consent of them all, thought it best to send to view this groue, and to keepe it if need required: least in leauing it behind them, the enemies should come, and so be vpon their iackes afterwards. Now before they remoued their army, both the Consuls went out of their campe, with a small company of horsemen with them, to view the situation of this place: and so going on very vndiscreetly, and worse appointed then became men of their authority & place, they vnfortunatly fell into Hannibals ambush. So, when they saw themselues in a moment compassed about on euery side with enemies, that they could not go forward, and were also fought withall behind: they defended themselues the best they could, rather by cōpulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So, Marcellus was slaine fighting valiantly: and Crispinus the other Consull also very sore hurt, who hardly scaped the enemies hāds. Hannibal being aduertised that Marcellus was slaine, who was the chiefest man of all the ROMAINE Captains, that had most hindered the happy successe of his victories, & had besides troubled him most: he presētly went and camped there where the battell was fought, & when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue it honorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may see how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, are esteemed of all men: considering that the cruell and most mortal enemy, gaue honorable buriall to so noble and excellent a Captaine. The ROMAINES in the meane time seeing one of their Consuls dead, and the other Consull very sore hurt: they drew straight to the next mountaines, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Crispinus had sent to the next townes of the mountaines, to aduertise them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ring he sealed his letters withall: wherefore he wished them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus messenger came but newly vnto SALAPIA, when letters were brought also from Hannibal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they sent his messenger away, and carefully looking for Hannibals comming. About the fourth watch of the night, Hannibal came to the city of SALAPIA, who of purpose had put all the ROMAINES that had fled, in the vauntguard, because that they speaking the Latine tongue, might make them beleeue that Marcellus was there in person. So when the citizens had suffered 600 of them to come in, they shut too the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the army, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the city. Thus Hannibal being in a maruellous rage he had missed of his purpose: he remoued thence, & went into the country of the BRVTIANS, to aid the LOCRIANS that were besieged by the ROMAINES, both by sea and by land. After all these things, at the earnest request of the Senate and people, two new Consuls were created, both famous Captaines, & valiant souldiers, Marcus Liuius, & Claudius Nero: who hauing deuided the army betwixt thē, went vnto their seuerall charge and prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the country of the SALENTINIANS, & M. Liuius into GAVLE, against Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alpes, & made hast to ioyne with his brother Hannibal, bringing with him a great army both of footmē and horsmen. Now it chanced at the same time, that Hannibal had receiued great losse by Claudius the Consul. For first of al, he ouercame him in the country of the LVCANIANS, vsing the like policies & fetches that Hannibal did. Afterwards again, meeting with Hannibal in APVLIA, by the city of VENVSIA: he fought such a lusty battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the field. By reason of these great losses, Hannibal suddenly went to METAPONT, to renew his army againe. So hauing remained there a few dayes, he receiued the army from Hanno the which he ioyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not far from VENVSIA with his campe: who hauing intercepted letters of his enemies, he vnderstood by them that Hasdrubal was at hand with his army. Therupon, he bethought himselfe night & day, what policy he might vse to preuent the ioyning of two so great armies together as these. So, after he had taken aduice of himselfe, he followed in sight a dangerous determination: but peraduenture necessary, as the time required. For leauing the campe vnto the charge of his Lieutenant, he tooke part of the army with him, and making great iourneys, came to PISENVM (being the marches of ANCONA) so that on the sixt day he came to SENA. There both the Consuls ioyned their forces together, and setting vpon Hasdrubal by the riuer of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For, as it is reported, there were six and fifty thousand of the enemies slaine on that day: so that they almost had as great an ouerthrow, as the ROMAINES had receiued before at the battell of CANNES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victory, returning as speedily vnto VENVSIA as he went thence, he set vp Hasdrubals head, where the enemies kept the watch: and did let certaine prisoners go, to cary newes to Hannibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwards it was knowne, that Hannibal knew nothing yet of Claudius secret enterprise, nor of the speedy executiō & great slaughter he had made. Whereat sure I can but wonder, that so subtile a Captaine as Hannibal, could be deceiued by Claudius, considering both their campes lay so neare together: so that he first heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and all his army, before he vnderstood any thing of the Consuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the campe. Now Hannibal hauing not only receiued a generall, but also a particular great losse by the death of his brother: he sayd then he plainly saw the chaunge and alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune, and shortly after remoued his campe, and went thence into the countrey of the BRVTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow giuen by the riuer of Metaurum, was a maruellous incouragement to the ROMAINES, and would also be a great log in his way, for the successe of this warre. This notwithstāding, he gathered together all his power he had left in ITALY, after so many great battels and conflicts, and so many cities taken: and maintained the warre with an inuincible courage. But the most strangest thing in Hannibal was this: that through his authority & wisdome, he kept all his army in peace and amity together (being a medley of SPANIARDS, AFRICANS, GAVLES, and of diuerse other nations) and neuer man heard that there was any brawle or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMAINES themselues, after they had won SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAINE againe, they could neuer vtterly ouercome him, nor driue him out of ITALY, before they had sent P. Cornelius Scipio into AFRICKE: who making warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, he brought them to such great extremity, that they were driuen to send for Hannibal home out of ITALY. Hannibal at that time (as we haue sayd before) was in the countrey of the BRVTIANS, making war by inrodes and sudden inuasions, rather then by any fought battell: sauing that once there was a battell fought in hast betwixt him and the Consull Sempronius, and immediatly after he came and set vpon the same Sempronius with all his army. At this battel, Hannibal had the victory: but at the second, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time, I can find in no Greeke nor Latine Author, that Hannibal did any famous act in ITALIE worthie memorie. For being sent for into AFRICKE by the CARTHAGINIANS, he left ITALY sixteene yeares after this AFRICKE war was begun, greatly complaining of the Senate of CARTHAGE, & of himselfe also. Of the Senate, because that all the time he had bene in his enemies countrey so long, they had allowed him so litle mony: and so scanted him besides with all other things necessary for the wars: And of himselfe, because that after he had so often ouercome the ROMAINES, he had alwayes delayed time after the victory, and had giuen the enemy liberty to gather force againe. It is reported also, that before he imbarked and tooke sea, he set vp a triumphing arch or pillar, by the

the temple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his noble victories, both in the Punicke and Greeke tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind ſerued him ſo well, that in few dayes he arriued at LEPTIS, & landing all his army, he firſt came to ADRVMENTVM, & afterwards vnto ZAMA. There receiuing aduertiſement how the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS proſpered: he thought it beſt to deuiſe ſome way to end this war. For this cauſe he ſent vnto Scipio, to pray him to appoint him ſome conuenient place where they might both meet, & talke together, of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainly knowne, whether Hanniball did this of his owne head, or by commandement of the Senate. Scipio refuſed not to come to parley. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous Generals of mighty nations, in a great plaine together, either of them hauing his interpreter, to talke together of diuerſe matters touching peace and warre. For, Hannibal was altogether bent to peace: becauſe he ſaw the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS waxe worſe & worſe euery day: that they had loſt SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAINE: becauſe the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICKE: becauſe Syphax (a mighty king) was taken priſoner of the ROMAINES: and alſo becauſe that their laſt hope conſiſted in the army he had brought into AFRICKE: which was the only remaine and reliefe of ſo long a war as he had made in ITALY: and alſo becauſe that the CARTHAGINIANS had ſo ſmal a power left (both of ſtrangers, and alſo of citizens) that there were ſcarce men inough to defend the city of CARTHAGE. So he did his beſt to perſwade Scipio, with a long Oration he made, rather to agree to peace, then to reſolue of warre. Howbeit Scipio that liued in hope to bring this war to a good end, he would not ſeeme to giue eare to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either ſide, in the end they brake off, & made no agreement. Shortly after, was this famous battel ſtriken by the city of ZAMA, in the which the ROMAINS obtained victory. For firſt of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army, ſo that they did put all Hannibals horſemen out of order. And Lælius and Maſiniſſa, who made both the wings, increaſing their feare, gaue the horſemen no leiſure to gather themſelues in order againe. Howbeit the footmen fought it out a long time, and with a maruellous great courage: inſomuch that the CARTHAGINIANS (truſting in their former victory) thought that all the ſafety and preſeruation of AFRICKE, was all in their hands, and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMAINES on the other ſide had as great hearts as they, and beſides, they ſtood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeed did the ROMAINES great ſeruice to helpe them to the victory: and that was, Lælius and Maſiniſſaes returne from the chaſe of the horſemen, who ruſhed in to the battell of the enemy with great furie, and did put them in a maruellous feare. For at their comming, the CARTHAGINIANS hearts were done, and they ſaw no other remedy for them, but to hope to ſcape by flying. So it is reported, that there were ſlaine that day, aboue twenty thouſand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more priſoners. Hannibal their Generall, after he had taried to ſee the end of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great ſlaughter. Afterwards when he was ſent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to ſaue his country: he perſwaded the Senate not to hope any more in wars, but did coũſell them, that ſetting all deuiſes apart, they ſhould ſend vnto Scipio the ROMAINE Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condition. When the ten Ambaſſadors had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto CARTHAGE of the articles of peace: it is reported that there was one Giſgo, who miſliking to heare talke of peace, he made an Oration, and perſwaded all he could to renew warre againſt the ROMAINES. Wherefore Hanniball perceiuing that diuerſe men confirmed his opinion, and being much offended to ſee ſuch beaſts, & men of no vnderſtanding, to dare to ſpeake of ſuch matters, in ſo dangerous a time: he caſt himſelfe downe headlong, whileſt he was yet in his Oration. So when he ſaw that the citizens, and all the whole aſſembly, thought this too preſumptuous a part of him, & vnmeet altogether for a free city: he himſelfe got vp into the pulpit for Orations, and ſayd. Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth hath bene alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought vp all his life time in wars, be ignorant of the lawes and ordinances of the city. After that, he ſpake ſo wiſely of the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moued by the authority of ſo great a perſon: they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquiſher, and the neceſſity of time offered him. The articles out of doubt were very extreame, and ſuch as the vanquiſhed are wont to receiue with all extremity by the conquerours. But beſides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMAINES an annuall tribute, vntill a certaine time were run out. So when the day came that the firſt penſion was to be

payed to the ROMAINES, and that euery man grudged when the ſubſidie was ſpoken of: ſome ſay that Hanniball being offended with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGINIANS, he fell a laughing. And when Haſdruball Hædus reproued him becauſe he laughed in ſuch a common calamity of all the city, he anſwered, that it was no laughter nor reioycing from the heart, but a ſcorning of their fond teares, that wept when there was leſſe cauſe (and onely becauſe it touched euery priuate mans purſe) then before, when the ROMAINES tooke from the CARTHAGINIANS their ſhips, armour, and weapons, and their ſpoiles of the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gaue lawes and ordinances vnto them that were vanquiſhed. I know ſome Authors write, that Hanniball immediatly after he had loſt the battell, fled into ASIA, for that he was afraid they would deliuer him into Scipioes hands, that perhaps might demand him of them. But whether that was done ſuddenly, or ſome time after the battell was loſt at ZAMA, it makes no great matter: conſidering that all the world knoweth, that when he ſaw things brought to extremity, he preſently fled into ASIA vnto king Antiochus. So it is moſt true, that king Antiochus receiued him with great courteſie, and vſed him very honorably: inſomuch as he made him of councell with him all in all, both in priuate and publike cauſes. For the name of Hanniball caried great reputation with all men: beſides that, he had a cõmon and mortall hate to the ROMAINES, which was a pricking ſpurre ſtill to moue warre againſt them. And therefore it ſeemeth that he came in happy houre into that countrey, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king againſt them, but alſo to ſet warres at liberty againſt the ROMAINES. So he told him, that the only way to make warre with the ROMAINES, was to go into ITALY to leauy ITALIAN ſouldiers, by whom only, that victorious countrey of all other nations might be ſubdued. He requeſted of the king a hundred ſhips, 16000 footmen, and a thouſand horſemen onely. With this ſmall army he promiſed to inuade ITALIE, and that he would maruellouſly trouble the ITALIANS: whom he knew yet to ſtand in no ſinall feare of him, for the very ſound of his name onely, becauſe of the late warres he had made there, ſo freſh yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke heart againe vnto him to renew the warres of AFRICKE, if the king would licence him to ſend men vnto CARTHAGE, to ſtirre vp the BARCINIAN faction, whom he knew hated the ROMAINES to death. When he had gotten the king to graunt him his requeſt, he called Ariſton TYRIAN vnto him, a fine ſubtile fellow, and meete for ſuch a purpoſe: to whom he made large promiſes, and perſwaded him to go to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to carie them letters from him. Thus Hanniball being a baniſhed man, and fled out of his countrey, raiſed warre in all parts againſt the ROMAINES. And ſurely his counſell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduice, as he did at the firſt, then the vaine perſwaſions of his fine courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes courts, bred Hanniball great enemies. For they being afraid that by his counſels he ſhould grow in great fauour with the king (for he was a wiſe and politicke Captaine) and that thereby he ſhould beare great ſway and authority: to preuent it, they lacked no deuice to bring him in diſgrace with the king. And it ſo chanced at that time, that P. Villius, who came Ambaſſador vnto EPHESVS, had often conference with Hanniball. Hereupon his priuie enemies tooke occaſion to accuſe him, and withall, the king himſelfe became ſo iealous of it, that from thencefoorth he neuer more called him to councell. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo, as ſome do report, Publius Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambaſſadours ſent vnto king Antiochus) talking familarly with Hanniball, prayed him amongſt other things to tell him truly, whom he thought the worthieſt Captaine of all others. Hanniball anſwered him. Firſt he thought Alexander, king of MACEDON the chiefeſt: next vnto him, Pyrrhus, king of the EPIROTES: and thirdly, himſelfe. Then Scipio African ſmiling, asked him: what wouldeſt thou ſay, Hanniball, if thou hadſt ouercome me? Truly ſayd he, then I would be chiefeſt my ſelfe. This anſwer pleaſed Scipio maruellous well, becauſe he ſaw he was neither deſpiſed, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peereleſſe, by ſome ſecret flattery of Hanniball. After theſe things, Hanniball found occaſion to talke with king Antiochus, and began to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, and bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the ROMAINES: whereby he ſo ſatisfied the king, that he was againe receiued into his grace and fauour, which he had almoſt vtterly loſt. Thereupon the king was determined to haue made him Admirall of his army by ſea, the which he had put in readineſſe for ITALIE, and alſo to make proofe of his great courage and ſeruice, whom he knew to be a worthie man, and a mortall enemy to the ROMAINES. But one Thoas, Prince of the ÆTOLIANS, thwarting this

this opinion, either for malice, or elſe for that his fancy was ſuch: he altered the kings mind, and cleane changed his purpoſe, the which was a matter of great importance for the war he pretẽded to make. For he gaue counſell vnto Antiochus, that he ſhould go himſelfe into GRECE, & direct his own affaires: & that he ſhould not ſuffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this war. So king Antiochus ſhortly after went into GRECE, to make war with the ROMAINS. Within few daies after, when he cõſulted whether he ſhould make league with the THESSALIANS, Hannibals opinion was ſpecially asked: who ſpake ſo wiſely touching the ſtate of the THESSALIANS, & the chiefeſt matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, & gaue their conſents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they ſhould not need much to care for the THESSALIANS, but rather to make all the means they could, to get king Philip of MACEDON to take their part: or elſe to perſwade him to be a Newter, and to take neither part. Furthermore, he gaue counſell to make war with the ROMAINS in their owne country, & offered himſelf to aid him the beſt he could. Euery man gaue good eare to his words, but his opinion was rather cõmended, then followed. Wherfore euery man maruelled, that ſuch a Captaine as he, that had ſo many yeares made warre with the ROMAINES (who had in maner conquered all the world) ſhould then be ſo light ſet by of the king, when it ſpecially ſtood him vpon, to haue ſuch a mans helpe & counſell. For, what captaine liuing could a man haue foũd more skilful or politike, or meeter to make war with the ROMAINS, then him? Howbeit the king made no reckoning of him, at the firſt beginning of this warre: but ſhortly after, diſdaining all their counſell, he confeſſed that Haniballl onely ſaw what was to be done. For after the ROMAINES had obtained victory in the warre he made in GREECE: Antiochus fled out of EVROPE into EPHESVS, where making merry, & there following pleaſure, he hoped to liue in peace, litle thinking the ROMAINES would come with an army into ASIA. Now, theſe flattering courtiers ſtill fed his humor: a perpetuall plague to kings & princes, that ſuffer thẽſelues to be flattered, & are contented to be deceiued, becauſe they giue good eare to that that pleaſeth them. But Hannibal, who knew the power & ambition of the ROMAINES, perſwaded the king to hope for any thing rather then peace, & bad him truſt to it, that the ROMAINS would neuer ſtay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICK, & EVROPE. Antiochus perſwaded by the authority of ſuch a man, ſtraight cõmanded Polyxenidas, a very ſeruiceable man, & skilful in ſea ſeruice, that he ſhould go meet with the army of the ROMAINES that was coming thither. Then he ſent Hannibal into SYRIA, to leauy a great number of ſhips together, and afterwards made him, and Apollonius (one of his fauoured courtiers) Generals of his army by ſea: who notwithſtanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worſt by the ROMAINES, they went & ſet vpon the RHODIANS, that were confederates with them. Hannibal in this battell aſſailing Eudamus the Captaine of the RHODIANS, that led the left wing: he had already compaſſed in the Admirall galley, and doubtleſſe had obtained the victory, but that the other wing came in to reſcue, after they had followed Apollonius in chaſe, and tooke the victory from him, that was his owne. After this battell by ſea, which had no great good ſucceſſe: we do not find that Hannibal did any thing worthy of memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, beſides other conditions, the ROMAINES offered him: they deſired that Hannibal (the mortall enemy of the country) ſhould be deliuered vnto them. Hannibal foreſeeing this long before, he ſuddenly ſtole from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrowne. So, after Hannibal had wandred vp and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Pruſias, king of BITHYNIA, for ſuccor. Now he did not ſo much truſt to his friendſhip, but becauſe he ſought for the meeteſt place he could come by, as alſo for the ſafeſt, the which he moſt deſired: conſidering that the ROMAINES had the moſt part of the ſea and land in their ſubiection. Some ſay, that after king Antiochus was ouercome, Hannibal went into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumour ran immediatly, he had brought a great maſſe of gold and ſiluer with him. Wherefore being afraid leſt the CRETANS ſhould offer him ſome violẽce, he deuiſed this ſhift to ſcape the danger: he filled earthen pots with lead, gilt, and ſent them into the temple of Diana, faining that he was maruellous carefull for them, as though all his treaſure had bene there. On the other ſide he had hid all his gold in images of braſſe, the which he had left careleſly lying on the ground in the houſe. In the meane time, whileſt they watched the temple carefully, that theſe earthen pots ſhould not be caried away without their priuity: Hannibal hoiſed faile, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the ſea ſide, which the countrey men call LIBYSSA, of the

which by ſome mens ſaying, there ranne an old Oracle and Prophecy in this ſort:

The land of Libyſſa ſhall couer vnder mold
The valiant corps of Hanniball, when he is dead and cold.

There Hanniball lay, not ſpending his time idly, but paſſing it away in exerciſing of the mariners, riding of horſes, and training of his ſouldiers. Some Authors alſo do write, that at that time Pruſias made war with Eumenes, king of PERGAMVS, who was a confederate and friend of the ROMAINES: & that he made Hanniball his Lieutenant generall of his army by ſea: who aſſailing Eumenes with a new found and vnknowne deuice, wan the victory of the battell by ſea. For before they began to fight, it is reported that Hanniball had gotten an infinite number of ſnakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begun, & they buſily tending their fight: he threw thoſe pots with ſnakes into the enemies ſhips, and that by this fearefull and ſtraunge deuice he made them flie. Now whether this was true, or not, the old Chronicles do make no maner of mention, but only Æmylius and Trogus: and therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diſſention betwixt theſe two kings, Pruſias, and Eumenes being brought to ROME: the Senate ſent T. Q. Flaminius Ambaſſador into ASIA, whoſe name was famous for the noble victories he had obtained in GREECE, to the end (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt theſe two kings. Flaminius being come vnto king Pruſias, he was maruellouſly offended, and ſory in his mind to ſee Hanniball yet aliue (that was the mortalleſt enemy of the ROMAINES) after the conqueſts of ſo many nations, and the ſacking of ſo many people: therefore, he was very earneſtly in hand with king Pruſias, to deliuer him Hanniball. Hanniball from the firſt beginning miſtruſted king Pruſias inconſtancy very much, & therefore had digged diuerſe vaults in his houſe, & made ſeuen ſeuerall vents to flie out at, if he were ſuddenly taken. The report of Flaminius comming did increaſe his ſuſpitiō the more, for that he thought him the greateſt enemy he had in ROME: both generally for the hate he bare vnto all the ROMAINS, as alſo particularly for the remēbrance of his father Flaminius, that was ſlaine in the battell fought by the lake of Thraſymene. So Hannibal being full of care & griefe (as it is reported) he found deuices to eſcape, the which ſtood him to no purpoſe againſt ſuch a great power. For when the kings guard which were ſent to take him, had cōpaſſed his houſe about: Hanniball thought to flie at their firſt coming, & to ſaue himſelfe by the ſecreteſt vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the guard, then he determined to rid himſelf out of the ROMAINS hands, by deſtroying himſelfe. So, ſome do report, that he was ſtrangled by one of his men, whom he had cōmanded to helpe to diſpatch him. Others write againe, that he had drunke buls bloud, & when he had drunke it, died, as Clitarchus, & Stratocles do falſly report of Themiſtocles. Howbeit Titus Liuius, that famous Hiſtoriographer writeth, that Hannibal called for the poyſon he had ready for ſuch a miſchiefe, & that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke he ſaid: Come on, let vs rid the ROMAINES of this paine & care, ſith their ſpite & malice is ſo great, to haſtē the death of a poore old man, that is halfe dead already. The ancient ROMAINS aduertiſed Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES, who came with enſignes diſplayed to the very wals of the city of ROME, that he ſhould looke to himſelfe, & beware of poyſoning: and theſe ROMAINS now do make a friend forgetting his kingly ſtate & faithful promiſe, vilely to betray his poore gueſt. After he had ſayd, bitterly curſing king Pruſias, he poyſoned himſelfe, being 70 yeares old, as ſome writers do teſtifie. His body was buried in a tombe of ſtone by LIBYSSA, on the which was engrauen no more but this: Here lieth Hanniball. The ROMAINS being aduertiſed of his death, euery man ſaid his opinion, as his fancy ſerued him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius cruelty, who to make himſelfe famous by ſome notable act (as he thought) made a poore old man put himſelfe to death, that was in maner halfe dead by age, and beſides, was paſt doing the ſtate of ROME any more hurt, they being conquerors in maner of all the world. But ſome againe on the other ſide, cōmended Flaminius for it, & ſayd it was a good deed of him, to rid the ROMAINES of their mortall enemy: who though he had a weake body, yet he lacked no wit, wiſe counſell, & great experience in wars, to intiſe king Pruſias to make war, and to moleſt all ASIA beſides with new wars. For at that time, the power of the king of BITHYNIA, was ſo great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the ſame BITHYNIA, did maruellouſly moleſt the ROMAINES both by ſea & by land, & moreouer fought battels with L. Lucullus, & Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the ROMAINES. And ſo the ROMAINES might alſo be afraid of Pruſias, and ſpecially hauing Hanniball his Captaine. So ſome iudge, that T. Q. Flaminius was ſpecially ſent Ambaſſador vnto king Pruſias, ſecretly to practiſe Hannibals death.

Howbeit

Howbeit it is to be ſuppoſed, that Q. Flaminius was not ſo deſirous to haue Hannibal ſo ſuddenly put to death, as he would haue bin glad otherwiſe to haue brought him again to ROME, that had done ſuch miſchiefe to his country: and this had bene a great benefit for ROME, and much honor alſo vnto himſelf. Such was the death of Hannibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous mã doubtleſſe, and highly to be commended for martial praiſe, ſetting his other vertues aſide. So we may eaſily iudge, of what power and force his noble mind, his great wiſedome and courage, and his perfit skill of martiall diſcipline was in all things. For in all the warre the CARTHAGINIANS had ſo vehemently, and with ſuch great preparation enterpriſed: they neuer thought themſelues ouercome, till Hannibal was ouerthrowne at that great battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth, that all their ſtrength and skill of warres began, and alſo ended, with Hannibal their Captaine.

The praiſe of Hannibal.

THE LIFE OF Scipio African.

The parentage of Scipio.

PVblius Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the family of the Cornelij (who was the firſt ROMAINE Captaine againſt whom Hannibal fought in ITALIE) was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards ſurnamed African, the firſt: ſo called, becauſe he had conquered that nation. The ſame Scipio, after he had obtained many great victories in SPAINE, and done notable feats of armes: was in the end ſlaine with a wound he had in a battell. againſt his enemies, as he was plying & incouraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greateſt danger and fury of the battell Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio alſo end his life, much after one ſelfe maner, & was ſlaine valiantly fighting. So theſe two captaines, beſides the fame they atchieued by their noble deeds, left behind thẽ great praiſe of their faithfulneſſe, modeſty, & courage: the which made them not only wiſhed for of their ſouldiers that were then liuing, but alſo of all the SPANIARDS beſides. Cn. Scipio had a ſon called P. Cornelius Naſica, one that had bin Conſull, and had alſo triumphed: who being but a yong man, was thought the meeteſt man of all the city of ROME to receiue Idea, the mother of the gods. This Publius had two ſonnes, the ſo famous Scipioes: of the which the one was called Aſian, becauſe he conquered ASIA: and the other African, becauſe he ſubdued AFRICKE at that famous battel of ZAMA, where he ouerthrew Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, as we ſaid before. Whoſe life we purpoſe now to write, not ſo much to make the glory of his name (ſo famous by all the Greeke and Latine Authors) the greater by our history: as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds, & morall vertues, to the end that all Princes and noble Captaines in reading it, should behold the liuely image of perfit vertue, which may moue an earnest desire in them to follow the example of P.C. Scipioes life, who from his childhood gaue great hope and shew of a noble nature, and excellent vertue, after he followed the instruction of martiall discipline, vnder the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the second war with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but 17 yeares old, and in a very short time grew so toward, and forward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all maner of paines like a souldier, that he wan great commendation of his owne father, and besides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharpe wit, and noble courage: that it made him beloued, and also feared of his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Consull fought with Hannibal, by the riuer of Thesin: & some writers do affirme, that Cornelius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemy, had not his son Scipio saued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was so yong. After that also, at the battell that was fought by CANNES, to the great losse, and in maner vtter destruction of the Empire of ROME, when the 10000 men that fled to CANVSIVM, had all together with one consent referred the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, & vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very yong: the same Scipio shewed then by his deeds, what noble mind and courage was in him. For when he saw certaine yong men consult together betweene themselues to forsake ITALY: he thrust in among them, and drawing out his sword, made them all sweare they would not forsake their country. These, and such like deeds done by him with a liuely courage and noble mind, being then but a yong man: wan him such fauor with the ROMAINES, that not respecting his yong yeares, nor their ancient custome, they called him forward, & layd offices of great charge and gouernment vpon him. Insomuch that when he sued for the office of Ædilis before his due time, notwithstanding that the Tribunes of the people were against his sute, because he was so yong a man: yet the people suffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, and so was presently chosen Ædilis with the most voyces. So after his father and vnkle (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene slaine one after the other in SPAINE, and that the ROMAINES were in consultation to appoint some worthy Captaine in the roome: they could find no man that durst vndertake this so dangerous war, considering the losse of two so great Captaines before. Wherfore the whole assembly being called to chuse a Viceconsull, all the other Princes and Peeres of the Realme being silent at so worthy a motion: Scipio only of all the rest, being but 24 yeares old, stood vp in the middest of them, and sayd, with a good hope and confidence he wold willingly take the charge vpon him. He had no sooner offered this promise, but he was presently made Viceconsull of SPAINE, with the wonderfull goodwill and fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voices. Howbeit the Senators afterwards considering better of the matter, against what Captaines and nations he should make warre: they thought it vnpossible so young a man could performe so waighty a charge. Wherfore mens minds were wonderfully changed againe on the sudden, as if the tribes of the people had repented them of their voices & election. Scipio perceiuing it, called an assembly presently, and made such an Oration of his age, and discipline of wars, that euery man that heard him wondred at him, and the people began againe to renew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not only a noble courage in him, being indued with so many singular vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, and very comely of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance: all which things together, are great meanes to win him the loue and goodwill of euery man. Moreouer, euen in his gesture and behauior, there was a certaine Princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline, being ioyned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature: it was to be doubted, whether ciuill vertues made him more acceptable vnto strangers, then wonderfull for his skill in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples hearts with a certaine superstitious feare, because he did daily (after he had taken the mans gowne) vse to go vp to the Capitoll, and so into the Church without any company: insomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret things in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymph Ægeria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in old time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wit: that oftentimes there was a snake seene in his mothers chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten ten thousand footemen, and a fleete of thirty galleys, euery one of them hauing fiue oares to a banke: he sailed into SPAINE, and in few dayes arriuing at EMPORIA, he landed his men, & marched by land to TARRACON. There he kept a councell, and many Ambassadors of the cities their confederates came thither, who being curteously receiued, returned to their lodgings with such answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the warre he had taken vpon him, he thought it best to ioyne the remaine of the old bands with his army, which had bin saued through the manhood and valiantnesse of Lucius Martius. For after both the Scipioes were slaine, and both SPAINES almost lost, and the ROMAINE legions also ouerthrowne and put to flight: Lucius Martius a ROMAINE Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both armies, resisted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies puffed vp with glorie of the victorie they had gotten, and with great valiantnesse, and vnspeakeable industrie he maintained warre in SPAINE, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being come to this army that lay in garrison for the winter time, euery man did certainely perswade themselues that the warre should prosper: and when they saw him, they remembred their old Captaines, insomuch that there was neuer a souldier could haue his fill, with looking vpon this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the souldiers for their noble courage, not dispairing for the calamity of their country: he greatly honored Lucius Martius, to shew, that who so trusteth in his owne vertues, need not enuy the glory of another man. So winter being past, he tooke the old and new bands out of the garrisons, and first of all determined to go & lay siege vnto new CARTHAGE. For of all the cities of SPAINE it was the wealthiest, and none more meete to make war both by sea and land, then that. Moreouer, the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed in this city all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the city, and castell. But the Captaines themselues were deuided in diuerse countries, to the end that they three might keepe the whole region from spoile, least of all looking then that CARTHAGE should be besieged. But Scipio hauing put all in readinesse, he came to besiege new CARTHAGE with all his army both by sea and land. This seemed to be a maruellous hard enterprise, and would continue long, both because the city was very strong of it selfe, and also for that the men within it were so couragious: that they did not onely thinke themselues able to defend the city, but their hearts serued them also to make sallies out vpon the enemy, and to skirmish with them, euen to the very trenches of the ROMAINES campe. Howbeit it happeneth often, that what a man cannot obtaine by force, he may winne by industry. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or meare which is not farre from the wals of CARTHAGE, did ebbe and flow with the tide, and that it was passable by foord on that side where they might easiliest come to the wals: So, he thinking to imbrace this occasion, & that he could not possibly meete with a better deuice to take CARTHAGE: when he saw his time, he set his men in battell ray, and hauing deuided them into seuerall squadrons, gaue a more desperate assault vnto the citie, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a band of the valianteſt men he had, and commanded them to wade ouer the lake, and to scale the wals on that side, where they within the towne made least account of it. So, these souldiers that were commaunded to giue this attempt, after they had passed ouer the lake without any let or trouble: they found that part of the wall without any watch or guard, because the greatest furie of the fight, was on the other side of the citie. Therefore they easily getting vp on the wall, came and assailed the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of the garrison, perceiuing they were vnwares fallen into that great danger: they immediatly forsooke the wals, and seeing themselues charged on euerie side, betooke them to their legges, and fled. The ROMAINES pursued them so hotly, that they wanne the citie, and sacked it: where they found a wonderfull great spoile, and abundance of all things necessarie for warre. Scipio greatly praised his souldiers, and did reward them, for that they had done so valiant seruice. Howbeit when he should come to giue the scaling crowne of the wals, vnto the first man that got vp vpon the wals: there were two souldiers at such variance for the matter, that all the army was in danger of diuision and mutiny vpon that occasion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open assembly told them, that he knew they both got vp on the wall together, and so gaue them both a scaling crowne: and by this meanes their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he sent vnto all the cities of SPAINE, the hostages that were found in the citie, which were a maruellous number: the which wanne him great fame for his courtesie and clemencie, whereby he allured many nations to yeeld themselues vnto the ROMAINES, and to forsake the

CARTHAGINIANS. But one thing aboue all the reſt chiefly increaſed his praiſe, and wanne him great loue and goodwill, as a mirrour and example of all vertue. There was a young Ladie taken priſoner, that in beautie excelled all the women in CARTHAGE: whom he carefully cauſed to be kept and preſerued from violence and diſhonour. And afterwardes when he knew that ſhe was maried vnto Luceius, Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: he ſent for her husband, that was a very young man, and deliuered her vnto him, vntouched or diſhonoured. Luceius not forgetting his noble curteſie vnto her, did let all his ſubiects vnderſtand the great bountie, modeſtie, and rare excellencie of all kind of vertues that were in this ROMAINE Generall: and ſhortly after, he returned againe to the ROMANES campe with a great number of horſmen. The three Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago, Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Haſdrubal, the ſonne of Giſgo) knowing that the loſſe of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other ſtrange nations, as alſo by the cõiecture diuers made of the ſucceſſe of this war: they firſt practiſed to diſſemble the loſſe of it, and then in ſpeech to make light of it as much as they could. Scipio hauing ioyned to him diuers nations and Princes of SPAINE, (among the which were the two litle kings, Mandonius and Indibilis) vnderſtanding where Haſdrubal BARCINIAN lay: he marched towards him with his army to fight with him, before Mago and the other Haſdrubal came to ioyne with him. Haſdrubal BARCINIAN lay in campe by the riuer of Beſula, & was very deſirous to fight, truſting wholy to his ſtrength and army. But when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of prety ſtrength. The ROMAINE legions followed him, and gaue him no reſpit, but purſued ſo neare, that they came and aſſaulted his campe at their firſt coming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampers, as if they had bene at the aſſault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIANS truſting to the ſtrength of the place, and driuen vnto it of neceſſitie, (the which maketh cowards moſt deſperat) they valiantly reſiſted their enemies the beſt they could. The ROMAINES in contrarie maner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out luſtily like men, and the fight was ſo much more cruell, for that it was in the ſight of their Generall Scipio, & of all the army beſides: inſomuch that their valiant ſeruice there could not be hidden. Therefore they neuer gaue ouer the aſſault, vntill that hauing done their vttermoſt indeuour, they got vp vpon the rampers, and entred in diuers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Haſdrubal Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, ſaued himſelfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMAINES entred into their fort. After this battell, Scipio according to his manner, cauſed all the Spaniſh priſoners to be brought before him, & then gaue them libertie to depart without paying of ranſome. Among the priſoners, there was a yong Gentleman of the kings bloud, & nephew vnto Maſiniſſa, whom whẽ he had vſed very honorably, he ſent vnto Maſiniſſa, with great and rich giftes: to ſhew therby, that a Generall of an armie, ſhould be as bountifull and full of ciuill vertues, as otherwiſe skilfull and expert in martiall diſcipline. For the end of war is victorie: the benefite whereof conſiſteth in bountie and clemencie. From thence commeth the glorie and all other praiſes due to Captaines: as it happened in thoſe things whereof we now treate. For a great number of SPANIARDS being preſent, wondering at the great clemencie of the Generall of the ROMAINS: they could do no leſſe but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Scipio ſtrake that word dead ſtraight, the which was no cõmon ſound to the ROMANES eares, & therefore he would by no means allow that title, which he knew to be hatefull to the Noblemen of his country, & alſo vnmeet for the libertie of the ROMAINES. He only prayeth the SPANIARDS, that if they had any mind & deſire not to ſhew themſelues vnthankfull to him, that then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of ROME. So whileſt theſe things were done by Scipio, the other two Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Haſdrubal the ſonne of Giſgo) after they vnderſtood of the ouerthrowe of their men by the riuer of Beſula: they made all the ſpeede they could to ioyne together, and ſhortly after came and met with Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, to conſult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and conſidered all things, they concluded thus: that Haſdrubal BARCINIAN ſhould go into ITALIE to his brother Hannibal, where the warre was greateſt: and that Mago, and the other Haſdrubal ſhould remaine in SPAINE, ſhould ſend for aide from CARTHAGE, and ſhould not fight with the ROMANES vntill all their forces looked for, were aſſembled, and ſo might make a great and puiſſant army. When Haſdrubal was gone into ITALY, Hanno was ſent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practiſing in his iourney to make the CELTIBERIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and ſet vpon him by Scipioes commaundement, and

and was so fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him prisoner. Now there was a city which the country men called ORINGE, the which was very wealthy, & meete to renew the war. Lucius Scipio was sent thither with part of the army to besiege it: but finding it a very strong situation, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he enuironed the towne, and within few daies tooke and sacked it. Winter came on a pace, and the time of the yeare made thē both to retire into their garrisōs, for the winter. So Scipio hauing had so good fortune in this war, he wēt vnto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hasdruball, the sonne of Giszo, went to the sea side. The next sommer, wars growing more bloudy and cruell then before in the lower SPAINE, the ROMAINES & CARTHAGINIANS met, and ioyned battell by the riuer of Besula, and fought set battels. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victory, and made the enemies flie (of the which there were slaine a great number in the field) and giuing them no leisure to gather together againe, and to make head against him, he fought with them, and followed the chase so hotly, that Hasdruball and Mago were driuen to leaue the maine land, and to flie to GADES, after they had lost all their army. In the army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a yong man of a noble courage, and very wise, called Masinissa, who finding meanes to haue secret conference with Syllanus, he was the first man that offered him friendship, either being brought to it through Scipioes liberality, or else becausse he thought the time was come, that it was the surest way to take part with the ROMAINES, which were the conquerors. It is that Masinissa that afterwards (through the goodnesse of the ROMAINES) became the great and mighty king of NVMIDIA, and indeed he was diuerse wayes a profitable friend vnto the ROMAINES. Furthermore, the selfe same yeare (which was the fourteenth of the second war with the AFRICANS) SPAINE was the first nation and people of the vpland men dwelling in the heart of the Realme, that was conquered vnder the happy conduct of the Viceconsull Scipio: howbeit it was the last Realme that was made a prouince long time after, by Augustus Cæsar. Now Scipio not cōtenting himselfe with the great victories he had obtained, in very short time in SPAINE (for he had an imaginatiō and good hope also to conquer AFRICK) he thought that his best way, to make all the means he could possible to get Syphax, king of the MASÆSYLIANS, a friēd to the ROMAINS. Wherfore after he had felt the kings mind, perceiuing that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMAINES: he presently set all his other affaires aside, and sailed into AFRICK with two galleys only, at fiue oares to a banke. At the selfe same time also came Hasdrubal, the son of Giszo thither, from GADES: so that both these valiant and lusty Captaines came of purpose to the king, enuying one the other, to craue the kings goodwill, vnto their countrey and commonwealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his court, and did vse them very honourably and courteously, and appointed that they should both eate at one table, and lie in one selfe chamber, becausse the one should not thinke his entertainement better then the other. It is reported that Hasdrubal wondering at the magnanimitie & great wisdom of Scipio that was present, he considered with himselfe the great danger the city of CARTHAGE and all AFRICKE besides was in, through that mans meanes: for he saw him yet a young man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, and that had continually obtained such victories, and therefore considering the lusty youth of this gentleman, he imagined that it was impossible to perswade him to imbrace peace, rather then warre. Besides, he was afraid also that Syphax, moued by the personage and authoritie of him that was present, would take part with the ROMAINES: and indeed his mind gaue him rightly, for so it happened. For though Syphax at the first shewed himselfe indifferent to them both, & had moued talke to end the war betwixt the ROMAINES and the CARTHAGINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio told him he could conclude no peace without consent of the Senate of ROME, he reiected Hasdruball, and inclining to Scipioes request, he made league with the people of ROME. So Scipio being returned againe into SPAINE, himselfe partly by force, and partly also by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITVRGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refused to yeeld themselues vnto the ROMAINES. And to the end nothing should be lacking for all kind of sports and pleasures, after he had so fortunately obtained so many famous victories: when he was come to new CARTHAGE, he caussed the fencers to prepare thēselues to fight with great pompe, where there were many great estates, not onely to see that pastime, but also they themselues to handle the weapons in person. But amongst other SPANIARDS of noble houses, there were two called, Corbis and Orsua, which were at strife together for the kingdome: but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being slaine by the others hand. The fight was very lamentable and grieuons to the beholders: but the death of him that was slaine, troubled them much more, for they were both cousin-germains. After all this, Scipio hauing his mind still occupied in matters of greater waight and importance, then those which he had alreadie brought to passe, he fell sicke. His sickenesse being caried through all SPAINE, and as it happeneth often, his disease being reported to be much greater and daungerous then it was indeed: therupon, not onely the nations of SPAINE began to rise in hope of change, but the armie selfe also of the ROMAINES, the which he had left at SVCRO. First of all, martiall discipline was corrupted through the absence of the Generall. Afterwardes also, the report of his sickenesse, and daunger of his life being spred abroad in the armie, raised such a rebellion among them: that some of them litle regarding the authoritie and commaundement of the head Captaines of the bandes, they draue them away, and chose two meane souldiers for their Captaines; who presumptuously tooke vpon them the name giuen vnto them by men of no authoritie, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundles of roddes and axes to be caried before them. Such folly doth furie and vaine ambition oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other side, the SPANIARDS slept not, & specially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aspiring to the kingdome of SPAINE, came to Scipio when he was conquerour, after he had taken new CARTHAGE. But afterwardes, being offended to see the power of the ROMAINES increase daily, they sought occasion to make some alteration. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipioes sickenesse, but also how he was at deaths doore, and did beleeue it: they presently leauied an armie, and went and made war with the SVVESSITANS which were confederats of the ROMAINS. But Scipio being recouered againe of his sicknes, like as vpon the false rumor of his death euery man began to rise: euen so after the truth was knowne indeed of his recouerie, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durst proceed any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skilfull in martial discipline, then acquainted with sedition and rebellion: although he was maruellously offended with the souldiers that had committed this folly; yet in the end, lest following his anger, men should haue thought him to haue exceeded all bounds of reason in punishing of them, he referred all vnto the Councell. The most part of them gaue aduice, that the authours of the rebellion should be punished, and all the rest pardoned: for by this meanes, said they, the punishment shall light vpon a few that haue deserued it, and all the rest shall take example by them. Scipio followed that aduise, and presently sent for all the seditious bands, to come to new CARTHAGE to receiue their pay. The souldiers obeyed his commaundement, some of them making their fault lesse then it was, as men do often flatter themselues: others also trusting to the Captaines clemencie, as knowing him not to be extreame in punishment. For Scipio was wont to say, that he had rather saue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then to kill a thousand enemies. The rumor ran also, that Scipio had another armie readie, the which he looked for to ioyne with them, and then to set vpon the kings (Mandonius and Indibilis) who made war with the SVVESSITANS. These souldiers departing from SVCRO, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came vnto CARTHAGE. Howbeit the next day after they were come into the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armor and weapons being taken from them, they were enuironed with all the legions armie. Then the ROMAINE Generall sitting in place of iudgement, shewed himself before all the companie in as good health and good disposition of bodie, as euer he was in all his youth. Then he made a sharpe and bitter oration, full of grieuous complaints: insomuch as there was not one of all the souldiers that were vnarmed, thar durst cast vp their eyes, or looke their Generall in the face, they were so ashamed. For their consciences did accuse them for the fault they had committed; and the feare of death did take their wits and sences from them, & the presence of their gratious Captaine, made them blush as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherfore there was a generall and sorowfull silence of all men. So after he had ended his oration, he caused the chiefe authors of this rebellion to be brought foorth before the whole assembly: who, after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were presently beheaded, the which was a fearefull and lamētable sight to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other souldiers to be sworne againe, & then went and proclaimed war against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they considering with themselues, how the ROMAINE souldiers that had rebelled in the campe, were put to death: they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leauied an armie of twenty thousand footmen and two thousand horsmen, and came downe with them against the ROMAINES. Scipio hauing intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increase their army, & that that other nations could rebell: he departed from CARTHAGE, and went with as great ſpeed as he could, to meet with the enemy. The kings were camped in a very ſtrõg place, & truſted ſo to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor alſo to refuſe the battel if it were offered them. Howbeit it chanced by the nearneſſe of both campes, that within few dayes, they being prouoked by the ROMAINES, came downe and ſet their men in battell ray, & ioyned battel with Scipio: ſo that a good while together, the fight was very bloudy & cruell. But at length the SPANIARDS ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind, & being driuen to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on euery ſide, they were ouercome: ſo that the third part of them ſcarcely ſaued thẽſelues by flying. Mandonius and Indibilis ſeeing themſelues vtterly vndone, & that there was no hope nor remedy left: they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receiue them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMAINES; yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemy by curteſie and clemency, then by force: he did pardon them, & only commanded them to giue him mony to pay his ſouldiers. In the meane time Maſiniſſa came from GADES, & landed: becauſe he would himſelfe in perſon confirme the friendſhip he had offered Scipio in his abſence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, & alſo ſpeake with him face to face, whõ he iudged to be a worthy man, for the famous victories he had obtained. And in truth Maſiniſſa was not deceiued in the opinion he had of the valiantnes & vertues of Scipio, but found him the ſelfe ſame man whom he before had imagined him to be in his mind: the which but ſeldome happeneth ſo notwithſtanding. For beſides the great rare gifts of nature that Scipio had aboue all others, there was in him alſo a certaine princely grace and maieſty. Furthermore, he was maruellous gentle & courteous vnto them that came to him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a paſſing gift to win euery man. He was very graue in his geſture & behauior, and euer ware long haire. Maſiniſſa being come to ſalute him, when he ſaw him, he had him in ſuch admiration, as it is reported, that he could not caſt his eyes off him, nor haue his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him maruellouſly for ſending his nephew vnto him, & promiſed him that his deeds ſhould confirme & witneſſe the friendſhip agreed vpon betweene them: the which he euer after inuiolably kept vnto the ROMAINES, euen to the houre of his death. So all the nations of SPAINE became ſubiect to the Empire of ROME, or at the leaſt their cõfederats: wherupon thoſe of GADES alſo following the examples of others, came & yeelded themſelues vnto the ROMAINS. This is a very antient nation, and if we may credit the report of it: as CARTHAGE was in AFRICK, & THEBES in BOEOTIA; ſo was GADES vpon the ſea, a Colony of the TYRIANS. Scipio after he had cõquered all SPAINE, & driuen out the CARTHAGINIANS, conſidering that there remained nothing more for him to do: he left the gouernment of the prouince vnto L. Lentulus, & to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to ROME. When he was arriued at ROME, the Senate gaue him audience out of the city, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he had particularly told them of the things he had valiantly, and fortunately brought to end: and further, that he had ouercome foure Captaines in diuerſe foughten fields, and alſo put to flight foure armies of the enemies, and driuen the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAINES, and that there was no nation left in all thoſe parts, but was ſubdued to the ROMAINES, the Senate gaue iudgemẽt, that al theſe things were worthy of a noble triũph. But becauſe neuer man yet was ſuffered to enter into ROME in triumph, for any victories he had obtained, whileſt he was only but Viceconſull, and had not yet bene Conſull: the Senators thought it not good, and Scipio himſelfe alſo made no great ſute for it, becauſe he would not be an occaſion to bring in any new cuſtome, and to breake the old. So when he came into the city, he was afterwards declared Conſull, with the great goodwill and conſent of the whole aſſembly. It is reported that there neuer came ſuch a world of people to ROME, as were there at that time, not only for the aſſemblies ſake, but more to ſee Publius Cornelius Scipio. Wherefore not the ROMAINES onely, but all the ſtrangers alſo that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and ſayd both openly and priuately: that they ſhould ſend him into AFRICKE, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, at home in their owne countrey. Scipio alſo being of the ſame opinion, ſayd, that he would aske aduice of the people, if the Senate would be againſt ſuch a worthy enterpriſe. For amongſt the Peeres and Senators, there were ſome that vehemently inueyed againſt that opinion, and amongſt the reſt, Fabius Maximus ſpecially, a man of great fame and authority. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and ſhewed many reaſons that there was no way to ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to driue Hanniball out of ITALIE, but that only: and that all other counsels were in vaine, and vnprofitable. After this matter was long debated in councel, Sicile was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with all his army into Africke, if he thought it meete and profitable for the commonwealth. The decree of the Senate being published, euery mans mind ran of so great enterprises, that they perswaded themselues Africke was already their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio saw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this iourney, because of the pouerty of the common treasure, and for lacke of yong men: the flower and choise of the which was vtterly gone, by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Hanniball had giuen them. Howbeit to satisfie euery mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speed he could, to prepare things necessary for the warres. So diuerse people of Thvscan, and of the Vmbrians, offered to helpe him to their best power: some of them gaue him timber to build his ships, others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kind of victuals, and munition for his army. The ships being built, and all the army by sea put in readinesse, in the space of fiue and forty dayes, a thing incredible to many: Scipio departed out of Italy, and sailed towards Sicile. But when he came to take muster of his army, he specially chose those that had serued long time in the warres, vnder the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for very expert souldiers. And for the Sicilians, he partly wanne them by courtesie, and partly by compulsion cõpelled them to giue him aide for the warre he tooke in hand, the which he meant to make in Africke, when the time of the yeare should serue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of diuerse cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the sayd prouince, and commanded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, euery man with horse and armour. Then comming at the day appointed, according to his commandement: the Consull bad them chuse whether they would follow him in the warres of Africke, or else deliuer vp their armor & horse, to as many other Romaines as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the warre, Scipio appointed 300 other yong Romaines in their places, whom he had brought out of Italy with him vnarmed, because he would mount and arme thẽ at the Sicilians cost, as indeed it chanced. Afterwards, they did him great seruice in Africke, in many great battels. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his army in garrison for the winter time, when he came to Syracvsa, taking order not only for the preparation of war, but also for the affaires of Sicile. There when it was told him by complaint of diuerse, that there was a great company of Italian souldiers in that city, who wold not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the wars, but kept them still in their hands, notwithstãding that the Senate had enioyned them by speciall commandement to make restitution to the Syracvsans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commandement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hearts of Sicile, and was reported to be a iust and vpright Consull. In the meane time he was aduertised by Caius Lælius, that returned out of Africke with great spoile: how king Masinissa was very desirous of his comming thither, and that he instantly prayed him he would come into Africke, as soone as he could possible, so it were without the preiudice of the commonwealth. Moreouer, that diuerse nations and people of Africke had the like desire: who hating the gouernement of the Carthaginians, desired nothing more, then some good occasion to rebell. Now this iourney was not deferred through Scipioes fault or negligence, considering that such a Captaine could hardly be found that was more carefull and diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of Sicile, & the oportunity he had to recouer Locres again, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpose to passe according to his mind. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieued him much: because that hauing left him at Locres, he fell to all sorts of insolency, as to deflowre women, and to spoile the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruellously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subiect to the gouernment of so vile and vicked a man. So the Ambassadours of Locres being arriued at Rome, and exhibiting their complaints in open Senate of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter so grieuously, that they made bitter decrees, not onely against the same Pleminius, but also against P. C. Scipio himselfe. Whereupon Scipioes enemies hauing gotten matter inough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offered the Locrians, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had suffered ſuffered all theſe things more negligently, then became the office or dutie of a Conſull. They added thereto moreouer, that his armie he had in SICILE was altogether vnruly and vnſeruiceable, and regarded not the ordinances of the camp: and that the captaine himſelfe was careleſſe, and altogether giuen ouer to pleaſure and idleneſſe. But aboue al others, Fabius Maximus was his heauy enemie, and ſo vehement againſt him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modeſtie and reaſon, and thought good to call him preſently home out of SICILE, and to diſmiſſe him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very ſtraight, and extreme. Wherefore, following Quintus Metellus counſell, the Senators appointed ten Ambaſſadors to go into SICILE, to make diligent inquiry, whether the accuſations obiected againſt Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they ſhoud commaund him in the name of the Senate preſently to returne into ITALY. And on the other ſide, if they found that he was vniuſtly accuſed, and onely through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detracters: then that they ſhould ſend him to his armie, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this warre. So when the Ambaſſadors were arriued in SICILE, after they had made diligent inquirie according to the articles of their commiſſion; they could not find that Scipio was faultie in any thing, ſauing that he had too lightly paſſed ouer the wrongs and iniuries Pleminius had done vnto the LOCRIANS. For Scipio was very liberall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding curteous and merciful alſo in puniſhing of them. But when they ſaw his armie, his ſhips, and all his other furniture and munition for war: it is reported that they wondred ſo much to ſee the great abundance and good order taken for all things, that when they returned to ROME, they greatly commended Scipio, and reiecting all the accuſations of his accuſers, they did promiſe the Senate & people of ROME, aſſured hope of victorie. So when all theſe home-troubles at ROME were taken away, there chanced other outward troubles abroad that grieued him much. For the Ambaſſadors of king Syphax came and told him that their maſter had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and was become friend vnto Haſdrubal, whoſe daughter he had maried: and therefore that he wiſhed him if he meant to do his country good, to make no attempt vpon AFRICKE, for he was determined to reckon the CARTHAGINIANS friends his, and alſo to ſet vpon them whom the CARTHAGINIANS account their enemies. Scipio quickly returned the Ambaſſadors again vnto Syphax, bacauſe the effect of their comming ſhould not be blown abroad in his camp: and gaue them letters, in the which he praid king Syphax, that remembring his league & faithful promiſe, he ſhould beware he attempted nothing vnworthy the name of a ROMAINE, & faith of a King. Afterwards calling his men together, he told them that the Ambaſſadors of king Syphax were come into SICILE, to cõplaine of his long tarying, as Maſiniſſa had done before. Therefore he was to haſten his iorney to go into AFRIKE, and thereupon commanded all his ſouldiers to put themſelues in readineſſe, and to prouide all things neceſſarie for their iourney. The Conſuls commandement being publiſhed through all SICILE, there repaired immediatly vnto LILYBEA a multitude of people, not onely of thoſe that were to ſaile into AFRIKE, but of others alſo that came to ſee the fleete and armie of the ROMAINES: becauſe they neuer ſaw an armie better furniſhed, nor ſet out with all things neceſſarie for warre, nor better repleniſhed with ſouldiers, then that. So Scipio, all things being readie, imbarked at LILYBEA with ſo earneſt a deſire to paſſe ouer the ſea, that neither oares nor wind did content his mind. Yet he was brought in few daies ſailing, to the promontory or mountaine called Faire, and there he put all his men on land. The newes of his arriuall flying ſtraight to CARTHAGE, all the citie was preſently in ſuch an vprore, that ſodainly they ſounded the allarme, and guarded the gates and wals, as appeareth by teſtimonie of ſome in writing. For from M. Regulus time, vnto that preſent day, it was almoſt fifty yeares ſpace ſince any ROMAINE captaine euer entred AFRIKE with force of armes. And therfore it was no maruell though they were afraid, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did increaſe their feare the more, becauſe the CARTHAGINIANS had no Captaine matchable with him. Haſdruball the ſonne of Giſgo had the name at that time of a luſtie Captaine, whom they knew had notwithſtanding bene ouercome, and driuen out of SPAINE by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope and ſafetie of their country in him, and in king Syphax that mightie king: they neuer left intreating the one, nor perſwading the other, to come and help the affaires of AFRICKE, with all the ſpeed they could poſſible. So, whileſt theſe two were preparing to ioyne both their armies together, Hannibal the ſonne of Hamilcar, being appointed to keepe the next country adioyning to it, came againſt the ROMAINES. Scipio after he had deſtroyed the countrey, and enriched his armie with great ſpoile: he camped by the citie of VTICA, to ſee if it were poſſible for him to winne ſo noble and wealthie a citie, and being beſides ſo commodious for the warres both by ſea and land. At the ſelfeſame time Maſiniſſa came to the ROMAINES camp, and was inflamed with a vehement deſire to make warre againſt king Syphax, by whom he had before bin driuen out of his kingdom and inheritance. Scipio that had known him in SPAINE, a yong Prince of an excellent wit, & quick and valiant of his hand: he ſent him to diſcouer the armie of the enemies, before the CARTHAGINIANS could gather any greater power, and willed him to vſe all the deuiſe and meanes he could poſſible to intiſe Hanno to fight. Maſiniſſa as he was commanded, began to prouoke the enemie; and drawing him out by litle and litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with al his legions armed, looking for a good houre to fight. The armie of the enemies was now wearied, when the ROMAINES caine to ſet vpon them with their freſh armie. Hanno at the firſt onſet was ouercome and ſlaine, with moſt of his men: and all the reſt fled, and diſperſed themſelues here and there, where they thought they might beſt ſcape. After this victory, Scipio returning back againe to beſiege the citie of VTICA: the ſodaine comming of Haſdruball and king Syphax, made him to leaue off his enterpriſe, for that they brought with them a great armie both of footmen and horſemen, and came and camped not farre from the ROMAINES. Scipio perceiuing that, raiſed his ſiege immediatly, and came and fortified his camp vpon a hill, from whence he might go and fight with the enemie, and moleſt them of VTICA, and alſo keepe his ſhips ſafe that rode at anker. Howbeit the time of the yeare being come, that both armies were to diſpoſe their men in garriſons for the winter ſeaſon: he determined to ſend vnto king Syphax to feele his mind, and to make him leaue the friendſhip of the CARTHAGINIANS if it were poſſible. For he knew well it was his mariage with Sophonisba, that through her flattering perſwaſions had brought him to that furie, that he had not onely forſaken the friendſhip of the ROMAINES, but alſo meant to deſtroy them, contrary to his faith and promiſe: and that if he had once ſatisfied the heate of his loue with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax hauing vnderſtood Scipioes meſſage ſent him, he anſwered, that indeed it was time, not onely to leaue the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but alſo to giue vp all thought of warre: and ſo promiſed, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Scipio gaue good eare vnto it, and caught hold of an excellent fine deuiſe. He choſe the valianteſt ſouldiers in his armie, apparelled them like ſlaues, and made them waite vpon the Ambaſſadors, and gaue them inſtructions what they ſhould do. Theſe fellowes, whileſt the Ambaſſadours and King Syphax were in talke together about the articles and conditions of peace, and that the conſultation held longer then it was wont to do: they went and walked vp and downe through the enemies campe, to ſee all the wayes and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes inſtructions. After they had done this diuers times, they came againe to Scipio. Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio ſeemed to make preparation for warres, (as being out of hope of any peace) and to make his armie readie by ſea, preparing engines of batterie to returne to beſiege VTICA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumor through all the countrie, to perſwade his enemies that it was true: howbeit hauing called the Captaines and petie Captaines of his armie together, he made them priuie to his intent and enterpriſe. He told them that both the enemies campes lay not farre aſunder; of the which, the one of them had all their tents and cabines of wood; and the building of the other camp was all of reeds, ſo that they were both eaſie to be burnt. Whereupon hauing ſent for Maſiniſſa and Caius Lælius to come vnto him, he gaue them charge about midnight to giue allarme vnto Syphax camp, and to ſet it a fire: and that he himſelfe on the other ſide, would ſet vpon the CARTHAGINIANS campe. They two obeyed Scipioes commandement, performed his will without delay, and came at the houre appointed them to aſſaile the NVMIDIANS camp, and ſo did ſet the houſes of reeds on fire; which tooke fire in ſuch ſort, as the flame was immediatly round about the camp. The NVMIDIANS at the firſt thinking the fire had come by misfortune, ranne thither ſtraight vnarmed to quench it. But when they found themſelues among the legions of the ROMAINES, and that there was nothing but killing downe right, ſeeing themſelues ſo compaſſed in on all ſides, they ſaw their beſt remedie was to flie. On the other ſide alſo, where Scipioes armie was: the CARTHAGINIANS campe was almoſt all burnt, and the enemies put to flight with ſuch cruell ſlaughter, that ſome writers affirme there were ſlaine that night about fortie thouſand men, aſwell CARTHAGINIANS as NVMIDIANS. This great ouerthrow and ſlaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in ſuch a feare and terror, that ſome thought beſt to ſend for Hannibal out of ITALY, and others gaue aduiſe to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich and wealthie, and altogether againſt the peace

peace makers: they ſo preuailed, that they leauied a new power to begin war againe. King Syphax and Haſdrubal hauing leauied a great multitude of footmen and horſemen againe, renued their armie ſooner then was looked for, and came againe to pitch their campe directly ouer againſt the enemies. Scipio hauing vnderſtanding of that, would not tarie, but determined to giue thē battel, whileſt his men were in good heart, and willing to fight. So it chanced at the firſt, by the neatenes of both their camps, that there were certaine skirmiſhes: but in the end, the armies came to ioyne battel, and the Romaines fought with ſuch corage and terror, that at the firſt onſet they made the Nvmidians and Carthaginians flie, and ſlue the moſt part of them. Haſdrubal and Syphax ſcaped, by flying out of the ſlaughter. Scipio ſent Maſiniſſa and Caius Lælius with the light horſemen to giue them chaſe. Syphax being come into Nvmidia, and from thence into his own realme and kingdome, he leauied an army in haſt of all ſorts of people, and came to meete with Maſiniſſa and Caius Lælius, & was not afraid to giue them battell. But it was a fond part of him, conſidering that he was nothing like ſo ſtrong as his enemie, neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in likelihood of ſouldiers. For neither the ſouldiers nor captaines of his armie, were matchable with the ſouldiers and captaines of the Romaines camp: and therefore king Syphax was eaſily ouercome by ſuch skilful ſouldiers, and moreouer, was himſelfe taken in battel, with many other great noble men, whom Maſiniſſa would hardly haue looked for: and then they were brought vnto Scipio. At the firſt there was a maruellous ioy among them, when it was told them that king Syphax ſhould be brought priſoner vnto the camp: but afterwards when they ſaw him bound, they were all ſory to ſee him in ſuch pitifull ſtate, remembring his former greatnes and regall maieſtie. For they called to mind how famous the name of this King had bin but a litle before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, and alſo the power of ſo great a realme and kingdom. Howbeit Scipio the Romain Conſull receiued him very curteouſly, and gently asked him what he meant to change his mind in that ſort, and what moued him to make war with the Romaines. Thē the king remembring his former friendſhip and faithfull promiſe broken, he boldly told him, that it was the loue he bare to his wife Sophonisba, who onely had procured him to deale ſo diſhonorably with the Romaines: howbeit, that he had ſo ſmarted for it, as all others might take example hy him, and beware how they breake their promiſe. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreme miſerie, to ſee that his mortal enemy Maſiniſſa was ſo taken with that frenzie and mad humor, wherewith he before was poſſeſſed. For after Syphax was ouercome and taken, Maſiniſſa went into Cyrtha, the chiefe citie of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonisba there, with whom he fel in fanſie: who after ſhe had finely wrapped him in with her deceitfull flatteries & kindnes, he promiſed her alſo to deliuer her out of the Romaines hands: and becauſe he might the better performe his promiſe made, he took her to his wife, and maried her. When Scipio was informed of theſe things, it grieued him maruellouſly. For it was knowne to all men, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, & through the Romaines meanes: and therfore al that was belonging to Syphax, was at the diſpoſition of the Romaines. Wherfore if Maſiniſſa had without Scipioes conſent, vndertaken to defend Sophonisbaes quarel: then it appeared plainly, he deſpiſed the authoritie of the Conſul, and the maieſtie of the people of Rome. Furthermore, his filthie luſt did aggrauate his fault the more, the which ſeemed ſo much more intollerable, by how much the cōtinency of the Romaine Conſul was the greater, the which Maſiniſſa ſaw daily before his eyes, and might haue bene a paterne and example vnto him. For Scipio, beſides many other proofes and ſhewes of his vertues, in all places where he obtained victory, he alwaies kept the women vndefiled, which were taken priſoners. So Scipio being offended with Maſiniſſa, (though he ſhewed it not before companie) receiued him very louingly at his returne to the camp: yet afterwards notwithſtanding, taking him aſide, he ſo ſharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and alſo a ſeuere captaine. Whereupon Maſiniſſa went into his tent and wept, and could not tel what way he ſhould take: howbeit ſhortly after, perceiuing that it was vnpoſſible for him to keepe promiſe with Sophonisba, which grieued him to the heart: he ſent her poiſon, and a meſſage withall, the which ſhe dranke immediatly, and ſo willingly made her ſelfe away. Furthermore, the Carthaginians after they had receiued ſuch wonderfull great loſſes and ouerthrowes, one after an other, perceiuing that their affaires were brought to ſuch a ſtraight and extremitie, that they were no more to looke after the enlarging of their dominions, but onely to conſider which way they might keepe their owne country: they ſent for Hannibal to come out of Italy. P. Scipio about peace: either becauſe he was afraid of the good fortune of this yong man, or elſe for that he miſtruſted he could not otherwiſe helpe his countrey and common wealth, which he ſaw decaying, and like to be deſtroyed. Wherfore a place was appointed, where they might meet according to his deſire: where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this warre. In the end Scipio offered Hanniball ſuch conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the Romaines were not wearie of warre, and that Scipio himſelfe being a yong man, had better hope to obtaine victorie, then great deſire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being ſet aſide, they brake of their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthy captaines of the moſt noble nations that could be, prepared themſelues to battel, either to giue or take away in ſhort time from their common-weales, the ſeigniorie and Empire of all the world. The place where they employed all their force, and where this famous battell was fought, as it is reported, was by the citie of Zama: in the which the Romaines being conquerours, did firſt make the Elephants flie, then the horſemen, and in the end brake ſo fiercely into the footmen, that they ouerthrew all the armie. It is reported, that there were ſlaine and taken by the Romaines, aboue fortie thouſand Carthaginians. Hannibal fled out of the fury of the battel, and ſaued himſelf, though that day he had ſhewed himſelfe like a valiant and famous Captaine. For at this battell he had ſet his armie in better order then euer he had done before, and had ſtrengthened it, both with the commoditie of the place, and reliefe beſide: and euen in the very furie and terror of the battell he ſo beſtirred himſelfe among his ſouldiers, that the enemies themſelues did commend and praiſe him for a noble Captaine. After this victorie, Scipio meeting with Vermina king Syphax ſon, that brought aide to the Carthaginians: he put him to flight, and came and brought his armie to the walles and hauen of Carthage, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that the Carthaginians would ſue to him for peace. For, as the Carthaginians before had bene very good ſouldiers, and readie to make warres: ſo were they now become timorous and faint hearted, ſpecially when they ſaw their Generall Hannibal ouercome, in whom they chiefly repoſed all their hope & truſt, for defence of their countrey. Wherefore they being (as I haue ſaid) out of heart, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accuſtomed clemencie he would graunt them peace. Now was great ſute made at Rome, to haue the gouernement of the prouince of Afrike, and one of the new Conſuls made haſte to come and make warre, with ſuch charge and preparation as was meete for his dignitie and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that another ſhould carie away the glorie for ending of ſo great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the Carthaginian Ambaſſadors requeſts. So the capitulation of the articles of peace was offered vnto the Carthaginians, according to the conquerours mind: and beſides all other things, the whole fleet of all their ſhips and gallies (in the which conſiſted much their hope) were taken from them. For when the whole fleet was burnt, it was ſuch a lamentable ſight vnto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole citie, as if Carthage had bin deſtroyed and razed to the very ground. For as ſome do write, there were fiue hundred ſhips burnt of all ſorts. Theſe things therefore ſhould make vs all beware of humaine frailtie, the which we often forget in our proſperitie. For they that before perſwaded themſelues to conquer the world, after they had wonne ſo many great battels and victories of the enemie, and in maner conquered all Italy, and ſo valiantly beſides beſieged the citie of Rome: were in ſhort time after brought to ſuch miſerie and extremitie, that all their power and force being ouercome, they had left them no more but the walles of Carthage, and yet they were not ſure to keepe them, but through the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the enemie. After theſe things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely reſtore King Maſiniſſa to his Realme againe, but alſo adding thereunto the beſt part of all king Syphax countrey, they made him one of the mightieſt kings of all Africke: and afterwards he gaue honourable gifts vnto euery man as he had deſerued. In fine, after he had ſet all the affaires of Africke at good ſtay, he brought his armie backe againe into Italy: at what time there came to Rome a world of people, to ſee ſo great and famous a captaine, returning from ſuch wonderfull great victories. So he entred into Rome with pompe of triumph, Terentius Culeo following of him with a hat on his head, becauſe that through his fauor and friendſhip he was taken out of bondage. Polybius writeth, that king Syphax was led in triumph: howbeit ſome ſay he died before Scipio triumphed. Indeed diuers that did triumph, ſome before him during the warres of the Carthaginians, and others afterwards in the warres of Macedonia and Asia, they made greater ſhew of plate, both of gold and ſiluer in their triumph, and

and led also a great number of prisoners: howbeit one onely Hannibal that was ouercome, and the glorie of so great a warre ended, did make the triumph of P. Scipio so excellent and famous, that it farre passed all the gold and magnificent pompe of all others triumphs. For after AFRICKE was conquered, no nation then was ashamed to be ouercome by the ROMAINES. For he made this prouince, as it were a bridge and open passage to increase and enlarge the Empire of ROME, both in MACEDON, and also in ASIA, and in other parts of the world besides. Now Scipio (whom I may rightly call AFRICAN, after the conquest of AFRICKE) being returned to ROME, he lacked no temporall dignities nor honours. For in the councell holden for the election of Censors, although there were diuers others of the noblest houses of ROME that sued for that office: yet he himselfe, and Ælius Petus were preferred before all the rest, and after they were created Censors, they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietnesse. Afterwards the Censors that followed them, did still one after another chuse Scipio AFRICAN Prince of the Senate: the which dignitie was wont to be giuen to them onely, that obtained the type of all honour, through their great conquests and benefites done to their countrey. Shortly after, he was againe chosen Consul with Sempronius Longus, the sonne of that Sempronius whom Hannibal ouercame in that great ouerthrow, at the battell by the riuer of Trebia. They two were the first (as it is reported) that deuided the Noblemen and Senators from the people, in the shew place to see pastime. This separation was very odious to the people of ROME, and they were maruellously offended with the Consuls for it, because they tooke it, that increasing the honour of the state of the Senators, they thereby did discountenance and imbase them. Some say also, that Scipio AFRICAN afterwards repented himselfe that he had taken away the old custome, and brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variance betwixt Masinissa and the CARTHAGINIANS, touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate sent Scipio thither with two other commissioners: who after they had heard the cause of their quarrell, they left the matter as they found it, and would proceed no further in it. And this they did, because that the CARTHAGINIANS being troubled with ciuill warres at home, should take vpon them no other warres abroade, neither should haue leysure to attempt any alteration otherwise. For the ROMAINES had great warre with king Antiochus, and Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN was there with him, who still stirred vp the old enemies against the ROMAINES, and practised to raise vp new enemies against them, and in all things to counsell the CARTHAGINIANS to cast away the yoke of bondage, which the ROMAINES had brought them into vnder the title of peace, & to proue the friendship of the kings. Howbeit shortly after, the ROMAINES hauing obtained victorie, and driuen king Antiochus out of GREECE: they intended also to conquer ASIA: and therefore all their hope was in Scipio AFRICAN, as a man that was borne to end wars of great importance. Howbeit Lucius Scipio and Caius Lælius were Consuls, and either of them made sute for the gouernement of ASIA. The matter being consulted vpon, the Senate stood doubtfull what iudgement they should giue, betwixt two so famous men. Howbeit, because Lælius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater estimation: the Senate began to take his part. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, praied the Senate that they would not dishonour his house so, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was besides very wise, and that he himselfe also would be his Lieutenant: he had no sooner spoken the words, but the Senators receiued him with great ioy, and presently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordained in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio should go into GREECE to make with war the ÆTOLIANS, and that frō thence he should go into ASIA, if he thought good, to make warre with King Antiochus: and also that he should take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, because he should go against Hannibal, that was in Antiochus armie. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he first shewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwards also vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, considering the great things he had done? For, notwithstanding he was that AFRICAN by name that had ouercome Hannibal, that had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praise of martiall discipline: yet of his owne good nature he made himselfe inferior to his yonger brother, because he might haue the honour of obtaining the gouernement of that prouince from his fellow Consul Lælius, that was so well beloued, and of great estimation. Lucius Scipio the Consull brought great honour to his countrey by that warre, for that he followed the sound and faithful counsell of his brother. For first of all going into GREECE, he tooke truce for sixe moneths with the ÆTOLIANS, through the aduice of his brother AFRICAN: who counſelled him, that ſetting all things apart, he ſhould ſtraight go into ASIA, where the warre was rifeſt. Afterwards alſo he wanne Pruſias king of BITHYNIA from Antiochus friendſhip, who before was wauering vp and downe, doubtfull which ſide to take, and all through his brother AFRICANS meanes and practiſe. So the authoritie of the AFRICAN was very great, and all thoſe that would obtaine any thing of the Conſul, came firſt to the AFRICAN to be their meane and interceſſor. Now when he came into ASIA, Antiochus Ambaſſador, and Heraclides BIZANTINE, came vnto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly told their meſſage, perceiuing that they could not obtaine reaſonable conditions of peace: they priuatly talked with Scipio AFRICAN as they were commaunded, and practiſed the beſt they could to make him king Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would ſend him his yonger ſonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the gouernement of all his Realme, onely reſeruing the name and title of the King. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no leſſe in faithfulneſſe and bountie, then in many other vertues, after he had anſwered them to all other matters, he told them, that for his ſonne he would take him for a maruellous friendly gift: and that for a priuate good turne, he would do the beſt he could to requite him with the like. Howbeit, that he would counſell the King aboue all things to leaue off thought of warre, and to receiue thoſe offers and conditions of peace, which the Senate and people of ROME would offer him. Shortly after, Antiochus ſent P. Scipio his ſonne according to his promiſe: who (as it is reported) had bin taken priſoner from the firſt beginning of the warre, as he went from CHALCIDE vnto ORICVM: or as other writers ſay, as he paſſed by in a pinnaſe. Yet ſome hold opinion, that he was taken as he went to diſcouer the counſell of the enemies, and that he was then ſent againe vnto his father, lying ſicke at the citie of ELEA. This great curteſie of king Antiochus was maruellous well thought of of the AFRICAN, and not without cauſe: for to ſee his ſonne after he had bene away ſo long, it did greatly lighten his ſpirits, and diſeaſed bodie. But P. Scipio to ſhew ſome token of a thankfull mind, prayed the Ambaſſadours that came vnto him, greatly to thanke King Antiochus for the exceeding pleaſure he had done him, to ſend him his ſonne. Afterwards he gaue Antiochus aduice alſo that he ſhould not giue battell, till he vnderſtood of his returne from ELEA to the campe. So Antiochus being perſwaded by the athoritie of ſo worthy a man, he kept cloſe in his campe for a certaine time, and determined to draw the warre out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to ſpeake with the Conſull, by the AFRICANS meanes. But afterwards, the Conſull camping hard by MAGNESIA, did ſo vexe and prouoke the enemie, that the King came out to battell, and ſet his men in battell ray. It is reported that Hannibal himſelfe was preſent at the battell, being one of the Generals for the King. So Antiochus being ouercome, and his armie diſcomfited, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires: he came vnto the AFRICAN, (who being newly recouered of his ſickneſſe, came to the campe within a litle after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtained of the Conſull to be contented to talke of peace. When Antiochus Ambaſſadours were come to the camp, and that they had humbly craued pardon in the behalfe of their King, and alſo praied that they would giue them ſuch conditions of peace, as they beſt liked of: Scipio AFRICAN with the conſent of them all anſwered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to yeeld to aduerſitie, neither alſo to be proud in proſperitie: and therefore that he now made him the ſelfſame offer and conditiõs of peace, which he did before the victorie. That the king ſhould not meddle with EVROPE: that he ſhould ſurrender vp all he had in ASIA, from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the riuer of Tinais: that he ſhould pay tribute twentie yeares together: that he ſhould alſo put in ſuch hoſtages as the Conſull would chuſe out: and that ſpecially aboue all the reſt, they ſhould deliuer Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN vnto the Conſull, who was the onely author and procurer of this warre. But he, as we haue written in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus armie was ouerthrowne both by ſea and by land, eſcaped the ROMAINES hands, and went vnto Pruſias King of BITHYNIA. Antiochus hauing accepted the offers and conditions of peace, ſaid, that the ROMAINES vſed him very fauourably, to rid him of ſo great care, and to appoint him ſo ſmall a kingdome. For great kingdomes, and ouer-much wealth which euery man coueteth, are full of great and ſundrie troubles: inſomuch that Theocritus words are as true, as otherwiſe excellently written.

So when the mightie King of ASIA was ouercome, and that ſo great a warre was ſo eaſily ended beyond all mens opinion: the Conſull L. Scipio returned to ROME, and made his entrie into the citie, ſhewing a great and honourable triumph. He alſo deſerued the ſurname of the prouince and country ſubdued by him. So that, as his eldeſt brother before was called AFRICAN, for that he had conquered AFRICKE: euen ſo was Lucius Scipio ſurnamed ASIAN, for conquering ASIA vnto ROME. And P. Scipio, through whoſe counſell his brother Lucius had brought his warres to happie end, he went not cleare without honour alſo. For ſhortly after, two noble Cenſors, T. Q. Flaminius, and Marcus Claudius Marcellus choſe him Prince of the Senate the third time. Now at that time, the houſe and family of the Scipioes and Cornelians flouriſhed, with ſupreame degree of honour: and the authoritie of Scipio AFRICAN was growne to ſuch height and greatneſſe, as no priuate man could wiſh to be any greater in a free citie. Howbeit the ſecret malice of wicked hearts, which could no longer abide this greatneſſe and authoritie, began at length to burſt out, and to light vpon thoſe that were the authors of ſo great things. For two Tribunes of the people, ſuborned (as it is reported) by Porcius Cato: they accuſed P. Scipio AFRICAN for keeping backe king Antiochus money, and becauſe he brought it not into the common chamber or treaſurie. Scipio AFRICAN knowing his innocencie, being called by the Magiſtrate, ſhewed him ſelfe obedient, and came into the market place with a bold countenance, and there made an oration, declaring what things he had done for the benefite and commoditie of his countrie and commonwealth. The rehearſal of theſe things did not miſlike the common people that were preſent: becauſe he did it rather to auoid the daunger prepared for him, then otherwiſe for any vaine glorie or oſtentetion. Howbeit the Tribunes not being ſo contented, were vehement againſt him, and ſpared no iniurious words, but accuſed him as though he had indeed bene in fault, howbeit vpon ſuſpition, rather then of any due proofe. The next morning being commaunded to come before them againe, he appeared at the houre appointed, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole aſſembly, & went vp to the pulpit for orations. When he ſaw that euery man kept ſilence, then he ſpake in this maner: I remember, my lords, that on ſuch a day as this, I wan that famous victorie of Hanniball and the CARTHAGINIANS, and therfore leauing aſide this contention, I think it good we go vnto the Capitol to giue God thanks for the victorie. So he departed thence, and all the whole aſſembly followed him, not onely to the Capitoll, but alſo to all the other temples of the citie, leauing the two Tribunes all alone with their Sergeants. That day was the very laſt day of all the AFRICANS good fortune, for the great aſſembly and multitude of people that waited vpon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that day forward he determined to get him into the countrey, farre from all ambition, and the companie of people: and ſo went vnto LINTERNVM in a maruellous rage, that for reward of his ſo great ſeruice, and ſo ſundrie benefites as he had brought vnto his country: he receiued but ſhame and reproch: or elſe for that indeed being (as he was) of a noble mind, he thought it more honor willingly to giue place to his enemies, then to ſeeke to maintaine his greatneſſe by force of armes. So when the Tribunes did accuſe him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuſe his abſence by reaſon of his ſickneſſe: Tiberius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes that was againſt the AFRICAN, tooke his excuſe (beyond all mens opinions) for good payment, and did ſo well defend Scipioes cauſe, ſometime honourably praiſing him, another time alſo threatning his enemies: that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were maruellouſly offended for the great iniurie they did him. Some do write that P. Scipio himſelf, before he went vnto LINTERNVM, did with his owne hands teare the booke his brother had brought vnto the Senate, to deliuer the account of his charge: and that he did it not for any deceit or pride, but with that ſelfe boldneſſe of mind he had aforetime vſed to the treaſurers, when he did againſt the the law require the keyes of the common treaſure, to ſupply the preſent need of the State. Now ſome there be alſo that ſay, it was not the AFRICAN, but Scipio ASIAN that was accuſed before the Tribunes: and that Scipio AFRICAN was ſent in commiſſion at that time into THVSCAN. Who, vnderſtanding of his brothers accuſation at his returne to ROME, and finding his brother Lucius condemned, and the Sergeants waiting on him to carie him, being bound, into priſon: he was in ſuch a rage withall, that he reſcued his brother by force out of the Sergeants hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report beſide, that Tiberius Gracchus

one of the Tribunes, complaining first that the authoritie of the Tribuneship was troden vnder feete by a priuate person: he afterwards letting fall all the malice and enuie he bare vnto the Scipioes, defended their cause, because the Tribunes should rather seeme to be ouercome by a Tribune, then by a priuate person. They said moreouer, that the selfesame day the Senate supped in the Capitoll, he perswaded the AFRICAN to let Tiberius Gracchus marrie his yonger daughter. This promise was no sooner made, but P. Scipio comming home to his house, told his wife that he had bestowed their daughter: whereupon she being angry, told him againe, that he should not haue maried her without consent of her mother, though he could haue bestowed her vpon Tiberius Gracchus. This answer liked Scipio marueilous well, when he saw that his wife was of his mind, touching the mariage of their daughter. I know it is thought of some, that it was attributed to Tiberius the sonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in law. For Polybius, and other ancient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchi, was maried vnto Gracchus after the AFRICANS death. For Scipio AFRICAN was maried vnto Æmylia the daughter of L. Paulus Æmylius Consull, that was slaine at the battell of CANNES. By her he had two daughters, of the which the eldest was maried vnto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the yonger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before or after the death of his father. Now touching his sonne, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certaintie to be true. We haue spoken of his yonger sonne that was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwards frankly sent vnto his father: of whom notwithstanding afterwards I find no mention in writing, sauing that some say he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicereius his fathers Secretarie. There appeareth in writing also, that the yonger AFRICAN was adopted by the sonne of P. Scipio. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Maior saith, how weake (said he) was the sonne of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his sonne? And in his sixt book also de repub. Æmylius the father exhorteth Scipio his sonne, to follow iustice and pietie, as his grandfather Scipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers do diuersly varie: for some say that he died and was buried at ROME. And for proofe thereof, they do bring forth the monument that was set vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which stood three statues or images, two whereof were the images of Publius and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And surely that which Cicero wrote, seemeth to confirme it true: our Ennius, said he, was marueilously beloued of AFRICAN the great, and therfore it is thought that he was buried in Scipioes tombe. Other authors write also (and surely they agree best with the common report) that Scipio AFRICAN died at LINTERNVM, and that there he was buried at his owne appointment: because his country so vnthankfully acknowledging his seruice, should do him no honour at his death: and that there they set him vp a tombe, and his statue vpon that, the which afterwards was blowne downe by a tempest of wind, and the which Liuie himselfe witnesseth he saw. Furthermore, by CAIETA this Epitaph was grauen in a plate of copper, set in a marble tombe.

The man that vanquisht Hannibal, and conquer'd Carthage towne,
And eke increast the Romaines both in Empire and renowne,
Lies here a heape of dust and earth hid vnderneath this stone:
His deeds, his prowesse, and his life, are altogether gone.
Whom neither Europe could withstand, nor Africke in times past, (Behold mans frailtie) here he lies in litle roome at last.

Now touching the time of his death, hauing made great search for it, I haue found in certaine Greeke authors, that the AFRICAN liued foure and fiftie yeares, and died shortly after. Furthermore, he was a noble Captaine, and worthy of all commendation for martiall discipline, and besides excelled in all other vertues: the which did so delight his mind, that he was wont to say, he was neuer lesse idle, then when he tooke his ease: neither lesse solitarie, then when he was alone. For sometimes he would withdraw himselfe out of the assembly, and from all mens companie, and thought himselfe safe when he was alone. The fame of his noble deeds was so great, that whersoeuer he went, all sorts of people would come and see him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNVM, there came certaine rouers vnto him, to see so famous a man, and to kisse that so faithfull and victorious a hand. For vertue hath great force and power with all sorts of people: because it doth not onely make the good, but the euill also to loue and honour it.

THE COMPARISON OF
Hannibal with P. Scipio African.

NOW let vs compare Hannibal and Scipioes deeds together, as touching their ciuill diſcipline. Firſt, if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifeſt that both of them haue bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they haue not onely bene comparable with the nobleſt Kings and Princes in their time (being alſo in that age when warres flouriſhed moſt) but with thoſe alſo that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at them, that they hauing great and heauie enemies in their countrey, (who ſought to ouerthrow all their doings and enterpriſes) could poſſibly go thorough with ſo great matters, and to obtaine ſuch happie and famous victories, in ſtrange and forreine warres. Therefore paſſing ouer all other matters, what adoe had Publius Scipio before he could obtaine to be ſent into AFRICKE, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other Noblemen of the citie being greatly againſt it. Againe, what enemie had Hannibal of Hanno, who was prince and head of the contrarie faction againſt him? Now they both hauing ouercome ſuch great troubles at home, did notwithſtanding bring things to end worthy perpetuall memorie: not by chance, as it happeneth vnto many; but through their induſtrie, great wiſedome, and counſell. So diuers do wonder greatly at Hannibals courage and noble mind: who after he had ſacked the citie of SAGVNTVS, came boldly from the fartheſt part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great armie of footemen and horſemen, and came to make warre with a great State and common-wealth, the which his predeceſſors alwayes dreaded: and after he had wonne many battels, and ſlaine ſundrie Conſuls and Captaines of the ROMAINES, he came and camped hard by the citie of ROME it ſelfe, and procured ſtrange Kings and farre nations to make warre with the ROMAINES. He that was able to do ſo great things as theſe, men cannot otherwiſe thinke of him, but that he was a great and valiant Captaine. Others alſo ſpeaking of Scipio, do greatly praiſe and commend him for the foure Chiefetaines he ouercame, and for the foure great armies which he defeated and put to flight in SPAINE, and alſo for that he ouercame and tooke that great King Syphax priſoner. In fine, they come to praiſe that famous battell, in the which Scipio ouercame Hannibal at ZAMA. For if Fabius (ſaid they) were praiſed, becauſe he was not ouercome by Hannibal: what eſtimation will they make of the AFRICAN, that in a pitched battell ouercame that ſo famous and dreadfull Captaine Hannibal, and alſo did end ſo dangerous a warre? Beſides alſo, that Scipio did alwayes make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemie in plaine field: where Hannibal in contrary manner did alwayes vſe craft and ſubtiltie, and was full of ſtratagemes and policie. And therefore all Authors, both Greeke and Latine, do count him very fine and ſubtill.

Furthermore, they greatly commend Hannibal for that he maintained this armie of ſo ſundrie nations, ſo long time in peace, as he had warre with the Romaines: and yet that there was neuer any mutinie or rebellion in his campe. On the other ſide, they blame him againe, becauſe he did not follow his victorie, when he had ouercome the Romaines at that famous battell of Cannes: and alſo becauſe he ſpoyled his ſouldiers with too much eaſe, and the pleaſures of Campania and Apvlia, whereby they were ſo changed, that they ſeemed to be other ſouldiers then thoſe that had ouercome the Romaines, at the ſundrie battels of Trebia, Thrasimene, and Cannes. All writers do reproue theſe things in Hannibal, but ſpecially his crueltie. For amongſt other things, what crueltie was it of him to make a woman with her children to come from Arpi to his campe, and afterwards to burne them aliue? What ſhall a man ſay of them whom he cruelly put to death in the temple of Iuno Lacinia, when he departed out of Italie? For Scipio African on the other ſide, if we ſhall rather credit the beſt authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious writers: we may ſay, he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely liuely and valiant in fight, but alſo curteous and mercifull after victorie. For oftentimes his enemies proued his valiantneſſe, the vanquiſhed his mercie and clemencie, and all other men his faithfulneſſe. Now therefore, let vs tell you what his continencie and liberalitie was, which he ſhewed in Spaine vnto a young Ladie taken priſoner, and vnto Luceius Prince of the Celtiberians: doth it not deſerue great praiſe? Now for their priuate doings, they were both vertuouſly brought vp, and both of them embraced learned men. For as it is reported, Hannibal was very familiar with Socillus Lacedæmonian, as the African was with Ennius the Poet. Some ſay alſo, that Hannibal was ſo well learned in the Greeke tongue, that he wrote an hiſtorie in Greeke touching the deeds of Manlius Volſo. Now truly I do agree with Cicero, that ſaid in his booke de Oratore, that Hannibal heard Phormio Peripatetician in Ephesvs, diſcourſing very largely of the office and dutie of a Chieftaine and Generall, and of the martiall lawes and ordinances: and that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philoſopher, he ſhould anſwer in no very perfect Greeke, but yet in Greeke, that he had ſeene many old doting fooles, but that he had neuer ſeene a greater doterd then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, and Hannibal had a ſharpe taunting wit in his anſwers. When King Antiochus on a time prepared to make warre with the Romaines, and had put his armie into the field, not ſo well furniſhed with armor and weapon, as with gold and ſiluer: he asked Hannibal if he thought his armie ſufficient for the Romaines? Yea Sir, quoth he, that they be, were the enemies neuer ſo couetous. This may truly be ſaid of Hannibal, that he obtained many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the deſtruction of his countrey. Scipio in contrary maner did preſerue his countrey in ſuch ſafetie, and alſo did ſo much increaſe the dominions thereof: that as many as ſhall looke into his deſert, they cannot but call Rome vnthankfull, which liked rather that the African (preſeruer of the citie) ſhould go out of Rome, then that they ſhould repreſſe the furie and inſolencie of a few. And for mine owne opinion, I cannot thinke well of that citie, that ſo vnthankfully hath ſuffered ſo worthie and innocent a perſon to be iniured: and ſo would I alſo haue thought it more blame-worthie, if the citie had bene an aider of the iniurie offered him. In fine, the Senate (as all men do report) gaue great thankes vnto Tiberius Gracchus, becauſe he did defend the Scipioes cauſe: and the common people alſo following the African, when he viſited the temples of Rome, and left the Tribunes alone that accuſed him, did thereby ſhew how much they did loue and honour the name of the Scipioes. And therefore, if we ſhould iudge the citizens hearts and good wils by thoſe things, men would rather condemne them for cowards to haue ſuffered ſuch outrage, then vnthankfull for forgetting his benefites: for there were very few that conſented to ſo wicked a deed, and all of them in maner were very ſorie for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of a great mind, not much regarding the malice of his enenies: was content rather to leaue the citie, then by ciuill warres to deſtroy it. For he would not come againſt his countrey with enſignes diſplayed, neither would he ſolicite ſtrange nations and mightie kings to come with force, and their aide to deſtroy the citie, the which he had beautified with ſo many ſpoiles and triumphs, as Martius Coriolanus, Alcibiades, and diuers others did, by record of auncient ſtories. For we may eaſily perceiue how carefull he was to preſerue the libertie of Rome, becauſe when he was in Spaine, he refuſed the title and name of King which was offered offered him: and for that he was maruellous angrie with the people of Rome, becauſe they would haue made him perpetuall Conſull and Dictator: and conſidering alſo that he commaunded they ſhould ſet vp no ſtatue of him, neither in the place of the aſſembly, nor in the iudgement ſeate, nor in the Capitoll. All which honours aferwards were giuen by the citizens vnto Cæſar, that had ouercome Pompey. Theſe were the ciuill vertues of the African, which were great and true praiſes of continencie. Now therefore, to deliuer you the ſumme and effect of theſe things: theſe two ſo famous Captaines are not ſo much to be compared together in their ciuill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the diſcipline of warres, and in the glorie of their famous victories. To conclude, their deaths were ſomewhat alike: for they both died out of their countries, although Scipio was not condemned by his country as Hannibal was, but would by voluntarie baniſhment die out of the citie.

TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH,

BY THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND,

Fraunce, and Ireland Queene, Defender of the Faith, &c.

THE Princely bountie of your blessed hand (most gracious Soueraigne) comforting and supporting my poore old decaying life, of right challengeth the trauels in my studie, the labours of my bodie, and the prayers of my deuotions to be wholly imployed for your Highnesse, and altogether dedicated to your seruice. Wherein whilest I striue to bring in open shew some small performance of my most humble dutie to your sacred Maiestie, mine owne vnworthinesse amazeth me with trembling feare for my presumption, but that your Highnesse matchlesse grace to so many your most admirable vertues offer my pardon. Vnder which I present in all humblenesse into your Maiesties sacred hands this my second translation of the late addition of fifteene other liues, vnto those former in Plutarch, published for benefite of my country, vnder protection of the most royall name of your most gracious Maiestie. And albeit in respect of my selfe I offer but dutie, which I wish I could in other and better sort performe: yet I am the rather emboldned herein, for that the famous memorie of renowmed Emperours, mightie Kings, worthie Chieftaines and Generals of armies yea and of two famous Philosophers Plutarch and Seneca, being the whole subiect of this second translation, is worthily published vnder your Maiesties patronage. Whose rare vertues and wonderfull wisedome, neither former mightie kings, nor learned Philosophers might equall: from whose blessed fortunes many oppressed Kings, and distressed kingdomes haue sought and found their succors:

and whose most honourable and most happy peaceable gouernement, is worlds wonder to all posteritie.

Wherefore most gracious and most blessed Soueraigne, I beseech your Princely fauour to accept with grace the simple performance of your poore vnworthie seruant his most humble seruice, whose soule with heartiest prayer according to his most bounden dutie, continually calleth vnto God for preseruation of your most royall person, in all honour, health, and happinesse, and so still to raigne ouer vs.

Your Maiesties most humble and obedient seruant.

Thomas North.

THE LIFE OF Epaminondas.

O onely like thy ſelfe, the world alwayes
Admireth thy great valure, grace and wit:
And thinking to haue all good parts in it,
By hauing thee, triumpheth in thy praiſe.

WRiters of hiſtories report that Cadmus the ſonne of Agenor hauing taken ſea out of PHENICIA into EVROPE, by commandement of an Oracle he left the countrey of THRACIA where he had dwelt, and came into BOEOTIA, where he had great doings againſt a certaine neighbor-people called SPARTANS: of whom hauing ouercome part of them by ſubtilties, he made alliance with the chiefe of thoſe that were left aliue, and grew into ſuch fauour with them, that he drew them and their people vnto THEBES, where theſe great men which were of noble houſe tooke them wiues, and ſo had a great number of worthie men of noble race deſcended from them. Of which ſome of them were very rich men, and attained to the tipe of royall dignity: as Creon and Iocaſtus. Now becauſe they were deuided into two principall houſes, it is hard to iudge out of which of the two families of the Chronians or Echionides, Polymnis the father of Epaminondas was deſcended. Some are of opinion that he came out of the houſe of another chiefe man of the SPARTANS, called Vdæus, from whom deſcended the deuine Tireſias. But howſoeuer it was, he deſcended from one of the moſt noble and ancient houſes of the THEBANS, of whom they report this notable thing: that the moſt part of this noble linage caried vpon their body euen for a naturall birth-marke from their mothers wombe, a Snake: and ſo did they beare it in their armes in the deuice of their Scutchions. Touching this matter, I hold the ſaying of the Poet Euripides to be true: that the honor of noble houſes falleth to decay, if once their goods faile thē. For the pouerty wherof ſome of Epaminon-

das anceſtors made vertue and profeſſion, ſeemed to be the cauſe that they were made ſmall account of. Otherwiſe I cannot allow that the ſayd Poet ſpake of, that a noble and vertuous man is no body, if he be poore. For one Epaminondas onely throughly confuteth this opinion, who notwithſtãding he was exceeding poore, obtained neuertheleſſe the chiefeſt places of honor in the common wealth: for he was one of the beſt learned and moſt excellent Philoſophers of the world, being Platoes folower and familiar, and the moſt renowmed man of all the GREEKES, as appeareth by the diſcourſe of his life. Now Polymnis had two ſonnes, to wit, Caphiſias, and Epaminondas, whom he was very carefull to ſee well brought vp and taught all the liberall and honeſt ſciences, eſpecially Epaminondas: who had the moſt ſtayedſt wit, and beſt inclined to vertue, deſirous to hearken and to learne, humble, obedient, and wonderfull apt and docible. And according to the diſcipline of the THEBANS, he learned of one Dionyſius to be very skilfull in ſong and playing vpon inſtruments. And as for learning, and in Philoſophy chiefly, it happened well for him that he fell into good mens hands by ſuch a meane. When the colledges and companies of the Pythagorian Philoſophers that were diſperſed through the cities of ITALIE, were baniſhed by the faction of the Cylonians: they that kept ſtill together, met in councell at METAPONT to determine of their affaires. But ſome ſeditious perſons roſe againſt them, ſet fire in all parts of the houſe where they were, and burnt them all together, ſauing Philolaus and Lyſis, who being young and luſty, ſaued themſelues through the fire. As for Philolaus, he recouered the countrey of the LVCANIANS, and kept there with his friends: but Lyſis went further, and got to THEBES, where when he was arriued, Polymnis receiued him, and prayed him to be Epaminondas ſchoolemaiſter, who was but a young boy, but yet of good capacitie, and of very great hope. This Philoſopher imployed his endeuour to manure this noble and quicke wit of Epaminondas, and in ſhort time made him ready and perfect in all ſcience and vertue: ſo that it is hard to find a more wiſe, graue, and vertuous perſon then he was, of whom it is fit we ſhould ſay ſomewhat more at large. When he was but fifteene yeares of age, he gaue himſelfe to all manner of exerciſes of the body, as to runne, wreſtle, play at the weapons, and to practiſe all maner of armes: and being quickly skilfull in all theſe, he then gaue himſelfe to his booke, being naturally ſilent, fearefull to ſpeake, but neuer wearied to heare, and to learne. Whereupon Spintharus the TARENTINE hauing bene a long time with him in THEBES, ſayd he neuer ſpake to any man that knew ſo much and ſpake ſo litle as Epaminondas. If he fortuned to be in any company where there was talke of Philoſophy, or of ſtate matters: he would neuer from thence till he ſaw the matter ended that was propounded. Furthermore, he had no great liking of theſe darke and myſtical arguments of ſome, that thinke to hide vertue in the obſcurity of their words, but he gaue himſelfe wholly to the true practiſe thereof: though otherwiſe he was as pleaſant a man to giue a fine ſlent in diſcourſe, as could be poſſible to be found. As the diſputation betwixt him and Theanor, touching pouerty and riches doth witneſſe, which worthily deſerueth to be mentioned here, as in his proper place.

Lyſis after he had liued a long time in THEBES, died, and was honorably interred by his diſciple Epaminondas, who had honored and entertained him whileſt he liued, & at his death omitted no ceremonies requiſite at his funerall. Arceſus, one of the chiefe of the Pythagorian Philoſophers that ſtayed in SICILIA, vnderſtanding that Lyſis was at THEBES, through age not able to go to him: appointed by his will and teſtament that they ſhould bring Lyſis aliue againe into ITALIE if it were poſſible, or at leaſtwiſe the reſt of his bones, if it ſo happened he were dead. The warres that fell out in the interim were a hinderance that that could not be done ſo ſpeedily. But when the wayes were open and free, the Pythagorians ſent Theanor of their ſect to THEBES, where he found Lyſis dead and buried, and ſo comming to Epaminondas, after ſalutations and preambles, told him before Polymnis and Caphiſias that his companions which were very rich, willed him to giue Polymnis and his children a good ſumme of money, in recompence of their courteous entertainement which they had giuen to Lyſis. Whereupon after pleaſant excuſes made, Epaminondas concluded, that none could be receiued: and added further, that Iaſon a Captaine of the THESSALIANS thought I had giuen him a rude and vnciuill aunſwer, when he hauing earneſtly intreated me to take a good ſumme of gold which he gaue me, I ſent him word that he did me wrong, and began to make warre with me: for that he aſpiring to make himſelfe a Lord, would corrupt me with money, a plaine citizen of a free towne, and liuing vnder the law. But for thee, Theanor, I commend thy good will, becauſe it is honeſt

and vertuous, and I loue it with all my heart: but I tell thee, thou bringeſt phyſicke to men that be not ſicke. Admit then that thou hearing we had bene in warres, haddeſt brought vs armes to defend vs, and then in the ſame place thou haddeſt found vs quiet, and in good peace and amitie with our neighbours, thou wouldeſt not haue thought it good to haue beſtowed theſe armes, and left them with thoſe that had no need of them. Euen ſo thou art come to relieue our pouertie, as if it were a griefe vnto vs: whereas to the contrary it is an eaſie and pleaſant thing for vs to cary, and we are glad we haue it in our houſe amongſt vs: and therefore we need no armes nor money againſt that that doth vs no hurt at all. But thou ſhalt tell thy brethren there, that they do vſe their goods very honeſtly: and alſo that they haue friends here which vſe their pouerty well. And as for Lyſis entertainement & buriall, he himſelfe hath fully recompenced vs: hauing taught vs amongſt many other goodly things, not to be afraid of pouerty, nor to be grieued to ſee it amongſt vs. After Theanor had made ſome reply touching the good or euill of riches: as that if pouerty were not euill of it ſelfe, neither was riches to be had in contempt, and deſpiſed. No truly ſayd Epaminondas, yet conſidering with my ſelfe that we haue a world of couetous deſires of many things, ſome naturall as they call them, and borne with vs, bred in our fleſh for the luſts pertaining to it: others ſtraunge vnto vs grounded vpon vaine opinions, which taking a ſetling and habite in vs by tract of time, and long vſe through euill education, ofentimes do plucke vs downe, and withdraw our ſoules with more force and violence, then thoſe that be naturall vnto vs. For reaſon, by daily exerciſe of vertue and practiſe thereof, is a meane to take many of thoſe things away from vs that are borne and bred within vs: yet this notwithſtanding, we muſt vſe continuall force and exerciſe againſt our concupiſcenſes that are ſtrangers vnto vs, to quench them in vs, and by all poſſible meanes to repreſſe and ſubdue them. Now hauing made ſufficient proofe of that, there is alſo, ſayd he, an exerciſe of Iuſtice againſt greedy couetouſneſſe of getting, which is not, not to go rob and rifle his neighbors houſes in the night, nor not to rob men on the hie way ſide, nor if any man betray not his friends nor his countrey for money: ſuch one doth not exerciſe himſelfe againſt couetouſneſſe, for law poſſible, or feare, bridleth his couetous deſire to offend any man. But that man that oftentimes willingly abſtaineth from iuſt gaines, which he may lawfully take: he it is that by continuall exerciſe keepeth himſelfe farre off from vniuſt and vnlawfull taking of money. For it is vnpoſſible that in great pleaſures, yea wicked and daungerous, the ſoule ſhould containe it ſelfe from coueting of them, vnleſſe before being oftentimes at his choiſe to vſe them, he had not contemned them. And it is not eaſie to ouercome them, nor to refuſe great riches euill gotten being offered, vnleſſe he had long before killed in him this couetous deſire of getting, the which beſides many other habitudes and actions is ſtill greedily bent ſhamefully to gaine, pleaſing himſelfe in the purſute of iniuſtice, hardly ſparing to wrong another, ſo he in any thing profit himſelfe. But to a man that diſdaineth to receiue liberality and gifts of his friends, and refuſeth to take preſents offered him by kings, and that hath reiected the benefits of fortune, putting by all couetous deſire of gliſtering treaſure layed before him: he ſhall neuer be aſſailed to attempt him to do that is vniuſt, nor his mind ſhall neuer be troubled, but will content himſelfe quietly to do any thing that is honeſt, carying an vnright hart, finding nothing in it but that that is good and commendable.

But his life is farre more excellent then his diſcourſe: and as touching that, I will yet ſpeake ſomewhat of it. Diomedon Dyzicenian, at Artaxerxes requeſt, promiſed to win Epaminondas to take the Persians part. To bring this to paſſe, he came to Thebes, and brought a great maſſe of gold with him, and beſtowing three thouſand crownes, he bribed a young man called Mycithus, whom Epaminondas loued dearely. This young man went to Epaminondas, and acquainted him with the occaſion of the other mans comming to Thebes. But Epaminondas ſtraight anſwered him, Diomedon being preſent: I haue no need of mony: if the king wiſh well to the Thebans, I am at his commaundement without taking one peny: if he haue any other meaning, he hath not gold nor ſiluer enough for me: for I will not ſell the loue I beare to my countrey for all the gold in the world. As for thee that haſt now attempted me, not knowing me, haply thinking me to be like thy ſelfe, I pardon thee: but get thee away quickly out of the citie, leſt thou ſeduce ſome other, hauing failed to corrupt me. And for thee Micythus, deliuer him his crownes againe: and if thou doeſt it not preſently, I will ſend thee before a Iuſtice. Thereupon Diomedon beſought him he would let him go away with ſafetie, and cary that with him he brought thither. Yes mary, ſaid Epaminondas, but it ſhall not be for thy ſake, but for mine honor: being afraid that if thy gold and ſiluer ſhould be taken from thee, ſome man would accuſe me that I had a ſhare in that which I refuſed to take openly. Then he asked him: Whither wouldeſt thou I ſhould cauſe thee to be conueyed? Diomedon ſaid, To ATHENS: which was done, and he had a very good conuoy with him: and becauſe he ſhould not be troubled by the way betwixt the gates of THEBES, and the hauen where he ſhould imbarke himſelfe, Epaminondas gaue Chabrias the ATHENIAN charge of this man, that he ſhould ſee him ſafe at his waies end, and ſo he ſtraight returned backe againe.

Now though he was very poore, yet he would neuer take any thing of his citie or friends, he was ſo well acquainted with pouerty, which he bare more patiently through his ſtudie of Philoſophie. For on a time he hauing the leading of an armie of the THEBANS into the country of PELOPONNESVS, he borrowed about fiue crownes of a citizen for his expences in his iourny. Pelopidas being a man of great wealth, and his exceeding good friend, could not poſſibly euer make him take any part of his goods, but rather Pelopidas learned of him to loue pouertie. For Epaminondas taught him to thinke it an honor to him to go plainely apparelled, to eate moderatly, to take paines willingly, and to make warre luſtily. But to releeue others, he would make bold to vſe his friends goods, and in ſuch a caſe their goods were common to him. If any of his citizens were taken priſoner with the enemy, or any friend of his had a daughter to be maried, and was not able to beſtow her: he called his friends together, and ſeſſed euery man of them at a certaine ſumme, and afterwards brought him before them that ſhould haue this money, and told him how much euery man had beſtowed vpon him, that he might thanke them all. But on a time he went farre beyond this: for he ſent a poore friend of his to a rich citizen of THEBES, to aske of him ſixe hundred crownes, and to tell him that Epaminondas willed him to let him haue them. The citizen being amazed at this demaund, went vnto Epaminondas to know what he meant to charge him ſo deepely, to make him diſburſe theſe ſixe hundred crownes vnto him. It is, ſaith he, becauſe this man being an honeſt man, is poore: and thou that haſt robbed the commonwealth of much, art rich. He liued ſo ſoberly, and was ſuch an enemy vnto all ſuperfluitie and exceſſe, that being on a time inuited to ſupper to one of his neighbours, when he ſaw great preparation of fine meates, baked meates, made diſhes and perfumes: he ſaid vnto him: I thought thou haddeſt made a ſacrifice, not an exceſſe of ſuperfluitie, and euen ſo went his way. Euen the like he ſpake of his owne table, ſaying, that ſuch an ordinarie neuer receiued treaſon. On a time being at a feaſt with his peeres and companions, he dranke vineger. And when they asked him what reaſon he had to do ſo, and if it were good for his health? I cannot tell, ſaith he, but well I wote it is good to put me in remembrance how I liue at home. Now it was not for that his nature miſliked ſweet meates, that he liued thus ſtrictly, and did loue and embrace pouerty, for he was maruellous high and nobly minded: but by his ſtraight and vnreproueable life he led, he thought to bridle many inſolencies and diſorders then raigning amongſt the THEBANS, and to reduce them to the former temperance of their auncеſtors. As vpon a time a cooke giuing vp an account to him and his fellowes of their ordinarie expences for certaine daies, he could find fault with nothing, but with the quantitie of oyle that was ſpent. His companions maruelling at it: Tuſh, ſaith he, it is not the expence that offendeth me, but becauſe they haue powred in ſo much oyle into their bodies. The citie of THEBES made an open feaſt, and they were all of them in their banquets, feaſts, and great aſſemblies one with the other: but Epaminondas to the contrarie, he went drie vp and downe the towne very ſad, without being annointed with any oyle of perfume, or decked with braue apparel. Some of his familiar friends met him in this eſtate, and wondering at him, asked him why he walked ſo alone, & ill apparelled through the citie? Becauſe, ſaid he, you might in the mean time ſafely giue your ſelues to drink drunke, and make merie, taking thought for nothing. Thus haue we ſpoken enough touching his temperance: and as for his other vertues they are moſt famous in armes, the which he with great good fortune and happineſſe managed for the good of his countrie.

Now his modeſty would in no wiſe ſuffer him to ſeeke his aduauncement, but contrariwiſe he withdrew himſelfe from gouernment, onely to giue himſelfe quietly to the ſtudie of Philoſophie. Howbeit it happened that the LACEDEMONIANS on a time prayed aide of the THEBANS, at that time being in league with them, who ſent them certaine foot-bands. Epaminondas being about fiue and thirtie yeares of age, armed himſelfe, and went with the reſt. Then it was that that friendſhip began betwixt Pelopidas and him, which conſtantly continued euen to the end.

end. For they both being in battell ray the one by the other, againſt the ARCADIANS, whom they had in front againſt them in the plaine of MANTINEA, it chaunced that one of the points of the battel of the LACEDÆMONIANS in the which they were, retired, and many of them left their ranckes: but they being reſolute, determining rather to die then to flie, ſtood to it like men, vntill that Pelopidas being hurt in ſeuen places, fell downe vpon an heape of dead bodies: then Epaminondas, though he tooke him to be but a dead man, ſtepped manfully before him to defend his bodie and armes, and he alone fought againſt many, reſolued to die in the place, rather then to leaue Pelopidas among the dead men, vntill that himſelfe being thruſt into the breaſt with a pike, and wounded in the arme with a blow of a ſword, (ready to giue ouer) by good fortune and in a happie time, king Ageſipolis came on with the other point of the battell, and ſaued them both. Afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS finely wanne the caſtell of THEBES called CADMEA, put in a ſtrong garriſon there, and gaue the gouernment of the citie vnto Archias, Philippus, and Leontidas, authors of all the miſchief. Wherupon to auoide their violence, Pelopidas and many others with ſpeed fled and ſaued themſelues, and were baniſhed by ſound of trumpet. And as for Epaminondas they ſaid nothing to him, but let him alone in the citie: for he was contemned as a man of no reckening, becauſe he was ſo giuen to his booke: and if he ſhould haue had any will to haue ſtirred againſt them, he could haue done them no hurt for his pouertie. Now whileſt Pelopidas and his companions being at ATHENS, had laid a plot to free THEBES, Epaminondas making no ſhew of any thing, had long before deuiſed another practiſe, which was: to lift vp the hearts and courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they went out to play and exerciſe their bodies, he alwaies found a way to make them wreſtle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Afterwards when he ſaw the LACEDÆMONIANS fiercely throw them, and giue them ſhrewd fals they being the ſtronger, he rebuked the THEBANS, and told them, it was a ſhame for them for want of courage, to ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to ſet their feet vpon their throats, that were not halfe ſo ſtrong, rough, and boiſterous as they were. All this while Pelopidas and his followers went on with their complot, and they had ſo good ſucceſſe in their purpoſe, that one night they got priuily into the citie of THEBES, and met at Charons houſe, where they were to the number of eight and fortie. Epaminondas knew all well enough, and ſome towards night taking him aſide, went about to perſwade him to ioyne with them in this enterpriſe, and to take armes with them to ſet vpon theſe tyrants: maruelling much, that he would be ſo backward, the liberty of his countrey ſtanding vpon it. He anſwered, that he had taken order with his friends and Gorgidas, that they ſhould put themſelues in readineſſe vpon any occaſion, howbeit that he would put none of his citizens to death, vnleſſe they were condemned by law: yet if you will make an attempt for deliuery of the citie, ſo it be without murther, and ſhedding the bloud of the citizens, I will helpe you (ſaid he) with all my heart. If you will not beleeue me, but perſeuer in your determination, I pray you let me alone, pure and vndefiled with the bloud of my citizens, and ſo blameleſſe to attend occaſion, whereby I may iuſtly take hold of that which may turne to the good of the commonwealth: for the murther that will be committed, cannot poſſibly be contained within reaſonable bounds. I do certainely beleeue that Pherecides and Pelopidas peraduenture will ſpecially ſet vpon the authors of the tyrannie: but Eumolpidas and Samiadas, both cholericke and fierce men, taking the liberty of the night, they will neuer lay downe their armes, nor put their ſwords vp into their ſheathes, before they haue filled all the citie with murthers, and ſlaine diuers of the chiefe perſonages. Moreouer, it is very conuenient for the people of THEBES, that ſome be left free, and blameleſſe of this murther, and guiltleſſe of all that ſhall be done in this furie of action: for ſo the people ſhall leaſt ſuſpect that we giue any incouragement to their riſing, although to good end. Notwithſtanding all this the enterpriſe was executed, and the tyrants put to death, the citie reſtored to her auncient liberty, and the caſtle of CADMEA rendred vp by compoſition, and Lyſandridas the LACEDÆMONIAN and other commanders within, ſuffered to depart, with ſafetie of their goods and the ſouldiers.

Theſe were the beginnings of the long wars of the LACEDÆMONIANS againſt the THEBANS, with whom the ATHENIANS ioyned in league. For Epaminondas, he quietly gaue himſelfe to his booke: notwithſtanding he was put forward by Pammenes, a principall man of THEBES, and he began to follow the warres very hotly, and in diuers encounters made great proofe of his wiſdome, hardineſſe and valure: inſomuch that by degrees he attained at the length to the higheſt charges of gouernment in the commonwealth. And his citizens hauing made no further reckoning of him, being a man of fortie yeares old: after that they came to know him, and had truſted him with their armie, he ſaued the citie of THEBES that was like to haue bin vndone, and freed al GRECE from the ſeruitude and bondage of the LACEDÆMONIANS: making vertue as in a cleare light ſhine with glorie, ſhewing her effects when time ſerueth. Furthermore, Ageſilaus being entred into BOEOTIA with an armie of twentie thouſand footmen, and 5. thouſand horſe, preyed and ſpoiled all the plaine countrey, and preſented the THEBANS in open field that which they would not accept, finding themſelues the weaker: howbeit they defended themſelues ſo well, through the aide of the ATHENIANS, and of the wiſe conduction of Epaminondas and Pelopidas, that Ageſilaus returned home with his armie. But after he was gone, the THEBANS went with their troupes before the citie of THESPIES, where they ſurprized and put to the ſword two hundred men of the garriſon, and afterwards gaue diuers aſſaults one vpon another vnto the wall, and ſeeing their labor loſt, they returned with their army backe againe to THEBES. Howbeit Phœbidas the LACEDÆMONIAN, he that had taken the caſtle of CADMEA by treaſon, (whereupon roſe all this warre that followed) and was then gouernour of THESPIES, made a ſallie out of the towne, and raſhly went to giue a charge vpon the THEBANS in their retreate, where he loſt fiue hundred of his men, and himſelfe was ſlaine in the field. Not long after, the LACEDÆMONIANS with the ſelf ſame power returned againe to make war with the THEBANS, who hauing wonne certaine ſtreights and places of aduantage, ſo blocked vp the way, as they could not ouerrunne the countrey, and ſpoile it as they had done before. Neuertheleſſe, Ageſilaus had ſo harried and troubled them, that by litle and litle they came to a maine battell, which held very long and cruell. Now though Ageſilaus at the firſt had the better, yet the THEBANS charged him ſo hotely, that at the length he himſelfe was hurt, and conſtrained to retire, being well payed for teaching the THEBANS militarie diſcipline. And this was the firſt time that the THEBANS knew themſelues to be as ſtrong and luſtie as the LACEDÆMONIANS: whereupon they triumphed in ſigne of victorie, and from that time forwards, they waxed more couragious to make head againſt the enemy, and to preſent them battell. But the onely thing that did moſt encourage them, was the preſence of Epaminondas, who counſelled, commaunded, and executed very wiſely, valiantly, and moſt fortunately. A certaine time after that, they went with a great number of good choſen men before ORCHOMENE, where they preuailed not, becauſe there was a ſtrong garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that ſallied out vpon them to giue them battell, which was very ſharpe betweene them. And yet, albeit the LACEDÆMONIANS were many againſt one, the THEBANS gaue them the ouerthrow, which neuer happened to them before: but what nation ſoeuer they had bene, they thought they had done a great feate, if with a greater number by many, they had ouercome a ſmall number of the LACEDÆMONIANS. But this victorie, and the encountring of TEGYRE, where the THEBANS obtained another victory vnder the conduct of Pelopidas, lift vp their hearts on high, and made their valure more famous then before.

The next yeare following, Artaxerxes king of PERSIA, meaning to make warre in ÆGYPT, and therefore to retaine diuerſe ſtraungers, determined to appeaſe the warres againſt the GREEKES in hope that they being at peace, would more eaſily be contented that ſouldiers ſhould be leauied in their countrey: and thereupon ſent his Ambaſſadours to all the townes of GRECE, to perſwade and intreate them to be at peace together. The GREEKES were very willing to hearken vnto it, being wearied of all ſides with ſo long a warre, and were eaſily drawne to treate of peace: whereby it was eſpecially agreed and concluded, that all the cities of GRECE ſhould be free, and vſe their owne lawes; and commiſſioners were ſent all about to withdraw the garriſons in euery place where any was kept. Vnto this the THEBANS onely refuſed to agree, that euery towne ſhould by it ſelfe ſeuerally capitulate in this treatie, requeſting that the townes in the countrey of BOEOTIA ſhould be comprehended vnder the city of THEBES. Thereunto the ATHENIANS mightily oppoſed themſelues, and there was one of their Orators called Calliſtratus, that touching this matter made a notable oration before the aſſembly of the ſtates of GRECE. And Epaminondas on the other ſide alſo, made a wonderfull and vehement oration in defence of the right of the THEBANS: inſomuch as this controuerſie was left vndecided, and the treaty of peace was vniuerſally agreed and concluded amongſt all the other GREEKES, the THEBANS onely excepted, who were not compriſed within the treatie. So through the motion of Epaminondas, they were bold to withſtand the decrees of all the reſt of

Greece. For the Athenians and Lacedæmonians that many yeares before had contended for the principality of Greece, made then diuision together: so that the one should commaund by sea, and the other by land. Thus they could not like in no wise, that the Thebans should aspire to be chiefe, and therfore they sought to dismember the other townes of Boeotia, from the citie of Thebes. And the rather for that the Thebans being strong and lustie of body, and encouraged for that of late they had oftentimes beaten the Lacedæmonians, would striue with them for the superiority of Greece by land, but specially they had a wonderfull confidence in the wisedome and proweſſe of their Captaines, but especially of Epaminondas. Matters resting thus doubtfull, the citizens of Platæes, a towne of Boeotia, desirous to be at league with the Athenians, they sent to request some souldiers of them, promising to put the towne into their hands. The gouernors of the country of Boeotia hauing intelligence of it, desirous to preuent the garrison of the Athenians, brought a troupe of souldiers against them, and they all came before Platæes, before the townes men had any knowledge of their comming: insomuch that part of them were surprised in the fields by the horsemen, and the other fled into the towne. But hauing no body to aide them, they were compelled to receiue and accept such composition as it pleased the Thebans to graunt them: which was, to leaue their towne, and to go safely with bagge and baggage, and neuer to returne againe into the countrey of Boeotia. After this, the Thebans razed the city of Platæes to the ground, and had the sacke of the towne of Thespies enemy vnto them. All the Greekes solicited againe by the Ambassadors of Persia, thought it good to make a generall peace, and so assembled the commissioners of all the townes at Sparta. Epaminondas that was yet scant knowne, because he loued not to shew himselfe, and in all his exploits of warre had euer preferred the aduancement of his great friend and companion in armes Pelopidas, before himselfe: yet famous among the Greekes for his great knowledge and experience, was sent thither by the Thebans. Epaminondas finding that the other commissioners did leane to Agesilaus, began to speake boldly and plainely, and made an oration, not onely in the Thebans behalfe, but for all Greece also: making them plainely see, that warre did still increase the greatnesse of the city of Sparta only, and keepe all the rest of the townes of Greece vnder. Therfore he gaue counsell to all to establish a firme peace indifferently betwixt them, that thereby it might haue the longer continuance, when all comprized within the contract should be equals. Agesilaus perceiuing all the Greeks assistant at this assembly to giue very attentiue eare vnto him, and to be tickled, hearing him speake so freely of peace: he asked him aloude if he thought it iust and reasonable, that all Boeotia should be set at liberty. Epaminondas on the other side, did presently and boldly aske him againe, if he thought not also that it was iust and reasonable that all Laconia should be set at libertie. Thereupon Agesilaus in anger stood vp on his feete, and commaunded him to answer plainely, if they should not restore all the prouince of Boeotia to her liberty. Epaminondas returned the selfe same speech againe vnto him: if they should not also put that of Laconia in her liberty. This did so anger Agesilaus, besides that it did him good to haue this colour for an old grudge he bare vnto the Thebans, that foorthwith he put the name of the Thebans out of the list of those that should be comprised within the peace, and immediatly proclaimed open war against them. But this being done had euill successe afterwards, and by reason of the sodaine and rash enterprise of the Lacedæmonians, it turned to their vtter ouerthrow. For the Thebans, there was no remedie but they must beare the whole brunt alone: for there was not a town that durst send them any aide, because they were all agreed and sworne to this peace, insomuch as euery one thought them vtterly cast away and vndone. Many pitied their estate, and they that loued them not reioyced: they made so full account, that the Lacedæmonians should find nothing that could stand before them.

So the Lacedæmonians made king Cleombrotus march with his army towards Thebes: and being come neare to Chæronea with ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horse, he pitched his camp there to stay for the rest of his allies. The Thebans hauing intelligence of the approch of the enemy, chose Epaminondas to be captaine generall, giuing him the charge of this warre, with sixe other Councellers, whom they call Beotarches, as who would say, Gouernours of Boeotia, to be of his counsell, and to assist him. Now there came Oracles to the Thebans from all parts: some promising victory, others threatning ouerthrow. He commaunded them to set those on the right hand of the chaire for Orations that promised victorie: and those that threatned ouerthrow on the left hand. They being thus diſpoſed of, he got vp to the chaire for Orations, and ſaid to the THEBANS: If you will be obedient to your Captaines, and couragious of heart to encounter your enemies, theſe here, (ſhewing the good Oracles on the right hand) are yours: but if for faint hearts you refuſe daunger, thoſe there (ſhewing the bad on the left hand) ſhall be for you. Thereupon enrolling all the THEBANS names that were of age to beare armes, and of ſome parts of BOEOTIA thoſe that he thought fitteſt for wars: word was brought him that a very honeſt and valiant man of his perſon died in his bed. O Hercules, ſaid he, what, had this man leyſure to die in all theſe troubles? His preſence reioyced and made all his armie liuely: alſo all the time he was Captaine of the THEBANS, they neuer ſaw any of theſe terrours happen in his campe without manifeſt cauſe, which they call ſodaine feares. He was wont to ſay, that there was no death more honeſt, then to dye in the warres: and that the body of a ſouldier ſhould not onely be kept in exerciſe like the champions that fight for maiſtrie, but rather more hardened to endure any labour or paines meet for a good ſouldier. And therfore he could not abide very fat men, but caſſered a whole band of them for that cauſe only: ſaying that ſcarce three or foure targets could couer ſo great a belly, as did keepe him that he could not ſee his owne priuities. So he drew his armie out of THEBES, hauing in all but ſixe thouſand fighting men. Euen as they were marching away out of THEBES, diuers of the ſouldiers thought they had had many vnluckie ſignes. For as they were going out of the gates, Epaminondas met on his way a Herald, that following an auncient ceremonie and cuſtome of theirs, brought an old blind man as if he had bene run away: and the Herald crying out aloud, Bring him not out of THEBES, nor put him not to death, but carie him backe againe, and ſaue his life. The old men tooke this meeting and cry for an euill ſigne: but the young men kept ſilence, and ſpake neuer a word, for feare it ſhould be thought that their hearts failing them, they would ſeeke to diſſwade Epaminondas from going the iourney he had vndertaken. And he himſelfe, vnto ſome that were bold to tell him, that it were well done before he went any further, to conſider firſt what ſucceſſe the flying of the birds did promiſe vnto him, anſwered this verſe of Homer:

Such a preſent and francke reſolution ſtopped the mouthes of all thoſe that were not very conſtant. But there happened yet another ſigne worſe then the firſt. For there went a Secretarie before him carying a Iauelin, vnto the which was tyed a ſcrole to make the ſoldiers know that they ſhould do what the Generall commanded them. The wind roſe and blew off this ſcrole and caried it away, folding it vpon a ſquare pillar that ſtood vpon a tombe of certaine LACEDÆMONIANS, and PELOPONNESIANS, that had bene ſlaine in that place when Ageſilaus brought his army thither. Alſo there came againe certaine old men vnto him to ſpeake with him, perſwading and proteſting that he ought not to go any further with his armie, ſince the gods were ſo manifeſtly againſt it. All this notwithſtanding he neuer ceaſſed to march with his campe, thinking that the conſcience and reſolution to fight in a good cauſe, ought to be much ſtronger and of more force to put him in good hope, then theſe euill ſignes that appeared to make him miſtruſt the worſt. And as in marching to meete with the LACEDÆMONIANS they heard it thunder: they that were neare vnto him, asked him, what that thunder meant? That, ſaith he, betokeneth that the enemies braines are troubled and aſtonied: ſeeing they hauing hard by them ſo commodious places to campe in, they now lye encamped where they are. Indeed they halted, ſtaying for diuers of their allies that came not: all of them hauing at better leyſure conſidered of the diſcourſe Epaminondas made in SPARTA in open aſſembly of all the commiſſioners of euery town, againſt the ambition of the LACEDÆMONIANS. For him therefore applying to good purpoſe at that time all the goodly diſcourſe he had learned by the ſtudie of Philoſophie, for the preſent time the common people blamed him much: but after the fortunate ſucceſſe of his intention, euery man then iudged him to be a man ripely vnderſtanding the dutie of a wiſe and valiant chieftaine of warre. For making his army march with ſpeed, he wanne the ſtraights hard by the citie of CORONEA, and camped there. Cleombrotus on the other ſide, vnderſtanding that the THEBANS had gained that paſſage, diſpairing he could not paſſe that way: made his army go a great compaſſe about by the countrey of PHOCIDE, and marching alongſt the ſea ſide in a very troublous and daungerous way, at the laſt he pierced into the countrey of BOEOTIA without any daunger. And as he went alſo he tooke in litle townes, and certaine gallies that lay alongeſt that coaſt, and in the end arriued at LEVCTRES: and there ſet downe to refreſh his men a litle,

ouer-wearied with trauell in their iourney. The Boeotians marched presently that way to meet with them, and so passing ouer some litle mountaines, they discouered them in the plaine of Leuctres, which did amaze them, seeing so great an army.

The Bœotarches thereupon came together to consult whether they should go forward, and to fight one against many: or else retire, and find out some better place of aduantage. In this counsell their opinions fell out to be equall: for three of them thought it good to retire: the other three with Epaminondas, said, they must tarie and fight. So the conclusion of this counsell being doubtfull, and the Bœotarches disagreeing, Pelopidas captaine of the holy band came to thē, who was of the second opinion: so that they all agreed together to put it to the hazard of battell. But Epaminondas seeing their souldiers affraid through the superstition of these signes, deuising by some like remedy to put this mistrust out of their heads: to bring this to passe, some being newly come from Thebes, he willed them to say and giue it out euery where, that no man could tell at Thebes what was become of the armes that hung vp in Hercules temple: but that the voice was all the towne ouer, that the auncient demigods their aunce stors had come and taken them away, for the aide of their descendants at this present time. He suborned another also, that gaue it out he was newly come from Trophonius truncke or hole, and that the god which giueth the Oracles in the same, commanded him to tell the Boeotians that after they had ouercome their enemies in the plaine of Leuctres, they should celebrate yearely playes in the honor of Iupiter. And thereof it came that the Boeotians long time after that did yearely celebrate a feast, which is made in Lebadia. Now to end the painting of this artificial deuise, Leandrias a Spartan, being a banished man out of his countrey, and fighting at that time for the Boeotians, being brought before the souldiers, whom they encouraged to fight like men the day of the battell: he did sweare vnto them that the Lacedæmonians had an auncient Oracle, that said they should lose their principalitie, when they should be ouercome by the Thebans in a pitched field, in the plaine of Leuctres. It is true indeed that the Lacedæmonians had had many oracles and forewarnings to bid them beware of the anger of Leuctres: but the common people vnderstood not what this warning meant, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the word: for that there were three Leuctres: to wit, in Laconia, Arcadia, and Boeotia. Howbeit, the vision of Pelopidas, whereof is made large mention in his life, and the sacrifice he made of the yong Filly that came into his campe, confirmed all the former inuentions, and made them bold that were most discouraged. Adding withall, that Epaminondas hauing assembled all his armie, began to encourage them with these strong and liuely reasons to shew their valour: insomuch, that being freed from this superstitious feare, they longed for nothing more then to come to blowes. Epaminondas euer concluded all his orations in this manner: O worthy men, embrace sacred death, aduauncing your selues to the most honorable and famous fight for your country, for the tombes of your aunce stors, and for the holy things. Euen at the same time came to the Thebans an aide of fiue hundred horse, and fifteene hundred footmen Thessalians, conducted by Iason: who practised with both sides to make a peace for certaine daies, telling them he was not wise that feared not the euents. Some iudge it was not at that time that Iason trauelled betweene them both, but rather that it was after the iourney of Leuctres. Howbeit, I haue followed that which Diodorus the Sicilian writeth, as a thing most likely. Now as Cleombrotus retired with his army out of Boeotia, he met with a great supply of naturall Lacedæmonians, and of some of their allies, brought to him by Archidamus, Ageſilaus sonne. The Lacedæmonians seeing the Thebans so resolute, and fearing their desperate boldnesse: sent these two troupes the easilier to daunt the courage of their enemies. These two being ioyned together they were ashamed to be afraid of the Boeotians, and whether it was that the truce taken was neare expired, or that they forced not of it, they returned on the sodaine againe into the plaine of Leuctres fully bent to fight. The Boeotians also for their part shrunke not an inch backe, and so on both sides they set their men in order of battell. For Epaminondas, he set his battell after a new fashion, neuer before shewed by any other Captaine. For hauing chosen out of his armie the best men and valiantest souldiers he had, he placed them together in one of the points of his battell, where he should be himself & fight in person, seconded with Pelopidas, with his three hundred chosen men, called the holy band: and in the other corner he placed his weaker men, commaunding them expresly not to abide the charge of the enemies that should come to assaile them in front, but faire and softly to retire when they saw them come neare them. So the matter fell out as he wished: and he hoped to determine the battell by the vertue and proweſſe of that point where he had placed all the flower and choiſe of his armie.

Now the ſigne to fight being giuen, the LACEDÆMONIANS marched of euen hand with the two hornes of their battel, ordred in forme of a Creſſant. On the contrarie part, one of the wings of the battell of the BOEOTIANS began to giue backe, and the other with great furie ranne to charge the enemie in the flancke: ſtraight they were both come to the ſword together. And at the firſt, becauſe either ſide fought very deſperatly, the victorie was doubtfull for a certain time: but at the length Epaminondas troupes brake in amongſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and killed the moſt part of them that were about king Cleombrotus. So long as the king was aliue, he kept backe the THEBANS from victorie, becauſe he was accompanied with all the moſt valiant men of his army, valiantly fighting about him. But after he fell downe dead on the ground, hauing receiued an infinit number of wounds, and ſtriken downe many of his enemies: then they thronged together on all ſides, and there was a cruell fight about his bodie, where were heapes of mens bodies ſlaine one vpon another. And although Epaminondas did ſharply follow his point, yet the LACEDÆMONIANS made ſuch reſiſtance at the laſt, that they did a litle repulſe the BOEOTIANS and cleared the bodie of the king out of the preſſe and multitude: but that held not long. For Epaminondas through his perſwaſions did ſo lift vp the hearts and courage of his men, that they gaue a ſecond and ſo fierce a charge vpon them, that they wholly ouerthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS, & made them flie for life. Then Epaminondas fiercely purſuing the flying enemies, made great ſlaughter, and wan one of the moſt glorioueſt victories that euer Captaine did: hauing in a pitched field ouercome the moſt noble and warlike nation of all GREECE, with a farre ſmaller number of men then his enemies had. Alſo he tooke more glorie of that aboue all his other exploits, & eſpecially becauſe it hapned vnto him in his father Polymnis life time. And oftentimes he had theſe words vp in his mouth: that of all the honeſt and happy fortunes that euer chaunced vnto him, nothing ioyed his heart more, then that he had vanquiſhed the LACEDÆMONIANS at the battell of LEVCTRES, his father and mother that begat him being both aliue. And to ſay truely, he that day preſerued the life of his father and mother, and of his whole countrey beſides: for the LACEDÆMONIANS were fully reſolued vtterly to deſtroy the THEBANS. Now he vſing at all other times to ſhew himſelfe amongſt them, fine and neat, with a pleaſant countenance: the next day after the battell at LEVCTRES he came out openly very ſad, heauie, and penſiue. Whereupon his friends asked him preſently if he had heard any euill newes, or ſome misfortune had happened to him. None, ſaid he, but I perceiued by my ſelfe yeſterday, that ouerioyed with the victorie I obtained, I lift vp my ſelfe more then became me: and therefore to day I correct this ioy, which yeſterday was too exceeding in me. He knowing that it was the maner of the SPARTANS to hide and couer (as well as they could poſſible) all ſuch misfortunes, deſirous openly to ſuppreſſe and ſhew the greatneſſe of the loſſe they had ſuſtained: he would not ſuffer them to carie away their dead bodies by great all together, but euery citie one after another: and ſo by this meanes it appeared that there were aboue a thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS. Some make the number of the dead to be greater, and ſay they were foure thouſand naturall LACEDÆMONIANS, but that muſt be vnderſtood of them and their allies: and of the BOEOTIANS, there were not aboue three hundred or thereabouts found dead. This battell of LEVCTRES was ſtriken at the beginning of the 2. yeare of the hundred and ſecond Olympiade.

The LACEDÆMONIANS hauing at that battell loſt the greateſt part of their honor and greatneſſe, which men had ſeene before in their eſtate, loſt not their courage for all this: but to keepe their youth ſtill in heart, and to take away all feare which had poſſeſſed them that had eſcaped from this ouerthrow: Ageſilaus entred ARCADIA with an armie, and was contented to take a ſmall towne of the MANTINEANS, and to prey and ſpoile the country, which done he returned home againe. Some thinke that this was the cauſe that brought Epaminondas into LACONIA. Other ſome report it otherwiſe, and ſay that Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the MANTINEANS to reedifie their citie. And there be that are of another opinion, which is: that Lycomedes Captaine of the ARCADIANS hauing made a rode hard to ORCHOMENE, he ſlue vpon an encounter Polytropus Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and 2. hundred SPARTANS with him, his purpoſe being to win ORCHOMENE: and that thereupon they finding themſelues too weake to ſtand againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, they ſought the alliance and aide of the THEBANS. How ſoeuer it was, the LACEDÆMONIANS and ARCADIANS being enemies, by reaſon of their chiefe

citie of MANTINEA: that was the cause the THEBANS ioyned with the ARCADIANS, and being followed with their allies, led by Epaminondas, they entred into LACONIA with an armie of forty thousand men of warre, and with thirty thousand others that followed the campe. The ATHENIANS sent Iphicrates Captaine with twelue thousand men to aide the SPARTANS: but before his comming Epaminondas entred into LACONIA in diuers places, and sacked all the whole countrie, which had not bene laid wast by any enemy in sixe hundred yeares space before, when the DORIANS came to inhabite there. The SPARTANS seeing their countrey wasted and destroyed before their eyes, were desirous to go out with all the force they could make: but Agesilaus would not suffer them, telling them how daungerous it was to leaue the citie, to set vpon such a mightie enemie. So they were quiet, and Epaminondas in the meane space descended the mountaine Taugete with his armie, towards the riuer of Eurotas, the which at that time was risen very high by reason of the winter. He sought what he could to draw Agesilaus to fight, who beholding Epaminondas a great while marching in battell ray alongst the riuers side at the head of his troupes: he wondred at his boldnesse and valure, but would by no meanes come out of his fort. Insomuch as after this armie had preyed and foraged all LACONIA, Epaminondas led them backe againe laden with bootie. And though Agesilaus had won himselfe great honour for his wisedome, in looking to the safetie of his citie: yet Epaminondas had made his countrey so poore, with the former losses sustained, especially at the ouerthrow at LEVCTRES: that SPARTA could neuer afterwards recouer that losse againe, nor grow into that reputation and power it had before. Furthermore, notwithstanding all the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the experience of Iphicrates, Epaminondas returned with his whole armie as he came. And the more to keepe the LACEDÆMONIANS still vnder their feet, and to heape new troubles vpon them: he gaue counsell to the ARCADIANS and other their allies, to reedifie and repleniſh the citie of MESSINA with new inhabitants againe, which the LACEDÆMONIANS had long before that destroyed. All the whole councell giuing their consents vnto it, he made diligent inquirie forthwith to seeke out all those that till that time had bene auncient inhabitants in MESSINA: and in the space of foureſcore and fiue daies hauing reedified the ruined houses, he set a foot againe one of the nobleſt and most auncient cities of GRECE, and left there a strong garrison: for the which he was as much esteemed and rather more, then for any other seruice he had euer done.

The LACEDÆMONIANS being lightened of a maruellous great feare, made an agreement with the ATHENIANS, and left them the chiefe commaund by sea, reseruing to themselues that by land. Afterwards through the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the supply that was sent vnto them out of SICILIA, they wan their townes againe by litle and litle. The ARCADIANS to stop their course, assaulted the citie of PALLENE in LACONIA, put all the garrison there to the sword, razed the towne, and preyed all the countrey thereabout: and doubting that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be reuenged, they prayed aide of the THEBANS, who sent Epaminondas thither with the other Bœotarches, sixe thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horse. The ATHENIANS hauing intelligence thereof, sent their armie before vnder the leading of Chabrias, who marched directly to CORINTH, and there had supply of souldiers, of the MEGARIANS, PALLENIANS, and CORINTHIANS: so that he had made vp a regiment of ten thousand men. And afterwards the armie of the LACEDÆMONIANS and of their allies, being arriued at the very place of CORINTH, they made all together the number of twenty thousand fighting men. So they determined to repaire and fortifie all the passages and entrances into the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, to stop the passage of the BOEOTIANS. And beginniug frō the city of CENCHREES vnto the hauen of LECHEVM, they shut and blocked vp all the waies from the one sea to the other, with mighty great peeces of timber a crosse, and with a maruellous deepe ditch. And this great peece of worke was followed with such speed, both by meanes of the great multitude of people, as also through the goodwils of those that laboured it hard: that they had finished and done all before the BOEOTIANS could arriue there. Epaminondas at his comming hauing diligently viewed and considered this fortification, perceiued that the easiest way to be forced, was that which the LACEDÆMONIANS themselues kept. So he sent to giue them defiance, though they were thrice as many men in number as his owne. For all this that they had the defiance, they durst not come out, but kept them close vnder this fortification, which receiuing certain assaults, they were repulsed. Now all of them doing their best indeuour, being occupied, some assailing, other defending, Epaminondas chose out the best men in all his armie, and lustily charging the guard of the LACEDÆMONIANS enforced them to giue him way, and in deſpite of them he entred into PELOPONNESVS, which was a wonderfull and memorable exploit of all others. Frō thence he marched towards the cities of EPIDAVRE and TROEZEN, and ſo foraged all the countrey: howbeit he could take none of the townes, becauſe they were defended with ſtrong garriſons. Neuertheleſſe he put SICYONE, PHEVNTE, and ſome other townes in ſuch feare, that they yeelded themſelues vnto him. That being done, he went to CORINTH, and there ouercame the CORINTHIANS in a ſet battell, and bet them home fighting euen to the wals of their citie. There were ſome of his men ſo raſh, and preſuming of their valour, that they entred hand ouer head with thoſe that fled, euen within the gates of their citie, which put the CORINTHIANS in ſuch a terrible feare, that they ran with all ſpeed poſſible to get their houſes ouer their heads. Chabrias beat them out againe, and killed ſome of them. Whereupon he cauſed a token of triumph to be ſet vp, as if it had bene an ouerthrow. Epaminondas laughing him to ſcorne for it, ſaid he ſhould not call it a Trophee, or token of triumph, but rather Hecateſie, as one would ſay, a ſtatue of Proſerpina: becauſe in times paſt they commonly ſet this image of Proſerpina at the firſt gallowes they found before the gate of any citie. The BOEOTIANS therefore came on with their battell as neare vnto CORINTH as they could, and Chabrias with his troupes camped without in a very ſtrong place of aduantage for him: ſo there were many skirmiſhes betweene them, in the which Chabrias ſhewed ſuch valour, that he wan great fame and reputation, euen of Epaminondas himſelfe. Who being asked on a time whom he thought the greateſt captaine, himſelf, Chabrias, or Iphicrates: It is hard to iudge, ſaid he, whileſt we are all aliue. Another brought him word that the ATHENIANS had ſent an army againe into PELOPONNESVS, furniſhed with new armours. Well, anſwered he, doth Antigenidas weepe when he knoweth that Tellin hath new flutes? This Tellin was a very bad player of the flute, and Antigenidas excellent good & skilful. Touching the ſupply of this armie, they were ten thouſand SPANIARDS and GAVLES, whom Dionyſius the tyrant ſent out of SICILIA to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing payed them for fiue moneths. They had ſerued reaſonably well in this warre, and ſo in the end of ſommer returned home againe.

Now it fortuned in theſe laſt encounters, that Epaminondas hauing forced the LACEDÆMONIANS that ſtood to the defence of the fortification aboue mentioned, and hauing them in his power to haue ſlaughtered a great number of them at his will: he contented himſelfe onely with this glorie, that in deſpite of them he had entred into PELOPONNESVS, and ſought to do them no more hurt: which gaue thoſe occaſion that did enuie his glorie to blame him, and to accuſe him of treaſon, as hauing willingly ſpared the enemies, becauſe they ſhould particularly thanke him onely. But now that we haue begun to ſpeake of this matter, we muſt ſee how he behaued himſelfe among his citizens, and the wiſedome he vſed in defence of his integritie. Among all thoſe that could not endure the glorie of his vertues, was Meneclides the Oratour, an eloquent man, but withall moſt wicked and malicious. He finding that Epaminondas wan ſuch honour by warres, neuer left perſwading the THEBANS to embrace peace, and to preferre it before warre: becauſe they ſhould not liue alwaies vnder the obedience and command of one man. Epaminondas told him one day in open councell: Thou wilt deceiue the THEBANS, going about to counſell them toleaue warres: and highly commending eaſe, thou goeſt about to put iron bolts vpon their feet. For warre begetteth peace, the which cannot hold long but among thoſe that know how to ſeeke and keepe it with the edge of the ſword. Then ſpeaking to the citizens: If ye will haue the principalitie and commaund of all GREECE, before all others: you muſt ſhrowd your ſelues in your tents and pauilions in the open field, and not follow games and wreſtlings here at home. Alſo he knew well enough that the BOEOTIANS ſpoiled and vndid themſelues by eaſe and idleneſſe: which was the cauſe that he conſtantly bare this mind to keepe them continually in warres. Whereupon when time came that they fell to chooſing of Captaines, and that they went about to chuſe him Bœotarche: he ſaid to the citizens: My maiſters, I pray you conſider of it now you are at leyſure, before you chooſe me: for I tell you plainely, if I be choſen your captaine, you muſt to the warres. He called the country of BOEOTIA, which is all plaine champion, the ſcaffold of warre: ſaying it was vnpoſſible to keepe it, vnleſſe the inhabitants had their targets on their armes, and their ſwords in their hands. This was not becauſe he did not loue peace, and ſolitarineſſe to ſtudie Philoſophie, and that he was not more feareful of them he had in his charge then for himſelfe, vſing alwaies to watch and forbeare his meate, when the THEBANS were at their banquets and feasts giuing themselues to all pleasures: but he knew them well enough, and he was neuer more carefull of any thing, then to keepe his armie from idlenesse. For on a time the ARCADIANS intreating that his troupes might enter into one of their towns, to lye drie there in couert all the winter, he would by no meanes yeeld to it. For now (said he to his souldiers) that they see you exercise your selues in armes, they wonder at you as braue and valiant soldiers: but if they should see you at the fire side parching of beanes, they would esteeme no better of you then of themselues. No more could he endure couetousnesse: for if sometime he gaue his men leaue to go a booting, his meaning was, that whatsoeuer they got should be bestowed in furnishing of armes. For if any man went about to fill his purse with mony, he thought him vnworthie to be a souldier. As on a time when he perceiued that his Target-bearer had receiued a great summe of money for the raunsome of a prisoner, he said vnto him: Giue me my target, and go thou thy waies, and buy thee a Tauerne to leade the rest of thy life there: for I perceiue thou wilt no more like an honest man put thy selfe in daunger in the warres, as before thou hast done, because thou art now rich and wealthy. Now Epaminondas being such a one as you haue heard, Meneclides notwithstanding would neuer cease controlling of him: and one day he went so far as to reproch him that he had no children, that he was not maried, and that he magnified himself more then euer king Agamemnon had done. Epaminondas answered him, thou hast nothing to do to counsell me to marie: for in that respect there is neuer a man here in all this councell whome I would lesse vse then thou. And this he spake, because the other was suspected to be an adulterer. And where thou thinkest that I do enuie the glorie and fame of Agamemnon, thou art foule deceiued: yet I tell thee he was not a litle troubled to win a towne in ten yeares: where I to the cõtrarie putting the LACEDÆMONIANS to flight in one day, haue deliuered our citie and all GREECE from them. But thankes be to you, my Lord THEBANS, (speaking to all the whole assembly:) through you I did it, and ouerthrew and ruined the power and gouernment of our enemies. Neuertheless, Pelopidas and he were very euill recompenced for this good seruice of theirs: for at their returne from LACONIA, they with some other of the Bœotarches were accused, for that after the time of their charge and gouernment was expired, they had kept it foure moneths beyond the time the law had appointed them. With much ado Pelopidas was absolued: but Epaminondas willed his companions to lay all the fault vpon him, as being forced vnto it by his authoritie: and that for his part his words could be no better then his deedes. So vpon this he being called before the Iudges, and after he had iustified that he had passed the time limited of his authority: in stead of excusing himselfe, he went and told brauely his worthy exploits he had done in this iourney at that time, adding withall, that he was willing and readie to die, so they caused his condemnation to be written vpon the pillar of his tombe, to the end the GREEKS should vnderstand that they had put Epaminondas to death, because he had compelled the THEBANS against their wils to burn the country of LACONIA, the which in fiue hundred yeares before had neuer once bene spoiled: that he had restored the citie of MESSINA with inhabitants againe, two hundred and thirtie yeares after the LACEDÆMONIANS had laid it waste: that he had brought al the people and townes of ARCADIA to be as one bodie in league together, and had set all the GREEKES at libertie: and all these things, said he, we did in our iourney. The Iudges vnderstanding this worthy and true defence, they all rose from their seates and laughed a good, and would neuer take their bals to ballot against him.

But as for this second accusation, that he had shewed fauour vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS for his owne particular honour, he would make no answer before the people of THEBES to this false imputation, but he rose out of the Theater, and passing through the assembly walked into the parke of exercises. The people being in vprore against him, made no choise of him againe as they were wont to do, although there was great need: but created other Bœotarches to go into THESSALY. And the more (as they thought) to despite Epaminondas, they commaunded him to go that voyage as a priuate souldier: the which he refused not, but went very willingly, and vpon this occasion. Pelopidas being sent the second time into THESSALY, to make accord betwixt the people and Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was by this tyrant (not respecting the dignitie of an Ambassador, nor of his countrey) made prisoner with Ismenias. Whereupon the THEBANS being iustly offended, sent thither an army of eight thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horse, howbeit vnder the leading of vnskilfull Captaines, who wanting iudgement to vse the time, thought it good to returne home againe without doing any thing. But as they went their way, Alexander being ſtronger in horſmen then they, followed them, and gaue charge vpon the rere, killed ſome, and grieuouſly wounded others. So they knowing neither how to go forward nor backward, were in great diſtreſſe, and the rather becauſe their victuals fell ſhorter euery day then other. But being now almoſt out of all hope to retire home with ſafety, Epaminondas being then amongſt the foote, was earneſtly intreated by the ſouldiers and Captaines to helpe to redreſſe this diſorder. Thereupon he choſe certaine footmen light armed, and all the horſemen, and ſo falling himſelfe amongſt them in the rereward of the army, he ſo luſtily repulſed the enemies, that the reſt of the army afterwards marched in great ſafety: and did ſo well, fighting at times, making head as occaſion ſerued, and keeping his troupes in ſo good order, that he brought them all away ſafe. This act crowned him with a new glorie, confounded his enemies, and wanne him great honour euery where, beſides the loue and good will of his citizens: who ſet great fines vpon their Captaines, becauſe they had behaued themſelues ſo euill in this iourney. Againe, the people ſeeing that by ſo many worthy deeds Epaminondas razed out all the ſlaunders and accuſations which his euill willers had vomited out againſt him: they choſe him a new their Captaine generall, to returne into THESSALIE with another army. At whoſe comming all the country ſtraight reioyced for the reputation of ſo great and famous a Captaine, and there wanted litle euen to breake this tyrants necke altogether, his friends and Captaines ſtood in ſuch feare, and his ſubiects in good mind to rebell, and very ioyfull for the hope they had ſhortly to ſee the tyrant at one blow well recompenced for all his curſed and wicked deeds he had done long before. Neuertheleſſe Epaminondas ſetting aſide the conſideration of his honour and glorie, in reſpect of the deliuerance and ſafety of his friend Pelopidas, and being afraid that Alexander, when he ſhould ſee his eſtate in daunger to be ouerthrowne, would take reuenge in his madneſſe vpon Pelopidas: he purpoſely drew this warre in length, wheeling about in euery place, refraining to ſet on him in earneſt, diſſembling to make his preparations, and ſtill delaying, becauſe he would prepare and ſoften the heart of this tyrant by this deuice, not to leaue him too much to his bold vnbridled will, neither to ſtirre vp (to the danger of Pelopidas) the ſharpe and inhumane anger of this bloud-ſucker. Who being a monſter, compounded of cruelty and cowardice, was ſo afraid onely of the name and reputation of Epaminondas, and hanging the wing as they ſay: that he preſently ſent men vnto him to excuſe and iuſtifie him. But Epaminondas would not that the THEBANS through his ſlackneſſe ſhould make peace and alliance with ſo wicked a man, but onely he was contented to take a truce with him for thirtie dayes, taking Pelopidas and Iſmenias out of his hands. So with them he returned backe againe to THEBES, and alwayes continued faithfull friendſhip with Pelopidas, refuſing euer to haue any part of his goods, but did ſtill perſeuere in his wonted ſimplicitie and diſcipline. Now ſpeaking of this friendſhip, they report that Epaminondas hauing committed a man of baſe condition for ſome light fault to priſon, Pelopidas prayed him to ſet the poore man at liberty, but he denied him: and yet afterwards being intreated by a woman he kept, he did it at her requeſt, ſaying that harlots were to be graunted ſuch requeſts, not Captaines.

This boldneſſe he ſhewed in all places, and to all men, yet mingled with a great ſweetneſſe, and with a good liuely grace: whereof we will bring many examples, beſides that he ſpake at SPARTA againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS and Ageſilaus, in the preſence of all the commiſſioners of GREECE. The ARGIANS hauing made league with the THEBANS, the ATHENIANS ſent their Ambaſſadours into ARCADIA, to ſee if they could gaine the ARCADIANS to be their friends. So theſe Ambaſſadours began roundly and hotly to charge and accuſe both the one and the other: inſomuch as Calliſtratus ſpeaking for them, reproued the other two cities, ORESTES and OEDIPVS. Epaminondas being preſent at that aſſembly of counſell, ſtood vp, and ſayd: My Lords, we confeſſe that in times paſt we had a man that killed his father in our city, and in ARGOS one that killed his mother: but for vs, we haue driuen out of our countrey, and baniſhed all ſuch wicked murtherers, and the ATHENIANS haue receiued them both. And to the SPARTANS that had layed many great and grieuous imputations vpon the THEBANS: If they haue done nothing elſe, my Lords of SPARTA, anſwered Epaminondas, yet at the leaſt they haue made you forget to ſpeake litle. The ATHENIANS had made league with Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, mortall enemy of the THEBANS, who promiſed the THEBANS that he would let them haue a pound of fleſh for an halfe peny. Epaminondas hearing of it, Well ſayd he, and we will find them wood that ſhall coſt them nothing to ſeeth this fleſh withall: for we will go fell and cut downe all the trees they haue in their countrey, if they go about to make any alteration other then good. So when he went into THESSALY, and brought backe Pelopidas againe, the ATHENIANS made no great ſtirre againſt him: and the tyrant that promiſed fleſh ſo good cheape, had much ado at that time to keepe his skin whole. But afterwards he had his payment, as you may reade in the latter end of Pelopidas life. But that which did excell in Epaminondas, and did cut the throat of enuy it ſelfe, was his moderation and temperance, knowing how to vſe any ſtate or condition offered him, & neuer to rage againſt himſelfe nor others, alwayes bearing this mind, that howſoeuer they tooke him, and in what place ſoeuer they ſet him, he was well contented, and all for the good of his countrey: for proofe whereof I will ſhew you this example. His euill willers on a time thinking to bring him in diſgrace, as they ſay, for ſpite they made him ſuperintendant and ouerſeer of all the cuſtomes, whileſt others his inferiors, vnworthy to be compared to him, were placed in the moſt honourable offices. This notwithſtanding he deſpiſed not this office, but did diſcharge it very faithfully: for, ſayd he, office or authority ſheweth not onely what the man is, but alſo the man what the office is.

But now further: ſhortly after Epaminondas returne out of THESSALY, the ARCADIANS were ouercome by Archidamus and the LACEDÆMONIANS, and they loſt not a man: and therefore this dayes iourney was called for them, the teareleſſe battell. Epaminondas foreſeeing that the ARCADIANS ſhould yet haue a ſtorme, gaue them counſell to fortifie themſelues: whoſe counſell they following, they built the towne which afterwards was called MEGALIPOLIS, ſituated in a very conuenient place. Whileſt they made warre with the ELIANS their neighbors, Epaminondas heart neuer fainted, but his mind was alwayes giuen to high enterpriſes for the good of his countrey: where being reſpected and honoured aboue all others, he made an oration vnto his citizens, perſwading them to make themſelues ſtrong by ſea, and to attend the conqueſt of the principality, making themſelues Lords of it. This oration of his had bene long thought of before, being full of liuely reaſons, which did ſhew and proue vnto them that the enterpriſe was both honourable and profitable, aſwell by other arguments he alleadged, as alſo for that he told them it was an eaſie thing for them that were now the ſtronger by land, to make themſelues alſo the ſtrongeſt by ſea: and the rather for that the ATHENIANS in the warre againſt Xerxes, notwithſtanding that they had armed and ſet foorth two hundred galleys well appointed with men, they neuertheleſſe willingly ſubmitted themſelues vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. So alledging many other reaſons to this purpoſe, he preuailed ſo much, that the THEBANS inclined to vndertake the enterpriſe by ſea. Thereupon the people gaue preſent order they ſhould build a hundred galleys, and withall an arſenall with ſo many roomes to lay them vnder couert in the docke: and that they ſhould ſend to them of RHODES, of CHIO, and of BYZANCE, to pray them to further them in this enterpriſe. And for this purpoſe Epaminondas was ſent with an army vnto theſe cities. So in his courſe he met with Laches, a Captaine of the ATHENIANS, and a good number of ſhips in his fleete, ſent of purpoſe to hinder the intention of the THEBANS. Notwithſtanding, Epaminondas made him ſo afraid, that he draue him backe againe: and he holding on his voyage, brought the cities before named to make league with the THEBANS, who on the other ſide were at warre with the citie of ORCHOMENE, which had done great hurt and miſchiefe in their eſtate. So they hauing won it by aſſault, they ſlue euery man that was able to beare armes, and moreouer made all the women and children ſlaues.

Some time after Pelopidas death, certaine priuate men of MANTINEA, fearing to be called to account for their bad behauiours and robberies they had done, if the ARCADIANS and ELIANS fell to agreement: they practiſed ſo, that they raiſed vp a new quarrell within the countrey deuided into two factions, of the which the MANTINEANS were chiefe of the one ſide, and the TEGEATES on the other part. This quarrell went ſo farre, that the parties would try it by armes. The TEGEATES, they ſent to demaund aide of the THEBANS, who choſe Epaminondas their Captaine generall, and ſent him with a good number of men of warre to aide the TEGEATES. The MANTINEANS aſtonied at this aide comming out of BOEOTIA to their enemies, and at the reputation of this Captaine: they immediatly ſent vnto the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, the greateſt enemies of the BOEOTIANS for aide, which both the cities graunted. Whereupon there fell out often and many great skirmiſhes in diuerſe parts of PELOPONNESVS. Epaminondas being not farre off MANTINEA, vnderſtood by the ſame country men, that Ageſilaus and the LACEDÆMONIANS were come into the field, and that they waſted all the territory of the

TEGEATES. Whereupon imagining straight that there were few men left in the citie of SPARTA to defend it, he went about a great exploit, and a wonderfull stratageme of a man of warre: and had brought it to passe, if the maruellous great good fortune of SPARTA had not hindred it. So he departed from TEGEA by night, the MANTINEANS knowing nothing of it, and taking another way then Agesilaus, he had taken SPARTA without one stroke striken, but for a post of CANDIA that with speed brought Agesilaus word of it: who foorthwith sent out a horseman to giue them intelligence that were left at SPARTA, that they should beware they were not surprised vpon the sudden: and he himselfe came speedily after, and arriued there a litle before the THEBANS comming thither: who being very neare the city by breake of day, gaue assault to them that were within to defend the towne. Then Agesilaus bestirred him throughly, beyond the power of an old man. But his sonne Archidamus, and Isadas the sonne of Phœbidas, fought valiantly of all parts. Epaminondas seeing the SPARTANS in order of battell, began then to mistrust that his enterprise was discouered. This notwithstanding, he left not off to force them all he could, albeit he fought with great disaduantage for the inconuenience of the places he occupied: and continued alwayes couragiously doing and receiuing hurt, vntill the army of the LACEDÆMONIANS came on, and the night also: whereupon he made them sound the retraite. Now he being aduertised that the MANTINEANS came on also with their forces, he drew his troupes somewhat further off the towne, and there camped. After that he caused his men to refresh themselues with victuals, and hauing left certaine horsemen in the campe, he commanded them to make fires in the morning, and he himselfe went in the meane space, to surprise those that remained at MANTINEA before any man wist he was gone. Neuertheless he failed of his purpose, albeit he had forethought him of all misfortunes that any man possible could haue considered in so waighty a cause. But the prosperity of the THEBANS was come to his height, and the course of Epaminondas life drawing neare to an end, would very shortly depriue GRECE of this noble and famous person, from whom was taken a most notable victorie, and that twise, by a most straunge accident. For at this second time, when he was neare vnto MANTINEA, left without gard and defence; on the other side of the towne there arriued six thousand ATHENIANS, led by their Captaine Hegelecus: who hauing put sufficient force into the towne, he ordered all the rest in battell without the towne wals, as though he meant to haue fought a field: and immediatly after them came also the LACEDÆMONIANS and MANTINEANS together, who prepared themselues to put all to the hazard of a battell, and therefore sent for their allies out of all parts. They were in all fiue and twenty thousand footmen, and two thosand horse. The ARCADIANS, BOEOTIANS, and their partakers, made the number of thirty thousand footmen and aboue, and three thousand horse. First, the horsmen charged with so great furie as was possible, insomuch as the horsmen of the ATHENIANS finding the THEBANS in front, were the weaker: not because they were lesse valiant and hardy then the other, but because they had not so good leaders, and had few archers among their troupes. The THEBANS on the other side they were well appointed, and specially of THESSALIANS amongst others, men very skilfull in their bowes, who so plied the ATHENIANS, that they brake them, and put them all to rout. Yet they did not flie amongst their footmen, which made them somewhat recouer their honour they had lost by running away, and all because they had not broken the rankes of their allies. On the contrary part, as they fled they met with certaine troupes of souldiers of NEGROPONT, whom the ARCADIANS sent to take in certaine hils hard by the plaine where the battell was fought, and they put them all to the sword. The men at armes of the THEBANS seeing them turne their backes, did not pursue them at all, but gaue charge vpon a great battalion of footmen, forcing them all they could to breake and run through them: so the fight was very cruell and sharpe, but in the end the ATHENIANS left the place. This notwithstanding, the Colonell of the horsemen of the ELIANS being appointed for the safety of the reregard, defended them, and comming to the encounter of the BOEOTIANS he resisted them, and made them speedily giue backe: and this reformed the fault againe of the left point of their army. But in the right point, after the horsemen had charged one vpon the other, the fight was soone tried. For, by reason of the great number of the men at armes of the THEBANS and THESSALIANS, the partakers of the MANTINEANS were presently put to rout, and after they had lost a great number of their men, they succoured themselues about the battalion of their footmen. And this was the successe of the fight of the horsemen. As touching the battalions of the footmen, footmen, after they came once to the ſword, it was a maruellous bloudie and moſt cruell fight: for neuer before that time was there ſo great a number of GREEKES in battell one againſt the other, nor ſo great Captaines, nor of better fighting and more valiant men. The two nations that at that time bare the name to be the braueſt ſouldiers for footmen of all the world, to wit, the THEBANS, and LACEDÆMONIANS, they were ſet in front in the battell one directly againſt the other. So the firſt began to charge, neither ſparing life nor limme. The firſt charge they gaue was with their pikes, which being broken by force of the great blowes they gaue to each other, then they fought with their ſwords, and laying about them body to body, there was no kind of flaſhing and wounding but they both gaue and receiued: and neither part ſhrunke nor gaue ouer, but ſtucke to it manfully. And ſo continuing this dangerous fight a long time, by reaſon of the valiantneſſe of either ſide: the victory ſtood doubtfull a great while, and could hardly be iudged which ſide were like to haue the vpper hand. For euery one that fought had this reſolution in his heart, not to feare death what ſoeuer hapned: but rather deſiring to make proofe of the valour of his perſon, worthily gaue his life in pray, to win honour in exchange. By reaſon whereof, though the fight was moſt ſharpe and violent, the euent of it remained a long ſpace betwixt two irons, not to be diſcerned of whether ſide the victorie ſhould fall. Vntill ſuch time as Epaminondas ſeeing that there was no remedy, but that the reſolution of this doubtfull fight depended vpon his owne vertue and valour: he reſolued with himſelfe to venter his life vpon it. So he preſently gathered about him all the beſt and choiſe men of his army, and of them hauing made a company of reſolute men, he ranne with great furie into the greateſt preſſe of all the enemies, marching himſelfe the formeſt man before his troupe, with a ſpeare in his hand, with the which at the firſt blow he gaue, he ſlue the Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſtraight way the other began to aſſaile their enemies. But Epaminondas killed ſo many in the place with his owne hands, and did ſo terrifie the others, that at the laſt he opened the battell of his enemies, and layed on them ſo luſtily, that they not able any longer to defend themſelues againſt the valorous force of himſelfe and his followers, were enforced to giue backe, and to leaue the place to the BOEOTIANS: who were ſtraight at their heeles, beating and following them ſo eagerly, that in a ſhort ſpace all the field was couered with dead bodies, lying on heapes one vpon another. But in the end, the LACEDÆMONIANS ſeeing they could by no meanes ſaue themſelues, becauſe Epaminondas followed them ſo neare (giuen ouer too much to his paſſionate courage) they gathered a troupe together, and running all on heapes they ſet vpon him, throwing infinite number of darts at him, of the which he put by ſome, and receiued others vpon his target, but yet there were many that ſtucke in his body, which he pulled out himſelfe, and with the ſelfe ſame weapons fought with them that had throwne them at him. At the laſt, when he had fought more then a man, and beyond all the force a man could vſe to giue his countrey the victory: a LACONIAN called Anticrates thruſt him into the breaſt with a dart with ſuch a force, that the wood brake, and the iron with the tronchion remained in his bodie. Hauing receiued this great wound, he ſuddenly fell downe to the ground: but then was there a more cruell fight about him then before, with great ſlaughter of both ſides: vntill that the THEBANS, which had much ſtronger bodies then the LACEDÆMONIANS, made them flie for life, and after they had followed them a litle way, they returned againe to the campe where the battell was fought, to the end they might haue the dead bodies in their power, and ſo the whole victory. Thereupon they ſounded the retraite, and thus the battell ceaſed, for the which both of them ſet vp tokens of triumph, either ſide pretending they had the better. For the ATHENIANS hauing ouerthrowne thoſe of NEGROPONT and their adherents which were ſent to take the hils of that plaine: they kept the bodies in their power. The THEBANS on the other ſide hauing ouercome the SPARTANS, had the bodies of thoſe that were dead in that battell in their power, being the farre greater number alſo: wherefore they ſayd that they were victours. So ſtanding in theſe termes, it was a good while before they ſent trompeter or herauld the one to the other, to burie their dead: vntill that the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent firſt of all, and then they all tooke their dead bodies and buried them. And furthermore, he that had killed Epaminondas was ſo wel thought of, & highly eſteemed for this valiant act of his, for the great feare all the SPARTANS had had of Epaminondas in time paſt: that they gaue him many great preſents and honours, and beſides, made thoſe that came after him free from all publicke charges and contributions in the common wealth. And Plutarch alſo ſayd, that in his time one Callicrates, a nephew of Anticrates aboue named, did then enioy that freedome. Touching Epaminondas, he was brought yet aliue into his tent: howbeit the phiſitions and ſurgeons being called together to dreſſe him, they all agreed, that ſo ſoone as euer they pulled out the head and ſplent of the dart out of his body, he muſt needs dye. So he made a moſt worthie and noble end of his life: for firſt he called for his target-bearer, who was alwayes at his hand in battell, and asked him, Is my target ſafe? He brought it ſtraight to ſhew it him. Then he asked who had the victory? The BOEOTIANS, ſaid the target-bearer. Then he commanded they ſhould bring him Diophantus and Iolidas: but being told they were both dead, he willed his citizens to make peace with their enemies, for that now they had no more Captaines of skill to leade them to the warres. Adding further to that aboue ſpoken, It is now time I dye, and ſo commanded them to plucke this ſpell of the dart out of his body. At that word all his friends about him fetched grieuous ſighes and cried out: and one of them weeping, ſayd vnto him: Alas Epaminondas, thou dieſt now, and leaueſt no children behind thee. No that I do not, ſayd he: but I leaue two faire daughters behind me, whereof the one is the victory of LEVCTRES, and the other that of MANTINEA. Immediatly they pulled out the ſpell of the dart, and at that inſtant he gaue vp the ghoſt, without ſhewing any ſigne or token that he was troubled in his mind. And thus did he embrace that bleſſed death: that fortuning vnto him which he often had in his mouth: that warre is the bed of honour, and alſo that it is a ſweete death to dye for his countrey. Now may we well ſee, that he excelled all the Captaines that euer were before him, did accompany, or follow him. For whoſoeuer would compare all their vertues, with the deeds and glory of Epaminondas, he ſhall ſee that the vertue of him was more noble and excellent, then any of theirs. For in them will appeare at the firſt ſight ſome ſpeciall thing more eminent then all the reſt, which hath made their fame great and glorious: but in this man onely were ioyned together all the vertues and good parts that could be wiſhed for in a graue, politicke, and a great Captaine, to make him perfect and complete in all things. For in the liberall ſciences, in experience, ripe vnderſtanding, force of eloquence, ſtrength of body, diſpoſition of his perſon, in height and greatneſſe of courage, in temperance, wiſedome, watching, ſweetneſſe and courteſie: and moreouer in hardineſſe, proweſſe, good iudgement, and ſufficiencie in militarie diſcipline: I know not where there is to be found ſo complete a man. For my opinion, I compare Epaminondas to himſelfe. Alſo in his time he wan to his countrey by force of armes, the principalitie of GREECE: but after his death his citizens loſt it immediatly, and fell daily to decay: that at the laſt Alexander the great vtterly ouercame them, made them that were aliue ſlaues, and deſtroyed their citie to the very ground. To conclude, before, and after Epaminondas, THEBES was vnder foote, and yet commanded all others whiles he ſtood on his feete. And ſo we muſt conclude, that THEBES was vtterly ouerthrowne in the battell of MANTINEA, and that Epaminondas at that time wan an immortall glorie. And as in his life time he had caried himſelfe modeſtly, and alwaies deteſted couetouſneſſe: ſo after his deceaſe the THEBANS brought him to his graue at the commo charge of the towne, becauſe they found no money in his houſe to defray the leaſt charges of his funerall.

The end of Epaminondas life.

Loue right and meekneſſe, leaſt like thee they dye.

Amyntas, the ſecond of that name, and ſeuenteenth King of Macedon, of the race of Temenides or Caranides, deſcended from Hercules, and that reigned foure hundred and ninetie eight yeares, reckoning from Caranus vnto Antipater, in whom began another race: he had three ſonnes by his firſt wife called Eurydice, borne in Illyria: to wit, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip. Alexander hauing ſucceeded his father, raigned but one yeare, during which time he made warre with his baſe brother Ptolomæus Alorites. But to appeaſe the ſtrife betwixt them, they ſent for Pelopidas, who was at that time in Thessalie. He tooke vp all their quarrels, reſtored thoſe that were baniſhed vnto their houſes, and (becauſe this peace ſhould be more ſurely kept) he tooke of them for hoſtages, Philip, and thirty other of the nobleſt mens ſonnes in Macedon, and brought them all away with him to Thebes. Now during the time that Perdiccas raigned, which was the ſpace of fiue yeares, Philip kept at Pammenes houſe, with whom Epaminondas was very great: & hereof it came, that ſome thought Philip was a hearer of Lyſis Epaminondas ſchoolemaiſter, and that they conferred together in Philoſophy. Howbeit Epaminondas was then much older then he, & ſurely it can hardly be that they were ſcholers together: except they will ſay that Epaminondas continuing all his life time to profit by the ſtudy of wiſedom, made Philip deſirous to heare him ſometime, and to follow him alſo. And it may be well inough alſo that he had learned of Epaminondas to be ſo quicke and ſudden of execution in the warres, as he was: which was but one of the leaſt parts of Epaminondas vertues. But as for his continency, iuſtice, magnanimitie, and clemency, which were the parts that in truth made him great: Philip, neither by nature, nor by education, nor by ſtudy, euer attained vnto it: for all this, he wanted not great gifts of body & mind, as ſhall appeare in the diſcourſe of his life: and as Theophraſtus teſtifieth, he was greater then any other of the kings of Macedon, not onely in proſperity of fortune, but alſo in wiſdome, bounty, and moderation of manners. So it came to paſſe that Alexander, notwithſtanding the accord Pelopidas had made, was traiterouſly killed by Ptolomy ſurnamed Alorites, who vſurped the kingdome, and was ſlaine himſelfe by Perdiccas: who after he had bene ouercome in a great battell by the SLAVONS, in the which he was ſlaine: Philip which was the laſt of the three brethren, ſtealing away from the place where he was in oſtage, fled into MACEDON, and came to ſucceed in the kingdome, the which he found in great trouble. For there were ſlaine at the laſt battell aboue foure thouſand MACEDONIANS, and thoſe that eſcaped were ſo beaten and aſtonied with blowes, that they thought of nothing leſſe then to take armes againſt the SLAVONS. On the other ſide the HVNGARIANS made inrodes into MACEDON, and the SLAVONS muſtered againe to returne thither. There was one Pauſanias alſo that aſpired to the kingdome, by the ſupport of the king of THRACIA. And the ATHENIANS alſo, they would eſtabliſh one called Argæus, and to this end ſent a great fleet by ſea, and three thouſand footmen well armed by land, led by Mantias. Philip taking heart to him in theſe rude beginnings, began to embolden the MACEDONIANS by wiſe perſwaſions: he reeſtabliſhed militarie diſcipline, furniſhed his ſouldiers very well, making them arme themſelues, and gaue order they ſhould be continually trained and exerciſed. It was he that amongſt other things deuiſed how to cloſe his footmen, and that framed the ſquare battell, which euer ſince was called the MACEDONIAN Phalange. He was very gracious in his words, and by his promiſes and gifts he wan the hearts and goodwill of his ſubiects.

Now finding himſelfe ſtrong, although he was yet but young of yeares, he reſolued to make head againſt all his enemies, yet not by open force, but where there was need: being alwaies of this mind, to buy time and men as much as he could poſſible. So perceiuing that the ATHENIANS did their vttermoſt indeuor to win the citie of AMPHIPOLIS againe, and that by this meanes they ſought to bring the kingdome of MACEDON into the hands of Argæus: he made them leaue it, and thruſt out their garriſons. As for the PANNONIANS (others reade PÆONIANS) or HVNGARIANS hauing ſent ambaſſadours to them, he corrupted ſome with money, and wan others by faire promiſes: inſomuch that they were all contented to liue in peace with him. And by the ſame meanes he brake the hope of Pauſanias, hauing by preſents gained the king of THRACIA that aided him. And for the regard of Mantias captaine of the ATHENIANS, he marched with his armie vnto the citie of METHONA: but he remained there, and ſent Argæus with the ſouldiers ſtraungers whom they had brought with them, vnto the citie of ÆGES. Argæus approching neare the towne with his troupe, ſent to feele the inhabitants, if they would receiue him, and be the firſt that ſhould be cauſe of his entrie into the poſſeſſion of the kingdome of MACEDON. But perceiuing they cared not for him, he returned againe. Philip that followed him hard at his heeles gaue him battell, killed the moſt part of his men, and draue the reſt vnto a litle mountaine, where he did beſiege them ſo ſtraightly, that they were forced to deliuer him all the baniſhed men of MACEDON amongſt them: whereupon he let them go their liues and goods ſaued. This firſt victorie of Philip put the MACEDONIANS againe in heart, and made them bold to enterpriſe any thing afterwards. Hereupon he made peace with the ATHENIANS, and vnderſtanding that the king of HVNGARIE was dead, he entred into their countrie with a maine armie, ouercame them in battell, and made them ſubiect vnto him. Of all his enemies there were left none but the SLAVONIANS, whom he went to aſſaile with ten thouſand footmen, and ſixe hundred horſe. But ſince they could not agree together, Bardyllis their king truſting in the victories he had gotten before time of the MACEDONIANS, and in the valiantneſſe of his SLAVONS, he came into the field, and preſented battell. The which hauing bene fought a long time, Philip behaued himſelfe ſo valiantly with his men of armes the MACEDONIANS, that he ouerthrew the SLAVONS, leauing ſeuen thouſand of them dead on the ground: and the reſt eſcaped by flying away. Shortly after they were agreed together, and reſtored to Philip all the places they held pertaining vnto MACEDON. Now the AMPHIPOLITANS had of long time borne Philip euill will, and whilſt he was occupied in other places, they did him many inuries: wherefore he determined to make a ſharpe warre vpon them. He hauing beſieged them with a puiſſant armie, and hauing brought his engines of warre hard to their wals, he beat them with ſuch furie, that he made a ſufficient breach, and entred the towne by force: out of the which he draue thoſe afterwards that were his enemies, and very courteouſly vſed and intreated the reſt. This towne being ſeated in a very commodious place, vpon the frontiers of THRACIA, and of the countries neare adioyning thereto: ſtood him afterwards in great ſtead for the furtherance and increaſe of his greatneſſe. For by meanes of that he preſently had the citie of PYDNE, and made league with the OLYNTHIANS, of great power at that time: by reaſon whereof he and the ATHENIANS, enuying one the other, they both practiſed to winne them. But Philip hauing wonne POTIDEA, draue out the garriſon of the ATHENIANS and vſed them very honeſtly: for he ſent them home to their houſes their liues and goods ſaued, not becauſe he loued the people of ATHENS, but for that he feared the power of their citie. After he had taken in the citie of PYDNE, he gaue it to the OLYNTHIANS, with all the territorie belonging vnto it. Then he returned to CRENIDES, the which he hauing augmented with a great number of inhabitants, he changed the firſt name of it, and called it by his owne name, PHILIPPI. Within that territorie he had mynes of gold, the which he opened and digged ſo diligently, that he drew out yearely new made, about the ſumme of ſixe hundred thouſand crowns. By this means in a ſhort time he gathered together a great treaſure, and daily the kingdome of MACEDON grew great, becauſe it had one of the chiefeſt ſinewes and props of warre. So he coined a number of peeces of gold called Philippus, wherewith he waged a great number of men, and bribed many priuate GREEKES: who afterwards ſold him for ready mony the townes of their countrie, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. In all this buſineſſe, Alexander the tyrant of PHERES in THESSALIE, hauing bene ſlaine by his wife Thebe, and by her brethren called Lycophron, and Tiſiphonus, at the firſt they were honoured as men that had deliuered their countrey of a cruell tyrannie: but very ſhortly after, theſe two men chaunging their minds, by money wan the ſouldiers whom Alexander kept for the guard of his perſon, and put themſelues in his place whom they had killed, putting many citizens to death that withſtood their enterpriſe: and hauing gathered together a great number of ſouldiers, they made themſelues Lords of PHERES. The ALLEVADES, men of authoritie and greatly followed in the countrie for the auncient nobilitie of their houſe, would haue oppoſed themſelues againſt this new tyranny. But finding themſelues to be too weak, they made meanes to Philip: who entring into THESSALIE with his armie, ouercame the two tyrants, and ſetting the townes at liberty which theſe tyrants held in ſubiection, he ſhewed great loue and fauour to the THESSALIANS. By which occaſion, in all his conqueſts he obtained afterwards, he found the THESSALIANS alwaies readie to do him ſeruice, and to aide him in all his affaires, and not himſelfe alone, but alſo his ſonne Alexander. But the greatneſſe of Philip grieued his neighbours, inſomuch as the kings of THRACIA, HVNGARIA, and SLAVONIA, not being ſtrong enough of themſelues, they ioyned forces together to make warre vpon him, and to be reuenged. Whileſt they were preparing to ioyne their forces, Philip went before, and compelled them to do what he would.

About this time, to wit, in the laſt yeare of the hundred and fifth Olympiade, fifteene years after the battell of MANTINEA, the holy warre began amongſt the GREEKES, which continued ten yeares ſpace: and this was the occaſion. The THEBANS not being contented with the victorie they obtained at the battell of LEVCTRES, framed a complaint againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS in the aſſembly of the Eſtates of GREECE, which they call the councell of the Amphictyons: and followed the matter ſo hard, that the LACEDÆMONIANS were condemned in a great ſumme of money, becauſe they had in time of peace ſurpriſed the caſtell of CADMEA. The PHOCIANS alſo, they hauing plowed vp a great deale of a certaine land ſacred to the gods, called the land of CIRRHE, were condemned by the Amphictyons in a great ſum of money: and becauſe they would not pay it, the councell pronounced, without longer delay and refuſall, all their towns and lands to be confiſcated to the gods: & that all other which were cõdemned (of which number were the LACEDÆMONIANS) ſhould be compelled to pay their fines, and if they refuſed, they ſhould be taken for excommunicate, and the other GREEKES ſhould make warre with them as againſt accurſed and execrable men. Philomelus, a man of great authoritie among the PHOCIANS, did ſo much, that he perſwaded them not to pay it, but contrariwiſe to defend their countrey with armes, and to win DELPHES. Whereunto they giuing their conſents, he gathered together a great armie, and in deſpite of all hindrances made himſelfe maiſter of DELPHES: cut aſunder with ſheares the decrees made by the Amphictyons engrauen vpon marble pillars: poſſeſt all the gold and ſiluer that was in the temple: and afterwards rendred a reaſon of his fact, and prepared himſelfe to make warre againſt the THEBANS, THESSALIANS, and LOCRIANS, and wanne three great battels of them. But being ouercome at the fourth battell, he threw himſelfe downe off a high rocke. In the meane ſpace, Cerſobleptes, the ſonne of Clotis king of THRACIA, hauing rendred vp to the ATHENIANS the townes of CHERRONESVS, partly for the good will he

bare the ATHENIANS, and partly for the hatred he had to Philip: the people of ATHENS sent inhabitants thither to keepe and defend the townes. Philip perceiuing that those of METHONE lent out their towne to all them that would make war against him, went and laid siege before it. They that were besieged, did valiantly defend it for a time: but in the end finding themselues too weak to make resistance, they yeelded vpon condition, that the inhabitants should go out euery man with one only gowne. Assoone as euer Philip had the towne in his hands, he razed it euen to the hard ground, & gaue the country all about vnto the MACEDONIANS. At this siege he was wounded with an arrow, that put out one of his eyes. Afterwards he led his army also at the instance of the THESSALIANS, into the country against Lycophron, that began againe to tyrannize those of PHERES: who hauing demanded aide of the PHOCIANS, they sent thither Phayllus with 7000. fighting men, whom Philip ouercame, and draue them out of THESSALY. Then Onomarchus that succeeded Philomelus in the charge of general, hoping to haue won THESSALY, made great speed thither with all his army, vnder colour to bring aide vnto Lycophron. Philip went against him with the THESSALIANS, but because Onomarchus had the greater number of men, he ouerthrew him, and killed many of the MACEDONIANS, insomuch that Philip himselfe was in great danger. For his men also were so afraid, that they would haue forsaken him, & he had much trouble to keepe them together: and in the end was constrained to retire home into his kingdome. Onomarchus departing from thence, entred into the country of BOEOTIA, ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and tooke the city of CORONEA. But Philip returned immediatly with a great force into THESSALY, to driue out Lycophron: who hauing called in the PHOCIANS, Onomarchus returned thither, followed with 20. thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horse. Hereupon Philip perswaded the commons of THESSALY, that they must all together vndertake this warre. And he could so well solicite them, that he assembled in one campe twenty thousand footmen, and three thousand horse. Then was there fought a most cruell battell, whereof the victory fell to Philip through the valiantnesse of his THESSALIAN men of armes. For Onomarchus and his men, they fled on foot towards the sea, where was by chance Chares the ATHENIAN Captaine sailing all alongst the coast with certaine gallies. There was great slaughter of the PHOCIANS there followed by the victors. Others to flie with more speed, threw downe their armes, and leapt into the sea, by swimming to get to the gallies of the ATHENIANS. There were slaine in battell and flight as well of naturall PHOCIANS, as of strangers that came for pay, aboue 6000. men, & there were taken prisoners to the number of 3000. Onomarchus that was one of them, was hanged, and all the other drowned as sacrilegers, by the cõmandement of Philip: vnto whom Lycophron yeelded the towne of PHERES, & so retired out of THESSALY, which by this means was set at liberty.

As for Philip, he marched with his army towards the way of THERMOPYLES, to make war with the PHOCIANS, within PHOCIDE it selfe: but the ATHENIANS stopped his passage. Wherfore he was constrained to returne backe into MACEDON, where he staid not long at rest, but determined to bring the townes of CHALCIDE in subiection to him. So he took by assault a fort called Gyre, the which he razed. But this was such a terror to the other small townes, that they put themselues vnder his obedience. Passing from thence into THESSALY, he draue away Pytholaus that had made himselfe maister of PHERES. And intending to bring the townes of HELLESPONT vnder his subiection, he tooke in without paine or daunger (rather by treason) the townes of MICYBERNE, and of TORONE. Afterwards he went with a great army against the city of OLYNTHE, the greatest & of most power that was in that marches: where first he ouercame the OLYNTHIANS in two great fights, so that he made them leaue the field, & shut them in within their owne town, vnto the which he gaue many assaults, and lost a great number of his men there. But hauing with great sums of mony corrupted Euthicrates & Lasthenes gouernors of the towne, at the length he had it by treason: and hauing sacked it, he sold the townsmen for slaues by the drum. The taking of this towne brought him a great quantity of siluer to helpe to defray the charges of his war, and did also make the other towns afraid, which had taken armes to resist him. Now after he had bestowed many rich presents vpon his captaines and souldiers, that had done him good seruice in this warre, he gaue also all about great sums of mony to the heads of the towns, and found merchants also among them that sold him their owne countrey and fellow citizens. Insomuch that he himselfe confessed he had enlarged his kingdome more through gold and siluer, then he did by force of armes: according to an answer that was made him, when he began first to put himselfe forward: for being desirous to know how he should carie himselfe, the oracle answered:

With

So ſhalt thou topſie turuy turne all things what ere they are.

Now the ATHENIANS being iealous of his greatneſſe, did euer helpe them whom he would hurt, and ſent Ambaſſadours to all the cities to perſwade them to maintaine and preſerue their libertie, and to put their townef-men to death whom they found willing to betray the Commonwealth: promiſing them to aide them all, and declared themſelues open enemies vnto Philip. He that ſet them moſt againſt him, was Demoſthenes: the moſt eloquent man of all GREECE at that time, and that did more trouble and hurt Philip with the blowes of his toung, and his continuall motions then all the Captaines of GREECE did him beſides. All this notwithſtanding, with all the diligence and labour ATHENS could vſe, they could neuer bridle the wicked diſpoſition of ſome priuate perſons, but they ſtill ſought to ſell their countrey: for he that bought, ſowed ſiluer without any ſpare, and there were a great number of traitours at that time through all GREECE. And touching this purpoſe, they ſay, that he being deſirous to winne a very ſtrong hold, he ſent ſome men before to view it: who returning, reported that it was vnpoſſible almoſt to approach it, and did by deſcription ſet it downe in all points impregnable. Then he asked them if the place were ſo hard to come to, that a poore Aſſe laden with gold could not come neare it: for he had oftentimes with ſiluer very eaſily wonne that which otherwiſe was not to be had by force of armes. And this was the cauſe that he practiſed to haue traitours in euery towne by gifts and penſions, calling them that receiued him his hoſtes and friends, corrupting mens manners beſides by vnworthie and diſhoneſt meanes. As after that he had wonne OLYNTHE, he made ſumptuous and magnificent ſacrifices to his gods, to thanke them for the victorie they had giuen him: and ſo hauing ſet downe a day of triumph for tilting and tourneying, and common ſports: thither repaired a great number of ſtraungers that came to ſee the feaſt. So keeping open court, he inuited many of theſe ſtraungers to come to his ſumptuous feaſtes he made, and in them he ſhewed all the familiaritie and courteſie that might be to entertaine them. For he dranke to ſome, and then gaue them the cups wherin he dranke to them: to others he gaue great preſents, and vnto all generally he gaue good words, and large promiſes: inſomuch that many ſought how to obtaine his loue and fauour. So it is reported, that one day at a banquet he eſpied Satyrus, an excellent Comedian and player, that he was very ſad: and that he asked him why he did not craue ſome thing of him, that he might ſhew his liberalitie vnto him. Satyrus anſwered him againe, that he would be glad to obtaine a ſute at his hands, but he durſt not aske it him, being afraid he ſhould be denyed. Philip liked his anſwer well, and bad him aske boldly. Then he told him, that a friend of his had two daughters among others priſoners, both of them mariageable, and beſought him that he would beſtow them vpon him: not for any other pleaſure or profite he ſhould haue of them, but becauſe he would marie them both at his owne charge, before they ſhould be forced to their diſhonour. Philip thanked him for his honeſt petition, and preſently cauſed theſe two maides to be deliuered vnto him. Thus he beſtowed many ſuch courteſies euery where, whereof he made his profite afterwards with great vſurie. For a number being drawne by the ſent and odour of ſo many good turnes, ſtudied with themſelues, enuying one another, which of them might do him beſt ſeruice, and find out moſt meanes to deliuer townes and countries into his hands.

But now to returne againe to that we had begun to ſpeake of the holy warre. The PHOCIANS that had three very ſtrong holds in BOEOTIA, to wit, ORCHOMENE, CORONEE, and CORSIES, did ordinarily from thence make incurſions into the country of the BOEOTIANS with great number of ſouldiers ſtraungers whom they kept in pay, and did burne and lay waſt all the territorie thereabouts, and euer had the vpper hand in all their inrodes and skirmiſhes they had with the countrimen. Vpon this occaſion the BOEOTIANS being weake of men, and wanting money, ſent in the end to demaund aide of Philip: who was not a litle glad to ſee them brought ſo low, for he deſired their pride might be pulled downe, which had lift them vp ſo high ſince the battell of LEVCTRES. So he ſent them a good number of ſouldiers, not for any deſire he had to aide them, but to make them thinke that he made great account of the temple of DELPHES, which the PHOCIANS had ſpoiled. After diuers exploits of warre, the one ſide and the other ſeeing themſelues wearie and bare, the BOEOTIANS prayed Philip to come and aide them: which he graunted them, and taking a ſupply of THESSALIANS with him, he came to LOCRIDE with a good armie, and put himſelfe in order to end this warre at one battell. But Phallecus Generall of the PHOCIANS, finding himselfe not strong enough to fight with him, sent vnto him to treat a peace: so he was suffered to go safely with his men whither he would. Whereupon vnder the assurance of this peace, he retired with eight thousand men into PELOPONNESVS. The PHOCIANS then left without all hope, yeelded themselues to Philips discretion. Thus hauing ended this holy war without stroke striken, beyond all mens opinion, he called a councell of the BOEOTIANS and THESSALIANS: in the which it was determined that there should be an assembly of parliament of the Amphictyons, vnto whom they would wholly referre themselues for deciding of this matter. Whereupon the Commissioners for the parliament of the Amphictyons were assembled, and there among other actes it was ordained, that from thencefoorth it should be lawfull for Philip and all of his race to sit in this councell of the Amphictyons, and that they should haue the two voyces which the PHOCIANS (by him lately conquered) had before. Also, that he and his thencefoorth should haue the gouernment and superintendancie of the sports PYTHIANS, with the BOEOTIANS and THESSALIANS. Because the CORINTHIANS had bene partakers with the sacriledge of the PHOCIANS. The rest of their decrees concerned those of PHOCIDE, the safetie of the temple of DELPHES, and the vnion of the GREEKES. Philip hauing broken vp the armories of the PHOCIANS and of the straungers that had fought in their pay, he defaced their townes, and made them sell their horses. After he had receiued of the Amphictyons the greatest honour and thankes they could deuise, he returned into his realme of MACEDON, hauing wonne him the name of a deuout and valiant Prince, and layed the foundations of the greatnesse vnto the which his sonne Alexander came afterwards. For he singularly desired to be chosen Captaine generall of all GREECE, with full power and authoritie to make warre with the king of PERSIA, as he did. Furthermore, the hereditarie quarrels he had against the SLAVONS, being as irreconciliable, he entred with his armie into SLAVONIA, where hauing spoiled a great part of that countrie, and taken many townes, he returned backe into MACEDON laden with bootie. After that he went into THESSALIE, and draue out the tyrants there, which held the townes in subiection. By this meanes he wanne the hearts of the THESSALIANS, whom indeed he had great care to vse well, hoping that if the THESSALIANS remained his faithfull friends, he should easily gaine the other GREEKES to desire his friendship, and so it happened: for the people neighbours to THESSALY, did presently enter into league with him. Soone after that, he led his army into THRACIA to represse Cersobleptes, who troubled all the townes of HELLESPONT next adioyning to his realme. When he had beaten the THRACIANS in diuers encounters, he compelled the vanquished to pay yearely vnto the MACEDONIANS, the tenth part of their reuenues, and fortifying a few good townes in the best parts of the countrie, he bridled the boldnesse of these barbarous people: whereupon the townes within those marches being deliuered from warres, they very willingly entred into league and alliance with Philip.

Thus waxing greater euery day then other, he led his armie before the city of PERINTH, because that stood against him, and tooke part with the ATHENIANS. So he laid siege vnto it, and brought his engines of battery before it, among the which there were rams of 80. foot long, and built vp towers of wood higher then the highest towers of stone that were within the towne: vpon the top whereof he maruellously annoyed the besieged: and battering the wals with these rammes, he made them fall downe in diuers places. The PERINTHIANS on the other side very lustily defended themselues, and reared vp other wals within, in place of them that were fallen down. He plyed them continually with wonderfull assaults, the assailants and assailed shewing all their possible force and endeuour. Now Philip had great Crossebowes and other engines of all sorts to kill farre off, great arrowes long and sharpe at the end, which did wound those that came to the cranewes of the walles, and those that were besieged lost many of their men euery day. But at the length, they were supplied with armes and men whom the BYZANTINES sent vnto them: whereupon equalling their enemies, they beganne to be couragious againe, and resolutely offered themselues vnto any daunger for defence of their countrey. For all this, the batterie begun discontinued not, and Philip deuiding his men into diuers troups gaue them many assaults, continued by turnes one in the necke of another night and day. Which he might easily do, considering he had thirtie thousand fighting men in his campe, with an inestimable number of missile weapons, with engines to bestow great shot a farre off, and of all sorts of engines to beate downe townes, with the which he wonderfully plagued and hurt the besieged. Neuertheless, the siege drew on in length, and many of the townes men died, besides those thoſe that were hurt and wounded: and becauſe that victuals alſo waxed ſcant amongſt them: ſo that they hourely looked for no other thing, but to take PERINTH. But it fell out cleane contrarie: for the fame of Philips greatneſſe being blowne abroad throughout all ASIA, the king of PERSIA being affrayed of ſuch a power, writ vnto his Lieutenants vpon the ſea coaſtes, that they ſhould aide the PERINTHIANS all they could poſſible. Thereupon his Satrapes hauing conſulted of this matter together, ſent vnto the beſieged a great ſupply of men of warre, ſtore of gold and ſiluer, plentie of corne, of armes, and of all other neceſſarie prouiſions for the warres. The BYZANTINES on the other ſide ſent them the beſt experienced Captaines and ſouldiers they had. By this meanes the two forces of the beſiegers and the beſieged being equall of new againe, the warre began to be hotter then before. For Philip beating at the walles without ceaſe with his rammes, made very great breaches, and with his engines to ſhoot farre off, kept them that none durſt ſtay at the cranewes of the walles: and at one inſtant made his men to giue an aſſault at the breaches of the walles throwne downe, and cauſed others to ſcale the walles that were yet ſtanding whole, and ſo fighting with their ſwords, many were ſlaine in the place, and others ſore wounded, both valiantly fighting for the reward and honour of victorie. The MACEDONIANS hoped to haue the ſacke of a rich and wealthie citie, and more then that, to haue goodly preſents of the king. They that were beſieged on the other ſide, ſetting before them all the calamities and miſeries of the taking of a citie, did luſtily endure any paines and daunger to preuent ſo great a miſchiefe. Beſides that, the ſituation of the towne was a great helpe vnto them, not onely to hope well, but alſo that in the end they ſhould be maiſters. For the towne of PERINTH ſtood all vpon the ſea ſide, vpon a hauen of halfe an Iſland that ſtood of a great height, and this hauen was about halfe a quarter of a league long. The houſes there were very narrow and high, and becauſe they ſtood high vpon the hanging of the coaſt, all the towne being vnderneath it on the ground, they were built much higher then thoſe that ſtood beneath: ſo to ſee them aboue, they ſhewed like the degrees of ſeates in a Theater. And although that they without did ſtill beate downe ſome part of the wall: that vantaged them nothing for all that. For thoſe within did nothing elſe but mure vp the entrance into the ſtreetes which were narrow, and they alwaies defended themſelues making rampers before the low houſes, as if they had bene the beſt wals in the world.

So Philip hauing gotten the outward walles of the towne, with all the troubles and daungers poſſible: he found other walles readie built ſtronger then the other, as if they had bene done of purpoſe, beſides that the BYZANTINES did alwaies furniſh them with any thing they wanted. Philip conſidering this, deuided his army into two, and left the halfe of them to continue the ſiege, vnder the charge of the beſt captaines he had: and taking with him the other halfe, he went to beſiege BYZANCE it ſelfe, and gaue it a moſt braue aſſault: wherat the BYZANTINES were amazed, becauſe their ſouldiers, their armes, and all other their neceſſarie prouiſions for warre were in the citie of PERINTH. But the ATHENIANS ſent them immediatly an army by ſea to aide them, as alſo thoſe did of CHIO, of RHODES, and out of other places. Chares went thither ſent by the ATHENIANS, but he did nothing of worth, nor worthy of the fleet he brought thither: becauſe he was ſuſpected of his friends, and deſpiſed of his enemies. So that they ſent Phocion thither, who before that time had fought brauely with Philip in the Ile of EVBOEA, (which he thought to haue won by means of traitours) had ouercome the MACEDONIANS in battel, and had done many other notable exploits. Howbeit after his departure, Philip being the ſtronger, departing from thence came to beſiege PERINTH, and after that BYZANCE, into the which Phocion entred with his troupes: who did ſo valiantly in all fights and aſſaults, that Philip (who before that time was thought ſo terrible in armes that none could reſiſt him, neither durſt any man preſent himſelfe in battell againſt him) roſe from beſieging of PERINTH, and retired from BYZANCE and out of HELLESPONT, and did nothing but loſt much of his reputation. For, beſides the men that were killed at theſe two ſieges, he loſt ſome of his ſhippes, and many ſtrong holds, out of the which his garriſons were throwne, and his friends forraged by the ATHENIANS. This was the cauſe why he offered articles of peace, fearing the forces of the ATHENIANS, deſirous to forward his affaires ſome other way, or rather to meddle no more with them. Phocion counſelled the ATHENIANS to hearken vnto it, and to accept the conditions vnto the which Philip ſubmitted himſelfe. But the Counſellers (eſpecially Demoſthenes) that bare the ſway at that time, moued the ATHENIANS to a new league, the which Demoſthenes prepared againſt Philip: who bethinking himſelfe, determined to employ all his meanes to ſubdue the cities all at once, to the end that he might afterwards paſſe further. So he leauied an armie with great ſpeed, and hauing ouercome certaine troupes of the townes in league together neare vnto AMPHISE, he marched into the countrey of ELATIA, and afterwards wan PHOCIDE, and being lift vp with ſuch proſperous beginnings, he reſolued to go to ATHENS. Whereof the ATHENIANS hauing intelligence, they were ſtraight in armes euery where, the people being ſo amazed, that none durſt be ſo bold as to ſpeake, and they knew not what to do. They reiected the wiſe counſell of Phocion, of which Demoſthenes was the cauſe. Wherefore to repaire his fault, he ſtepped out and counſelled the ATHENIANS to ſeeke the friendſhip of the THEBANS. So thereupon they ſent him to put it in practiſe, and happily he obtained it, notwithſtanding all Philips oppoſitions to the contrarie: who being aſtonied more then before with theſe croſſes, which the eloquence of one man did againſt him: he ſent againe to offer the GREEKES peace. But they kept themſelues cloſe, and made ſtraunge of it, expecting the euent of all this great tempeſt: not being diſpoſed at that time to hearken to pacification. But as if the time of their bondage had bene at the gate, they refuſed all conditions, yea contemned the very oracles of DELPHES, and Demoſthenes had it often in his mouth, that the Propheteſſe did Philippizate, to wit, fauoured Philips affaires. Theſe oracles threatned both the one and the other, and eſpecially the GREEKES. Now Philip, though he ſaw he was deceiued of the friendſhip of the BOEOTIANS, yet he reſolued to fight with the one and the other. Therefore keeping his campe certaine daies, looking for the forces of his friends that were not yet come vnto him: he entred into BOEOTIA, with thirty thouſand footmen, and about two thouſand horſe. So both campes being ready to giue charge vpon each other, they both had like courage and reſolution to do well. But as touching the number of men, and skilfulneſſe of Captains, Philip did paſſe them farre: for hauing done in many places ſo many worthie exploits of armes, he was become very expert in militarie diſcipline. To the contrarie, on the ATHENIANS ſide, their beſt captaines, as Iphicrates Chabrias, and Timotheus, were dead. Phocion alſo, he neuer thought well of this warre: and the factious, they had hindred the beſt they could that he ſhould haue no charge. Then was there but Chares and Lyſicles, that were too weake to take ſuch a great charge vpon them, and were much inferiour to many of the Captaines Philip had then with him.

The day being broken, and both armies ſet in battell the one againſt the other in the plaine of CHÆRONEA: Philip placed his ſonne Alexander, comming but newly out of his infancie, in one of the points of his armie, attended vpon by the beſt captaines he had: and he placed himſelfe in the other point, with the valianteſt men in his armie, giuing order and direction in all things according to time and place. The ATHENIANS, hauing taken one of the points of their battell, left the other vnto the BOEOTIANS. So the fight began very ſharply, & many were ſlain on both ſides, and it could not be diſcerned yet whether ſide had beſt occaſion to hope of victory: vntill that Alexander at the length, deſirous to make his father ſee ſome proofe of his valor, and many other valiant men ſeeing the courage of this young Prince following him, they with him brake into the battell of the enemies, and there was a maruellous cruell ſlaughter. Philip on his ſide alſo giuing charge vpon the greateſt preſſe and multitude of his enemies, not enduring that any ſhould take the honor from him, no not his owne ſonne: ſet vpon them ſo fiercely that withſtood him, that he put them out of order, and made them flie for life. There died in this battell aboue a thouſand ATHNIANS, and there were taken priſoners to the number of two thouſand. And of the BOEOTIANS in like manner there were many killed in the field, and a great number taken. After this battell, Philip cauſed a token of triumph to be ſet vp, and ſuffered the enemies to take away the bodies of their dead, and to bury them. He made ſumptuous ſacrifices vnto his gods, to giue them thankes for his victorie: and honoured them that had done good ſeruice in this battell, euerie one according to his degree and deſert. Howbeit he committed certaine inſolencies: for after he had drunke wel with his friends, he went to the place where he dead bodies lay, and there he fell a ſinging in mockerie, the beginning of the decree which Demoſthenes had propounded, whoſe counſell they following, the ATHENIANS concluded to warre againſt him, lifting vp his voice, and keeping meaſure with his foote, Demoſthenes, the ſonne of Demoſthenes PÆANIAN ſet out this. But afterwards when he beganne a litle to come to himſelfe againe out of his drunkenneſſe, and that he had thought a little of the daunger he had bene in: then his haire began to ſtand vpright on his head,

when he entred into the conſideration of the force and vehemencie of ſuch an Orator, that had brought him in a peece of a day, to put his whole eſtate and his life to the hazard of a battell. And when the ATHENIANS ſent vnto him to treate of peace, he preſently ſet his countenance, rubbed his eye-browes, and laying aſide all madneſſe and wantonneſſe, made them a very ſober and aduiſed aunſwer. Others ſay, that he dranke too much at the feaſt of his ſacrifice, and that after ſupper he daunced and made a mommery with his minions: paſſed by the priſoners, and gaue them ſharpe taunts in mockerie, touching the misfortune of their ouerthrow: and that Demades then being one of the number, was ſo bold franckly to ſpeake a word to him which was of ſuch efficacie, as it made him refraine from his inſolencie. O king, ſayd he, being now thy fortune to play Agamemnons part, thou art not aſhamed to ſhew the deeds of Therſites. Philip finding himſelfe touched to the quicke with this word ſo well ſet, he preſently chaunged his apparell and countenance, caſt downe to the ground his garland of flowers he wore on his head, cauſed all the other ſignes of mockerie which were caried after him to be broken, and from thencefoorth began greatly to eſteeme of Demades, and would haue him about him. Demades, being paſſing eloquent aboue others of his time, did ſo well entertaine Philip, that he cauſed him to deliuer all the other priſoners of the ATHENIANS, without paying of any ranſome. And further yet, humbling the conquerours fierceneſſe, he made peace with the ATHENIANS, but put a garriſon within THEBES, and moreouer graunted peace vnto the BOEOTIANS.

But that which principally brought him to incline vnto it, was the deſire he had to be choſen Captaine generall of GRECE. And to this end he cauſed them to giue out abroad, that he would vndertake to make warre for the GREEKES againſt the PERSIANS, and to be reuenged of them for the outrages and ſacriledges which they had committed againſt the temples of the gods in GRECE: and ſought to gaine the good will and friendſhip of all the GREEKES by all kind of courteſies he could poſſibly deuiſe or thinke of, as well openly as ſecretly. So he made a motiue, that he deſired to ſpeake with the townes openly, and to communicate ſome things vnto them which concerned the good of all their common wealth in generall. And for this purpoſe there was appointed a generall aſſembly of the ſtates in GRECE in the citie of CORINTH, in the which he propounded this, to vndertake the warre againſt the PERSIANS, and putting them in great hope of happie ſucceſſe, he perſwaded the commiſſioners of euery towne, which were preſent in this aſſembly of counſell, boldly to conclude this enterpriſe. He ſolicited this matter in ſuch ſort, that the GREEKES with generall conſent choſe him their Captaine generall with ſoueraigne authority. Then he began to make great preparation for this war, and hauing made a deſcription and ſeſſe of all the contributions, as alſo the number of men of warre which euerie citie ſhould furniſh for this enterpriſe: he returned into MACEDON, and ſent from thence two of his chiefe Captaines before into ASIA, Attalus and Parmenio, with a part of his armie, commanding them to deliuer the GREEKES cities of ASIA out of bondage. But his death brake the voyage, ſo that they went not very farre. Now hitherto we haue ſeene Philips naturall diſpoſition in the middeſt of his deeds, and what is commendable and reprochfull in ſo great a Prince. But before we go further in the reſt of his life, it may peraduenture not be much impertinent, to inſert in this place, ſome of his ſentences and memorable actions, whereby he may be the better diſcerned, to compare him afterwards with the others. For mens words and faſhions amongſt their familiars, be the very liuely tables of the affections and paſſions of the ſoule: being vnpoſſible for any man alwayes to counterfeit ſo, but that they may oftentimes ſee his heart at his tongues end.

So then, newes being brought him in one ſelfe day of three great proſperities: the firſt, that he had wonne the prize at the courſes of coaches with foure horſe in the ſolemnity of the Olympian games: The ſecond, that his Lieutenant Parmenio had ouercome the DARDANIANS in battell: The third, that his wife Olympiade had brought him a goodly ſonne: he lift vp his hands to heauen, and ſayd: O fortune, I beſeech thee ſend me in exchange of this, ſome reaſonable aduerſitie, againſt ſuch and ſo great happineſſe. Laſthenes an OLYNTHIAN, that for a great ſumme of money had ſold him the towne of OLYNTH, complained to him one day that ſome of his minions called him traytor. He aunſwered him againe, that the MACEDONIANS were rude plaine men, that called all things by their name. He ſeemed to repute the ATHENIANS happie men, for that they found yearely ten Captaines in their towne to be choſen: and that he to the contrary in many yeares could find but one, and that was Parmenio. After he had ouercome the GREEKES, many aduiſed him to put good and great garriſons in the townes, that they might with more ſafety be kept vnder. But he anſwered them, I had rather be called a long time courteous, then a ſhort time Lord. And when his familiars gaue him counſell, to baniſh a malicious perſon, that did nothing but ſpeake euill: he anſwered them he would not, fearing leaſt he ſhould euery where elſe ſpeake euill of him. There was an ACHAIAN called Arcadion, that made profeſſion to ſpeake euill of him euerie where, and warned euery man to flie ſo farre from Philip, as none could tell there what man he was. Arcadion being by chance met in MACEDON, the courtiers would haue had Philip to haue puniſhed him, and not to let him eſcape out of his hands. Philip to the contrary ſpake him faire, and ſent him preſents to his lodging. Shortly after, he commaunded they ſhould make inquiry what talke Arcadion had of him among the GREEKES. Euery man brought him word, that he did wonderfully commend and praiſe him whereſoeuer he came. Then ſayd Philip vnto them, I am a better phiſition for euill ſpeech then you are. Another time in the aſſembly of the Olympian games, as the GREEKES ſpake euill of him, his friends ſayd, that ſuch ill ſpeakers would be ſeuearely puniſhed, to ſpeake ſo much euill of him that had done them ſo much good. Nay, but what would they do then, anſwered he, if we did hurt them? Smicythus did often accuſe Nicanor vnto him, telling him that he did nothing elſe but ſpeake euill of Philip: ſo that his beſt familiars thought it good he ſhould be ſent for, and be puniſhed according to his deſerts. Yea but (replied he) Nicanor is one of the honeſteſt men of MACEDON: were it not better therefore to inquire whether the fault be in vs, or not? And foorthwith hauing made diligent ſearch whence this diſcontentment of Nicanor came, he found that he was a man oppreſſed with extreme pouerty, and that no man would relieue him in his neceſſity: whereupon he ſent him immediatly a good preſent. Afterwards Smicythus brought word, that Nicanor euery where ſpake great praiſes of Philip. See then, ſayd he, how it dependeth vpon our ſelues to be well ſpoken of. He was wont alſo to ſay, that he was much beholding vnto the connſellors of ATHENS, for that they ſpeaking euill of him, were cauſe to make him an honeſt man of word and deed. For, ſayd he, I do daily enforce my ſelfe both in my deeds and words to make them lyers. He ſent home (as hath bene ſpoken before) all the ATHENIANS priſoners at the battell of CHÆRONEA, without paying any ranſome, and yet moreouer they asked for their beds, their apparell, and all their baggage, and complained of the MACEDONIANS, becauſe they did not deliuer it vnto them. When Philip heard of this, he fell a laughing, and ſayd to them that were neare about him: How ſay you, do not you thinke theſe ATHENIANS ſuppoſe they were ouercome by vs at the play at bones? He ſaid alſo that they which gaue him counſell to deale ſharply with the ATHENIANS, were men of an ill iudgement, to counſell a Prince that did and ſuffered all things for glory, to deſtroy the Theater of glory, which was the city of ATHENS, by reaſon of learning. There was a great number of priſoners taken at a battell, and he was preſent to ſee them ſold by the drumme, ſitting in his chaire, his gowne being turned vp alitle higher then was decent. Then there was one of the priſoners that was a ſelling, that cried out a loud vnto him, I beſeech thee, ô king, to pardon me that I be not ſold: for I am thy friend from father to the ſonne. Philip asked him, how and from whence this friendſhip ſhould come betweene vs? I will tell thee in thy eare, anſwered the priſoner. Philip commaunded they ſhould bring him to him. Then the priſoner comming neare to him, told him ſoftly: O king, let thy gowne fall downe before alitle: for as thou ſitteſt, thou ſheweſt that that is vnfit to be ſeene. Then ſpake Philip aloud to his men, Deliuer him, and let him go: for he is indeed one of my friends and wel-willers, but I had forgotten it. Such was his behauiour to his enemies, and thoſe that ſpake euill of him.

Let vs now ſpeake ſomewhat of his iuſtice, and of diuerſe other affections worthie to be noted in him: the which do appeare ſomething in his words, and by the effects that followed. And they do ſhew more & more that this prince had learned very much with Epaminondas, but aboue all, to be nobly minded, patient, and deſirous of honour without ſhame: qualities that had bene much more excellent in him, if he had not made ſuch marchandize with wicked men, as he did that ſold their country, beſides that they ſaw in him an ardent ambition: as alſo in that he coueted to be Captaine generall of all the GREEKES, and the triumphs preceding his death, and all his life do ſhew. And to this purpoſe, he counſelled his ſonne Alexander to ſpeake graciouſly vnto the MACEDONIANS, to winne their good wils, whileſt he had leiſure now to be

courteous vnto them, another raigning in the kingdome: as if he would haue ſayd, that when he came to be king, he ſhould carie the grauitie of a maiſter and of a Lord, and that he ſhould do iuſtice. He gaue him counſell alſo to ſeeke to get the loue of thoſe that bare credite and authoritie in good townes, as well of the wicked as of the good, that he might afterwards vſe the good, and abuſe the euill. But now to returne to his iuſtice againe: Being a Iudge betweene two bad men, he ordained that the one ſhould flie out of MACEDON, and the other ſhould runne after him. It is reported of him, that he had gotten together a number of the wickedeſt and moſt diſorderedſt men that were in his time, whom he lodged all together in a towne which he had cauſed to be built, and called it PONEROPOLIS, the towne of knaues. He had on a time beſtowed the office of a Iudge vpon one recommended vnto him by Antipater: but vnderſtanding afterwards that he vſed to paint his haires and beard, he tooke it from him, ſaying, that he that vſed deceipt in his haire, would hardly deale truly in a good cauſe. Machetas pleaded a cauſe on a time before him whileſt he ſlept, ſo that not conceiuing nor vnderſtanding well the matter, he wrongfully condemned him. Whereupon Machetas began to cry out, that he did appeale. Philip being angred at that word, asked him preſently vnto whom he did appeale from him? Before thy ſelfe, ô king aunſwered he, when thou art awake, and wilt giue good care to conceiue of my fact. Theſe words touched Philip to the quicke, whereupon he roſe vp on his feete, and calling himſelfe better to mind, knew that he had wronged Machetas in his ſentence, and yet neuertheleſſe he would not reuoke his iudgement: howbeit he himſelfe with his owne mony diſcharged the matter, whereupon the ſute was brought before him. Harpalus had a kinſman and friend of his called Crates, attainted and conuicted of great crimes. He beſought Philip that paying the fine, ſentence ſhould not be pronounced againſt this Crates, that he might auoide the ſhame and diſgrace. But Philip anſwered him againe, It is better he ſhould beare his owne blame and diſcredit, then I for him. A ſouldier of his, a valiant man of his hands, hauing by falſe report obtained of him the gift and forfeiture of the goods of a MACEDONIAN: it fortuned that the MACEDONIAN ill willing to put vp ſuch an outrage, bewrayed vnto Philip the vnthankfulneſſe of the ſouldier whoſe life he had ſaued. Philip was ſo offended with the villanie of this ſouldier, that after he had reuoked his gift, he made him quaile in ſuch ſort, that his wickedneſſe was knowne of euerie one, and the MACEDONIAN reſtored againe to all his goods. A poore old woman being in ſute of law, beſought him to giue iudgement, and preſſed him continually: but he excuſed himſelfe, and told her he was not at leiſure to heare it. The old woman cried out aloud: Leaue then to be king. He being aſtonied and liuely pricked with this word, did heare her, and all others in order. As for his friends, Philo a Gentleman of THEBES had done him many pleaſures at the time when he remained in hoſtage in the citie of THEBES: for he was lodged in his houſe, and after that he would neuer receiue any gifts or preſents of him. Whereupon Philip ſayd vnto him: Take not from me the title and honour of inuincible, being ouercome by thee of courteſie and liberality. Word being brought him of the death of Hipparchus, borne in the Ile of EVBOEA, he was very ſory: and as one that ſtood by told him, he was ripe, and ready to dye for age: Yea, ſayd he againe, for himſelfe, but not for me, to whom he is dead too ſoone: for he is dead before he receiued any recompence of me, worthy the friendſhip he bare me. As touching houſhold matters, he fell out on a time with his wife Olympias, and his ſonne Alexander: in which time of his anger, Demaratus a Gentleman of CORINTH went to viſite him. Philip then asked him, how, and after what manner the GREEKES liued one with another. Truly, aunſwered Demaratus, thou careſt much for the peace and vnion of the GREEKES, ſince the perſons that touch thee ſo nearely, and thoſe whom thou oughteſt to make moſt account of, are ſo ſeparated from thee. This word made him conſider ſo well of it, that afterwards he appeaſed his anger: the cauſe thereof is ſhewed in the beginning of Alexanders life, and ſo reconciled himſelfe vnto them. Being told him that his ſonne Alexander miſliked it, and complained that he begot baſtards of other women: he told him, Since thou ſeeſt now that thou ſhalt haue manie competitours with thee for the kingdome after my death: endeuour thy ſelfe to be an honeſt man, that thou mayeſt come to the crowne not ſo much through me, being mine heire, as through thy ſelfe, for that thou art worthie. He perſwaded him much, diligently to ſtudie Philoſophie vnder Ariſtotle, to the end, ſayd he, thou do not many things that I haue done, whereof now I hartily repent me. Being on a time fallen backward, lying all alongſt the place where they exerciſe wreſtling: and wallowing vp and downe, as if he had ſeene the figure and print of his body in the duſt: O Hercules, ſayd he, how litle quantity of ground will ſerue vs by nature, and yet we couet to inhabite all the world. He would on a time lodge his campe in a faire ground: but being told that there was no forrage for the beaſts, he was conſtrained to diſlodge from thence, ſaying, What is our life, ſince we muſt take care euen to place Aſſes? There was an hoſt of his that on a time bad him to ſupper with him. So, as he was going, he met diuerſe by the way, whom he caried thither with him. Whereupon perceiuing his hoaſt was much troubled, becauſe he had not meate inough to feede ſo many mouthes: Philip ſeeing it, ſent ſecretly to tell euery one in their eares whom he brought with him, that they ſhould keepe a place in their ſtomacke for the tart. The other beleeuing that he ſpake in earneſt, did forbeare to eate, whereby there was meate inough for them all. That which is alreadie ſayd, is ſufficient to make vs know the naturall diſpoſition of this great Prince: whoſe end we are now about to deſcribe vnto you. He vndertaking to paſſe into Asia, to make war with the Persians, in the ſtate of Captaine generall of the Greekes: being deſirous his voyage ſhould be fauoured of the gods he asked of the propheteſſe of Delphes, whether he ſhould ouercome the king of Persia? She anſwered him:

This oracle being doubtfull and obſcure, Philip tooke it for his aduantage: as if Apollo had told him, that the king of Persia ſhould be ſlaine by him, as an oblation of ſacrifice. But cleane contrary, the oracle threatned him with death in a day of a ſolemne feaſt: and that he ſhould be ſlaine as a bull, whom they crowne with garlands and hats of flowers, when they go about to ſacrifice him. Notwithſtanding ſuppoſing that the gods did fauour his enterpriſe, he was very pleaſant, perſwading himſelfe that Asia ſhould ſhortly be tributarie to Macedon. So he prepared ſumptuous and magnificent ſacrifices in honour of the gods, and made preparation for the mariage of his daughter Cleopatra. Now he being deſirous to draw to this feaſt as many Greekes as he could poſſible, to that end made proclamation euery where, that there ſhould be games of prize for learning, and muſicke, and ſent to ſummon all his hoſts and friends, in what part of Grece ſoeuer they were, to come to this mariage: and commaunded the Lords of his Court that they ſhould do the like for their part. For he deſired to ſhew the Greeks all ſignes of friendſhip, and to make them the beſt cheare that could be poſſible, in recompence of the honour they had done him, to chooſe him their Captaine generall. There was a wonderfull aſſembly of people from all parts at this feaſt, and the mariage was ſolemnized betwixt Alexander king of Epirvs and Cleopatra, and the games alſo at Æges acitie of Macedon. Where not onely Philips priuate friends, and the moſt notable men of the Greekes, but alſo the principall and chiefeſt townes of Grece (and among others Athens) gaue him preſents of many rich crownes of gold. The decree of the people preſenting a crowne of gold, and openly proclaimed by a herald, the effect of it was: that if it hapned any man hauing conſpired or attempted ought againſt the perſon of king Ppilip, ſhold flie to Athens in hope of priuiledge there: that he ſhould be deliuered into the hands of the king. In the middeſt of this great feaſt at the mariage, there was an excellent player of tragedies, called Neoptolemus, that rehearſed verſes touching the enterpriſe of Philip: and as if he had meant to haue reproued the pride of the king of Persia, he liuely touched that of his maiſter Philip, and before he was ware, foretold his death in couert termes, and which might be applied (as alſo Philip did, blinded and aſtonied with his proſperity) vnto the eſtate, and vnto the king of Persia. Among other verſes the beginning of it was very neare to this effect:

Surmount all hautineſſe that is Within this earthly vale ſo wide:
Promiſe thy ſelfe a worldly bliſſe,
And proſperous life for euer ſure,
Yet canſt thou now no longer dure.
For ſome already haue begun
Thy ruine, which thou canſt not ſhun.
And death neare to that breaſt of thine
Shall ſhortly breake off thy deſigne.

The

The day after this royall mariage the games began to be played, and the people ranne from all parts to the Theater to ſee them, euen vntill it was darke night. And in the morning at the breake of day there was a proceſſion, in the which among many other ſumptuous and magnificent ſhewes, they caried the images of twelue principall gods of GREECE, wonderfull cunningly wrought with great art: and then after them was borne the image of Philip for the thirteenth, as if he would haue placed himſelfe in ranke with his gods. When the Theater was full ſet with people, Philip himſelfe came in the end, apparelled all in white, hauing commanded all his gard to follow him a farre off: deſirous to ſhew the GREEKES, that becauſe of the great confidence he had of their faithfull friendſhip, he thought he needed no gard for his body. But at that time he was put to death after a ſtrange ſort: and that we may know by what occaſion, we will take the matter further off.

There was in his court a MACEDONIAN gentleman, called Pauſanias, borne in the countrey of ORESTIDE, one of the gentlemen penſioners of Philips gard, that ſometime was beloued for his beauty. He perceiuing that the king loued another, whoſe name was as himſelfe, Pauſanias: began to gall him with iniurious words, calling him Androgyne (as much to ſay, as womaniſh man) and reproued him that he abandoned his body to any that would. This ſecond Pauſanias, very impatiently bare theſe words in his heart, yet made no reply to them, but onely imparted vnto his friend called Attalus what he meant to do, and within few dayes after loſt his life after a notable manner. Philip fought a battell with the SLAVONS, in the which this young man behaued himſelfe very valiantly, right before the perſon of Philip, and receiued vpon his body all the blowes they ſtrake at him, ſo that he died in the field. This valiantneſſe of his being blowne abroad through the army, Attalus, that then was in great fauour with the king, intreated the firſt Pauſanias to come and ſuppe with him, and hauing made him drunke, he left his bodie to all the horſe-keepers and moyletters to be carnally abuſed. His drunkenneſſe hauing left him, he was ſo grieued at his heart for the outrage Attalus had done him, that he went and complained to the king himſelfe. Philip was maruellouſly offended withall, becauſe of the villany that was offered him. But becauſe of the loue he bare to Attalus, and alſo for that he ſtood in need of his ſeruice, and for that he was vncle of Cleopatra, the laſt and well beloued wife of Philip, and appointed his Lieutenant for the warre of ASIA, he made as though he knew it not. But to appeaſe Pauſanias, he gaue him great preſents, and placed him amongſt the number of them of the gard about his perſon. Pauſanias hauing made his complaint to Olympias, vnto Alexander, and to ſome other, had ſundrie aunſwers, but no iuſtice at that time. Wherefore keeping this deſpite in his heart, he reſolued not onely to be reuenged of him which had done him this iniurie, but alſo of Philip that would do him no iuſtice. But to further him in this diuelliſh purpoſe, amongſt others a Rhetoritian called Hermocrates did ſet him on, whom Pauſanias frequented to learne of him. Diſcourſing one day together, he asked him how a man might in a ſhort time make himſelfe famous, to be ſpoken of of euerie bodie? Hermocrates aunſwered, in killing one that had done many great things. For, ſayd he, it is of neceſſitie that remembring his facts, the name of him that killed him muſt alſo be compriſed. Pauſanias applying that to the purpoſe of his anger, hauing no patience to prolong time, his heart being ſo full of choler and griefe: determined with himſelfe to execute his enterpriſe the ſame day the playes ſhould be: the which he did, as followeth. He layed horſes readie at the gate of the Theater, and went about it, hauing a ſword vnder his downe after the faſhion of the GAVLES as they weare it. When the time was come that Philip would himſelfe go to the Theater, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen that attended vpon him, went into the Theater before him, who had commaunded all the Gentlemen of his gard to come a good way behind him. Then Pauſanias ſeeing Philip going all alone, ranne to him, and gaue him ſuch a blow with his ſword ouerthwart his flankes, that he ranne him through and through, ſo that he fell downe ſtarke dead. The blow being giuen, he ranne away ſtraight vnto his horſe, and ſome of the gard ranne to Philip, others ſwiftly followed the murtherer, among which was Leonidas, Perdiccas, and Attalus. Howbeit Pauſanias that had gotten the ſtart before, had eaſily mounted on horſe-backe before the others could haue come neare him to ouertake him, had it not bene that in the way as he fled, he ſtumbled at the roote of a vine, which ouerthrew him. Then Perdiccas and the reſt lighted on him as he roſe, and thruſting at him, killed him in the place. Behold how Philip, that was the greateſt king in his time of EVROPE, and for the great-neſſe of his power, placed himſelfe among the gods: was brought low euen to rancke with the weakeſt of the world, and died being but ſixe and fortie yeares old, hauing raigned 24 yeares. That therfore whereof he gloried moſt, was in his skill of warres, and in the actions which he managed brauely: preferring that farre aboue all his exploits of warre. For, ſayd he, in victory all that fight in the battell haue their part: but in thoſe things that I haue atchiued vnto, hauing wiſely directed them, none is partaker of the honour but my ſelfe only. He had fiue wiues, the firſt was Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of the MOLOSSIANS, of the line of Æacus, of whom were borne, Alexander ſurnamed the Great, and Cleopatra. Alexander ſucceeded his father: and for Cleopatra, ſhe was maried to her vnckle Alexander, king of EPIRVS, and brother of Olympias. The ſecond wife of Philip was Audate, a Lady of SLAVONIA, of whom he had a daughter called Cyne, maried vnto Amyntas his coſin germaine: who being ſlain, ſhe was betrothed vnto Lagarus, king of the AGRIANIANS, who died before conſummation of mariage. After the death of Alexander the Great, ſhe being of a manly courage, and oppoſing her ſelfe againſt thoſe that would depriue the children of Alexander of the crowne of MADEDON: was ſlaine by Perdiccas commandement. The third was Phila: and the fourth was called Mede, the daughter of the king of THRACIA. Theſe two had neither of them any children. And laſtly being too old to marry, he maried Cleopatra, the daughter of Hippoſtratus and Attalus neece: at the mariage of whom he would haue killed his ſonne Alexander, for throwing a cup at Attalus head: after the which followed great trouble, and foule ſtirre betwixt Philip, Olympias, and Alexander: but Demaratus the CORINTHIAN ſalued all that againe. Of this laſt wife, he firſt had a daughter called Europe, and then a ſonne called Caranus, whom Olympias put to a cruell death. For his concubines, the one called Arſinoe, being gotten with child by Philip, ſhe fell into Lagus hands, vnto whom ſhe gaue Ptolomie afterwards king of EGYPT. The ſecond was a girle of LARYSSENE, called Philinna, of whom he begat Aridæus: who firſt of all was poyſoned, and in the end cruelly murthered by Olympias: being the laſt king of the race of Temenides in MACEDON. For the iſſue of Alexander, they were reiected by Caſſander. The third was Nicaſipolis, a woman of THESSALY, and Iaſons ſiſter, tyrant of PHERES: of whom he had a daughter called Theſſalonica, whom Caſſander maried, and was afterwards ſlaine by Antipater. The end of Alexander, of his mother, and of his children and ſucceſſours, was lamentable in diuerſe ſorts. And thus we ſee in Philip and in his race, how many wayes the high Iudge of the world hath in his power and hand to ouerthrow the greateſt, when they are drunke with their proſperity.

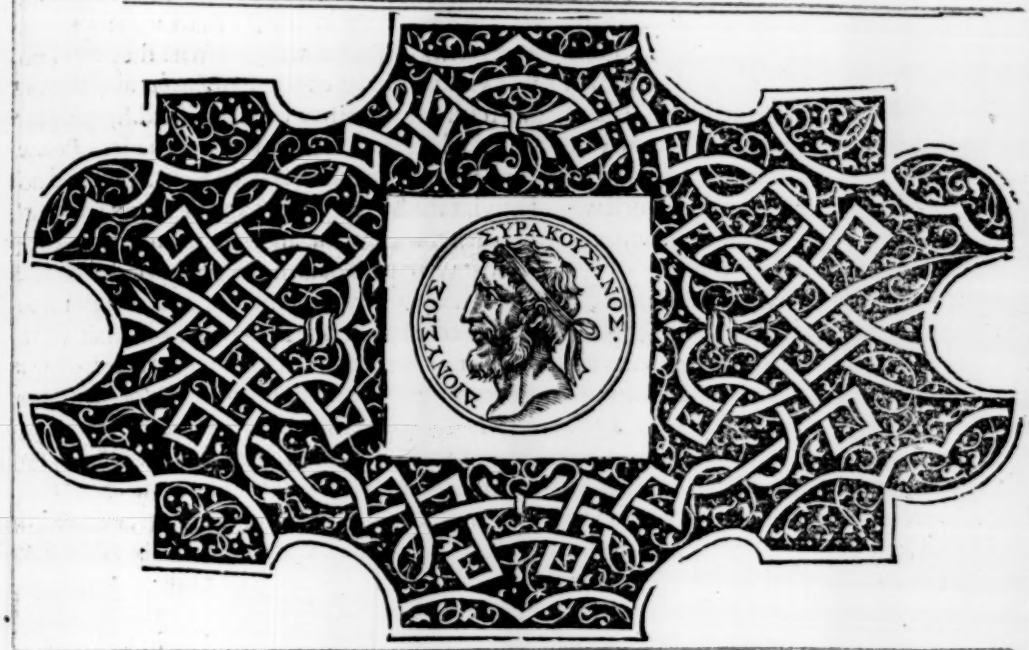
THE LIFE OF

Dionyſius.



Baſe Tyranny is wrongs vnhappy mother,
Witneſſe this wretch, in ſhew both graue and wiſe:
Yet he himſelfe beguiling, and each other,
Shew'd that his heart was fierce, and full of vice.

IN the ſecond year of the ſecond Olympiad, Archias a CORINTHIAN, not daring to returne againe into his citie for a foule fact committed by him in the perſon of an honeſt youth called Actēō: he tooke the ſea, and ſailed into SICILIA with certaine CORINTHIANS and DORIANS, and there built the city of SYRACVSA, the which by proceſſe of time became ſo great, that it had within it as it were foure townes, of the which the one was called the Ile, the ſecond Acradine, the third Tychè, and the laſt Neapolis: the one neare vnto the other, with a fort called Hexapyle, which commanded all the other, and it was in the top of a high place which they called Epipoles, as much to ſay, as ouer all the other townes. It was gouerned at the firſt, by the commaund and power of Archias onely: but he being killed by Telephus, whom he had abuſed in his infancie, the SYRACVSANS gathered together of diuerſe parts, brought their eſtate to Ariſtocratia, which flouriſhed for a time. But being come to paſſe that Tyndaris one of the Lords of the towne caried himſelfe after ſuch a manner, that he made many iealous that his drift and pollicy was to make himſelfe chiefe Lord: the other Lords made a law called Petaliſme, to meete with this practiſe: howbeit it was that that increaſed his enterpriſe. The effect of this law was, that the name of him that aſpired to make himſelfe abſolute Lord of the city, ſhould be written in an oliue leafe, the which being put into the hand of this Lord, without further ceremony it was to tell him that he was baniſhed the city for fiue yeares, much after the faſhion that is reported of the Oſtraciſme of the ATHENIANS. By meanes of this Petaliſme, the Lords baniſhed one another, ſo that in the end, the people became Lord. But hereupon a dangerous ſedition happening amongſt them, Gelo, Lord of the city of GELE, did ſo wiſely looke into the troubles of the SYRACVSANS: that they choſe him king in the ſecond yeare of the threeſcore and twelfth Olympiade. After him ſucceeded Hieron, who at the beginning caried himſelfe very euill: but afterwards falling into acquaintance with the Poets Simoni- des, Pindarus, and Bacchylides, which taught him many good things, he raigned very prudently. So, he hauing raigned about twelue yeares, left his brother Thrasybulus his succeſſor: who for his cruelties and inſolencies was driuen out of Syracvsa by force, and went to Locres, and there ended the reſt of his daies. Then the Syracvsans eſtabliſhed the gouernment of Lords, which continued ſixtie yeares: in which time they make warre with the Agrigentines, and compelled them to ſue for peace: they deſtroy the Trinacrians and their town: they ſet vpon the Leontines, which are aided by the Athenians vnder the conduct of Laches and Carceadas, who behaued themſelues ſo euill, that at their returne home they were baniſhed. Shortly after the new troubles betwixt the Syracvsans and the Leontines, the Athenians ſent Phaax into Sicilia to kindle the fire a litle, and to mutine the one againſt the other. Howbeit it had no good ſucceſſe, but rather raiſed a cruell warre betwixt the Syracvsans and Athenians, in the which at the laſt Nicias and Demoſthenes were ouercome by ſea and land both, and afterwards put to death, and the ſouldiers of Athens that were priſoners moſt cruelly vſed. The Syracvsans lift vp with this victorie, did put downe their Lordly gouernment, and brought it to a popular ſtate againe. Then thinking to be reuenged of the Carthaginians that were come to the aide of the Segestans againſt the Selinontines, which were their friends: they ſent Diocles with foure thouſand good men againſt Hannibal the ſonne of Giſco, who lay in campe at that time before Himera, the which he wan after he had ouercome Diocles, and ſlaine the moſt part of his troupes. The Syracvsans caſting their anger for this loſſe vpon Hermocrates one of their chiefeſt citizens, they baniſhed him with the Petaliſme, and draue him out of the towne. He helping himſelfe with the meanes he had in his hand, made vp and armed fiue gallies, and afterwards with certaine baniſhed men of Himera, attempted to put in againe into Syracvsa. But ſeeing he could not preuaile, he landed and poſſeſſed the ruined towne of Selinonte, he repaired it, called home againe all the inhabitants diſperſed through Sicilia, fortified himſelf there, and in few daies got together a troupe of ſixe thouſand men. With theſe forces he ſet vpon them of Palerme, and of Motye, in league with the Carthaginians, ouercame them in a pitched field, maintained his friends, and followed his victorie. The Syracvsans hearing good report of Hermocrates valour, began to repent them that they had ſo diſhonourably vſed him. He on the other ſide being aduertiſed by his friends of the good affection of the citizens vnto him: to win their good fauour againe, he was very carefull to gather together the bones of thoſe that were killed by Hymera vnder the leading of Diocles, and ſent them to Syracvsa, in carts very richly ſet out. For all this they ſent not for him home, the Syracvsans being affraid of him, for that he was a man of ſuch courage and wiſedome, leſt he ſhould make himſelfe Lord of the towne. He ſeeing himſelfe thus refuſed, went backe to Selinonte, and ſhortly after being ſollicited by his friends, he found meanes by night to come into Syracvsa, and poſſeſſed the Acradine. The Syracvsans tooke armes immediatly, fought with Hermocrates, killed him in the great market place with part of his traine, and baniſhed thoſe that fauoured him. His friends ſaued ſome of them from the violence of the citizens, and amongſt others Dionyſius the ſonne of Hermocrates, a plaine citizen of Syracvsa, whoſe life we preſently write of.

Now it is reported, that his mother being with child of him, dreamed that ſhe was brought to bed of a Satyre, and that the Soothſayers being asked their opinion, anſwered, ſhe ſhould haue a ſonne that ſhould be famous aboue all the Greeks. Furthermore, a young gentlewoman of Syracvsa called Himera, ſome time before Dionyſius made himſelf Lord of the city, dreamed that ſhe was taken vp to heauen, by a guide that hauing caried her too and fro, in the end brought her before Iupiter, at whoſe feet ſhe ſaw a yong man with a yelow haire, bound with iron chains: and asking her guide what he was: It is, ſaid the other, the cruell ſcourge of Sicilia and Italie, the which ſhall ſpoile a great countrie, aſſoone as his bolts be off his feet. Within few yeares after, Dionyſius hauing alreadie ſeized vpon the eſtate, as he came to make his entrie into Syracvsa, and that the citizens went out to meet him to do him honor: Himera being there by chaunce, knew him, and ſtraight cried out: This was the young man that ſhe ſaw in heauen. This being reported to Dionyſius, he cauſed them to kill this young damoſell. Another time his horſe falling in the mire that he could not get out, Dionyſius left him faſt there: but the poore beaſt with ſtrugling got himſelfe out, and ranne after his maiſter: bringing in his maine a ſwarme of bees. This did hearten him, eſpecially through the counſell of his ſoothſayers, to follow his purpoſe to ſubdue due his countrey: the which he obtained by this meanes. The CARTHAGINIANS desirous to make themselues great in SICILIA, sent thither their Captaine Himilco with a great army: against whom the SYRACVSANS made head, wanne a battell, and killed sixe thousand of his men. Notwithstanding this, he went and besieged AGRIGENTE, and hauing vpon surprise ouerthrowne the army of the SYRACVSANS by sea, he enforced them that were besieged to saue themselues as they could, entred into this great rich city abandoned, and tooke the spoile of it. The AGRIGENTINES that escaped gaue the allarme through al SICILIA; & retiring themselues to SYRACVSA their friend towne, began in full assembly of the city to accuse the Captaines of SYRACVSA, saying, that by their treason the countrey was sold vnto their enemies. Dionysius, the son of Hermocrates, a yong man of a stout hart, and that did embrace great matters in his mind, being in this assembly, tooke hold of the occasion offered: and seeing the people out of countenance, he stepped forth, charged the Captaines very much, & gaue counsell that they should do iustice: whereupon the magistrates did set a fine on their heads. And hauing found Philistus inclined that way, and gotten money of him (who was very rich) to pay this fine, with promise to furnish others if they were condemned: he followed his purpose in other assemblies, hauing speech at will, & a comely maner withall, so that almost for litle or nothing, he wan the harts of the people, who moued by his orations, did casseere the old Captaines, and chose new, & among others Dionysius, who was a good souldier, & had made proofe of his valiantnesse in diuerse encounters against the CARTHAGINIANS. But after they had chosen him Captaine, he neuer came to counsell with his other companions, nor would not be acquainted with them: but vnder hand, made a foule report run abroad that they practised with the enemies. This made men of good iudgement to presume that he himselfe went about to make some alteration: and they could not forbeare to blame him for it. Neuertheless the people not looking so inwardly into it, they esteemed him very much. Herupon many assemblies were made to thinke of their affaires in wars, in one of the which Dionysius perceiuing the SYRACVSANS astonied, gaue aduice that they should call home their banished men, saying: that it was a great mockery to run into GRECE and ITALY for ayd, since they had hard at their doores such as had bene citizens, who had rather die like vagabonds, then serue the enemy. And that the fauour they should shew them, would spurre them forward to do their countrey good seruice. The wisest men durst not gainsay this aduice, perceiuing that the people did incline vnto it: that if they hindred that, it was to get as many enemies as there were banished: and that they being called home, should thanke none but Dionysius, at whose commandement they would euer be afterwards. No man speaking a word, the decree of repeale was authorised by the people, and the banished men returned to SYRACVSA. In the middest of all this businesse, letters were brought from GELE, which demanded aide. Dionysius offered himselfe straight, & was sent thither with 2000 footmen, and 400 horse. Being arriued at GELE, & finding the city in trouble, he tooke the peoples part, accused the principals, made them be put to death, & their goods forfeited. With which forfeiture he payed the ordinary garrison of GELE, and promised double pay to them that folowed him from SYRACVSA: vnto the which he returned immediatly, hauing the fauour of his souldiers. So all the people ran about him in multitudes, asking him where the enemies were, and what they did? You do not consider, sayd he, thas your enemies indeed are in your towne. They that gouerne in your estate are more to be feared, then the CARTHAGINIANS: for whilest you are busie about your playes and feasts, they deuide the common treasure among themselues, and pay not the souldiers. In the meane space Himilco prepareth himselfe to come & besiege you, whereof your gouernors make no reckning, neither do they giue any order for it. I knew this well inough before, but now I am most assured of it: for Himilco sent a trumpet vnto me, vnder colour of certaine prisoners, and secretly bad him tell me, that he wold giue me more then any other of my companions, so that I would not search him too narowly: and if so be that I would not helpe him, at the least yet that I would not hinder him. And therefore thinke with your selues to find another captaine in my place, for it is no reason whilest others sell the town to the enemies, that I should go hazard my selfe with my fellow citizens, & in danger in the end that they should thinke of me I should be partaker with the wicked practises of others. Those that heard what he spake, being maruellously offended, caried these words immediatly all about the towne. But for the present time euery one went home to their house, sad, and troubled in their minds. The morow after, as those that should speake before the people did draw by lot of letters, that they might know in order how they should speake, and that the letter F. came to his lot: some stander by told him, this F. signifieth * Foole, Dionysius, because thou wilt tell vs great follies. No, replied he quickly: that I shall be a Monarke. Presently the people being assembled, and his turne being come to speake, he accused his other companions with great vehemency, was heard very attentiuely, and with great praise of all the people, whom the day before he had angred very much: so that in the end there was some of the assembly cried out, that necessity required that Dionysius should be chosen alone Captaine generall, with all authority and soueraigne power, and that it was no tarying till the enemies be vnder our wals, and that he was a fit man to take care of this businesse: and as for the traytors, that they should thinke of them at better leisure. Hereupon the people chose Dionysius their Captaine generall, giuing him full authority, and power of the affaires of the commonwealth, and praying him to consider of all that should be expedient to resist the enemies.

He seeing his enterprise so well grounded, propoundeth a decree to the people, that the souldiers pay should be doubled ouer that it was before: for that would make them more couragious and willing to do good seruice. And as for money, that the SYRACVSANS should take no thought for that, for he knew a way how to come by it well inough. This so sudden aduancement, and his bold promises ioyned with the disposition of this young man, made many suspect him that had any vnderstanding and iudgement: in so much that some began to go and come to houses to conferre together to find meanes betimes to withstand the tyranny, which had now (as they say) put the irons in the fire. But Dionysius hauing an eye abroad, and a number of spies that slily fell into companies, being afraid they would do him some hurt, determined to prouide for it by a farre fetch to sight, but very fit to serue his turne: which was, to obtaine licence to chuse a gard for his person, vnto the which he came, as foloweth. He proclaimed in the towne that those that were able to beare armes should follow him, and to make their rende-vous with their armes at a day set downe at the towne of the LEONTINES, and bring victuals with them for one moneth. There was then in that towne a garrison of the SYRACVSANS: the banished, & all sorts of men withdrew themselues, whom Dionysius hoped would haue taken his part, for that they were men which desired nothing more then change and alteration, and perswaded himselfe that few of the SYRACVSANS would follow him. Hereupon he went himselfe into the field, and being incamped neare the towne, one caused his friends to giue the alarme, and to cry helpe, as if the enemies had enuironed him to kill him in his tent: and making as though he had bene maruellously afraid, he fled, and saued himselfe by swiftnesse within the castell of the towne, where he passed all the rest of the night, made fires all about, and sent for his soldiers in whom he put most trust, as a man that is afraid, seeing his enemies lye in waite for him. The next morning some of the people of SYRACVSA being gathered together in this towne of the LEONTINES, in open assembly he made a long discourse of that that had passed, to make them beleeue that his euill willers would haue surprised him, and could speake so well, that the people appointed him sixe hundred souldiers to gard his person, such as he himselfe would chuse out. Immediatly he chose young men to the number of a thousand which had nothing to loose, hardy and desperate to put any thing in execution that they were commaunded. These he furnished with all things necessarie, and made them great promises: so that he wanne their hearts, and got vnto him the souldiers straungers that were in the SYRACVSANS pay. Howbeit he chaunged the Captaines from their companies, and put in their places some other made to his hand. And afterwards he sent Dexipus, a wise and valiant Captaine LACEDÆMONIAN, backe againe into his countrey, of whom he stood in feare, and perceiued he would be a barre in his way to hinder that he went about. Ouer and aboue that he sent for the souldiers of the garrison of GELE, and gathered together all them that were banished, all theeues and rogues that would come and serue him, iudging them to be fit men to serue the turne he purposed. When he had gotten a great troupe of such rakehels, he straight returned to SYRACVSA, and lodged his forces in the Arsenall, and then shewed himselfe openly Lord, and tyraunt, without any longer dissimulation. This amazed and grieued the SYRACVSANS most extreamly: neuertheless they were enforced to beare this yoake which they could not helpe, because the towne was full of souldiers straungers, and for that also they were afraid of the CARTHAGINIANS that were neare vnto them with a mightie armie. All this happened, Dionysius being but fiue and twentie yeares old, in the third yeare of the ninetie three Olympiade, and in the three hundreth seauen and fortieth

yeare of the foundation of ROME. Thus you ſee how this young man of a baſe condition, meanely borne, made himſelfe Lord of one of the greateſt commonwealths in the world at that time, and continued this vſurpation all the dayes of his life, which was the ſpace of 38 yeares.

This being done, he made them all rich and wealthy that aided him in this enterpriſe, draue out all thoſe he could find that withſtood theſe his attempts, put to death before all the people Daphneus, and Demarchus, two of the chiefeſt men, and of greateſt power that were at that time in SYRACVSA, and that had moſt croſſed him of all others in the deuice of his purpoſe. Afterward, becauſe he would yet ſtrengthen himſelfe the better, he maried Hermocrates daughter, a SYRACVSAN Captaine, that ouercame Nicias and the ATHENIANS, and maried his ſiſter vnto Polyxenus, brother in law vnto Hermocrates. Whileſt things paſſed thus, the CARTHAGINIANS, being maſters of AGRIGENTE, after they had ſpoiled, burnt & razed it, they marched away with their Generall Himilco, and went and beſieged the city of GELE, friend to the SYRACVSANS, in maner of a like diſtance from SYRACVSA and AGRIGENTE, very farre in land, where the other two were ports of the ſea. The beſieged did wonderfull valiantly defend themſelues, their towne being weake and kept by the citizens onely, accompanied with their wiues and children that would not forſake them. Dionyſius hearing of their neceſſity, brought a ſtrong aide vnto them of thirtie thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſe, beſides a great number of galleys, that lay off and on vpon the Ile, to cut off victuals from Himilco, and to land alſo. But when they came to ioyne, Dionyſius hauing deuided his bands into three troupes to trouble his enemy the more, he could not do ſo well but the CARTHAGINIANS had the better, and ſlue many of his men. He very hardly eſcaping with his troupe entred into the towne, and there called his friends together to counſell what they were beſt to do. They ſeeing the place dangerous, and of great diſaduantage to hazard a battell in, gaue him counſell to retire againe. He ſent a trumpet ouer-night to Himilco, to pray him to ſurceaſe armes till the morning, that he might gather the dead bodies together to bury them. In the meane ſpace, in the firſt watch of the night, he made all the people come out of the towne, and diſlodged himſelfe about midnight, leauing there 2000 men lightly armed, commanding them to make great fires and noiſe, that the enemies might thinke that he and his men were ſtill in the towne: & that they at the breake of day ſhould come to their troupes. Dionyſius hauing eſcaped thus, came vnto CAMARINE, a towne halfe-way betwixt GELE and SYRACVSA, and commanded all the inhabitants to diſlodge and come to SYRACVSA, that they might auoide the cruelties of the CARTHAGINIANS who ſacked GELE. So, all the inhabitants of theſe two townes compelled to leaue their houſes and countrey, all the fields & high-wayes were full of women, children, and of poore people of the country. This moued the ſouldiers againſt Dionyſius, who accuſed him that he had done this of purpoſe, that he might more eaſily ſeaſe vpon the other cities of SICILIA, which ſhould be deſtroyed by the barbarous CARTHAGINIANS: and thus they complained one to another of the litle aide he had giuen to the townesmen of GELE: how the ſouldiers of his gard had dealt cowardly in their ſeruice, and ranne away without the loſſe of a man of theirs, and no body purſued after them. Vpon this diſcontentment, the ITALIAN ſouldiers that came out of ITALIE, tooke their iourney to returne home. And the men of armes of SICILIA at the firſt began to lie in waite to kill Dionyſius on the way: but ſeeing that the ſouldiers of his gard were neuer from him, nor he from thē: they departed all together, and went with ſpeed towards SYRACVSA, and found them that were left there in garriſon, lodged in the place of the Arſenal, who knew nothing what had hapned before GELE. By this meanes being entred without reſiſtance, they ſacked the pallace of Dionyſius, where they met with great riches, and did ſo villanouſly abuſe his wife, that for griefe ſhe killed her ſelfe. But about the time that they departed from the camp, Dionyſius imagining by the way what would follow after this, he choſe out certaine footmen and horſemen which he thought he might beſt truſt about his perſon, and went with all ſpeed poſſible with them to SYRACVSA, ſuppoſing he ſhould not ouercome theſe mē of armes, vnles he did as they. And euen as he thought ſo it came to paſſe: for they perſwading themſelues that Dionyſius could not well tell what courſe to take, whether to follow them, or to keepe with is army: thought they had won all, and walked vp and downe the towne telling ſtories of the cowardlineſſe of Dionyſius: who hauing marched well neare nineteene leagues at one iourney, came about midnight to the gates of ACRADINE, with about a hundred horſe, & ſix hundred footmen: and finding it ſhut, cauſed ſtore of fagots, reeds, and ſedge of the fens to be laid againſt the gate, wherewith the SYRACVSANS vſe to burne their lime, which they found there ready at hand. Whileſt this gate was a burning, his men that could not follow him ſo faſt arriued one after another. And ſo the gate being burnt he entred, & found in the market place ſome of theſe men of armes, who in haſt had ſet themſelues in order of battel: but on the ſudden they were engaged, and killed with pikes and darts. Dionyſius on the other ſide, he ran through the towne putting them all to the ſword he met here and there in the ſtreets, that were running to aid their men. And not ſtaying ſo, he entred into their houſes whom he knew to be his enemies, killed ſome of them, and draue others out of the city. The reſt of the men of armes fled, ſome here, ſome there, and the next morning all his forces arriued at SYRACVSA. But they of GELE, and of CAVARINE, being angry with him, went into the city of the LEONTINES.

In the middeſt of all theſe ſtirs and doings, the plague being hot in the campe of the CARTHAGINIANS, enforced Himilco to ſend a herauld vnto SYRACVSA to demaund peace. Dionyſius accepted it very willingly. So peace was concluded, that the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould haue the SICANIANS, beſides al the towns which they had before the war in their power: That they of SELINONTE, of AGRIGENTE, of HIMERE, of GELE, and of CAMARINE, might returne home to their houſes, dwell in their country, & in their townes without wals, paying a certaine yearely tribute vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: That the LEONTINES, thoſe of MESSINA & all other the SICILIANS ſhould be free, and enioy their liberties and priuiledges: That the SYRACVSANS ſhould remaine vnder the gouernement of Dionyſius: That the priſoners and galleys taken in this war ſhould be reſtored againe on either ſide. By meanes of this peace Dionyſius got the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, eſtabliſhed his principality ſurer then euer, and maried againe two other wiues together: the one a ſtranger of the city of LOCRES, called Doris: the other of SYRACVSA called Ariſtomache, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefe man of all the citizens. He had asked a wife of them of RHEGE, but they refuſed him, and ſcorned his tyranny: of whom he was cruelly reuenged, as we will tell you hereafter. It is reported that he maried them both in one day, and it was neuer knowne which of them he knew firſt: for the reſt, that euer afterwards he ſhewed them both a like fauour. They did ordinarily eate together with him, and both of them by turnes lay with him. They of SYRACVSA were deſirous that his wife of SYRACVSA ſhould be preferred before the ſtranger. But Doris had this good hap, to bring foorth Dionyſius eldeſt ſonne: which ſerued his turne well to defend himſelfe that ſhe was a forreiner. Ariſtomache to the contrary was maried a long time to Dionyſius and had no children: though he was very deſirous to haue one by her. Inſomuch that he put Doris mother to death, charging her that ſhe had by charmes and ſorceries kept backe Ariſtomache from conceiuing. But afterwards ſhe had children, to wit, two ſonnes, Niſæus, and Hipparinus: and two daughters, Arete, and Sophroſyne. Dionyſius the yonger, maried his ſiſter Sophroſyne: and Arete was maried vnto Thearides, brother to Dionyſius the elder: and her ſecond husband was Dion, the brother of Ariſtomache. Furthermore, conſidering that the SYRACVSANS being deliuered from the warre of the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould haue leiſure to thinke to recouer their libertie againe: and perceiuing that the quarter they called the Ile was ſtronger of ſituation, and eaſier to keepe then any other of the three: he encloſed it in with a ſtrong wall from the reſt, & built there many great and high towers, pallaces to keepe his courts, hals for his Counſell and publicke aſſemblies, goodly galleries, and ſpacious gate-houſes to containe a great number of people. And to retire himſelfe vnto vpon any ſudden emotion of the common people, he built a maruellous ſtrong caſtell, within the compaſſe whereof he incloſed the Arſenall, where might ly in docke threeſcore galleys: and there was a gate alſo to ſhut too, into the which could enter but one galley at a time. Then chuſing out the goodlieſt and beſt place of all the territorie of SYRACVSA, he deuided it among his friends, and gaue it vnto them that had charge of men of warre vnder him. That which remained, he diſtributed by equall portions vnto other inhabitants of the towne, aſwell naturall borne citizens, as ſtrangers, come from other parts to dwell at SYRACVSA, concluding vnder the name of citizens the bondmen enfranchiſed, who he called the new burgeſſes: and diſtributed to the people alſo the houſes of SYRACVSA, thoſe reſerued of the quarter of the Ile, which he gaue vnto his friends and ſouldiers.

So, hauing as he thought well aſſured his eſtate, he began to make warre vpon the free cities of SICILIA, vnder colour that they had fauoured the CARTHAGINIANS. HERBESSE, a city in firme land neare vnto the mountaines, in the hart of the countrey, was the firſt he attempted, and went and beſieged it. But the SYRACVSANS that were a great number in this army, and well appointed, began to haue ſecret meetings, and to blame themſelues, for that they ioyned not with the men of armes to driue out this tyraunt. He whom Dionyſius had giuen them for their captaine called Doricus, was ware of their conferences, and threatned one that ſpake louder then the others: who replyed ſo fiercely againe, that the captaine came to him in choler to ſtrike him. But his companions tooke the quarrell, and did ſo conteſt againſt him, that they killed the captaine in the place. Then ſtirring vp their fellow citizens to recouer their libertie, they ſent for the men of armes of the SYRACVSANS, who were retired into the fort of ÆTNE. Dionyſius amazed with this chaunge, preſently raiſed his ſiege, and with all expedition tooke his way towards SYRACVSA, that he might be there firſt. After he was gone, thoſe that had mutined choſe them for their leaders that had killed captaine Doricus, went and encamped themſelues with the men of armes before SYRACVSA, in a place called Epipoles to make warre with the tyrant, hauing ſtopped all the paſſages that he could not come out into the field. And forthwith they ſent to them of RHEGE and MESSINA, to pray them to ſend them aide: which they obtained, to wit, ninetie gallies well appointed. Furthermore, they promiſed by open proclamation, a great ſum of money to him that would kill the tyrant: and to the ſtraungers that were in pay, to make them Burgeſſes as themſelues, if they would take their part againſt him. They prouided engines of batterie to beate downe the walles of the Iſle, and euery day gaue new aſſaults vnto them, and made very much of all the ſouldiers ſtraungers that tooke their part. Whereupon Dionyſius ſeeing himſelfe ſhut out of the field, and that his men forſooke him euery houre, aſſembled his friends to conſult with them what was to be done. Some counſelled him to tarie, alleaging that tyranny and abſolute power vſurped by him, was a faire tombe. Polixemus his brother was of the mind, that he ſhould ſaue himſelfe on the ſwifteſt horſe he had in his ſtable, in the lands which the CARTHAGINIANS held in SICILIA. But Philiſtus, who afterwards wrote the ſtorie of his geſts, ſaid then, that Dionyſius ſhould neither flie away, nor yeeld vp his tyrannie, the which he ſhould neuer forgo but by force, and his feet forward. Dionyſius tooke hold of this opinion, and reſolued with himſelfe to abide all extremitie, rather then to yeeld vp his place. Being in this caſe he fortuned to come to ſee a butcher ſlaughter an oxe, and hauing obſerued that at one ſtroke he fell downe ſtarke dead: Alas, ſaid he, were it not great ſhame that for feare of death which laſteth ſo litle while, and is ſo ſoone gone, I ſhould leaue ſo goodly and great a Seigniorie? But knowing what people he had to deale withall, he ſent ambaſſadours vnto them that kept him in ſo ſtraightly, to beſeech them to permit him with ſafetie to come out of the towne with his followers. Euen at that inſtant he ſent men to the ſouldiers CAMPANIANS, to promiſe them all that they would haue, ſo they would come and beſiege SYRACVSA. The townesmen hauing ſuffered him to go his way with fiue ſhips, ſlept quietly in hope that he would be gone: and caſſiered a part of their ſouldiers, ſuppoſing they ſhould need no longer to beſiege it. So that their ſouldiers diſperſed themſelues here and there in the fields, euen as if the tyrannie had bene put downe. But the CAMPANIANS allured by Dionyſius promiſes, came into the field, and being come to AGYRIDE, they left their cariage to be ſo much the ſooner before SYRACVSA. They were twelue hundred horſemen, and made ſuch ſpeed, that they ſurprized the SYRACVSANS, and in deſpite of them rode through the towne vnto the caſtell of Dionyſius, in whoſe aide alſo at the very ſame time there arriued by ſea, three hundred other ſouldiers: ſo that now he became more couragious then euer he was. The SYRACVSANS on the other ſide began to diſarme themſelues, ſome being of one mind ſome of another: which Dionyſius vnderſtanding, he made a ſallie out vpon them that kept the quarter called NEAPOLIS, or new towne, and put them all to flight: howbeit many were not killed, for Dionyſius riding euery where about, willed his men to kill none that fled. Thus were the SYRACVSANS driuen and diſperſed in the field, where there gathered about the horſmen aboue ſeuen thouſand. Now for Dionyſius, he hauing cauſed them to be buried that were ſlain in this conflict, he ſent ambaſſadors vnto ÆTNE to them that were retired thither, to intreate them to be at peace, and to returne home to their houſes, promiſing them by oath, that he would neuer be reuenged for any thing they had practiſed or done againſt him. Thoſe that had wiues and children at SYSACVSA, were compelled to truſt to his words and promiſes. But when the ambaſſadours alleaged to the others, the humanitie of their maiſter in burying the dead: they anſwered, that the tyrant deſerued to haue as much done to him, and that they prayed the gods they might quickly requite him. For all this they would not ſtirre out of ÆTNE, expecting oportunitie to set vpon their enemy: who being escaped from so great a daunger, he courteously vsed them that returned, to entice the others to follow. And for the rest, after he had well payed the CAMPANIANS, he put them out of the citie, suspecting their inconstancie and treason. They departing from SYRACVSA, went vnto the citie of ATELLE, where they preuailed so much, that they were receiued into the towne to dwell there. But their wickednesse burst out into such extremitie, that one night they set vpon the naturall inhabitants, killed euery man that was able to beare armes, and afterwards by force thrust out their wiues: and by this meanes made themselues maisters of the towne, and of all the territorie thereabout. At the same time Aristus, one of the chiefest men of LACEDÆMON was sent vnto SYRACVSA, vpon a rumour giuen out amongst the people, that it was to driue out the tyrant. But the effect shewed that it was but to negociate with him, and to bind him vnto them, to serue their turnes in their affaires. Aristus then hauing immediatly after his arriuall had secret conference with Dionysius, he began to mutine the SYRACVSANS, promising them all the aide he could, for the recouerie of their liberty. But afterwards he himselfe killed Nicoteles the CORINTHIAN, who had promised the SYRACVSANS to be the head of this enterprise: and accusing them that gaue credit to his words, he made the tyrant more bold and stronger then euer. So did he also begin to shew himselfe more then before: for he found the meanes to send the SYRACVSANS into the fields to get in their corne and haruest, and in the meane space whilest they were out of the citie, he went into the houses himselfe, and fetched out all their armes that had any. Then he enuironed his castle round about with another second wall, built diuers shippes, and assembled a great number of souldiers straungers, whom he afterwards entertained. Now he thinking himselfe too litle a Lord, vndertooke to conquer some fronter townes neare vnto the territorie of the SYRACVSANS, and before he would assaile them, he brought his armie before ÆTNE, which he wan presently. From thence he came to besiege the citie of the LEONTINES, the which hauing resisted him, after he had foraged and preyed the countrie about, he turned vnto the townes of the naturall SICILIANS, making as though he meant to set vpon thē, to the end that those of CATANE, & of NAXE, seeing the warre in another place, should care the lesse for themselues. So being neare vnto the towne of ENNE, he put into Limnestus head, a citizen of the same, that he should take vpon him to make himself Lord of the town, promising to helpe him in it: which the other executed. Howbeit he kept the town for himselfe, & shut the gates against Dionysius: who being angry with this repulse, counselled the ENNIANS to driue out this new tyrant. The people being set on by him, ran one day in armes into the market place, and cried, Libertie. Dionysius vnderstanding that, followed with some of his faithfull friends, tooke hold of Limnestus, & deliuered him to the ENNIANS, and went out of the towne again immediatly, to make others to trust him. From thence he went vnto CATANE, and wan that town through the treason of Arcesilaus captain of the same: tooke all the armes from the inhabitants, and left a good garrison there. Procles captain of NOXE, shortly after played euen the like part that Arcesilaus had done: and was well recompenced for it, and all his kinsmen and friends were giuen him: but the other inhabitants were sold by the drum, their towne destoyed, and their lands giuen vnto the SICILIANS, neighbors to SYRACVSA. For those of CATANE, they were also sold vnto them that would giue most within SYRACVSA, and their town giuen to the soldiers CAMPANIANS. This made the LEONTINES hold vp their hands, leaue the towne, and go dwell at SYRACVSA. Now Dionysius fortified SYRACVSA a new, and hauing determined to close in the quarter called Epipoles with walles, he assembled threescore thousand labourers distributed by troupes, and seruing skilfull maisters, accompanied with Masons that had their day worke. These men encouraged by his presence, by his promises and gifts, finished the wall in three weekes of a reasonable height and thicknesse, being litle lesse then two leagues about. The banished men of SYRACVSA being fled to RHEGE, did what they could possible to moue the inhabitants to make warre against Dionysius. They laboured it so well, that in the end the RHEGIANS went into the field, and induced the Gouernours of MESSINA to keep them companie. But a MESSENIAN called Leomedon, hauing discouraged the troups, euery one went home againe, and did nothing: and as for Dionysius, he looked no further into them, but the RHEGIANS and MESSENIANS hauing sent vnto him to treate of peace, he iudging that the friendship of these two cities would be very expedient for him, made peace with them.

So hauing assured himselfe on that side, and considering that many GREEKES of SICILIA fled into the townes which were subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, and that there were townes,

vntouched, vnto the which they caried their goods: he thought that ſo long as he was at peace with them, diuers of his ſubiects would be willing to do the like: Howbeit that in making warre with them, thoſe whom the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould ouercome by armes, would come to his ſide. Furthermore, word was brought him that CARTHAGE was wonderfully afflicted with the plague, which did the more ſtrengthen him in his reſolution. But knowing that he had to deale with mighty enemies of all the people of EVROPE, and that this war would not ſo ſoone be ended: he gathered together into SYRACVSA out of all the coaſts of ITALIE, of GRECE, and of SICILIA, the beſt workmen and artificers, vnto whom he gaue great wages, and great gifts vnto thoſe that were moſt skilfull and diligent. Who labouring in enuie the one of the other, they built vp in a ſhort time two hundred gallies, repaired a hundred and ten that had ſerued a long time, forged an hundred and fortie thouſand bucklers or targets, ſo many ſwords and daggers, as many helmets and ſallets: fourteene thouſand corcelets, curates, and brigandines of all ſorts: engines of batterie of all faſhions, and of darts, an incredible and vneſtimable number. Touching the galleys, to arme them with pylots, mariners, and galley-ſlaues, the citie of SYRACVSA furniſhed for the one halfe: and Dionyſius for the other halfe payed the ſouldiers ſtraungers. The furniture of theſe ſhippes, armes, and harneſſe being readie, he began to gather his armie together, and would not for ſauing of charges put himſelfe in readineſſe before. He gathered together within SYRACVSA all thoſe that were able to beare armes: he drew out of the townes ſubiect vnto him, all that were meet for war: he leauied men out of LACONIA with conſent of the Lords of SPARTA, and got a great number out of all parts becauſe he payed well, and gaue them very gracious entertainment that came to ſerue him. But aboue all the reſt he ſhewed himſelf a maruellous friend to the RHEGIANS, and MESSENIANS, that had a reaſonable ſtrong armie in readines to be employed: being afraid that ſo ſoone as they ſhold ſee the CARTHAGINIANS paſſed into SICILIA, they would ioyne with them: for to which ſide ſoeuer theſe two cities would incline, they would helpe to make a great weight in the ballance, and to bring the victory to fall on their ſide. It was at that time that he gaue a great countrie of extent vnto the MESSENIANS, and prayed the RHEGIANS to giue him a wife of their towne. But they would not heare of that in any wiſe. Wherupon he went to the LOCRIANS, who gaue him her of whom we haue ſpoken before: and for many daies together did nothing elſe but make banquets and feaſts, aſwell to his ſouldiers, as vnto the more part of the citizens of SYRACVSA. For he had now changed his firſt ſoureneſſe and cruelty of a tyrant into gentlenes: he did vſe his ſubiects in a more ciuill ſort, put no more of them to death, nor baniſhed any mo of them, as he did at the firſt beginning. Shortly after this mariage was paſt, he aſſembled the people of SYRACVSA, & did perſwade them to make war with the CARTHAGINIANS, telling them that they were enemies of all the vniuerſall GREEKS, and of thoſe eſpecially that dwelt in SICILIA, whom they practiſed by all means they could to make ſubiect vnto them. And that albeit they did not now make any alteration, it was becauſe of the plague that tormented them much: but ſo ſoone as they were free from that, they ſhould ſee the effects of their malice againſt all the inhabitants of SICILIA, which they caſt long before in their minds. And that it were better for him, ſince it muſt needs be, ſoone or late, to begin to make war vpon them they being now weak, then to tarie 'till they were recouered again: and that it was a great ſhame to thē to ſuffer the towns of GRECE ſo neare vnto them, to be made ſubiect to barbarous people: that being deſirous to recouer their liberty, ſo much more willing they wold be to yeeld themſelues vnto the SYRACVSANS, ſo ſoone as they ſhould ſee that it were open war. Theſe and other reaſons were receiued and allowed by the SYRACVSANS, who were no leſſe deſirous then himſelfe to make war with them. For they hated the CARTHAGINIANS, becauſe that for feare of them they were conſtrained to put themſelues vnder the yoke. And next, for that they hoped Dionyſius would vſe them more gently, ſo long as on the one ſide he ſhold be afraid of the force of the enemies, and on the other, of the rebellion of thoſe whō by force he kept vnder. And eſpecially aboue the reſt, for that they hoped being armed, if occaſion were offred, they might one day ſtand for the recouery of their liberty.

Warre being concluded vpon in this aſſembly, Dionyſius ſuffered the SYRACVSANS to ſpoile the PHENICIANS that trafiqued in their hauen: which they executed out of hand. The other SICILIANS did aſmuch: ſo that the CARTHAGINIANS were driuen to run away, and thoſe that they could catch were cruelly handled in euery place, for the hatred they bare them, becauſe of the proud parts they committed in the wars paſt. Dionyſius hauing all his army in readineſſe, ſent a

Herald vnto CARTHAGE with letters, containing that the SYRACVSANS had decreed in their Councell to make warre vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, vnleſſe they departed from the townes of GREECE which they held in SICILIA, and did leaue them at libertie. The Senate and people of CARTHAGE amazed at it, knew that they had to fight with Dionyſius, neuertheleſſe they reſolued to take armes, and ſent to leauie men out of all parts. Dionyſius on the other ſide, he tooke the field with an armie of foureſcore thouſand fighting men of foote, and three thouſand horſe: and had at the ſea nere two hundred gallies and ſhips of ower, accompanied with fiue hundred great ſhips of burden, full of all ſorts of engines of batterie, and of neceſſarie munitions for ſuch an armie. All the townes almoſt of SICILIA yeelded themſelues vnto him, ſauing MOTYE, ANCYRE, SOLES, EGESTE, PALERME, and ENTELLE. Leptines his brother and Admirall, lay before MOTYE, and beſieged it: and himſelfe ſpoiled all the countrie of the SOLENTINES, PALERMITANS, and ANCIREIANS: and beſieged EGESTE, and ENTELLE, and gaue them diuers aſſaults. Newes being brought vnto him that Himilco was at hand, he went and encamped before MOTYE, a town ſituated within a litle Iſle of SICILIA, halfe a league from firme land, ſtately built, and very rich at that time. The which he aſſaulted by ſea and by land, draue Himilco and his forces back, and wan the towne by aſſault: but they ſold their liues and towne very deare, hauing killed a great number of the enemies, before they were forced. The SICILIANS yet angry in their harts for the miſchiefes they had endured through the inſolencie of the CARTHAGINIANS in the former wars: were ſo brued in bloud, that all thoſe of MOTYE were put to the ſword. They that ſaued themſelues in the temples, had their liues graunted them: but Dionyſius made them all be ſold by the drumme. Whileſt he was occupied there, the EGESTANS made a ſallie vpon the campe which he had left before the towne, and ſet it on fire, which burnt the moſt part of his ſoldiers, and the reſt well warmed, ſaued themſelues as they could. But Dionyſius not much regarding this loſſe, ſet vpon all the townes of the CARTHAGINIANS with his armie. They for their part, gaue all the authoritie and power vnto Himilco, to prepare for this war of SICILIA. He made an armie of three hundred thouſand footmen, and of a great number of horſemen, and gaue the rende vous to the ſhippes of burthen at PALERME: where he arriued with his fleet of gallies that followed him. The Admirall Leptines hauing deſcried his comming, ſet forward with his ſhips, and fought with them in the maine ſea: he killed fiue thouſand of his men, ſunke fiftie ſhips, and two hundred carts of warre: and the reſt of them ſaued themſelues by flying. But Himilco hauing landed his armie, went and aſſailed MOTYE, and wanne it againe of the SARACVSANS.

At that time Dionyſius was before EGESTE, where word being brought him of the arriuall of the CARTHAGINIANS, and of the taking againe of MOTYE: he began to be affraid, and to take aduice to return to SYRACVSA: he commaunded the SICILIANS to retire, and made their lands waſt, to diſaduantage their enemies by ſo much the more. This ſudden change of Dionyſius, was cauſe that many of his friends tooke part with Himilco, who ſeeing his affaires proſper ſo well, made his armie march to MESSINE: tooke in (paſſing by) the Ile and towne of LYPARE: and then beſieged the MESSENIANS ſo ſtraightly, that in the end he wan the towne by aſſault. And there hauing refreſhed his troupes, he razed the towne to the very ground, the which did ſo much amaze the SICILIANS, that all, except the ASSARINS, turned vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionyſius being at his wits end for ſo many loſſes, did fortifie the ſtrong holds that were in the territorie of the LEONTINES, ſent the CAMPANIANS to ÆTNE, that dwelt in the towne of CATANE: and taking order for his affaires the beſt he could poſſible, he went into the field with foure and thirtie thouſand footemen, and a thouſand horſe, and lodged vnder the mount Taur, where the baniſhed men of SYRACVSA were placed, fauoured by the CARTHAGINIANS, and had fortified it, and made it in forme of a towne: whileſt he made his abode there, newes came vnto him that the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS was deuided into two, and that the one part of them went by land to CATANE with Himilco: and the other came towards him by ſea, led by Mago. He hoping to make this fleet as nothing, commaunded his brother Leptines to make out with his ſhipping againſt Mago. But Leptines was put to flight, with the loſſe of twenty thouſand men, and well neare a hundred of his ſhips. This loſſe draue Dionyſius into ſuch a feare, doubting beſides leſt Mago following his victorie ſhould draw towards SYRACVSA, which was eaſie to be wonne hauing no garriſon in it: he retired into his citie, and from thence ſent men into ITALIE and into GREECE, to pray aide againſt the CARTHGAINIANS.

Himilco

Himilco knowing his retraite, brought all his forces immediatly vnto SYRACVSA, besieged it by land and by sea, wan the suburbes of ACRADINE, and set vp his pauilion in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, all the other temples of the suburbes hauing bene rifled by the souldiers. In the meane time Polyxemus brought to the aide of the towne, thirtie shippes of their friends vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS. With this aide, and all the shippes of burthen, Dionysius put to the sea to go get victuals. But now whilest he was at the sea in his voyage, the SYRACVSANS being carefull to looke to their citie, and spying out all occasions to mischiefe the besiegers: they descryed a boate that brought corne to the campe of Himilco. Whereupon on the sodaine they armed all their galleys, and fought so valiantly with the CARTHAGINIANS, that they tooke their Admirall with twentie others, and sunke foure of them, and followed the rest that fled, vnto the very place where their shipps lay at anker within the great hauen, prouoking thē to battel. But the CARTHAGINIANS astonied with this ouerthrow, stirred not.

Then the SYRACVSANS fastened the galleys prisoners vnto the poopes of theirs, and brought them into the citie. Whereupon they being couragions againe for this litle aduantage they had of their enemies: they began to talke among themselues, how the tyrant had bene many times ouercome, and that they to the contrary without him had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS. And therupon gathering together by troupes, they went speaking one to another, that they were weary with seruing a tyrant, and now specially hauing means to put him downe for euer: for before they were disarmed, but now by reason of the wars they had their armes in their hands. Notwithstanding they daily held this talke, Dionysius made the people to assemble, and praised them highly for the good seruice they had done, perswading them furthermore to be of good courage, for within few daies he would make an end of this war. But as the assembly of the people was ready to go their way, Theodorus SYRACVSAN, iudged to be one of the best men of armes within the towne, stepped vp, & made a long oration, in the which after he had by peecemeale laid open all the tyrannies, cowardlinesse, and wicked deeds of Dionysius, whom he called grammarian, clerke, a careless man, ignorant of the affaires of war, oppressor of all SICILIA, and fauorer of all theeues and ill men of the world: he perswaded them by diuers reasons to indeuour themselues to recouer their liberty. And since that their allies of ITALY and GREECE were within the city, that they should bring backe againe the power and authority to create such captaines as they should thinke good, into the hands of the citizens, according to the tenure of their ancient lawes, or else into the hands of their ancestors and first founders, which were the CORINTHIANS: or at the least into the LACEDÆMONIANS hands, who had then the seigniority of all GREECE. The SYRACVSANS being maruellously moued with such a speech, beheld the countenance of their confederates assistants in this assembly: vntill such time as Pharacidas being gotten vp into the pulpit for orations, made euery man hearken, supposing it should be he that should begin first to stir vp and encourage others to the recouery of their liberty. But to the contrarie, he being particularly friend to Dionysius, began to tell them, that his Lords had sent him to aide the SYRACVSANS and Dionysius against the CARTHAGINIANS: not to destroy them, nor to abolish his estate. This speech being cleane contrary to that the common people expected, the souldiers straungers ran straight about him. Wherupon the SYRACVSANS stirred not, sauing that to themselues they cursed the LACEDÆMONIANS, becausse that heretofore they had sent them Aristus, who pretending he came to aide them for to recouer their libertie, was a traitor and sold them: and now that this Pharacidas had broken the harts of their courages, being well disposed to root out this tyrannie. For Dionysius, he spake smoothly for the time, being throughly afraid they would haue set vpon him, and so dismissed the assembly, vsing the most gracious words vnto them he could possible. To others he gaue presents, he sent for others to come and eate with him at his table. In the meane time the plague straungely possest the campe of the CARTHAGINIANS, and in a short time killed wel-neare 150000. of them: wherupon the most part of them were forsaken aliue and dead, the contagion was so horrible. Some imputed it partly to the discommoditie of the place, and excessiue number of men liuing as it were on heapes together: partly vnto the vengeance of God punishing their pride, the insolencies, cruelties, and sacrileges of the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionysius vnderstanding of this miserie, would not vainely let slippe such a fit occasion, but armed fourescore galleys, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas and Leptines, and his troupes, with whom he assailed Himilco by sea and by land, tooke his fortes, burnt and drowned the most part of his shippes, brake the rest, and gaue his people of SYRACVSA meanes to set

vpon the litle barks,& to ſhut them within the citie. To be ſhort, he brought them to ſuch extremitie, that they ſent ſecretly vnto him to pray him to ſuffer that which was ſaued from the ouerthrow the day before, to paſſe the ſea, and to retire home to AFRICKE with ſafetie: promiſing to make him a preſent of an hundred and foureſcore thouſand crownes. His anſwer was, that it was not poſſible all ſhould be ſaued, yet he was contented the naturall CARTHAGINIANS ſhould paſſe. For he doubted much that the SYRACVSANS and their friends would neuer ſuffer him to reſpite thoſe other, if they once vnderſtood it. But he did it of purpoſe, being vnwilling that the armie of CARTHAGE ſhould be vtterly deſtroyed, for feare that when the SYRACVSANS ſhould ſee themſelues free from this feare: they would remember the Oration of Theodorus, and put too all their force to recouer their liberty againe. The mony promiſed him being deliuered, Himilco imbarked by night all the naturall CARTHAGINIANS that were left into fortie gallies, and made ſaile immediatly towards AFRICKE. Howbeit he was ſcant out of the hauen, but certaine CORINTHIANS perceiued his ſtealing away, and ſuddenly came to tell it to Dionyſius, who ſeeming to be very greatly buſied, commaunded to ſound the alarme, and that the Captaines ſhould prepare themſelues to follow him. The CORINTHIANS ſeeing he went but faintly to worke, would tarie no longer, but euen at the preſent houre imbarked themſelues, drew vp their ankers, and rowed hard after their enemies: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace they ouertooke the rere of their veſſels, and ſo rudely hurt them, that they ſunke ſome of them. Immediatly after, Dionyſius drew his armie into the field: but the SICILIANS, friends vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, had gotten the ſtart before croſſing the countrie, inſomuch that the more part of them got home to their houſes. For this cauſe Dionyſius hauing left a guard to keepe the paſſages by the high waies, he brought his army backe againe to the enemies campe. The barbarous people ſeeing themſelues betrayed by their Generall, forſaken of the naturall CARTHAGINIANS and SICILIANS, their hearts were killed, and began to flie, ſtealing away, ſome this way, ſome that way: but all of them in manner fell into the hands of the ſouldiers that guarded the high wayes. Thoſe that were left, came before Dionyſius, and caſting downe their armes, beſought him to take pitie of them, and to ſaue their liues: the SPANIARDS onely excepted, who gathered themſelues together with their armes, and ſent vnto him to offer their ſeruice, if it would pleaſe him to accept them: the which he did, and receiued them into pay among the ſouldiers ſtrangers. For the reſt, he tooke the other priſoners, and gaue their baggage in prey to his ſouldiers. For Himilco, after he had liued ignominiouſly and poorely at CARTHAGE, he died diſtract of his wits. Some hold opinion that immediatly after he was arriued, not able to endure the ſhame he got in this warre, he killed himſelfe.

Dionyſius hauing driuen the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, he built vp MESSINA againe which they had ruined. Then he went to beſiege TAVROMENION, fortified by the SICILIANS: who luſtily gaue him the repulſe, and made a ſallie vpon him, and killed the moſt part of his men, hauing much ado to eſcape himſelfe. On the other ſide, Mago chiefe of the AFRICANS in SICILIA, did courteouſly intreate his allies, and receiued into his protection all thoſe whom Dionyſius oppreſſed. By which occaſion hauing won the hearts of the moſt part of them, he became ſo ſtrong in a ſhort time, that he got a great armie againe on foot, marched with them to MESSINA, and ouerranne all the plaine countrie, where hauing gotten a great bootie, he tooke vpon him to beſiege the ABACENIANS confederates of Dionyſius: who being bound to aide them, he went againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, beat Mago in a conflict, and killed eight hundred of his men. So hauing brought his troupes to SYRACVSA and refreſhed them, he armed a fleet of an hundred veſſels, to go and make warre with thoſe of RHEGE, and comming to their hauen by night, at that inſtant time he did fiercely aſſaile them, ſet fire on their gates, and ſet vp ſcaling ladders in diuerſe parts: neuertheleſſe the RHEGIANS defended themſelues ſo couragiouſly, that he was forced to retire. And therupon receiuing certaine intelligence what great preparation they made at CARTHAGE to begin the warre againe: he left RHEGE, and returned againe to SYRACVSA. So the CARTHAGINIANS had gotten together againe foureſcore thouſand men, whom they ſent into SICILIA vnder the conduct of Mago. But before they came to ioyne with the enemies, they concluded peace with theſe conditions, that euery one ſhould enioy that they had gotten: That one of them ſhould not quarrel with the other for any thing: That Dionyſius might without breach of peace make warre with the TAVROMENITANS. Theſe being thus agreed vpon betweene them, Dionyſius went and beſieged TAVROMENION the ſecond time, and did more furiouſly furiouſly aſſault it then before: ſo that in the end, after long reſiſtance of them that were beſieged, he wanne the towne, draue out the SICILIANS that dwelt there, and did repleniſh it with ſtraungers whom he kept in pay. Afterwards becauſe his armie ſhould not be idle and mutinous, he choſe twentie thouſand footmen, and three thouſand horſe, and went into ITALY with them next adioyning vnto SICILIA, to ſubdue thoſe GREEKES which had dwelt there of long time. Newes being brought vnto them of Dionyſius intention, they aſſembled all the eſtates of the countrey of CROTONE, where they all reſolued to ioyne together to repulſe this common enemy: and making all the forces they could, eſtabliſhing Eloris, a baniſhed man of SYRACVSA their Chieftaine, they made their armie march againſt Dionyſius, who camped before the city of CAVLONE. He vnderſtanding of their comming, raiſed his ſiege ſuddenly to go and meete with them: and the next morning after his departure, by breake of day he gaue charge vpon the GREEKES with his troupes well appointed, who marching diſorderly, he killed their Chieftaine, and the valianteſt men of their army: and afterwards beſieged the others that had ſaued themſelues in a towne, and compelled them to yeeld for that they had no water. Yet contrary to all mens expectation, he vſed them very courteouſly, and ſent them home ſafe without ranſome. After he had won this goodly victory, he led his armie into the territorie of the RHEGIANS, whom he hated to the death. They hauing no friends, and too weake of themſelues to reſiſt ſuch a mightie enemy: were conſtrained to make peace with him with very hard conditions. For he made them giue him threeſcore galleys, a hundred and foureſcore thouſand crownes, and for hoſtage and obſeruation of other articles, a hundred of the chiefeſt of the towne. From thence he returned to beſiege CAVLONE, and held them ſo ſtraight, that he wan it by aſſault, deſtroyed it, and gaue the lands vnto them of LOCRES.

But for as much as he could not forget the vnreconciliable hatred he bare vnto the RHEGIANS, he hauing demaunded on a time one of their daughters in mariage: they report that the anſwer they made in an open aſſembly of the towne vnto his Ambaſſadors, was that they would giue him none of them, vnleſſe he would marry the hangmans daughter of the towne: this made him reſolue that he would ſee the end of it. And where before he had made peace with them, it was not for any good will he bare them, nor that he deſired their friendſhip, but becauſe he would take their galleys from them, hoping that after he had left them bare at the ſea, he ſhould come cloſer to them, and haue them at his diſcretion. Therefore whileſt he was in ITALIE, he ſought nothing elſe but to take an occaſion to make warre with them, ſo that he might not be charged that contrary to his faith he had broken the edict of pacification. Hauing therefore led his army vnto the ſtraite, making as though he would paſſe into SICILIA: he ſent vnto the RHEGIANS to demaund victuals for his army, promiſing to ſend them ſo much againe vpon his returne to SYRACVSA. Which he did, to the end that if they refuſed, he might excuſe himſelfe well if he did ſet vpon them: and if they did giue him any, it ſhould then turne to the hurt of the towne, which if it came to be beſieged, ſhould be conſtrained for famine to hold vp their hands to him. The RHEGIANS that leaſt doubted his malice, furniſhed him with victuals for certaine dayes: but perceiuing he taried there too long, now counterfeiting he was ſicke, then that he vſed other delayes to prolong time, they began to ſee his fetches, and refuſed to victuall him any more. Thereupon he faining to be much offended, ſent them home their hoſtages, and came to beſiege the towne: comming hard to their wals, he made daily and continuall aſſaults, beating vpon the wals with great engines which he had made expreſly of an incredible greatneſſe. They hauing choſen a valiant man for their Captaine, called Phyton, and furniſhed all thoſe that were able to beare armes in the towne, they defended themſelues couragiouſly, and did many wayes hurt their enemies: and ſpecially in a ſally they made, Dionyſius was ſore hurt with a launce in the flancke, that he was like to haue died. But being recouered and well againe, he purſued his purpoſe more obſtinately then euer: whereby he tooke all hope of aide from them, and hauing continued ſiege there eleuen moneths all together, in the end the RHEGIANS found themſelues in great want of victuals of all ſorts: for a buſhell of wheate was at fiftie crownes. After that all kind of corne failed them, firſt they did eate vp their horſes, and all kind of beaſts of burthen. Then when they had no more to eate, they did ſeeth all their hides and leather they could find within the towne, and ſo liued awhile. And laſt of all, comming out of the towne, they did eate and deuour vp ſuch hearbes and rootes as they could find by their walles, euen as wild beaſtes. Dionyſius perceiuing it, in ſtead of pitying of them (nay rather desiring they should eate one another of them) he caused the grasse to be cut downe, and put his beastes in the campe into it, to feed of all that was alongst the towne walles and ditches, to the end they should haue nothing more to eate. So that in the end the poore RHEGIANS ouercome by necessitie, were constrained to yeeld themselues and their towne to the discretion of the tyrant. Who being entred into the towne, found heapes of bodies dead of that plague of famine: and such as were yet aliue, seemed rather ghosts then liuing persons. So he gathered together about sixe thousand prisoners, whom he sent all to SYRACVSA, suffering notwithstanding all that could raunsome themselues, (paying a talent) to be redeemed: and the rest to be sold by the drumme to him that would giue most. Amongst the prisoners there was Phyton and his sonne. Dionysius made his sonne to be drowned first: and the next morning after, he made the father to be tied to the highest engine of battery he had, and sent to tel him newes of the death of his son. He was happier by a day then his father, said Phyton: who was drawne all the towne ouer, and whipped most shamefully: hauing a sergeant at his back that cried out aloud, that Dionysius made him be whipped thus, because he had made the RHEGIANS take armes against him. But Phyton that had like a valiant captaine and worthy man shewed himselfe in this siege, and had liued honorably all his life time, did patiently endure the paine which the tyrant made him suffer. For he remained constant, speaking out aloud that euery body heard him: That he was put to death, because he would not betray his countrey, and deliuer it into the tyrants hands, howbeit that within few daies the gods wold be reuenged of him for this outrage. His constancie was such, that it moued Dionysius soldiers to compassion: who began already to murmure against him. Wherfore fearing lest they shold be so bold to take him out of the tormentors hands: he made thē leaue whipping of him, & cōmanded that they shold drowne him in the sea with all his kinred, which was done: for the rest, the city of RHEGE was razed to the ground.

Thus haue we made a large discourse of the practises and wars of Dionysius. Now let vs speake somthing of his priuate gouernment. He had wit enough, but troubled with many vices: & the more he grew in yeares, the more it was corrupted. The flatterers made an end of his destruction: for they called his cruelty, the hate of wicked men, and good iustice, & made him beleeue that he was a most worthy man in all things: insomuch that he thought himselfe the only man of the world, and would be so reputed. Being thus caried, and seeing himselfe at good leysure, he entred into a course which he had somwhat discōtinued during the wars, & wherwith he was strangely taken: which was, to write verses, & to make tragedies. He fel to this study againe with more diligence then before, & sent for Poets out of al parts, whom he honored, and gaue presents vnto, because they should correct his works of Poëtry. They seeking to gratifie him for their profite, said nothing, but that which they thought should be most pleasing vnto him: so that being puft vp with their flatteries, he gloried more in his verses, then he did in his warres. Now amongst other Poets that followed him, there was one they called Philoxenus, a learned man, and excellent to write hymnes in praise of the gods. Dionysius one day gaue him a tragedy of his to peruse and correct, he crossed it all ouer from one end to the other: and one night being asked what he thought of certaine poësies which the tyrant made, he spake openly, that they were woorth nothing. He answered so plainly, that Dionysius angrily said, it was of enuy that he censured his works so, and sent him forthwith to dig in the quarry pit. The next morning his friends intreated Dionysius to pardon him, which he did: & would haue him againe to supper with many others of his sort. In the midst of this feast, Dionysius that desired nothing more then to haue his verses heard: he rehearsed some of them, and of those especially which he thought best done. Then turning himself to Philoxenus, he asked his opinion. But he answered him neuer a word, but looking about him, called one of Dionysius guard and said vnto him: Cary me againe to the quarry pit. Dionysius smiling at it, bare this nip well: and soone after taking Philoxenus apart, perswaded him not to be so sharpe. His friends also told him that he might easily forbeare to speake so freely to no purpose. Then Philoxenus made him an answer all new, saying, that from thenceforth he would keep such a weight on his words, that he would speake the truth, and keepe himselfe in Dionysius fauor, as he did. For Dionysius hauing rehearsed certaine verses full of great lamentations, to moue the hearts of the hearers to pity: he prayed Philoxenus to say his mind of thē: who answered him, that those verses had filled him full of pity. It was a sharpe gird of mockery which Dionysius perceiued not, no more then that which Melanthius spake of a tragedy after the like sort, that he could not see it, it was so darke of speech. And so was Plato not much better vsed then Philoxenus. Dion his disciple,and brother in lawe of Dionysius, had spoken so much good to this tyrant, that being at leysure he was contented to see Plato, and to heare him. So they being together, their talke generally was all of vertue: but chiefly they disputed, what was true force and prowesse? Where Plato proued vnto him, that tyrants were nothing lesse then valiant men. Out of that, turning his talke to speake of iustice: he shewed him that the life of the iust was very happie: and that to the contrary, the life of vniust men was most wicked. Insomuch that the tyrant seeing himselfe conuinced, could no longer endure talke with him: and was sorie to see those that were present so muchto esteeme of him, and to take such singular pleasure to heare him speake. So at the last his choler being vp, he asked him what businesse had brought him into SICILIA? To seeke an honest man, said Plato. And how? (replyed Dionysius) by the gods (to heare thee speake) it seemeth thou hast yet found none. Dion thought his choler should go no further, and so sent Plato away in a gallie, whom Polis a captaine of LACEDÆMON brought backe againe into GRECE. But Dionysius prayed this captaine secretly, that whatsoeuer he did he should kill Plato by the way, or at least wise sell him: adding too this least withall, He shall be neuer a whit the worse for that: for if he be a iust man, he shall be as happy being a seruant as otherwise. And so Plato was sold in the Ile of ÆGINE for the price of 200. crownes, and afterwards bought againe by Annicerius a Philosopher, and sent to ATHENS.

Dionysius gaue himself all to Poësie, and sent for the best singers he could recouer in the games Olympials, to rehearse and sing his verses before the people. The singers at the beginning were heard with admiratiõ of euery bodie, for the goodnes & fineneſſe of their voyces: but when they came to examine their songs, they were despised, mocked, and whistled at, which angred him extreamely when he heard of it. So this passioned desire did so much increase in his head continually, that he became almost as a man beside himselfe: & said that his faithfull friends did enuie him, and began to be at defiance with them, as if they had bene traitors vnto him. To conclude, this fury of his did so possesse him, that he did put many to death vpon false occasions, and banished others, as Philistus, and Leptines his brother, both of them valiant men, & that had done him great seruice in his wars. Howbeit afterwards he sent for them againe, and they were his friends as before. But since we are now to talke of his cruelties, let vs say something as we passe by. One of his greatest friends called Marsyas, dreamed one night that he cut his throate. The tyrant vnderstanding of it, put this poore dreamer to death: alleaging that this dreame could not haue come to him at night, but that he had it setled in his mind to commit such an act in the day. Leptines being desirous one day to describe SICILIA in his presence, tooke a halbard from one of the souldiers of his guard, and with the but end of it drew on the ground that which he would: wherewith Dionysius was so angry, that he bitterly tooke vp Leptines, and put the souldier to death that had giuen him his halbard. Dionysius one day being disposed to disport himselfe some way, gaue his Bardasse his sword and his cloke to keepe: which one of his familiars perceiuing, said: And what, do you trust this young boy with your life? The youth began to smile at it: but Dionysius made him be killed, because by his smiling he seemed to allow of this word: and he also dispatched the other, because he had shewed him the mean to kill him. He was determined to haue put his brother in law Polyxemus to death: but he hauing an inkling of it, fled out of SICILIA. Dionysius sent for Teschа his sister, and chid with her because she had kept his flying away close from him. But she answered him with a bold countenance: And how thinkest thou, Dionysius, that I am a woman so cowardly and faint hearted, if I had knowne that my husband would haue gone, that I would not haue taken sea with him, aud haue bene companion of his fortune? I knew nothing before he was gone, for it had bene more honorable for me to haue bene called the wife of Polyxemus banished, then sister to thee a tyrant. Dionysius was blanke at this speech, and the SYRACVSANS wondred at the vertue of this woman: insomuch that after the tyrannie was destroyed, they did not leaue to do her all the honor that they could haue done to a Queene. And when she was dead, all the citizens by common consent went with her body to the sepulture. A question being moued one day, to wit: Which was the best copper? Antiphon answering quickly that it was that wherwith the ATHENIANS melted the statues of Armodius and Aristogiton, Dionysius made him to be strangled and die in great torments. They report of him that he spared not his owne mother, but caused her to be strangled, though she was very old. And as for his brother Leptines, he suffered him to be killed by his enemies, albeit he might easily haue saued and deliuered him at that time. Some talked of his tyrannie in a Barbers shop, and said it was well established, and alſo euill to be deſtroyed, as the Diamond to be broken. I maruell, ſaid the Barber, ſmiling, how you ſay that of him, vpon whoſe throat I paſſe my razour ſo often? Theſe words being brought to Dionyſius, he hanged the Barber. He had put to death at diuers times ten thouſand of his citizens, and though he had written in one of his tragedies, that tyrannie was the mother of iniuſtice: notwithſtanding he had oftentimes this word in his mouth: That children muſt be deceiued with plaies, & men with faire promiſes. And he ſaid, that the greateſt pleaſure and cõtentment he found in all his gouernment, was: that what he wold haue done, was ſodainly executed.

One day he would haue had money of the SYRACVSANS: they complained and lamented, beſeeching him to hold them excuſed, telling him they had no mony. He to the contrarie, made them to be asked alſo by others: which he did twiſe or thriſe one after another. And as he continued ſtill vrging of them yet further: it was told him they did nothing but laugh as they walked in the market place. Then he commanded his receiuers to preſſe them no more: for it is a ſigne, ſaid he, that they haue no more, ſince they make no account of vs. His mother being paſt age to marie, would needs mary a yong man. He anſwered her, that indeed it was in his power to break the lawes of SYRACVSA, but of nature, not. He ſeuerely puniſhing all other malefactors, pardoned theeues that tooke away mens gownes and clokes whom they met by night in the ſtreetes. To the end that for this cauſe the SYRACVSANS ſhould leaue to make feaſts and aſſemblies, wherin they could not keepe themſelues from ſpeaking & complotting againſt him. On a time a ſtranger promiſed him aloud to teach him ſecretly, how he ſhould know thoſe that did practiſe any thing againſt him. Dionyſius prayed him very earneſtly. So the other going to him, Giue me ſaid he, ſixe hundred crownes, that the SYRACVSANS may thinke thou haſt learned of me the ſignes to diſcouer the conſpirators. He gaue them him, and fained that he had learned theſe meanes of him: greatly commending the ſubtill faſhion to get money which this man had inuented. Hauing heard one day a man that played vpon the citherne paſſing well, he openly promiſed him the ſum of ſixe hundred crownes. The next morning he came to demaund this ſum: and Dionyſius told him: Thou gaueſt me great pleaſure yeſterday to heare thee play: and ſo did I thee in making thee this promiſe: and ſo thou wert paid in the field for the pleaſure thou gaueſt me, by that that thou receiuedſt. One asked him on a time, If he were not idle. God forbid, ſaid he, that that ſhould euer happen to me. He being enformed that two young men of the city drinking together, had ſpoken many euill words of him and his tyranny at the table: ſent to inuite them both to ſupper to him: and ſeeing that the one after he had drunke a litle, ſaid and did many od fooliſh things: and that the other to the contrarie was very ſober, and dranke but ſeldome: he pardoned the one, as being a drunkard and inſolent of nature, and that through drunkenneſſe had ſpoken euill of him: but he put the other to death, as one that bare him euill will in his heart, and being enemy vnto him euen of ſet purpoſe. Some of his familiars reproued him, becauſe he had honored and aduanced a wicked man, and euill beloued of the SYRACVSANS. And he anſwered them, I will that there ſhall be ſome one in SYRACVSA, that ſhall yet be more hated then my ſelfe. Once he ſent preſents vnto certaine ambaſſadors of CORINTH, which came vnto him. They refuſed them, becauſe they had a ſtatute in their commonwealth, that did forbid ambaſſadors to take or receiue any gifts or preſents of Lord or Prince whatſoeuer. He was diſcontented withall, and told them that they did euill to take away that only good which is in tyrannies, that is, to haue power to giue: but they taught men alſo, that to receiue any good of tyrants, is a thing one ſhould feare and ſhun. Being informed that a townesman of SYRACVSA had hidden a treaſure in the ground in his houſe, he commanded him to bring it him: the which he did, but not all for all that, for he reſerued a part with the which he went and dwelt in another town, and bought ſome land there: which when he vnderſtood, he ſent for him to come to him, and reſtored him all his gold and ſiluer: Since thou knoweſt now, ſaid he, how to vſe riches, and not to make that vnprofitable which is made for the vſe of man.

Now his cruelties and tyrannous behauiour made him maruellous odious to the world, by reaſon whereof he entred into ſuch a miſtruſt of euery body, that he made a trench be digged about his lodging where he lay, and becauſe he would lye ſafely, he drew vp a draw bridge, and ſhut himſelfe in with great feare, hauing a great guard without round about him. His wiues durſt not come into his chamber before they had put off their gownes, he was ſo afraid leſt they ſhold bring a dagger vnder their gownes. Yea his brother and his owne ſon were faine to put off their clothes, & the guard of his chamber ſhould come naked whatſoeuer he was that put his foot into it:

it: then there was another garment caſt vpon him. He was afraid of his owne ſon as much as of any other, doubting that when he felt his owne courage, and frequented men of vnderſtanding, he would make ſome complot againſt him, and in the end thruſt him out of his ſeate and ſignorie. He locked him vp in a chamber, and would ſuffer no man to come and ſpeake with him: where for lacke of other occupations, this young man occupied himſelf to make litle coaches or charrets, candleſtickes, ſaddles, ſtooles, and tables of wood. Neuertheleſſe, after he had ſome more libertie, and that his father beganne to let him come abroad: he ſtraight grew to be proud and diſſolute as might be. And they ſay, that when he had rauiſhed a townesmans wife by force, his father being angrie with him, asked him: whether euer he had ſeene him do any ſuch thing or not? the ſonne anſwered him: No more had you a father that was a tyrant. But Dionyſius replyed vpon him again: So ſhalt thou neuer haue a ſon at all, if thou leaueſt not to play theſe wicked parts. Another time going to ſee his ſon in his lodging, and ſeeing there great ſtore of veſſels of gold and ſiluer, he told him: there is nothing in thee of a Lord or Prince, ſince I haue giuen thee ſuch a deale of gold and ſiluer plate, and yet thou knoweſt not how to get a friend. It was an ordinarie thing with Dionyſius to tell wonders, and do litle, being ſo exceeding timorous, but ſpecially after the execution of his Barber, and that his daughters were now waxen great, he would not abide that any ſhould clip his haires with ſizers: but he made an image-maker of images of earth to come to him, who with a burning cole burnt his glib round about his head. Now he made himſelfe to be knowne by a memorable fact he did: which was this. A certaine flatterer called Damocles, praiſing the maieſty and riches of Dionyſius, and the magnificence of his pallace, maintained that the Sun neuer ſaw a more happy man. Dionyſius to make him partaker of this felicitie, made him ſit downe vpon a litle bed very ſumptuous, and enriched with wonderfull precious things. Then he cauſed them to ſet vp tables laden with veſſels of gold and ſiluer, and couered with wonderfull daintie meates, a number of fine Pages attending on his ſeruice, perfumes paſſing rare and moſt excellent ſweet for the chamber, and daintie muſicke both with voice and inſtruments. To be ſhort, all the pleaſures and paſtimes poſſible to be thought of, did compaſſe this minion of court round about. But in the midſt of al this magnificent furniture, Dionyſius cauſed a naked ſword, gliſtering, and ſharpe pointed, to be faſtened to a ſmall haire of a horſe, and to be hanged right ouer Damocles head: who forgetting this felicity he had ſo much commended, beſought Dionyſius it might quickly be taken away. And like as he was cruell vnto men, ſo did he ſhew himſelfe a deſpiſer of his proper gods, wherof we will alleage ſome examples. Hauing ſacked the temple of Proſerpine in the citie of Locres, he tooke the ſea, and hauing a gale of wind at pleaſure: You ſee, ſaid he, how the immortall gods do fauour ſacrileges. He tooke off a cloke of fine gold from Iupiter Olympian, in the towne of Syracvsa, which cloke weighed foureſcore and fiue talents, which are more woorth then fiftie thouſand crownes, and gaue him another of woollen, ſaying: That the cloke of gold was too cold for winter, and too heauie for ſommer: and that the woollen cloke would be more conuenient in both ſeaſons. He rounded alſo the ſtatue of Apollo, which had a glibbe of gold. And finding that money went low with him, by reaſon of his great expences in the warres he had againſt the Carthaginians, he tooke the ſea with a fleete of threeſcore galleys, with pretence to ſet vpon pyrates, but indeed it was to ſpoile a temple of great fame, full of goodly and rich iewels that had bene offered vp there, the which was ſeated vpon the edge of a quarter of a citie of Tvscan called Agylle. Being arriued there in the night, and hauing landed his men: in the morning by breake of day he ſodainly and without any daunger executed his enterpriſe. For the place being guarded with ſome few men, he eaſily forced it, and afterwards at his leyſure ſacked the temple, where he got to the ſumme of 600000. crownes. Which the townesmen vnderſtanding, came out vpon him ſtraight to ſee if they could defend the temple: but he ouercame them in battell, and hauing taken a great number of priſoners, he ſpoiled all their countrie, and then returned to Syracvsa, where he ſold his priſoners and his bootie, for the which he had alſo 300000. crownes more.

So being now well ſtored againe, he began to ſet vp an armie: and becauſe he ſaw the towns ſubiect vnto the Carthaginians willing to reuolt, he did entice them, & vſed them very graciouſly that came and took his part. The Carthaginians hearing that, ſent vnto him to demand their townes, otherwiſe they proclaimed warre againſt him. So on both ſides they came into the field. For the Carthaginians, they diſpatched Mago into Sicilia with a great armie. Dionyſius being afraid of nothing, marched before with his troupes, and being camped neare to a place called Cabales: both the armies fiercely gaue charge vpon each other, & after a long fight Mago was slaine in the place with 10000. of his men, and 5000. taken prisoners. The Carthaginians were not discouraged for all this, but chose them againe the son of Mago for their chiefe Captaine, a young Gentleman, wise, couragious, and valiant. So after they had stayed Dionysius by a truce for a certaine time, the terme being expired, they presented him battell, and fought it out so resolutely, that after they had slaine his brother Leptines (whom he forsooke at his need) and fourteene thousand of his men, with much ado he saued himselfe. But the conquerers being neuer a whit prouder of such a victory, they sent ambassadors vnto him that cõcluded a peace for their aduantage. For beside the townes that remained vnto them, Dionysius paid them 6000. crownes to defray their charges in the wars. Also he kept not this peace long, but brake it shortly after: for vnderstanding that the plague was hot amongst the Carthaginians, and that they were fallen out amongst themselues: he tooke occasion of this aduantage, and to giue colour to his pretence, gaue it out that the souldiers Africans had foraged the lands of his friends, wherupon he leauied an army of 30000. footmen, and 3000. horse: with this army he began to make war againe, and in the first employment of his forces he wan Selinonte and Entelle: & after that he marched to Lilybee to besiege it: but seeing it well guarded, he returned backe againe. Hereupon newes was brought him that fire had taken some of the arsenals of the Carthaginians: wherfore supposing al their ships of war had bene burnt, he began to scoffe at al their forces. But they hauing armed vpon a sodain a fleet of 200. gallies, assailed vnlooked for 130. of Dionysius gallies, which wintered in the hauen of Erix, some of them he sunke and brought away the others. After this losse Dionysius retired into Syracusa, and fell very sicke. The which Dion perceiuing, entred into talke of his children, and of his sister Aristomache. But the Phisitians to currie fauor with yong Dionysius, hindered him that he could haue no fit time to say any thing to him. Or as Timæus writeth, they gaue him a drinke (as he had commanded them) to make him sleepe, and by this means tooke from him his senses, ioyning death with sleepe. Some others say, that he was killed by his guard: others, that he was poisoned. But Diodorus the Sicilian setteth downe the cause after another sort: which is this. He had caused, said he, a litle before, a tragedy of his intituled, The Lenetans, to be plaid at Athens: & hauing gotten the victory, one of the musitians brought him word of it by sea: which did so please him, that after he had richly rewarded the messenger, he made a great sacrifice to the gods to giue them thanks for this prosperity, & sumptuous feasts, vnto the which he inuited all his friends, and dranke so largely, that he fell into a great sicknes wherof he died. Now he had in times past an oracle, that had foretold him he shold dye then, when he had ouercome those that should be worthier then himself. He applyed this oracle to the Carthaginians, supposing it was meant by them, because they were stronger then he. This was the cause that oftentimes in the battels he had wonne against them, he being victour, fled, or willingly suffered himself to be ouercome because of this prediction. Howbeit he could not shun his destiny: for being an ill Poet, he was iudged by the sentence of corrupt iudges, to haue excelled all the other Poets better then euer he was: & then came he to end his daies, as the oracle had foretold him. Now though he had raigned the space of 38. yeares full out, and had boasted many times that he would leaue his son a Principality chained with strong chaines of a diamond: this yong Dionysius ruled no long time, but being shortly after driuen out of Syracusa by the inhabitants themselues, secondly by Dion, & at the last by Timoleon, who ouerthrew him altogether: he was sent to Corinth, where he ended the rest of his daies in misery. Afterwards the Syracusans maintaining their liberty for the space of 20. yeares: they fell into Agathocles hands, who also cõmitted terrible cruelties. After his death, they being full of ciuill dissention, demanded aide of Pirrhus king of Epirus against the Carthaginians. He hauing made a iourny into Sicilia, was constrained to leaue it, and had great war with the Romains. By reason wherof the Syracusans willingly yeelded themselues vnto Hieron the second of that name, vnder whom (a great friend of the Romains) they prospered the space of fiftie yeares. But after his death, his litle sonne Hieronymus, a yong Lord and vnruly: tooke part with the Carthaginians: and hauing raigned only fifteene moneths, he was killed by his guard. Now for that his death brought on great confusions, and that the Syracusans enclined to the Carthaginians part: the Consull Marcellus went to besiege Syracusa, and tooke it in the second yeare of the 142. Olympiade. So that afterwards it was gouerned by Prætors, and according to the Romaine law, euen to the declination of their Empire.

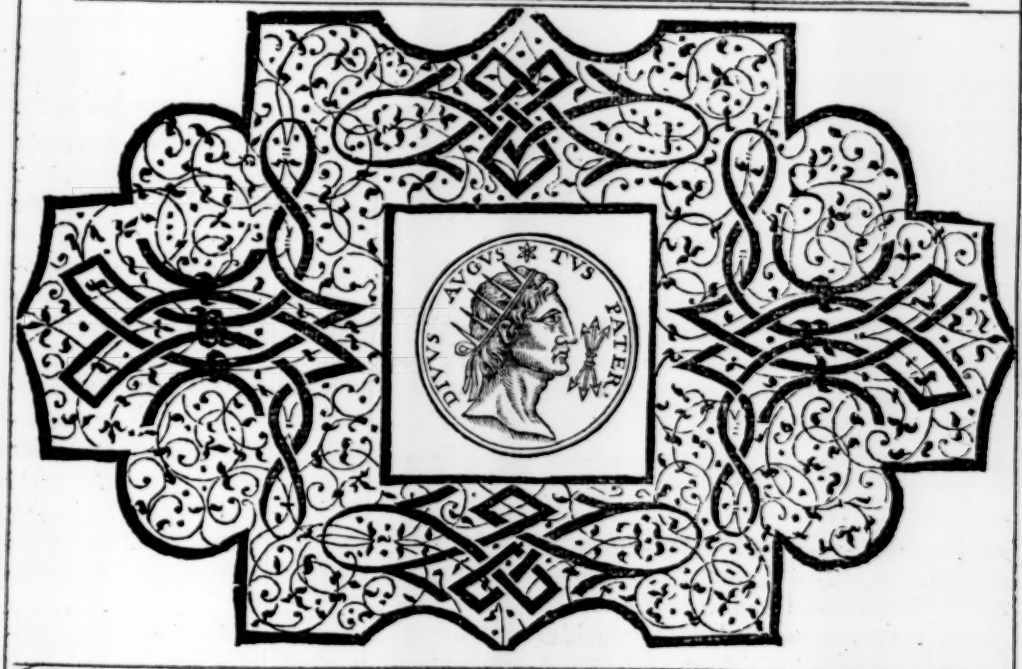
THE LIFE OF
Octauius Cæsar Augustus.



Thy youth Auguſtus, and thy tongues good gift,
Thy valour, wiſedome, and thy worthy feats,
Thy countries loue, thy lawes, and ſtatutes, lift
Thy throne aboue all other princely ſeates.

ACcia, the daughter of Accius Balbus and of Iulia the ſiſter of Iulius Cæſar, was maried vnto the father of this man, whoſe life we write of now, and who was deſcended of the auncient race of the Octauians, iſſued out of the countrey of the VOLSCES, and knowne at ROME from the time of Tarquinius, and of Seruius Tullus. Their ſonne Octauius was borne in the yeare of the Conſulſhip of Cicero and of Caius Antonius, at that time when as the conſpiracy of Catiline was diſcouered, and ſuppreſſed. He was called Thurinus: but afterwards, according to the tenor of his vnckles teſtament, who made him his heire, he was called Caius Iulius Cæſar, and laſtly Auguſtus, by the aduice of Munatius Plancus, and by the decree of the Senate. He was but foure yeares old when his father died, and at twelue yeares he made the funerall oration for his grandmother Iulia: foure yeares after that, he became a gowneman, though he were but yong: yet his vnckle gaue him a preſent at his returne out of AFRICK, ſuch as the ſouldiers are accuſtomed to haue of their Captaines. Shortly after he followed his vnckle into SPAINE, whither he was gone againſt the children of Pompey, and paſſed through many great dangers to ouertake him. This warre being ended, becauſe Cæſar vndertooke other longer iourneys, Octauius was ſent into the city of APPOLONIA: and there plied his booke very diligently. And it chanced him, without hauing any mind to it, that being gone to ſee Theogenes a learned Aſtronomer, he caſt his natiuity, and ſuddenly he leapt being amazed, and honoured him. The which made Octauius conceiue great hope of himſelfe, and in memorie of this good hap, he cauſed certaine peeces of money to be coined, and he himſelfe told the opinion of Theogenes. Being returned from APPOLONIA to ROME, after his vnckle was ſlaine by Caſsius, Brutus, and their allies, he declared himſelfe to be his heire, though his mother and Marcius Philippus were of another mind. And hauing put himſelfe forward, he gouerned

the commonwealth of Rome, first with Antonius and Lepidus: afterwards with Antonius the space of twelue yeares: and lastly himselfe alone, the space of foure and forty yeares. But before we speake of his gouernement of common affaires in time of peace and warre, let vs say somewhat (after Swetonius) of his family and his maners. He married being yet very young the daughter of Publius Seruilius Isauricus: but hauing made peace with Antonius after the warre of Mvtine, and at the request of their armies who were desirous to see them friends, he maried with Clodia, the daughter of Publius Clodius and of Fuluia then wife of Antonius. But before he knew her, he sent her to her mother, with whom he was somewhat discontented, and because of the warre also of Perovse. Immediatly he maried Scribonia, and kept not her long because she was too troublesome: yet he had a daughter by her called Iulia. But forsaking her, he tooke another which he loued vnto the end: and that was Liuia Drusilla the wife of Tiberius Nero, whom he caried with him great with child as she was, and had no children by her but one, and yet she went not out her time, and it had no life. His daughter Iulia was maried vnto Marcellus, the sonne of his sister Octauia: and after his death vnto Marcus Agrippa, by whom she had three sonnes, Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa: and two daughters, Iulia, and Agrippine. After the death of Marcus Agrippa, he chose for his sonne in law Tiberius the sonne of Tiberius Nero and of Liuia Drusilla, at that time a knight of Rome, and compelled him to forsake his wife Vipsamia, of whom he had a sonne called Drusus. But as he was fortunate in managing the affaires of the common wealth, so was he vnfortunate in his race: for his daughter and his neece Iulia committed so foule faults in Rome, that he was constrained to banish them. Agrippine was maried vnto Germanicus, the sonne of his sisters daughter. Caius and Lucius died in lesse then a yeare and a halfe one after the other: whereupon he adopted his nephew Agrippa, and his sonne in law Tiberius. But because Agrippa was of a churlish nature and vnhonest, he did disinherite him, and confined him to Svrrentvm. His neece Iulia had a child after she was banished, but he would not know it, nor suffer it should be brought vp. He was very modest and continent in all the parts of his life, sauing that he was somewhat giuen to women and play: for the rest, he liked not great pallaces, but was contented with meane lodgings: and if there were any ornament, it was in porches and parkes. His housholde-stuffe and apparell was nothing sumptuous nor costly. It pleased him well to make feasts, he very carefully made choise of his guests, and oftentimes he sate downe at the table a long time after euery body, and would rise before others, which remained after he was vp. In his ordinarie diet he banished superfluity of meates: he delighted to be merry and pleasant among his friends, or to bring in pleasant players of comedies to passe the time away. And he did not tie himselfe to any certaine howres to eate his meate, but when his stomacke serued him he tooke something. So that somtimes he supped not at al, and then when euery man was gone, he made them bring him meate, neither dainty nor delicate. Also he drunke very litle wine, he slept in the day, and by times in the night, talking with some, or reading: so that oftentimes he slept not till the breake of day, and for that he tooke no rest in the night, he might chaunce to sleepe in his litter as they caried him in the streetes in the day time vp and downe Rome. He was a goodly Prince, and that kept himselfe in good state from the beginning of his life to the latter end: not curious to set himselfe out, as litle caring to be shauen, as to weare long haire: and in stead of a looking-glasse, reading in his booke, or writing, euen whilest the Barber was trimming of him. Whether he spake or held his peace, he had so comely a face, that many of his enemies bent to do him hurt, their hearts would not serue them so soone as euer they looked on him. He had very cleare and liuely eyes, but with time he was subiect to many diseases and infirmities, the which he remedied with great care. As for his exercises, he left armes and horses immediatly after the ciuill warres: for he was neuer any great souldier. He would play at tennis, at the ballone, he would go abroad in his coach to walke and stirre himselfe. Sometimes he would go a fishing, or play at the bones, or at nuts with yong children of the Moores & Syrians that had some pretty maner and behauiour with them, and alwayes spake words to moue laughter. He was learned in the liberall sciences, very eloquent, and desirous to learne: insomuch that during the warre of Mvtina, in the middest of all his infinite affaires, he did reade, he wrote, and made orations amongst his familiars. He neuer spake vnto the Senate nor people, nor to his souldiers, but he had first written and premeditated that he would say vnto them, although he had speech at commaundement, to propound or aunswer to anything in the field. And because he would not deceiue his memory, or loſe time in ſuperfluous ſpeech: he determined euer to write all that he would ſay: and he was the firſt inuenter of it. If he had to conferre with any man, or with his wife in any matters of importance: he would put that downe in his writing tables, becauſe he would ſpeake neither more nor leſſe. And he tooke pleaſure to pronounce his words with a ſweete voyce and good grace, hauing continually about him for this purpoſe a fine man to frame his voice. But one day hauing a paine in his mouth, he made his oration to the people by an Herauld. He made many bookes and verſes of diuerſe ſorts: but all is dead with time. His ſpeech was as the reſt of his life, eloquent, well couched together, and ſententious. He delighted to reade good authors, but he gathered nothing other then the ſentences teaching good maners: and hauing witten them out word by word, he gaue out a copy of them to his familiars: and ſent them about to the gouernours of prouinces, and to the magiſtrates of ROME and of other cities. He was ſomewhat, and too much giuen vnto deuinations: he was maruellouſly afraid of thunder and lightning: he had a great confidence in dreames, and in ſuch like vanities. But peraduenture we are too curious ſearching out his priuate life: yet that may ſometime diſcouer great perſonages more then their publicke actions, in the which they are more carefull to frame their countenances, and do counterfeit moſt.

Now, as we haue lightly runne ouer his priuate life before ſpoken of: ſo ſhall the memorable deeds done by his authorite be briefly repreſented: being vnpoſſible to comprehend in a few lines ſo many notable things, vnleſſe a man would make a great booke of them. This is to be noted in him, that ſo young a man hauing ſo ſmall beginnings, comming out of a meane houſe in compariſon of others, hath excelled all other young and old men in wiſedome and greatneſſe of courage: ſhould riſe ſo high, that before he had bene Prætor the Senate gaue him the name of Auguſtus, created him maiſter of the horſe, when as yet he neuer had charge of a company of men at armes: proclaimed him Emperour and ſoueraigne captaine, afore he had bene placed in any publike office by authority of the Senate. Furthermore, for the firſt time he was choſen Conſull when he was but twentie yeares old: and he was thirteene times Conſull, and twentie times called Soueraigne captaine. Afterwards, when he was not yet foure and thirtie yeares old, the Senate and people of ROME gaue him this goodly name of father of his country, becauſe he had maintained and preſerued the commonwealth. It is a wonderfull thing that he could wind himſelfe out of ſo many great affaires and warres, that he could within foure and twentie yeares of age, reſtore againe into ſo good eſtate the commonwealth of ROME, turmoiled and troubled with ſo many proſcriptions and ciuill warres as it was. And that afterwards ſo long as he commaunded alone, he did ſo firmely eſtabliſh this Monarchie, that notwithſtanding the infinite troubles receiued vnder other Emperours, yet it ſtood vpright and in ſo great proſperitie for ſo many hundred yeares. After the death of Iulius Cæſar, this man being but bare eighteene yeares old, came to ROME, where he was welcomed and immediatly did conteſt with Antonius, hated of Cicero and of many others: from whence the aduancement of this young Cæſar came, and the declaration of the warre againſt Antonius, iudged an enemy of the commonwealth, and ouercome by the Conſuls Hirtius and Panſa. Cæſar who was their aſſociate, was called Soueraigne captaine, though he had not yet fought: both the Conſuls being dead of their hurts. But the Senate after this ouerthrow, beginning to change their mind, he perceiuing that they were ſlow to graunt him the Conſulſhip, reſolued to poſſeſſe it by force of armes, and began to acquaint himſelfe with Antonius and Lepidus which were ioyned together: he made that the ſouldiers promiſed by oath the one to the other, that they would fight againſt none of Cæſars troupes, & ſent 400 men to ROME to aske for him, in the name of all the army, the office of Cõſull. They hauing deliuered their charge vnto the Senate, Cornelius the Centiner chiefe of this legation or ambaſſade, perceiuing they wold giue him no preſent anſwer, caſting vp his caſſocke, & ſhewing the Senate the pommell of his ſword, ſayd vnto them: This ſhall do it, if you will not do it. So they being returned without obtaining their demand, Cæſar made Antonius and Lepidus come into ITALY, & he for his part hauing paſſed the riuer of Rubicon, marched with 8 legions right to ROME. This put all ROME in ſuch a feare, as they ſent to Cæſar to preſent him the Conſulſhip: and twiſe ſo much in gift, as they had promiſed the legions. Now whileſt the Ambaſſadors were on their way, the Senators beginning again to take hart to them, encouraged by the arriuall of the legions of AFRICK, they determined to try all meanes before they wold betray the liberty of their coũtry, being minded to cal backe that which they had ſent to Cæſar, & ſo diſpoſed themſelues to make warre. Cæſar being offended with this inconſtancie, ſent certaine horſemen before to aſſure the people that he would make no tumult at all: he drew his legions neare, and made himſelfe Lord of ROME without one ſtroke ſtriken: and contrariwiſe, the people and Senate receiued him with ſhew of great ioy. Then, in the aſſembly of all the people he was choſen Conſull, iuſt at the full accompliſhment of twenty yeares of his age. So he demaunded in the field that they ſhould proceed criminally againſt thoſe that had killed his father Cæſar. Q. Pedius his fellow Conſull publiſhed the decree. So were Brutus and Caſsius, and all their friends condemned, with interdiction of water and fire. But for as much as Auguſtus had too ſmall meanes to ſet vpon Brutus and Caſsius, he reconciled Antonius and Lepidus with the Senate, and made alliance with them, followed with great armies. They ioyned, and were in conſultation of their affaires the ſpace of three dayes together, neare vnto BOLONIA, or vnto MVTINE, and as if the ROMAINE Empire had bene their owne inheritance, they deuided it betweene them three. So that Cæſar had the high and baſe LYBIA, with SICILIA, and SARDINIA. SPAINE and GAVLE NARBONNESE fell vnto Lepidus: and the reſt of GAVLE was for Antonius. They did decree alſo that they ſhould be called Trium-viri, appointed for the reeſtabliſhment of the commonwealth, with ſoueraigne authority for fiue yeares, to diſpoſe and giue the eſtates and offices to whom they thought good, without asking aduice of the Senate nor people. So they eſtabliſhed Lepidus Conſull for the yeare following, in the place of Decimus Brutus that was killed: and they gaue him the gard of ROME and ITALIE, ſo long as they two that remained made their preparations to go againſt Brutus and Caſsius. Beſides the preſents they ſhould make vnto the ſouldiers after the victory, they promiſed to giue them leaue to eaſe themſelues, & eighteene rich townes in ITALIE for them to dwell in. Then they began to ſet vp a rolle of all the citizens of ROME appointed by them to be ſlaine. And they decreed to euery free man that ſhould bring the Trium-viri a head of the proſcripts, the ſum of two thouſand fiue hundred crownes, and halfe ſo much vnto the ſlaues with enfranchiſement: and the like ſumme alſo to whoſoeuer could diſcouer any man that had hidden or fauoured the proſcripts. Antonius and Lepidus were thought to be the chiefe authors of this horrible tragedie: and Cæſar ſeemed willing to none but to the murtherers of his father, and did a long time oppoſe himſelfe againſt the other two: but at the length he gaue ouer, and they made wonderfull changes, abandoning their owne parents and friends the one to the other, to be reuenged of their enemies. But when the ſword was once drawne, he was no leſſe cruell then the other two. Cicero was not forgotten, as we may ſee in his life: and it would be very hard to deſcribe the wickedneſſe of that time, the which like a furious ſtreame caried away ſo many citizens of ROME. In whoſe hiſtorie do appeare moſt rare examples of all ſorts of vices and vertues in all manner of perſons: of whom we will make mention, after thoſe that haue written more at large: as amongſt others, Appianus Alexandrinus: which will ſerue to ſhew, how much a man is a furious beaſt, being lift vp in authoritie in the commonwealth, and giuen to reuenge. That there is nothing certaine nor ſure in mans proſperitie, which bringeth much enuie to his ſeruants: as to the contrarie aduerſitie maketh the afflicted contemptible: and euery body aſhamed of them. But they are wiſe men, that in ſuch tragicall accidents do cary an inuincible heart, reſolutely obeying neceſſitie, and a more high prouidence then that of man. We muſt not call that intollerable which may happen to great or meane men: for all humane accidents are vnder the feete of vertue. It chaunceth often, that force and wiſedome do defend a man, as alwayes theſe two vertues do preſerue his honour. He is well aduiſed that can finely pacifie and diuert the furie of an enemy: as to the contrary ſhame and deſpaire do gripe cowards, ſlothfull, and fearfull. But in fine, neceſſity preſſeth on the one ſide, and danger on the other.

So they did ſet vp the names of the proſcripts faſtned in diuers places of ROME, to the number of an hundred & thirty Senators for the firſt time, a hundred & fiftie at the ſecond time, and two thouſand Knights. Then was the gate open to all villanies and cruelties, fought withall by patience and fidelity: but the examples will ſhew that better then all the diſcourſe a man can make. Saluius Otho, Tribune of the people, was one of the firſt. Hauing inuited his friends to his laſt ſupper, a Centener came in, who in the preſence of all his gueſts, halfe dead for feare, ſtrake off his head. Minutius the Prætor was alſo killed, ſitting in his ſeate of iudgement. L. Villius Annalis, a man that had bene Conſull, being eſcaped out of the hands of the murtherers, ſaued himſelfe in the ſubburbes in a litle houſe of one of his clients: but his owne ſonne hauing

no patience to ſtay for the inheritance of his father, bewrayed him vnto the ſouldiers who went to kill him there. Shortly after, this parricide being drunke had a quarrell with the ſelfe ſame ſouldiers, who ſtabbed him in with their daggers. C. Toranius was betrayed in like maner by his owne ſonne, who hauing conſumed in a few dayes the ſucceſſion which he had ſo execrably purſued, and being condemned for theft, was baniſhed into a place where he died for want and pouerty. Now againſt theſe wicked, let vs ſet ſome vertuous children. Q. Cicero was hid by his ſonne, whom they could neuer make confeſſe (though he was tormented) where his father was: who, not able any longer to endure they ſhould afflict ſo vertuous a ſonne with ſo many euils for his ſake, came and preſented himſelfe to the murtherers. The ſonne began to intreate them to kill him before his father: but they were both killed at one time. The Egnates, father and ſonne, one embracing the other, were both run through and ſlaine at one blow. C. Hoſidius Geta was buried for dead by his ſonne: who ſaued him, ſuſtained and kept him till it was peace. Arruntius, after he had comforted and ſtrengthened his ſonne, put himſelfe to the ſwords of the murtherers. The ſonne died immediatly after for griefe, and famine. Some other children carefully ſaued and kept their fathers, and hid them. Certaine women alſo ſhewed themſelues maruellous faithfull and louing to their husbands: and ſo were there to the contrarary ſome vnfaithfull, that diſcouered their wonderfull wickedneſſe. Tanuſia made ſuch earneſt ſute, that ſhe obtained grace of Cæſar for T. Iunius her husband, who was hidden by Philopœmen his bondman enfranchiſed: whom Cæſar knighted for his fidelity to his maiſter. Q. Ligarius hauing bene kept by his wife was diſcouered by a ſlaue, and killed: wherefore his wife killed her ſelfe with famine. Lucretius Veſpillo, hauing erred and runne in great daunger here and there, not knowing whither to flie: came ſecretly to his wife Thuria, and was hidden and kept cloſe betwixt the ſeeling and the top of the houſe, vntill ſhe had obtain ed his grace of the Trium-viri. Apuleius was ſaued by his wife, who fled with him. The wife of Antius wrapped vp her husband in couerlets, and made him be caried to the ſea as a packet of ſtuffe, where he imbarked, and ſailed into SICILIA. Coponius was ſaued by his wife, who put her honour aſide in reſpect of her husbands life: for ſhe lent her body one night vnto Antonius to preſerue him (which ſhe did by that meanes) whom ſhe loued better then her ſelfe. Now to the contrary, ſome women vnfaithfull to their husbands, deliuered them into the hands of the murtherers, becauſe they might marrie againe. Amongſt other, the wife of Septimius hauing ſhamefully giuen her body vnto one of Antonius familiars: ſhe cauſed her husband to be put in the number of the Proſcripts, that ſhe might more eaſily continue her adulterie: and ſo was Septimius put to death. Q. Vettius Salaſſius, was hidden in a ſure priuy place: wherewith he acquainted his wife, but ſhe ſtraight reuealed him to the murtherers. The which he perceiuing from a high place where he was, caſt himſelfe downe headlong, chuſing rather to die ſo, then to make his cruell wife paſtime. Fuluius was diſcouered by a ſlaue of his, and his concubine: ielous becauſe he had maried a wife, and had left her, although notwithſtanding he had made her free, and had giuen her goods to liue withall. Now let vs preſently ſpeake of the faithfulneſſe and vnfaithfulneſſe of ſlaues enfranchiſed. P. Naſo was betrayed by his ſlaue freed, with whom he had bene too familiar. But he ſold his death, for he killed the traytor with his owne hands, and afterwards held out his neck to the hangmen. L. Lucceius had put into the hands of two of his ſlaues manumiſſed, as much as was neceſſary to haue relieued him in his baniſhment: but they ranne away with all, and he came and put himſelfe to the ſlaughter. Haterius, that was in a ſecret place, was ſold and diſcouered by a ſlaue of his. Caſſius Varus being bewrayed by a free man that was his ſlaue, eſcaped neuertheleſſe, and hid himſelfe among reeds: where being found by thoſe of MINTVRNES, they tooke him for a theefe, and would haue racked him to haue bewrayed his companions, he diſcouered himſelfe to be a Senator of ROME: but they would not beleeue him, becauſe he was in poore eſtate. But whileſt they were reaſoning of the matter, there cometh a Centener that ſtrake off his head. C. Plotius was ſaued by his ſlaues: but being a man giuen to parfume and rubbe himſelfe with odoriferous ointments, the ſent and ſmell of them diſcouered him to the ſouldiers, that went ferriting vp and downe in his houſe: yet could they not find him, but cruelly tormented his ſeruants, to make them confeſſe where he was: which they would neuer do. But Plotius hauing compaſſion of the euils of his faithfull ſlaues, came out of the place where he was hidden, and becauſe he would prolong their life, he ſhortened his owne, and preſented himſelfe to the murtherers. Appius Claudius, as he was neare to be had by the backe, chaunged his gowne with his ſlaue, who went in that ſort to preſent himſelfe to the murtherers: but they tooke off his head, and ſo he ſaued his maiſters head. Another ſlaue of Menenius did the like: for he went into his maiſters litter, and offered his necke to the ſword of the murtherers: who diſpatched him whileſt his maiſter got to the port of the ſea, from whence he eſcaped into SICILIA. But the ſlaue of Vrbinus Panopio is worthy of memory euery where: for he hearing the murtherers came to ſacke his maiſter, tooke his maiſters gowne from him and his ring, gaue him his owne, and put him out at the backe gate. Then he goeth vp into his maiſters chamber, and lay downe vpon his bed, where he boldly attended them that killed him for Panopio. Another ſhewed himſelfe no leſſe faithfull in the behalfe of Antius Reſtio: for although his maiſter had throughly thwacked him for his knauiſh trickes played a few dayes before, and that then it ſeemeth he had oportunity to be reuenged: he to the contrary imployed himſelfe after a maruellous faſhion to ſaue his maiſter: for he meeting with an old man in his iourney ſtrake off his head, and ſhewing that with his whippings together to the murtherers, he made them eaſily beleeue that he had bene well reuenged of his maiſter, with whom immediatly after he ſaued himſelfe in SICILIA. The ſlaues of Martius Cenſorinus kept him a long time, and ſo well that he had leiſure to go to Sextus Pompeius. Q. Oppius an honourable old man, and being almoſt at the pits brincke, like to be killed, was reſcued by his ſonne, who hauing finely gotten him out of ROME, tooke him vpon his ſhoulders, and afterwards led him into SICILIA, where all the poore diſtreſſed ROMAINES were gently receiued: for Pompeius had ſent certaine ſhips to keepe vpon the coaſt of ITALIE, and pinaſſes euery where, to the end to receiue all them that fled on that ſide: giuing them double recompence that ſaued a Proſcript, and honourable offices to men that had bene Conſuls and eſcaped, comforting and entertaining the others with a moſt ſingular courteſie: many went into MACEDON to Brutus and Caſsius: others into AFRICKE to Cornificius. Some hauing eſcaped the tempeſt that was in the time of Sylla, were euen glutted with this cruelty: as amongſt others, M. Fiduſtius, and Lucius Philuſcius. T. Labienus was one of the number of the murtherers in the proſcription of Sylla. Afterwards he did nothing elſe but go vp and downe with a ſoule poſſeſſed with furies: ſo that being weary of his life at this time, he went and ſate in a chaire at his gate, quietly attending that they ſhould put him in the number of them that ſhould be killed. Statius Samnis, an honourable Senator, being foure-ſcore yeares old: becauſe theeues ſhould haue no part of his goods, he left them in pray whoſoeuer would take them: and afterwards ſet his houſe on fire, and burnt himſelfe within it. Aponius being kept a good while by his ſlaues, was ſo weary to be ſhut vp in a troubleſome place, and where he liued very poorely: that he came out to the market place, and held out his throat to the murtherers. Ceſtius being poſſeſſed with the like griefe, cauſed his ſlaues to make a great fire, and then caſt himſelfe in it. Sulpitius Rufus, a man that had bene Conſull died, becauſe of an Ile of his the which he would not ſell vnto Fuluia: as alſo Ampius Balbus, for that he refuſed to giue this woman a pleaſant place of his. Balbus was betrayed by a ſeruant of his, that ſhortly after was hanged vpon a gibbet by ſentence of the people: and ſo had his reward for his villanous fact. Antonius did put in the number of Proſcripts a Senator called Nonius Struma, and onely to get out of his hands an Emerode eſteemed at fiftie thouſand crownes. But Nonius found the meanes to eſcape with this Emerode to the great deſpite of him that greedily deſired this pray. Some valiantly defended themſelues, as Atteius Capito, that killed many ſouldiers running rudely vpon him, thinking he would haue ſuffered himſelfe to be killed as others were. Howbeit after he had ſold his fleſh deare, he was ouercome by multitude of aſſailants. Vetulinus aided with his ſonne, hauing many times valiantly repulſed the murtherers, he would haue ſaued himſelfe in SICILIA: but in the ſtraight he met with ſuch a number of enemies, that there he was killed. Sicilius Coronas a Senator, was put in the number of Proſcripts, becauſe he would not with others condemne Brutus and Caſsius: deuiſing how to eſcape, he put himſelfe in ranke among thoſe that caried a dead corpes to buriall: but he was diſcouered and put to death. The Triumviri appointed ſuch men as they liked of to take charge of them that had bene killed. They ſold the goods of the Proſcripts by the drumme, at ſuch price as the ſouldiers would: and yet the moſt part of them were ſpoiled and giuen away. They promiſed the widowes their ioynter, and to the ſonnes the tenth part of the patrimonie of their fathers, and to the daughters the twentieth part. Howbeit there were few, and in maner none, that had any benefite by that: but to the contrarie, they ſacked many that demaunded ſuch rights. On the other ſide, they did

exact great ſummes of money vpon the citie of ROME, and ouer all ITALIE: the owners were conſtrained to giue the halfe of their yearely reuenue: the tenants to furniſh one yeares rent of that they held of others: the maiſters of houſes, the halfe of the rent of their houſes, according to the rent they went for. To encourage the ſouldiers, the Triumuiri gaue vnmeaſurable gifts, granted them daily new pillage: the legions wintered in the richeſt townes, who were compelled to feed the ſouldiers at their owne charge. Furthermore, all the rich men were conſtrained to pay in nature of a tribute at one time, the tenth part of all that they were woorth. To be ſhort, ſo that they could find out new inuentions, it was enough to exact mony. For the feare and cuſtome to endure all, had faſhioned men to be more ſlaues, then the murtherers and exactors would haue had them. And to cloſe vp all, the Triumuiri cauſed mony to be coyned: the which on the one ſide had the image of Antonius with an inſcription in Latine, the effect whereof is this: M. Antonius Emperor, Augur, Triumuir, for the eſtabliſhment of the commonwealth. And on the other ſide there were three hands ioyned together, with the markes of the Conſulſhip, and had theſe words: Salus generis humani, that is to ſay: The health of mankind.

Now during the cruelties of this Triumuirate, Brutus and his followers made themſelues ſtrong in MACEDON, and did diuers exploits of warre: and were afterwards ouercome in the fields PHILIPPIANS, as hath bene ſaid in the life of Brutus, which we need not rehearſe againe, the principall being comprehended there. After this victorie, Antonius went into the Eaſt to diſpoſe of his affaires in ASIA, and to leauie money there to pay his ſouldiers, hauing promiſed to euery one of them fiue hundred crownes. Cæſar returned into ITALIE to refreſh himſelfe, to aſſigne Colonies to his ſouldiers, to pacifie the troubles Lepidus had procured, and to ſet a pike betwixt him and Pompey at a need: if he were neuer ſo litle in league with him. Cæſar fell grieuouſly ſicke at BRVNDVSIVM: but being recouered againe he entred into ROME, pacified all things, and kept Lepidus in his wonted degree. But when he came to bring his ſouldiers into Colonies, then the ſtorme began to riſe: for the owners cryed out that they were tyrannized, being driuen out of their inheritances: the old ſouldiers they complained that promiſe was not kept with them. Fuluia and ſome others practiſed to ſet them on, to the end to draw a warre into ITALIE, and by this meanes to make Antonius come againe beſotted by Cleopatra. Theſe things proceeded ſo farre that Fuluia tooke armes, for ſhe was then in the campe, her ſword by her ſide, and commanded like a Captaine. Cæſar on the other ſide being angry, ſent her daughter home to her, vnto whom he was betrothed, and led his armie againſt the NVRSINIANS and SENTINATES the allies of Fuluia. In the meane ſpace Lucius Antonius departed in the night with ſpeed, and entred into ROME by treaſon: vſed it as a citie taken in warre, and draue out Lepidus. Cæſar left Saluidienus to beſiege the SENTINATES, returned to ROME, and draue out Lucius, followed him and ſhortened his iourney as he was going into GAVLE, ſhut him vp, and beſieged him a great time in PEROVSE, and compelled him through famine to yeeld himſelfe, and to craue pardon, which he graunted him. PEROVSE was burnt by a ſtrange accident: for one of the chiefeſt of the citie hauing ſet his houſe on fire, after he had wounded himſelfe with his dagger, a boiſterous wind being riſen vpon it, ſo diſperſed the flames abrode, that it burnt all the houſes beſides. Cæſar cauſed ſome of his Captaines to be killed that were againſt him. He condemned the NVRSINIANS in a great ſumme of money, and becauſe they could not pay it, he draue them out of their citie and territorie. Afterwards he ſuppreſſed ſome troubles raiſed in NAPLES by Tiberius Claudius Nero, father of Tiberius Cæſar, and fauourer of Fuluia: who ſeeing her ſelfe vnder foot, ſhe fled vnto ATHENS. But Cæſar to preuent a new conſpiracie, ſent Lucius Antonius far from ROME, to commaund the legions that were in SPAINE: he gaue him alſo commiſſioners to looke into him, and to obſerue his actions. He finely draue out Lepidus alſo into AFRICK with ſixe legions. On the other ſide Fuluia being dead, Cæſar and Antonius agreed being ready to fight: after that they made peace with Pompey that gouerned SICILIA. Immediatly after that he went into GAVLE, to appeaſe ſome troubles that happened there, and ſent Agrippa before, who compelled the AQVITANS to ſubmit themſelues, and pacified al GAVLE. On the other ſide Cneus Caluinus ſubdued the CERETANIANS in SPAINE. And becauſe the legions had committed certaine inſolencies, whereupon they fell together by the eares, and the enemies had the better hand: after he had ſharpely reproued them, he took the tenth man of the two firſt bands, and belaboured Iubellius with a cudgell. In the mean time Cæſar ſent at times troupsof men of armes into DALMATIA, and ILLYRIA, to the end to breath them for other warres that were a hatching, as that of SI-

CILIA was the firſt. For Menas the pyrat, Sextus Pompeius Lieutenant, hauing for deſpite brought his fleet vnto Cæſar, and taken his part, vnto whom alſo he deliuered the Iles of SARDINIA and CORSICA, with three legions: Cæſar did him great honors, & refuſed to deliuer him againe vnto Pompey, who asked him of him. Beſides that Pompey complained of Antonius, and pretending to haue iuſt occaſions, he tooke armes againe. Wherfore Cæſar ſent for Antonius and Lepidus out of GRECE and AFRICKE to come and aide him. Antonius came to the hauen of BRVNDVSIVM: but vpon the ſudden, not knowne wherfore, he tooke ſea againe, & returned from whence he came. Lepidus came too late, which made Cæſar (ſeeing all the weight fall on his armes) that he ſent his Lieutenants againſt Pompey: who fought with them by ſea & by land, & had the better, and put Cæſar to great trouble, who had like to haue bin killed by a ſlaue alſo, that wold haue reuenged the death of his maiſters father, that was a proſcript. After that Antonius being come to TARENTVM, with intention to make war againſt Cæſar: Octauia ſiſter of the one, and wife of the other, agreed them, ſo that they did yet prolong with Lepidus their Triumuirate for fiue yeares more. Antonius went againſt the PARTHIANS, and Cæſar prepared to ſet vpon Pompey againe. Hereupon Menas being angry for that he was not ſo well accounted of as he thought he deſerued: he returned againe to ioyne with Pompey with 7. gallies. Cæſars fleet hauing ſuſtained great hurt by tempeſt, was alſo beaten by Menas. Lepidus wan LILYBEE, & tooke certaine neighbor villages. Cæſar hauing repaired his ſhips and army by ſea, and made it ſtronger then before vnder the conduct of Agrippa, who ſailed vnto LIPARE, he gaue battell by ſea vnto Pompeys Lieutenants. But they being aided by Menas (that was returned the ſecond time) he ouercame and wan thirtie ſhippes. But the other fleet that Cæſar himſelfe brought, was wholly ouerthrowne by Pompey, neare vnto TAVROMENION, and Cæſar brought to that extremitie, that he was readie to kill himſelfe. But Cornificius ran to the ſhore who ſaued him, and brought him to the campe: from whence he retired further off, and very quickly (but with great daunger) vnto MESSALA. After certaine encounters where Pompey euer had the better, inſomuch as Lepidus was ſuſpected to leane on that ſide, Cæſar reſolued to commit all to the hazard of a latter battell: and to draw Pompey vnto it, he cut him ſo ſhort of victuals, that he was conſtrained to come to blowes, and the fight was verie cruell: wherein Agrippa beſtirred himſelfe ſo valiantly, that he wan the victorie, ſunke 28. ſhips, brake and ſpoiled the moſt part of the reſt, and tooke two of the chiefeſt Captaines Pompey had: one of the which called Demochares, killed himſelfe with his owne hands. Now for Pompey, who but a litle before had about three hundred and fiftie ſaile, he fled away with all ſpeed only with ſeuenteene, and went to MESSINA ſo diſcouraged, that leauing all hope and his armie he had by land, he went to the Ile of CEPHALONIE, where being ſomewhat come to himſelfe, he determined to repaire to Antonius. But Tiſienus a Frenchman (his lieutenãt of the armie by land) led all his troupes vnto Lepidus: ſome GREEKE hiſtorians report that it was to Cæſar. Plemminius was within MESSINA with eight legions, and did capitulate with Lepidus to render vp the towne to him: wherupon Agrippa hapned to come thither: who maintained, that they ought to regard Cæſar that was abſent then. But that ſtood him in no ſtead, for Lepidus entred the towne, & gaue the ſpoile of it as well to Plemminius ſoldiers as to his. Therupon Cæſar vndertooke a thing worthie of memory, which was: that being vnarmed he went into Lepidus campe, & turning by the blows of the darts that were thrown at him by ſome, which hit his cloke & pierced it: he took hold of an enſigne of a legion. Then the ſouldiers all of them armed followed him, and left Lepidus: who ſhortly after loſt empire and army: he that with 20. legions promiſed himſelf SICILIA and a great deale more, Cæſar gaue him his life, and the office of ſoueraigne Biſhop of ROME, whither he ſent him. Some ſay he was baniſhed. Vpõ theſe ſtirs there roſe a ſedition in Cæſars campe through the inſolencie of the ſouldiers, that ran euen to his iudgement ſeat, vſing great menaces. But he wiſely appeaſed all, puniſhed the authours of the tumult, and did caſſiere all the tenth legion with great ſhame and ignominie, becauſe the ſouldiers of the ſame did outbraue him in words. He diſperſed and ſent ſome others to their houſes, and gaue vnto them that had vſed themſelues gently, two thouſand Seſterces for euery ſouldier: which is thought to amount neare to fiftie crownes. He made them to be muſtred, and found that they were fiue and fortie legions, fiue and twentie thouſand horſmen, and ſixe and thirtie thouſand lightly armed. Afterwards he did great honours vnto his Lieutenant Agrippa for his notable ſeruice, and commaunded Statilius Taurus to go into AFRICKE to take poſſeſſion of the Prouinces of Lepidus. Whileſt Antonius made warre with the PARTHIANS, or rather infortunately they made

warre with him to his great confusion: his Lieutenant Titius found the meanes to lay hands vpon Sextus Pompeius that was fled into the Ile of SAMOS, and then fortie yeares old: whom he put death by Antonius commandement: for which fact he was so hated of the people of ROME, that though he had giuen them the pastime of certaine playes at his owne costs and charges, they draue him out of the Theater.

Moreouer, Cæsar thinking to haue sailed out of SICILIA into MAVRITANIA, the sea being rough stayed him: which was the cause that he sent his armie into ILLYRIA, and set vpon the IAPVDES, which did him much mischiefe, yet at the last he ouercame them. Then he ranne vpon the PANNONIANS, and the DALMATIANS, whom he made tributaries, being hurt in his thighes, in his armes, and in one of his knees, in this warre against the ILLYRIANS. On the other side, Messala his Lieutenant fought against the SALASSIANS, dwelling in a valley enuironed with high mountaines of the Alpes: and after diuerse ouerthrowes, he made them subiect to the Empire. And shortly after Cæsar was chosen Consull the second time: but he resigned the office the same day vnto Antronius Pætus, being about to make himselfe friends against Antonius: who being stayed about Cleopatra, gaue his wife occasion to returne from ATHENS to ROME. Now after the fire of enmitie betwixt these two competitours had bene a hatching a certaine time: it stood either of them both vpon to seeke all the meanes to ouerthrow his companion. The straunge proceedings of Antonius in fauour of Cleopatra hastened the warre, whereupon followed the battel of ACTIVM, the flying of these wicked louers, and the beginning of the Monarchy of Cæsar, confirmed by the conquest of ÆGYPT, and the tragicall death of Antonius and Cleopatra. The which we touch briefly, the whole being largely set downe in the life of Antonius. They did great honours vnto Cæsar after these exploits. The memorie of Antonius was condemned, and his statues maimed and throwne to the ground. A litle before, M. Lepidus, sonne of the Trium-vir and of Iunia sister of Brutus, conspired against Cæsar. But after they had discouered it, he was put to death by the wisedome of C. Mæcenas a knight, and gouernor of ROME: his wife Seruilia killed her selfe, as Portio the wife of Brutus. After the vtter ouerthrow of Antonius, Cæsar tooke order for the affaires of the East parts, he made alliance with Herodes king of IVDÆA. He sent the king of the PARTHIANS sonne in hostage to ROME, vntill they should send all the ensignes and standards they had wonne of Crassus and Antonius. He gouerned the affaires of ASIA, receiued into league and friendshid with him the kings of GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, & PAPHLAGONIA: & he punished some others by fines, that were not his friends. He gaue priuiledges to the cities of EPHESVS, of NICE, PERGAME, and BITHYNIA, to build temples in the honour of Iulius Cæsar, of ROME, and of himselfe. He set the SAMIANS at liberty, and after he had taken order for all the rest, he went towards ITALIE: where after he was arriued, it cannot be expressed with what great ioy he was receiued of high and low, from BRVNDVSIVM vnto ROME. There he triumphed three dayes together, for the ILLYRIANS, for Antonius and for Cleopatra. He gaue great presents vnto souldiers, and besides the mony that was made of the booty, and distributed by euen portions, he gaue euery one fiftie crowns a peece, the double to a Centener, and the treble to a Knight: and to euerie person among the people ten crowns, euen to litle children. He brought such store of gold and siluer out of ÆGYPT (by him reduced into a prouince, and condemned to pay twenty millions of gold to the people of ROME for a fine) that he brought downe vsurie from twelue in the hundred, to foure: and made that land and houses were sold deare, where before the rich men had them almost for nothing. Furthermore, he brought in a maruellous change in all trafficke: he also abolished all taxes and subsidies imposed by necessity of the ciuill warres. He cried downe all straunge coine, which were at too high a price for their law, and all through the iniquity of time. He lent out money for a time without interest, vnto those that had meanes to make double profite of it. He would not receiue the gold which the cities of ITALIE sent him to make him crownes: but sent them it backe againe with his thankes for their good will. He gaue the pastime of all maner of games and magnificent sights vnto the people, such as they had neuer seene before. He made goodly feasts vnto the Senators and Magistrates, and by a world of pleasures he appeased the sorow of proscription, and of so many ciuill warres. Being occupied in these matters, letters came from Crassus Cæsars Lieutenant, aduertising that he had subdued the BASTARNES, diuerse people of MÆSIA, of DACIA, and of THRACIA: that he had won seuen or eight battels of them, that with his owne hands he had killed the king of the BASTARNES, and had brought the king of GETES to such extremity, that he killed himſelfe. Theſe newes did increaſe the ioy, and the triumph was granted to Craſſus, and to Cæſar alſo: who by decree of the Senate cauſed the temple of Ianus to be ſhut the third time, which had remained open the ſpace of 200 yeares. At this time Cæſar that was in his fift Conſulſhip, numbred and muſtred all the people of Rome, reformed the Senate, the order of knights, the diſtribution of corne: and becauſe of the great dearth that was then, he made corne to be diſtributed to the people at a very meane price to ſome, & for gramercy to the poore. They that had bene bound to the common wealth of too long a time, he diſcharged them, and burnt their obligations. He confirmed the propriety of houſes in ſtrife betwixt them and the common wealth, if they had bene in quiet poſſeſſion any conuenient time. And to aſſure all thoſe that had adhered vnto Antonins, & to keepe them that they ſhould no more giue care to any new rumors: he ſware vnto them in good faith that hauing taken Antonins coffers, he had burnt all the letters he found in them, and read not one of them. He ſet downe an order for Cuſtome, eaſed the cuſtomers that had bene too much oppreſſed: alſo he reſtored the treaſure againe, and the augure of health. And by reaſon of that aboue named, he was called father of the countrey in open Senate: and at the ſame time he ſent people to Carthage, to ſet vp the families of the Patricians, greatly diminiſhed by the proſcriptions and ciuill warres.

The next yeare following, which was the 725 of the foundation of Rome, and the ſixt of his Conſulſhip: ſeeing all the wars appeaſed, peace eſtabliſhed, armes laid downe euery where, the cõmonwealth in good ſtrength, the laws honored, iuſtice in authority, the Senate in their anciẽt glory, & the people reſtored by him to their rights of aſſembly to chuſe their yearly magiſtrates, and to giue out their commiſſions & charges according to their old cuſtome: he began to reaſon the matter with himſelfe, which of the twaine was moſt profitable: either to keepe (for the good of the ſtate, and vnder the title of a Prince) the Empire which he had in his hands: or whether he ſhould render it vp vnto the people. He found himſelfe grieued for that Antonius had oftentimes accuſed him of tyranny & vniuſt inuaſion: and on the other part alſo he apprehended the fury of the people, and the factions of ambitious men, which like the billowes of the ſea, would incontinently toſſe in horrible faſhion this vnconſtant ſea. Being thus perplexed, one day he tooke aſide Agrippa and C. Mæcenas, his two faithfull friends, very wiſe men and of great experience aboue all others: and prayed them to tell him plainly without flattery, what they thought of it, being reſolued to follow that which ſhould be moſt expedient for the good of the commonwealth. Agrippa by an ample diſcourſe did counſell him to render vp to the people his principality and ſigniority. Mæcenas was of the contrary opinion, & gaue ſuch counſell as Cæſar followed, tempering both opinions, & made himſelfe maſter in ſuch ſort that the people felt it not, but rather confeſſed that they needed ſuch a Phiſition to raiſe thẽ vp againe from the incurable maladies they were fallen into. He thanked both his friends, gaue his neece Marcella to be the wife of Agrippa, and did him new honours, proceedeth to a new reuiew of the citizens of Rome: and is choſen Prince of the Senate by Agrippa, who was then his companion in the Conſulſhip. Furthermore, aſſuring himſelfe that ſo much good and honours as had bene communicated to the ſmall and great, would make them they ſhould not much paſſe for their ancient dignitie and liberty: and that the ſweetneſſe of the eaſe and reſt they did enioy, would make them forget all the good and euill paſt: he borowed of his magnanimitie the maruellous counſell that followeth. He reſolued to diſcharge himſelfe of the principality into the hands of all the Senate, to render it vnto the people: hoping that the Senate ſeeing his affection ſo to ſubmit himſelfe to the accuſtomed order, & not to ſeeke a domination and gouernment ill-willed, they would thanke him the more: that all the great perſons would lay aſide the enuy which they might beare vnto him, and that the people would eſteeme and loue him ſo much the more. Vpon this thought, and after he had acquainted ſome of the Senators withall that ſtood affected to him, to the end to win others by their meanes, he made an oration in open Senate, well ſtudied, and fit for the time. Hauing made a long diſcourſe of the great extent of the Empire, and of his inſufficiency: he added vnto it, that this common burthen could not be caried but by the immortall gods: that he had continued ſome yeares to manage a part of it, and that experience had made him know that his ſhoulders were too weake to beare ſuch a burthen as the principalitie, ſubiect to infinite changes, and expoſed to a thouſand ambuſhes. He therefore required, the citie being furniſhed with ſo many noble perſons, that the affaires might be managed by many men, who ioyning themſelues together, might more eaſily ſatisfie the charges, then one alone: that in a good hower, hauing set all things in good estate againe, he did put the common wealth into the hands of the Senate and people of ROME. This oration diuersly moued the Senators. Some of them thought there was more art then truth in it. Others iudged that it was not expedient to put the estate into the power of many. The most of them enriched and made great by Cæsar, and that were risen vp by the ruines of their countrey, sayd: that they should preferre that which now they had in hand, before all the time past, beaten with so many tempests. Many others enclined to that side, not that they were in good earnest of that mind, but for feare to be looked vpon with an euill eye, if they did speake against their companions. So then all of them with one consent vnaduisedly, rather then of a commõn and ripe iudgement, began to beseech and adiure Cæsar, that it would please him to be chiefe and preseruer of the Empire, of the which he had set downe so many goodly and happy foundations. Immediatly they ordaine that Cæsars guard should haue twise as much pay as they had before. Agrippa was of opinion that they should cassere the SPANISH gard, and Cæsar in their place should chuse a gard of ALMAINES, knowing well that in those great bodies there was litle malice hidden, and lesse subtilty: and that they were a people that tooke more pleasure to be commanded, then to command.

He being thus established in his Empire by the consent of the Senate and people, to the end they should not thinke he would lift himselfe vp aboue measure, or to giue sure footing to a perpetuall Monarchie: he would not accept the charge to prouide for the affaires of estate, and the gouernement of the Prouinces, but for the space of ten yeares: with condition to giue vp his charge before this terme, if things were sooner setled in their full estate. First therefore, he left a part of the Prouinces vnto the Senate and people, to take care for the gouernement of the same: and for himselfe he kept those that were not yet in order, and in the which he should be driuen to make warre. In those that were quiet, he established Proconsuls: and for others, he gouerned them by his Lieutenants, which had their lesson, according vnto the which they were bound to be directed. Among other lawes they were forbidden to leauie any money, or to gather men of warre together, or to assaile any Prouince, without the commandement of the Senate, or of Cæsar. That foorthwith when they sent any successour, they should leaue their gouernement, and repaire to ROME within three moneths. He appointed also vnto the Proconsuls a certaine summe of money to beare their charges for their horse and cariage of the stuffe. Furthermore he established a law that the Proconsull or gouernour should not go to his Prouince appointed him, till the end of fiue yeares after his commission graunted him: to the end that they which were conuinced for taking of money corruptly, should pay to the Prouinces the fine they shold be condemned: in and he depriued them of all estates and honors, which through their euill behauiours had bene condemned in such fines. And further, he would not that the officers that had to deale in his affaires should haue any authoritie, but to demaund their stipends and money which the Prouinces were bound to furnish. And because he would beautifie and adorne ROME, as the maiestie of the Empire required: he raised vp many common buildings, and repaired many that had bene left vnfinished or ruined, leauing the names of the founders. His buildings among other were the temple of Apollo in the pallace, with the porch, and a librarie of GREEKE and Latin books. Also the Monuments, and the park, for the walkes and pleasure of the people of ROME. In his seuenth Consulship, certaine Senators propounded that they should call him Romulus, for that he hauing preserued the citie of ROME, it was as much bound vnto him, as vnto the first founder. But he would not accept of that name. Wherefore Munatius Plancus bethought himselfe of another, the which was giuen vnto him by common consent of all, and he held it to his death: as also we will call him from henceforth in all that remaineth to be set downe of his deeds: to wit Augustus. He not to seeme vnworthy of this name, and to cary himselfso that no man shold repent this change of gouernement, began diligently to set his hand to these affaires. He wisely reformed the auncient lawes, and made new, that were very necessary. To make sure worke in these affaires, he chose from sixe moneths to sixe moneths fifteene Senators that had bene Consuls, and did priuately acquaint them with all that was requisite to be done for the preseruation of the quietnesse of the commonweath, giuing order that nothing should passe but it should be searched and examined to the bottome: saying that he would giue the people lawes which they should all allow, and that he would not be his owne iudge alone. Afterwards he reformed the assemblies of the city, where all things were caried by sutes, presents, and violence. He then restored the people their right by voices to chuſe the magiſtrates. And to cut off all ſutes, he forbad them to make any rolle of ſuters names, but of thoſe that had layd downe great ſummes of money, to the end that being conuinced of their ſutes, they ſhould be put to their fines: adding alſo this ignominy, that ſuch ſhould be depriued of all eſtates & honors for the ſpace of fiue yeares. And furthermore, he finely hindred the bad practiſes in elections, giuing order that none ſhould be put in nomination, but ſuch as were vertuous and of good reputation. He left vnto the Magiſtrates their charges whole, and did alwayes require in al his Conſulſhips that they ſhold giue him two companions: howbeit the Senate wold neuer agree vnto it. The yeare before, he had reduced the nũber of Senators to ſixe hundred, all honourable men. At that time alſo he reeſtabliſhed the auncient order and dignitie: ordaining that the Senate ſhould haue the ſuperintendencie of the treaſure, and of all the reuenues that belonged to the people of ROME. That all the expences for the commonwealth ſhold be made by their ordinance. That the Senators ſhould haue the hearing of all crimes of treaſon, conſpiracie, ambuſhes, and offences to his Maieſties perſon: and that it ſhould pertaine to them to giue entertainement and anſwer that ſhould be fit, to Ambaſſadors of nations. When in matters of importance he asked the aduice of the Senate, in ſtead of comming to the Prince of the Senate according to the accuſtomed manner, or to him that was appointed Conſull, or to other Senatours by order: he made choiſe of any one of them which he thought good, to the end that euery one ſhould giue attentiue eare, and be readie to deliuer his opinion: and not to hold his head downe in his rancke, and content himſelfe to be of other mens minds. He ordained alſo, that the whole bodie of the Senate ſhould not aſſemble but from fifteene dayes to fifteenes dayes: howbeit that in ordinarie matters the magiſtrates ſhould thinke of that that were expedient. In the moneths of September and October, the Senatours were not bound to meete, but onely foure hundred drawne by lot: who might eſtabliſh any decree. And as for himſelfe, to honour this company the more, the day of the aſſembly he neuer ſaluted any of the Senators apart, but all of them together in the counſell chamber when they were ſet, and all of them name by name, the one after the other. If he would go out, and that he ſayd he would detaine the companie no longer: he bad them farewell in the ſame manner that he had ſaluted them at his comming in. He ruled iuſtice alſo ciuill and criminall, and willed that amongſt other things the criminals accuſed by certaine enemies, ſhould be ſet at libertie: with condition notwithſtanding that they ſhould be brought to priſon againe, if the accuſer did ſubmit himſelfe to receiue the like puniſhment as the offender, if it were found he ſlandered him. Moreouer, he made prouiſion for common workes, and reparations of bridges, cauſeyes, and high wayes. And becauſe he was determined to make a voyage into GAVLE, he eſtabliſhed Meſſala gouernour of ITALIE and of ROME, for feare leaſt any trouble ſhould happen in his abſence. But this place being troubleſome vnto Meſſala, he beſought Auguſtus he would diſcharge him: and therefore Agrippa was ſubſtituted, who ridde all ITALIE of a great number of theeues and robbers on high wayes, and ſtayed the courſes of many other troublers of the ſtate.

The affaires of ROME and ITALIE being in ſo quiet eſtate, vnderſtanding that ENGLAND was full of ſedition, SPAINE next vnto the mountaines PIRENEI in armes, and GAVLE readie to riſe: he opened the temple of Ianus, and tooke his iourney to giue order for all. But the Ambaſſadours of ENGLAND preuented him, and promiſed tribute. Then he went to GAVLE in NARBONE, to draw nearer to SPAINE. And ſo holding on his iourney to NARBONE, he pacified the GAVLES, he made an exact numbring of all the GAVLES, of their goods, poſſeſſions, and ſlaues, and cauſed the rolles to be brought vnto him. He eſtabliſhed lawes and cuſtomes in euery place, and deuided GAVLE into foure parts: of the which the firſt part was called NARBONENSE, which extendeth it ſelfe from the riuer of Var, vnto the mountaines PIRENEI. AQVITAIN the ſecond, vnto the riuer of GARONNE. The third, GAVLE LYONNOISE, vnto the riuer of Seine. Then GAVLE BELGICA, bordered with the riuer of Rhein: and rated all the GAVLS at ten milions of gold for a taxe. Now there remained no more for him to do, but to bring SPAINE to order: in the which the ROMAINES had made continuall warres the ſpace of 200 yeares together. Neuertheleſſe the CANTABRIANS and ASTVRIANS (which are the BASQVES) and other people neighbors dwelling in the mountaines, they neither cared for Auguſtus, nor for the Empire: for they were euer in armes, and made incurſions vpon the allies of the people of ROME, and did them great miſchiefe: who complaining vnto Auguſtus of the great neceſſity they were

were brought vnto, he being neare vnto them, came to aide them: and found the CANTABRIANS beſieging of a fort, hauing taken the towne by it called SAGESAME. He charged them home with ſuch furie, that he left them dead in the place, after they had valiantly defended themſelues. Afterwards he deuided his armie into three parts, and enuironed the countrie of the CANTABRIANS, who made head for the ſpace of fiue yeares, and did maruellous great hurt to the ROMAINES: and if the ſtreights wherby they might eaſily enter into their countrie, had not bene diſcouered vnto Auguſtus, they had ſent him home againe to ROME with ſhame. But hauing found the way to ſurpriſe them on euery ſide, he made a cruell warre vpon them, putting all to fire and bloud. They retired with ſpeed to one of their higheſt mountaines, with all that they could carie with them. The ROMAINES perceiuing that it was too hard a match for them, if they ſhould go thither to ſet vpon ſo warlike a nation, and that could not be ſubdued by force: they made forts in the midſt of the mountaine, and placed a ſtrong guard there, to the end to famiſh the CANTABRIANS, and by that means to bring them to reaſon. But they on the other ſide, in ſtead of yeelding themſelues, did abide all the miſeries that any man can poſſibly thinke of: and it came to that paſſe, that euen to ſuſtaine nature the ſtrong ſonnes killed their old fathers, the mothers their infants, and the young men did deuour the old to eate vp their fleſh. Vpon this euill, there followed another, to wit, diſcord among them. Some would yeeld, others were of another mind. The former alleaging, that they muſt needs ſubmit themſelues to the mercie of the ROMAINES: the other, that they ſhould make a deſperate ſallie vpon the enemies campe, and ſo ſell their liues. Their contention waxed ſo hote and violent, that the CANTABRIANS thruſt out ten thouſand of the ASTVRIANS with their wiues and children, and compelled them to deſcend alongſt the forts made by the ROMAINES: whom they intreated with the teares in their eyes to make them ſlaues, and to giue them ſomewhat to eate. Tiberius then one of Cæſars Lieutenants, would not ſuffer them to be receiued, to the end to famiſh the one by the other, and to end this warre without any bloudſhed. This poore people being depriued of ſuſtenance and hope, and being afraid they ſhould yet endure greater euils, began to powne a venimous hearbe like vnto Smallage, and poiſoned themſelues. The young men killed themſelues running one againſt another with their ſwords in their hands. The others, to the number of three and twenty thouſand came downe in a moſt miſerable eſtate from the top of the mountaine, and yeelded themſelues to the diſcretion of the ROMAINES: who ſet aſide ten thouſand of the ſtrongeſt of them, to ſerue them in the warre which they intended to make againſt the ASTVRIANS. The reſt were ſold by troups, with condition that they ſhould be caried farre from their countrie, and that they ſhould not be made free, before they had ſerued them as ſlaues the ſpace of thirtie yeares. They diſarmed ten thouſand of them: which they bare ſo impatiently, that many killed themſelues with their owne hands, eſteeming their life nothing without armes. They ſay, that a litle child with a dagger killed his father and brethren that were chained together, and that by the commaundement of the father: and that a woman did the like to ſome of her kinſfolkes. And that many of theſe mountainers accuſtomed to rob paſſengers, being vpon the gibbet, ſang out ſongs aloud, euen at their deaths, ſhewing a ioy and maruellous courage. Auguſtus being then in thoſe parts, gaue leaue to the ſouldiers of his guard of SPANIARDS to depart into the territorie of the GASCONS with great preſents, and priuiledge to enter in rancke amongſt the ROMANE legions. He built SARAGOVSSE, and other townes which he repleniſhed with ſouldiers, to bridle the courſes and tumults of the CELTIBERIANS: and afterwards made a ſtone bridge ouer the famous riuer of Eber. Then hauing ouerthrowne the CONISCES, friends of the ASTVRIANS, taken their head citie, and put all the inhabitants thereof to the ſword: he ſet vpon the ASTVRIANS, who being enuironed of all parts, and chooſing rather to die then to be made ſlaues: burnt, killed, and poiſoned themſelues, and with them many other of their neighbours. There were ſome of them yet left aliue, with whom the CANTABRIANS ioyned and other their neighbours, and that a long time. Theſe people had this cuſtome, that all goods were common amongſt friends, and when one of them came to the other, he receiued and vſed him as himſelf: and ſo alſo in aduerſitie they ran one fortune, or elſe killed themſelues immediatly after their friends were dead. Amongſt them were certaine looſe people gathered together out of diuers parts, who reſolued all together to go charge the ROMAINES, and came to fight with ſuch a furie, that nothing but the night could ſeparate them, hauing loſt many of both ſides. The next morning they began to ioyne againe with more violence then before, and the fight continued euen till night that the ROMAINES obtained the

victorie: but they confeſſed that they neuer encountred with ſuch cruell enemies. They that were left aliue fled into a towne, in the defence whereof they made themſelues all to be killed, rather then to yeeld themſelues. Auguſtus built certaine places there in that countrie, which afterwards by time were much enlarged. In this ſelfe ſame yeare of his ninth Conſulſhip, Terentius Varro his Lieutenant ſubdued the SALASSIANS, which are thoſe of the vale of OSTE: he diſarmed them, ſold the young men by the drumme, gaue part of the territorie vnto the ſouldiers Pretorians, & built there a citie called AVGVSTA PRETORIA. Vinicius alſo appeaſed ſome troubles in GERMANIE, and made warre very fortunately in diuers places. By means of which victories, Auguſtus was called the eighth time Imperator, as much to ſay, as ſoueraigne Captaine: and they ſuffered him to weare from that time foorth the firſt day of the yeare, a hat of Laurell, and a robe of triumph. At his returne he ſhut the temple of Ianus the fourth time, maried Cleopatra, (the daughter of Antonius and Cleopatra) vnto Iuba the Storie-writer, ouerthrowne by Iulius Cæſar in AFRICKE, with a part of MAVRITANIA and of GETVLIA to raigne there. He reduced into a prouince GALLOGRECIA and LYCAONIA, which made a portion of a kingdome: and by reaſon of his ſickneſſe not able to be preſent at the mariage of his daughter Iulia, whom Marcellus maried, the ſonne of Octauia his ſiſter: he left all to the charge of Agrippa, and went to ROME. There being choſen Conſull the tenth time, the Senate gaue him abſolute power ouer the eſtate and lawes, to make and vndo them at his pleaſure. They did him greater honours then before, and gaue Marcellus his nephew before his time great offices in the commonwealth: and to Tiberius his wiues ſonne. He in token of thankfulneſſe, gaue to euery one of the people ten crownes apeece. Whileſt theſe matters were in hand, the CANTABRIANS and their neighbours reuolted, by ſubtiltie caught ſome of the ROMAINS, and cut their throates. Ælius Lamia, gouernor in thoſe parts, to be reuenged of this outrage, put all the whole countrie to fire and bloud, deſtroyed ſome townes, and ſold their young men by the drum. To be ſhort, he followed them ſo hard, that he brought them in ſubiection. Ælius Gallus gouernor of ÆGYPT, almoſt about the ſame time, being ſent by Auguſtus commaundement with ten thouſand men, fiue hundred ſouldiers of Herods guard, and fifteene hundred NABATEIANS: vnder the conduct of a noble man of ARABIA called Syllæus: he did nothing to be accounted of, but diſcouer the countrie. But hauing loſt the moſt part of his men within the deſerts where this Sylleus brought them, and ouercome the SABEANS in a battell, he was enforced to retire. Afterwards this Sylleus, for that he killed his king Oboda by treaſon, he was taken priſoner, and beheaded by decree of the Senate.

Auguſtus being Conſull for the eleuenth time, the plague was in ROME, and for himſelfe he was grieuouſly ſicke: but reſtored againe to health by Antonius Muſa his Phiſition. The people therefore cauſed a ſtatue to be ſet vp to this Antonius, the Senate did him great honours, and in fauour of his profeſſion, gaue immunitie to all others that from that time foorth did practiſe Phiſicke. Furthermore, by many ceremonies they did ſhew the ioy they had for the health of Auguſtus: and ſpecially fathers of houſhold dying, expreſly commaunded their children to bring their ſacrifices to the Capitol with a title in great letters, ſaying: THAT AT THE DAY OF THEIR DEATH THEY LEFT AVGVSTVS IN GOOD HEALTH. It was alſo ordained that from that time foorth they ſhould neuer put any man to death, as often as Auguſtus entred into the citie. Shortly after he did aſſociate with himſelfe Calpurnius Piſo in the Conſulſhip, who had followed the partie of Pompey and of Brutus. Afterwards when he was gone from ROME into the countrie, he made Lucius Ceſtius his deputie for him, an inward friend of Brutus and of his memorie. Whereof the Senate maruelling, by decree made him perpetuall Proconſull of the ROMAINE Empire, Tribune of the people, and gaue him power to aſſemble the Senate as often, and when it pleaſed him. The people would haue compelled him to haue bene Dictator: but he bowing a knee, caſting downe his long robe, and ſhewing his breaſt, beſought them to diſcharge him of ſo odious an eſtate. In the meane time he accepted the decree of the Senate, and the charge to cauſe corne to be brought in, becauſe of the dearth that chaunced in ROME. In the which he ſerued his turne by Tiberius created Quæſtor at the age of nineteene yeares. As for Marcellus his nephew, he was choſen Ædilis Curulus, who aided him to ſet foorth all the magnificent pompe of plaies, which he cauſed to be played before the people: euery man iudged that he ſhould be the ſucceſſor of all his power. But this young man of great hope, died ſhortly after, to the great griefe of euery man: and no man can tell whether it was of naturall ſickneſſe, or of poiſon giuen him by the practiſes of Liuia. A litle before his death, Agrippa impatient to beare the riſing of this Marcellus whom he deſpiſed, went into ASIA vnder colour of another voyage. They say that Augustus much troubled with sickneſſe, returned to his firſt conſultation, to put the commonwealth againe into the hands of the Senate and people: and for this cauſe he called for the Senators and all the other magiſtrates: vnto whom he gaue an account of the Empire: and that was a litle booke containing the numbring of all the riches, townes, and prouinces allies, legions, armies by ſea and by land, of all the kingdomes and countries tributarie, of all the cuſtoms of the Empire of ROME, that which was neceſſarily to be leauied or releaſed. But being ſomwhat amended againe, he changed his mind. And furthermore, hauing giuen audience to the ambaſſadors of Phrahartes king of the PARTHIANS, which demanded a ſon of his brought by Tyridates vnto Auguſtus: he ſent backe the child, & ſuffered Tyridates to remaine at ROME, where he ſumptuouſly entertained him. By this means he kept himſelfe in friendſhip with the one and the other, and held the PARTHIANS in ſuſpence, to the end they ſhold alter nothing. At the beginning of the next yeare following, vnder the Cõſulſhip of M. Claudius Marcellus, and of L. Arruntius, the famine increaſing at ROME, he wiſely prouided for it. And then the people would conſtraine him by force to accept the Dictatorſhip, and threatned to ſet the pallace on fire and to burne all the Senators in it, if they refuſed to allow this decree. He would none of the office of Dictatorſhip, and did refuſe alſo to be Cenſor, although that office had bene void the ſpace of 28. yeares. But foraſmuch as Munatius Plancus and Æmilius Lepidus, who were choſen Cenſors, deſerued themſelues to be cenſured, becauſe of their diſcords, Auguſtus without the name tooke vpon him to diſcharge it: and prouided to reforme infinit diſorders that were in ROME, in apparell, countenances, companies, and in the fight of Fencers at the ſharpe. At the ſame time Fannius Cæpio, & L. Muræna hauing conſpired againſt him, and being diſcouered by Caſtricius, they were taken as they thought to haue eſcaped, & put to death. In the meane time the ASTVRIANS and CANTABRIANS ill intreated by Cariſius, they rebelled, but were ouercome in a ſet battell, and the priſoners ſold. The CANTABRIANS preferring death before ſeruitude, they killed, burnt, and poiſoned the one the other. The ASTVRIANS being ouercome the fourth time, did ſubmit themſelues: and their armes were taken from them. In the ſame time, Petronius gouernor of ÆGYPT, followed with 10000. footmen, and with 800. horſe, went to make warre with the ETHIOPIANS, which dwell vnder ÆGYPT, who had inuaded and ruined certaine townes, ouerthrowne and caried away the ſtatues of Auguſtus. Therupon he purſued them, and made them flie before him: took certaine places vpon them, and pierced far into their countrie: ſo that he inforced their Queene to ſend her ambaſſadours vnto Auguſtus (then wintering in the Ile of SAMOS) to pray peace, which he granted them paying tribute.

At the beginning of the Spring, he prepared himſelfe to giue order for the affaires in the Eaſt: but becauſe they that bent themſelues for the Conſulſhip, had almoſt put the city in alarme, and that in the end notwithſtanding the order he had ſet downe, the people had choſen men whom Auguſtus feared: through the aduice of Mæcenas, he made Agrippa come againe to gouerne ROME in his abſence, and maried his daughter Iulia vnto him, Marcellus widow. Now whileſt Agrippa gaue order for the affaires of the citie, Auguſtus tooke ſea, and hauing prouided for the affaires of SICILIA, he went into GRECE, did much good for the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to the contrarie, repreſſed the pride of the ATHENIANS, from whom he tooke away the tribute they had leauied of the Iles of ÆGINA and ERETRIA. In the meane time, though he made litle account of ſtraungers ceremonies, yet he made himſelf to be receiued into the fraternitie of myſteries: and the ambaſſadors of PERSIA hauing cauſed the temple of Iupiter Olympian to be finiſhed begun of long time in ATHENS: they ordained that it ſhould be dedicated to the ſpirit of Auguſtus. Being paſſed from thence into ASIA, he gaue order to his prouinces and thoſe of the people of ROME: puniſhed the CYZICENIANS, that had killed the ROMAINE citizens in their town. He impoſed a tribute vpon thoſe of TYRE and SIDON, who had dealt badly, and brought them into the forme of a prouince. He did much good vnto the townes that had bene faithfull vnto the commonwealth: to ſome of them he gaue the right of Burgesſhip of ROME, and to others the ſame rights and priuiledges which the naturall citizens of ROME had. He built vp againe the cities of LAODICEA, and of THIATIRA: he ſet vp them of the Iſle of CHIO againe, afflicted before by an earthquake, he did exempt them from all ſubſidies for ſixe yeares. He reſtored certaine Realmes vnto their kings whom he had ſubdued: or elſe he did ſtabliſh others anew, who came to attend him at his Court as ſubiects, without any ſignes or tokens of royall dignitie. He ſent Tiberius into ARMENIA, to inſtall Tigranes vnto his royall throne againe, hauing bene driuen out of it. Tiberius returned thither, and hauing fought with the ARMENIANS, he gaue them Artauasdes for their king, who ruled not long. Phraates king of the PARTHIANS being afraid they would set vpon him: was very carefull to get all the ROMAINES together, which were taken after the ouerthrow of Crassus and Antonius, whom he sent euery man of them vnto Augustus, with all the standards and ensignes, and also his sonne and nephewes for pledges of his faithfull friendship vnto the people of ROME. Augustus granted him peace, and then he came into the Ile of SAMOS, comforted RHODES, repleniſhed CORINTH and PATRAS with a great number of men enfranchiſed, whom he made Burgeſſes of ROME. In this place also there came vnto him embaſſadors from Porus and Pandion, two of the mightieſt kings of the INDIANS, who prayed alliance and friendſhip with him, and brought him very rare preſents. There came with them a philoſopher of INDIA called Zarmanus: who being brought to the citie of ATHENS, he burnt himſelfe aliue, as one Calamus did in the time of Alexander the Great.

In this meane ſpace the citie of ROME was ful of great trouble by the practiſes of Egnatius Rufus, who by force would needs be choſen Conſull in Auguſtus place being abſent: who gaue not him his voice, but named Lucretius Veſpillo, eſcaped from the proſcription, as hath bene ſpoken of before. But this put him in ſuch a rage, that he conſpired with M. Genucius, and Plautius Rufus to kill Auguſtus. But they being diſcouered betimes, they were impriſoned and executed by decree of the Senate: who made infinite numbers of honours vnto Auguſtus at his returne: howbeit he would not accept them all, but caried himſelfe very modeſtly in euery place where he was. The people choſe him Cenſor for fiue yeares, and perpetuall Conſull: and at his requeſt they graunted triumph vnto Cornelius Balbus, although he were no ROMAINE borne (for he was a SPANIARD) by reaſon of his notable victories he had obtained, as Lieutenant of Auguſtus, vpon the GARAMANTES. Agrippa on the other ſide was ſent into GAVLE troubled by the inuaſions of the GERMAINS, whom he ordered well enough. Then he led his armie into SPAINE, troubled with the rebellion of the CANTABRIANS: the which came thus to paſſe. The priſoners CANTABRIANS whom they had ſold by the drumme: by a complot they made together, cut their maiſters throates, and then fled into their countrie, where they ſollicited others to take armes, got their fortreſſes into their hands, and ſet vpon the ROMAINE garriſons. Agrippa could by no meanes bring his ſouldiers thither, whether that they deſerued to take reſt, or that the reſolution of the CANTABRIANS did aſtoniſh them. But after that he had brought them to his hand, he marched directly againſt the enemies: who had the better at the firſt encounter, and the ROMAINES were well beaten. But they being rebuked and puniſhed by Agrippa, who gaue them barley for wheat, he returned again to fight. But then the CANTABRIANS that bare armes were all cut in peeces, the reſt diſarmed, and drawne from the mountaine to dwell in the plaine. Auguſtus was ſaluted Emperour, or ſoueraigne Captaine, becauſe of this victorie: but Agrippa modeſtly refuſed triumph, and within a while after he ouercame the PANNONIANS alſo. The yeare following, the GETES and DACES being at ciuill warres, Lentulus that had ſubdued them before, counſelled Auguſtus not to loſe this occaſion: for he might eaſily ſubdue theſe barbarous people being thus deuided. But Auguſtus not being of the mind to make any warres at all with any nation, without great and iuſt cauſe, (although there were more hope of gaine, then apparance of loſſe,) he anſwered: There was no cauſe for him to do ſo: adding alſo, that thoſe that ſought a litle gaine with great loſſe and daunger, were like vnto thoſe that would angle with a golden hooke, the which breaking and falling into the water, no fiſh is woorth the value of it. And therefore that the barbarous were to be left to their owne miſeries: and that by their bloudſhed, by their owne companions, they were more then enough puniſhed for the illes they had done the ROMAINES, who ought not to begin firſt to do euill.

In the ſame yeare Auguſtus being very deſirous to put his hand to the reformation of abuſes in ROME, and that effectually: he ioyned with him his nephew Agrippa in the ſtate of a Cenſor, and did eſtabliſh him Tribune for fiue yeares. Firſt of all he began to correct ſome diſorders that were in the Senate, he reformed the knights, ſpectacles, and playes, and the maner of ſutes for publike offices. He ſet fines vpon their heads that would not marie, and beſtowed much vpon them that had wiues and children. He gaue vnto Hortenſius Hortalus fiue and twentie thouſand crownes, to procure him to take a wife, that he might raiſe vp iſſue to that noble houſe and familie of the Hortenſes. He ordained alſo that maidens ſhould be twelue yeares old at the leaſt before they maried, and ſuffered them to kill adulterers taken with the fact, without puniſhment:

condemning the Sodomites without remiſſion. And for militarie diſcipline, he looked very carefully vnto that. And becauſe a knight of ROME had cut off his owne ſonnes thombes, for that he ſhould not go to the warre: he made him to be ſold by the drumme and all his goods. But becauſe the Regrators were greedie to ſeize vpon them, he made them ceaſe the ſale, and put the knight into the hands of one of his bondmen enfranchiſed, and was contented to driue him out of ROME. Furthermore he procured that the Senate ſhould not be kept but with great reuerence: that the Senators ſhould come together as into a temple of deuotion, and that no decree ſhould paſſe, but in the preſence of 400. Senators if it might be: that no man ſhould be made free of ROME, but vpon great conſideration. For the reſt: he and Agrippa gaue the people the pleaſure of ſecular yearely games, which had not bene ſeene a hundred yeares before. But he tooke very great care that there ſhould be no inſolencies committed. He puniſhed the players in diuers ſorts, that behaued themſelues more licentiouſly then became them. And when one of them amongſt them called him Lord, he ſhewed the people with his voice, his eyes, and his hand, that he was not well pleaſed withall: and the next morning he publiſhed a ſharpe Edict, forbidding all perſons expreſly to ſay ſo, and would neuer ſuffer that any of his ſhould giue him this name. But theſe playes being ended, he adopted Caius and Lucius the ſonnes of Agrippa. In all this great buſines, the SICAMBRES, VSIPETES, & TENCHTERES, people of GERMANIE, ſurprized certaine ROMAINS in their territorie, hanged them vp, paſſed ouer the Rhein, ſpoiled GAVLE, ouerthrew certaine horſemen, and following their purpoſe, ouercame M. Lollius Proconſull of GAVLE, and tooke away an enſigne from him. Yet though he were a man of ſmall action and very couetous: neuertheleſſe he was reuenged of them, and coming vpon the inuadors, fought with them, and draue them beyond the Rhein. On the other ſide, C. Lentulus made war with the DACES, & killed three of their chiefe leaders with a great number of men: and afterwards he eſtabliſhed a garriſon by the riuer of Danuby, to ſtop the incurſiõs of this wild nation. Auguſtus ſeeing theſe troubles, diſpoſed of the affaires of ITALIE to go into GAVLE, to rid himſelfe of theſe griefes, & by his abſence to make his preſence more honorable. At that ſame time, diuers people inhabiting vpon the riuer of Danuby rebelled: but Auguſtus Lieutenants beſtirred them ſo well, that they were all compelled to ſeeke peace. At that time alſo all GAVLE was in commotion, and that in diuers ſorts. But the couetouſneſſe of Licinius Enceladus, made free, and ſoliciter of the affaires of Auguſtus, was cauſe of all this miſchiefe. For he hauing commaunded the people to furniſh the tribute for euery moneth, he had put fourteene moneths in the yeare for twelue. So being accuſed to his maiſter for money ill gotten, although all the world cryed out of him, yet he found the meanes to eſcape well enough. For after he had gotten an infinite maſſe of gold and ſiluer togther, he brought it to Auguſtus, ſaying, he had neuer other intention but to take from the GAVLES the meanes to rebell. For all this Auguſtus withdrew him from thence, and ſent Tiberius thither to ſettle all things in good eſtate againe. Almoſt during theſe commotions, and outragious diſſentions, the RHETIANS, neare vnto the lake of Come, they brake into GAVLE, CISALPINE, and tooke out of ITALIE ſtore of boote. They were a people ſeparated from all others, and ſo cruell, that hauing taken any place from the ROMAINES, they killed all the male children, and further, did aske their ſoothſayers of women with child: and if they ſaid ſhe was great with a boy, they preſently ran her through, and killed her and the fruit of her wombe. Auguſtus would not endure theſe outrages, but ſent Druſus the ſonne of Liuia againſt them: who draue them out of ITALIE, hauing ouercome them in a ſet battell, neare vnto TRENT. They ſay that their women ſhewed themſelues ſo cruell in this fight, that their darts failing them, they tooke their litle children by their legges, and did moſt barbarouſly force themſelues to ſmite their enemies in the face. Thoſe that were driuen out of ITALIE would haue entred into GAVLE, but they were repulſed by Tiberius. In the end, theſe people and their allies were conſtrained to ſubmit themſelues.

Auguſtus ſent a Colonie vnto NISMES in LANGVEDOCKE: and made them free Burgeſſes of ROME. It is thought that he ſent another vnto ARLES, of the ſixt legion: and one of the ſecond vnto ORANGE. Some make report of theſe Colonies in the time of Tiberius. M. Agrippa on the other ſide, he gaue order for the affaires of ASIA, and of all the Orient, where he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that all that were friends to the people of ROME, were of better courage then before, and all their enemies ſo valiantly ſuppreſſed, that Auguſtus was ſaluted the tenth time ſoueraign Captaine. But Agrippa after his wonted maner, he wold haue no triumph: which was the cauſe of the

losse of this custome, and following his example, were contented from thenceforth with the ornaments of triumph. But of another side, the PANNONIANS, the GENOVESES, and those of PIEMONT rebelling, they were subdued by the Lieutenants of Augustus: who builded two cities in testimonie of his victorie against these two last people: whereof TVRIN (called Augusta Pretoria) was one, and GENVA the other.

Augustus hauing pacified GAVLE, stayed the inuasions of the GERMANES, and quenched the rebellion of SPAINE: he left Drusus with authoritie and his armie vpon the Rheine, and came to ROME as Agrippa did out of ASIA, and became extreamely sicke of the gowt. Lepidus he died at the same time, to whom Augustus succeeded in the estate of chiefe Bishop, and made sumptuous spectacles and fights vnto the people. He burnt all the bookes of deuination and prophecie, except those of the Sibylles: and yet he kept them not all. He reformed the Kalender, and ordained that there should be no leape yeares for twelues yeares following. He suffered that the sixt moneth then called Sextilis, should be called Augustus after his name. All that yeare was spent in plaies and pastimes, sauing that Augustus (hauing bene sicke) caused all that he had done in his gouernment to be rehearsed before the Senate. He tooke a reuiew of the Senatours, and confirmed his nephew Agrippa in the estate of a Tribune for fiue yeares more. But shortly after, this great person being returned from a iourney out of PANNONIA, whither he was gone to preuent disorders that were likely to be renewed: he fell sicke and died, before Augustus could come in time. That was a maruellous griefe vnto him: and not knowing now on whom he should bestow his daughter Iulia, in the end he chose Tiberius his wiues sonne, and maried them together: but they continued not long in good tearmes together. From thencefoorth Tiberius and Drusus dealt almost in all the affaires of warre, and Tiberius especially after the death of the other: of whom we shall speake to best purpose in the life of Tiberius, yet we will briefly note it here. So then Tiberius went and made warre in PANNONIA, risen by meanes of the death of Agrippa: yet he made an end of it, killed some of them, sold and subiected the rest: and compelled all that people to submit themselues vnto the people of ROME. Drusus on the other side made warre in high and low Almaine, and brought the most part of these nations vnto some reason: and afterwards he returned to ROME. Where Augustus held so straight a hand to bring the Senate to order, that there were few men desired to be of the Senate: and many to the contrarie that gaue vp their offices. But Augustus compelled those that were of age, of qualitie and sufficiencie, and gaue order also that the dignitie of the Tribunes of the people should remaine entire: suffering those notwithstanding which had this office, their time expired, to be amongst the Senators, or with knights. As for the townes of ASIA afflicted with the earthquake, he payed of his owne to the commonwealth, the yearely tribute which they ought. And for the regard of those which were of his Prouinces, he freed them from all impostes for sixe yeares, and gaue them of PALESTINE a great quantitie of corne, which sustained great want and famine. In the meane time Drusus passed ouer the Rhein, made warre with the VSIPETES, SICAMBRIANS, TENCHTERES, CATTIANS, CHERVSIANS, and SVABIANS, whom he ouerthrew in diuers encounters: and especially in a great battell, where were killed a very great number. For these people were gathered together with such a confidence of victorie, that they had alreadie made agreement among themselues for diuision of the bootie. But specially at the last battell, the CHERVSIANS should haue the horse, the SVABIANS they should haue the baggage, and the SICAMBERIANS the prisoners. And yet to bind themselues more straightly together, they burnt twenty Cēteners of the ROMAINES. And this was the cause that the battell was so long and cruelly fought betwixt them: yet in the end the victorie remained to Drusus, who gaue the prisoners and all the bootie to the souldiers, making the horse, baggage, and captiues to be sold to them that would offer most. All the field for a great league and a halfe of length was strawed with dead bodies, and they found in the enemies campe great store of iron chains prepared by them for the ROMANES: howbeit they serued for thē. Drusus set vp a tokē of triumph, & was called Imperator of his troups in the field where the battell was pitched. Afterwards he built aboue fiftie castles vpon the riuers of Meuse, Visurge, and of the Rhein. Tiberius on the other side was in DALMATIA, where he brought them vnder that rose in armes against them. The triumph of Ouatio was decreed to them both, and Augustus was saluted by the Senate Imperator or soueraigne Captaine, and this for the twelfth time. But in these businesses, the warre was hote in THRACIA, and more then euer before: all the Prouinces being in rebellion vnder the conduct of Bulogæses, who had killed the

the king Rhacuſpolis, an allie of the people of Rome, driuen out his Vncle and Lieutenant Rhymetalces out of Thracia into Chersonesvs. L. Piſo gouernor of Pamphilia went againſt them, and at the firſt encounter had not the aduantage, but in the ſecond he ouercame them vterly. Druſus hauing made a voyage to Rome, to celebrate the birth day of Auguſtus in great magnificence, whilſt his troupes repoſed themſelues in their garriſons, about the Spring he returned into Germanie, ouercame the Svavbians, gaue them a king: then he inuaded the countrie of the Marcomannes, fought with them diuers times, killed a great number of them, and made all the reſt ſubiect to the Romaines. Becauſe of this victorie, and of that of Piſo, Auguſtus was called Imperator the thirteenth time. Almoſt in this time he put Proculus to death in priſon, one that he loued beſt of all his bondmen made free: being conuinced of many adulteries. He made the thighes of his Secretarie Thallus to be broken, for the ſumme of an hundred crownes which he tooke for ſhewing a ſecret letter. In this meane time Tiberius continued warre in Dalmatia and Pannonia, moued through the great impoſts whereof the people complained: but in the end he ſubdued them, and built many caſtels vpon the riuer of Danuby to ſtay the inuaſions of the enemies. Piſo alſo in Thracia ouercame the Mæsians, and Bastarnes, and brought away a great number of priſoners, who bit their iron chaines for anger, and moſt impatiently did beare their ſeruitude. Druſus made the Cattians ſubiect alſo, then he came to Lyons to meete with Auguſtus: from whence they both returned together into Italie. They had a cuſtome alſo that yearely on the firſt day of Ianuarie, (though Auguſtus were abſent) all the Senatours, officers of iuſtice, and others of meane eſtate, brought him New-yeares gifts to the Capitoll: and alſo euery one caſt a peece of gold or ſiluer into the lake Curtius, for a vow that they had made to his health. He did beſtow all theſe New-yeares gifts to buy many rich ſtatues of the gods, which he ſet vp in all the croſſe ſtreetes.

In the fiue and thirtieth yeare of his principalitie, vnder the Conſulate of Druſus Nero, and of Quintius Criſpinus, Druſus hauing ſubdued a great part of Germanie, and preparing to go further: a viſion hauing the ſhape of a great woman, that ſpake bigger and louder then a mans voice could do, ſaid to him in Latine: Go no further: which was a ſigne of his death. The which followed incontinently after, this young Nobleman of an excellent hope, being but thirty yeares old. Auguſtus had put him in the rolle of his heires, and made an oration in his praiſe. Afterwards all the charge of the warres of Germanie was committed vnto Tiberius. And for Auguſtus, he being the ſame yeare called for a witneſſe in certaine cauſes, did patiently ſuffer any man to aske him, or refuſe him, as he had oftentimes done before. One day as he ſpake in full Senate, one of the Senatours told him: I vnderſtood nothing: another, I would ſpeake againſt it, if I might be heard. Another time being wearie with the conteſtations of certaine pleaders, he went in choler out of his ſeate. But ſome began to ſay vnto him, that it was lawfull for Senatours to ſpeake freely to any matter that came before them: and that no man was euer offended for the replies or conteſtations of any man.

Nonius Aſprenas, one of his greateſt friends, was accuſed by Caſſius Seuerus to haue poiſoned a hundred and thirtie bidden gueſts at a banquet. Auguſtus did not recommend him, but let the Senatours alone, who baniſhed Caſsius. An old ſouldier vpon complaint being brought before the Senatours, and in daunger of his life, beſought Auguſtus to helpe him. And when he had giuen him an Aduocate to defend him: the ſouldier opened his breaſt, and ſhewing him the markes of the wounds which he had receiued in the battell of Activm, ſaid vnto him: But I beſeech thee Auguſtus, conſider that I haue receiued theſe wounds here vpon my bodie for to defend thee, and would put no other in my place. Auguſtus moued with theſe words, appeared in iuſtice, and pleaded this mans cauſe the which he wanne. Soone after he was ſaluted ſoueraigne Captaine for the fourteenth time: becauſe of the victories which Tiberius and Sextus Apuleius had obtained in Germanie, and in Italie. And the authoritie which had bene giuen him for ten yeares ouer the ſtate of the Commonwealth being expired, was continued vnto him for ten yeares following. Then he did greatly enlarge the bounds of the territorie of Rome, and hauing aduanced Saluſtius Criſpus (the ſon of the Hiſtorian) vnto the place which Mæcenas held, the Romaine knight his faithfull friend and principall Counſeller, deceaſed in thoſe daies: and by Tiberius continued to bring the Germaines vnder: for the victorie of whom, and alſo for that he had ſubdued all the people inhabiting alongſt the Alpes: the Senate had ſet vp a token of triumph, and granted triumph to Tiberius.

Vnder the ſecond Conſulate of Claudius Nero, and of Calphurnius Piſo, Caius and Lucius yong ſonnes of Auguſtus, were called young Princes, and appointed Conſuls, although they were but of tender yeares, and vnder fourteene yeares old. This pleaſed Auguſtus greatly, though he fained to take no pleaſure in it. Furthermore, he then made an edict touching ſlaunderous libels, declaring who ſhould haue the hearing of thoſe crimes, and how they ſhould be puniſhed: although he himſelfe cared not much, and patiently ſuffered they ſhould gibe at him, contented to anſwer by open defence, vnto the reproches and mockeries they made of him. They ſcattered abrode one day in the pallace many bils of paper of cruell iniuries againſt him. This moued him not at all, neither did he trouble himſelf much to anſwer it: but in ſtead of ſearching it out, he did aduiſe that hereafter they ſhould haue an eye vpon thoſe, that by litle bookes or Epigrams publiſhed (vnder falſe names) ſcandale againſt any man. Tiberius wrote a round letter to him one day, to the end he ſhould carie a ſtraighter hand vpon that: but he ſent him theſe words: I pray thee, my friend, let not thy youth ouerrule thee in this matter, nor be not ſo hote, though I be euill ſpoken of by ſome. It is enough if we gaine this point, that no man can hurt vs. Afterwards he deuided the citie of Rome into fourteene regions, and two hundred and ten ſtreetes, and in euery of them he eſtabliſhed Officers to ſee that all things ſhould be maintained as they ought to be, and to report vnto the Prince any memorable thing that ſhould happen. He prouided for the violence of fire, he built vp the temples that were burnt or ruined by time: and gaue at one time vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitoline, for the renewing of the ſame, ſixteene thouſand pounds of gold, and of rich and coſtly pearles, to the ſumme of twelue hundred thouſand Crownes.

Now Caius and Lucius his young ſonnes growing apace, and Iulia his daughter beginning to be too well knowne for her wantonneſſe: Tiberius that could no longer endure her, nor theſe two young Princes (and becauſe he would haue the Romaines a litle long for him) he demanded and obtained leaue with extremitie, threatning to kill himſelfe with famine, if they did not graunt him: and ſo went to ſtudie at Rhodes. In the meane time Auguſtus prouided for the affaires of Istria, deuided Italie into eleuen Prouinces: and becauſe he doubted they did enuie his greatneſſe, he choſe nine Pretorian cohorts for his guard, of the which he kept three of them in Rome, lodged here and there in houſes, ſo long as they were in their quarter: and the ſixe others were quartered in the next villages vnto it. He alſo erected new offices, to impart to ſo many men more the honours and charges of the Commonwealth. At the ſame time when before the Senate they did obiect many crimes vnto Aimilius Ælianus, and amongſt other things, that he ſpake ill of Auguſtus: he turning to the accuſer, ſaid vnto him as in choler: Proue me that, and I will make Ælianus know that I haue a tongue: for I will ſay more of him, then he hath ſpoken of me. He made no further inquirie afterwards, and ſhewed himſelfe very gentle and courteous alſo vnto Caſsius of Padva, a man of a meane eſtate: who hauing ſpoken openly at a table, that he lacked no good will nor courage to kill Auguſtus: he contented himſelfe to impoſe this onely puniſhment vpon him, as to driue him out of Rome. From his eleuenth Conſulſhip vnto the twelfth, there paſſed ſeuenteene yeares: in all which time he diuerſe times had refuſed this charge: but now he demaunded it, and obtained it. His intention was to aduaunce Caius his litle ſonne to great dignitie, whom he cauſed to be proclaimed, yong Prince, and ſent him to ſee the Prouinces and armies, in the title of a Proconſull. Then he commaunded him to go into Asia, hauing giuen him for gouernours Lollius, and Sulpitius Quirinus. He himſelfe in the meane time remained at Rome, where he eſtabliſhed extraordinarie guards, vnder colour to keepe theeues and maiſterleſſe men from offering violence, whileſt the armies abrode were farre off. The yeare following, Caius hauing trauelled in diuerſe parts of the Orient, made peace with Phraates king of the Parthians, and brought away hoſtages for aſſurance thereof, the kings three brethren, and all the Princes of the bloud. The which was practiſed by the meanes of the Queene Thermuſa, borne in Italie, who being ſent by Auguſtus for a gift vnto Phraates, he fell ſo in loue with her, and held her in ſuch high eſtimation, that after ſhe had brought him a ſonne called Phraataces, he receiued her for his lawfull wife. She being deſirous her ſonne ſhould poſſeſſe the Crowne, draue the right heires farre off by meanes of this peace. And at the end of certaine yeares, Phraataces who entertained it killed his father, and poſſeſſed the kingdome. But he was not long in quiet poſſeſſion, for the great Lords conſpired againſt him, and tooke from him his life and Crowne together. Furthermore,

Caius

Caius conquered ARMENIA, and ſhortly after Auguſtus demaunded the thirteenth Conſulſhip, to the end to aduaunce his litle ſonne Lucius as he had done Caius. He ſent him Proconſull into SPAINE, but he fell ſicke by the way, and ſtayed almoſt a yeare at MARSEILLES. Though theſe two brethren were farre enough off Tiberius, who kept himſelfe as a ſimple ſcholer at RHODES: yet they loued not him greatly, nor he them: for which purpoſe, the proceſſe ſerued not much againſt their mother Iulia, baniſhed becauſe of her adulteries into the Iſle of PANDATARIE. Shortly after, her daughter alſo called Iulia, maried vnto Lucius Paulus, was alſo conuinced of the ſame crime that her mother was: and was baniſhed into another Iſle of the ſea Adriaticum, called TREMERA. This affliction ſo neare vnto him, maruellouſly grieued Auguſtus, who could not beare it but in mourning, and deuouring himſelfe with ſorrow. Then all the Prouinces of the ROMAINE Empire being in peace, Auguſtus ſhut vp the third time the temple of Ianus: and the King of kings, the Sauiour of the world, being borne of a virgin in IVDÆA, appearing amongſt men: he ſhut vp the Oracles of all the Painim gods, as the Oracle of DELPHES among others was conſtrained to confeſſe it, and neuer ſpake afterwards. Wherewith Auguſtus being aſtonied, cauſed a great altar to be ſet vp in the Capitoll with an inſcription, ſignifying that it was The altar of the God firſt borne. The yeare following, to ſtay the violent courſe of great vſuries, and to raiſe vp againe many families decayed: he put into the Exchange two millions and a halfe of gold: that is to ſay, fiue and twenty hundred thouſand crowns: and ſuffered priuate men to take of it for three yeares without intereſt, putting in pawne into the Exchequer lands and poſſeſſions, being twiſe as much worth as the principall: and condemned the vſurers that had taken intereſt more then Iulius Cæſar had ordained, to pay foure times aſmuch, and deducting out of the principall that which had bene paid ouer and aboue the taxe of the law: he gaue the debters three yeares ſpace to pay it, at three equall times from yeare to yeare. He made prouiſion alſo for diſtributing of corne, and brought it to 200000. heads of thoſe that ſhold come to haue any of it: and did wiſely remedy diuerſe diſcontentments of the people. Shortly after, Lucius Cæſar being 16. yeares of age, died at MARSEILLES: the which was the cauſe that Tiberius being reconciled for ſome other occaſion with Caius, he obtained leaue to returne from RHODES to ROME: with condition (for ſo was Caius will) that he ſhould meddle with no affaires of eſtate, and that he ſhould remaine yet the reſt of the yeare at RHODES. As touching Auguſtus, he laboured to recreate himſelfe with his friends: and did willingly ſee learned men: and amongſt others, T. Liuius that renowned Hiſtorian: the Poets Virgil and Horace, but eſpecially Virgil, who was one of his moſt familiar friends. Which maketh men thinke that Ouid committed ſome great fault, ſince he was a baniſhed man ſo long, and that they could not obtaine his grace, though the greateſt men were ſuters for him. And yet the Hiſtorians ſay Auguſtus was not angry, as appeareth by the fact of Timagenes the Hiſtorian: who hauing diſperſed abrode ſome pleaſant by-names againſt Auguſtus, Liuia, and their familiars, wherat euery one of them laughed, it was ſo pleaſant an encounter: Auguſtus was contented to aduiſe him to moderate his toung from thenceforth, and did only forbid him his houſe and familiaritie, ſuffering him to waxe old in the companie of Aſinius Pollio. He did greatly ſupport ſome alſo that were accuſed to haue ſealed a falſe Will, & mingled with the marks of condemnation and abſolution a third, pardoning all thoſe that it ſhould ſeeme had through ignorance ſinned in this fact. One being euidently conuinced to haue killed his father, was euen at the point to be ſewed vp in a leather ſack, according to the cuſtome, and throwne into the ſea. Auguſtus deſirous this curſed wretch ſhould not be thus handled, put the anſwer in his mouth, in asking of him alſo: Surely I beleeue thou haſt not killed thy father. The ſon of Tarius being charged to haue conſpired againſt the life of his father, Auguſtus was ſent for into Tarius houſe, to counſell him what were beſt to be done: he gaue the father counſell to baniſh him far off from all knowledge. And when Tarius would haue made Auguſtus his heire, he refuſed it, and obtained that the ſon ſhould be baniſhed vnto MARSEILLES: and that during his fathers life he ſhold haue a penſion to maintaine him withall.

In the 44. yeare of the monarchie of Auguſtus, Tiberius hauing bene abſent the ſpace of eight yeares, he came againe to ROME, where he liued, and medled with no matters. But that held not long: for in the ſame yeare Caius, vpon whom Auguſtus principally looked, died in LYCIA: and ſome ſay, that Liuia knew well enough of what death. For ſhe greatly deſired the aduancement of her ſon Tiberius, knowing that Auguſtus did not greatly loue the laſt ſon of Agrippa & Iulia, by reaſon of the rudeneſſe of his nature. Auguſtus tooke the death of his ſon Caius very vnpatiently.

He made his schoolemaister and domesticall seruants to be drowned: and furthermore, he disposed all the forces of the Empire and the legions amongst the Prouinces, in commodious places as well by sea as by land. Afterwards he obtained the Tribuneship for Tiberius, more through the procurement of Liuia then otherwise: although in the end he was content to aduance him, to make his memorie to be so much the more desired, when they had made proofe of his successor, whom he knew better then any other, and neuer spake any thing well, but he spied alwaies some crosse thing in him of a dangerous nature he had. And yet some iudge, that Augustus did repute the vertues in Tiberius to be greater then his imperfections: considering also that in the Oration he made, his words tended to this end, that he adopted Tiberius in fauor of the commonwealth. But before he would declare this adoption: he compelled Tiberius to adopt his nephew Germanicus the son of Drusus: and he adopted with Tiberius Agrippa Posthumus, the son of M. Agrippa. Then to preuent the complots of some of the chiefest of ROME, he made Tiberius to be chosen Tribune for ten yeares following. That was the cause that in ROME they began to speak well of Tiberius, whom they saw by that meanes somwhat stepped into Augustus place, so soone as he should happen to die. Furthermore, at the instance of the people of ROME & of Tiberius himself, Augustus did tollerate the banishment of his daughter Iulia: howbeit for no intreatie he would euer reuoke her again. So after the decease of Augustus, she was destitute of all helpe, and Tiberius made her dy for want in an vnknowne place. The yeare following, Valerius Messala, and C. Cinna litle son of the great Pompey, were elected Consuls. Cinna that tooke part with his cousins, was taken prisoner, & brought to Augustus, who gaue him life & aduanced him. This notwithstanding, he was afterwards attainted and conuinced to haue conspired against the life of Augustus: whom through the counsell of Liuia he sent for into his chamber, & gently rebuked him for all the good deeds he had done to him: pardoned him this last offence, & afterwards raised him to the dignity of a Consull, being sory that he durst not demand it. After that Cinna became his faithfull friend and seruant, & bequeathed all his goods by will vnto Augustus: against whom neuer any man cõspired more. His Lieutenants in AFRICK obtained some victories, & Tiberius continued the war in GERMANIE, from whence he oftentimes returned to ROME, to keepe himself in Augustus good fauor. Who hauing limited the pay, recompence, commoditie, and time that the soldiers should haue, he procured for some time the good of the commonwealth: which had continued longer in prosperitie, if his successors had better entertained militarie discipline. Afterwards to resist the mutinies of the people by reason of famine, he established corps of guard in all the places of ROME, and draue out a great number of vnprofitable mouths. And when corne came againe to beare the ordinarie price, he was about to abolish the distributiõ of corn which the cõmonwealth made: becausse that the people trusting vnto that, made no reckening to plow their lands. At the same time many towns in diuerse Prouinces were inclined to rebel, which caused the Senate to make a decree, that the gouernors of Prouinces shold command two years one after another, and should not depart thence til their successor were arriued. The ILLYRIANS also they began to rise, but they were suppresst immediatly by Valerius Messalinus. For GERMANY, all were subiect vnder the name of the ROMAINS, except the MARCOMANNES, and their king Maroboduus, a valiant and wise man, that kept himselfe and his people in good discipline, hauing alwaies an army readie of threescore and ten thousand footmen, and foure thousand horse, all the which he trained and put in readinesse against his neighbours, to defend him the better against the ROMAINES, if they came to assaile him. Tiberius prepared himselfe with twelue legions to make warre with him: but being constrained to go against the ILLYRIANS, he made agreement with Maroboduus, that sought peace and quietnesse: and so marched where necessitie called him. For the ILLYRIANS, to the number of eight hundred thousand men and vpwards, rose in manner all at an instant, and mustered vp in short time, with such order in their affaires and warlike exploits, that they possest and brought in subiection almost all MACEDON, and put Augustus into a maruellous perplexitie, becausse they prepared themselues to come into ITALIE. Hereupon Tiberius is chosen to go against them, the which he did with so good direction and warlike iudgement, that he dispersed their armie. But now concerning the countrey of THRACIA: there the armie of the ROMAINES was put to flight: yet taking heart againe, they returned to meet with their enemies, and obtained an honourable victorie. For which cause they called Augustus Imperator or soueraigne Captaine the sixteenth time. The ILLYRIANS made head againe better then before vnder the conduct of Bato Desidiates: they made violent and straunge

inuasions, and Tiberius neuer came against them. Whereupon Augustus conceiuing an euill opinion, dispatched Germanicus the sonne of Drusus, to go into ILLYRIA with a complete armie. On the other side, Agrippa Posthumus shewed himselfe so insolent, and committed so many follies, that Augustus could no longer endure them, and therfore he disauowed & disinherited him, confiscated his goods, and confined him to SVRRENTVM: where being more audacious then before, he banished him into the Ile of PLANASIA, neare vnto CORSICA: and caused the Senate to make an ordinance that he should remaine there till his death. By this meanes euery man began to regard Tiberius, who was also declared the son and colleague of Augustus by decree of the Senate, who committed vnto him all the armies and prouinces of the Empire. Liuia his mother did helpe him greatly in all these affaires. Furthermore, he would not stir out of ILLYRIA vntill he had made an end of this warre, which continued three whole yeares.

Now at the arriuall of Germanicus, the chieftaines of the ILLYRIANS came suddenly to assaile the campe of the ROMAINS: who faining to be afraid, staid till the enemy came to charge them in disorder. Then they came out with furie against them, killed a great number of thē, and made the rest to flie. Germanicus wan another battell against the DALMATIANS, and pursuing his victorie, he followed them so neare at the heeles, that they submitted themselues, and demaunded peace. By reason whereof they gaue Augustus the name of Imperator the eighteenth time. Bato Desidiates came to salute Tiberius set in his tribunall chaire, without holding downe his head, or any way imbasing himselfe: and being asked why after so many battels lost, he did yet rebell againe? he answered boldly againe, that the ROMAINES were the cause of it: who in stead of shepheards had sent them wolues to keepe their flocke. Peace was graunted vnto the DALMATIANS vpon certaine conditions. And as for the BREVCIANS which continued their warre, they were ouerthrowne in many encounters, and at the length brought to subiection by Plautius Siluanus, who triumphed. Their king Bato Breucus had betrayed and deliuered vnto the ROMAINES another great Captaine of the ILLYRIANS called Pinnetes: and afterwards he was deliuered himselfe by his owne men vnto Bato Desidiates, who killed him with his owne hand: and then fortified himselfe in DALMATIA, where hauing made head almost a yeare and a halfe against the armies of Tiberius and of Germanicus, he won and lost many battels: at the last being able to hold out no longer, he sent his sonne to demaund peace of Tiberius, promising to yeeld himselfe and his into the hands of Augustus. He obtained safe conduct, and came by night vnto Tiberius campe: who gaue him very gracious entertainment, and many rich presents. Afterwards he made him be brought to RAVENNA, and was also gently vsed: because that in an encounter where he was inclosed, and in daunger of his life, he had giuen him meanes to escape and saue himselfe. And because of the diuers victories obtained by Germanicus and Tiberius, Augustus was saluted for the nineteenth & twentith time Imperator or soueraigne Captain. And for the PANNONIANS, their young men that had so many times threatned ITALIE, were constrained to bring all their armes together on a heape, as they were commaunded, and to fall on their knees before Tiberius to demaund peace of him. He receiued them into grace, and sent them home to their houses, disposing his garrisons in strong places, vnder the charge of Marcus Lepidus. The glorie of Tiberius was yet more noble, and the anguishes of Augustus increased by the ouerthrow of Quintilius Varus: who being gone to assaile Arminius Prince of the CHERVSSIANS, was enclosed in marishes, and vtterly ouerthrowne with three ROMAINE legions that were slaine in the place: and for himselfe, fearing to fall aliue into the hands of the CHERVSSIANS, he killed himselfe with his owne hand. The victours did neuer so cruelly handle the ROMAINES as those whom they might know were common Counsellers and pleaders. For at the beginning when Varus came to commaund their countrey, where they knew not what processe meant, he perswaded himselfe he should tame them well enough, vsing the same forme and order of processe there amongst them, as they did at ROME. So he had a iudgement seate, and all matters were pleaded before him. Some of them amongst the rest being very subtill, seemed to esteeme much this pleading: and to bring him asleepe, they of purpose moued occasion of processe and sute one against the other: and then they went before him, and by ROMAINES themselues whose tongues they borrowed, they demaunded iustice. Then they reioyced not a litle when they could catch any of these Counsellers: for they put out the eyes of some of them, cut off the hands of others of them: and they say, that they cut out the tongue of one, and afterwards sowed vp his mouth, and he that held the tongue in his hand, said vnto him:

O viper, at the laſt yet thou wilt leaue whiſtling. Auguſtus was ſo aſtonied at this loſſe, that at times he would beate his head againſt the wall, crying out, Varus, giue me my legions. Certaine yeares after, Germanicus buried the bones of the Romaines that were killed in this ouerthrow. The yeare following Tiberius returned into Germanie, and to keepe the paſſages of the Rhein, Auguſtus ſerued his turne with the ſlaues enfranchiſed, which cauſed afterwards great confuſions and ſeditions in the Romaine armie. In all theſe ſtirres, two men of no worth, called Andaſius and Epicadus, complotted to take away Iulia the daughter of Auguſtus, and Agrippa Poſthumus from the places where they were, and to bring them to ſome legions to alter the eſtate. But they were ſoone diſcouered, and puniſhed for their raſhneſſe. Some others alſo committed the like fond enterpriſes, but they vaniſhed away without any effect.

Furthermore, Auguſtus being now old and broken, began to leaue all great companies, caſſiered his guards, and ſent them to garriſons farre off, to the end they ſhould not go about to make any chaunge. He gaue commaundement that the Gavles and Germaines ſhould depart the citie by a day prefixed. In the meane time Tiberius hauing deuided his armie into foure parts, entred into Germany, about fiue and twentie leagues into the country beyond the Rhein, & put al to fire and bloud: then he retired fearing ſome encounter of Varus. Touching Auguſtus, he qualified ſome ſtrict lawes againſt the vnmaried, the gifts of the husband to the wife, the banquets and ſutes: he did forbid the Deuines to anſwer the vaine queſtion of thoſe, that wold know how long they ſhould liue: and he ſuffered the knights (if they were challenged) to fight at the ſharp. Germanicus being returned to Rome obtained the Conſulſhip, and Tiberius triumphed of the Illyrians, Pannonians, Dalmatians, and Germaines: followed with his Lieutenants Germanicus, Vibius Poſthumus, Plautius Siluanus, and Marcus Lepidus, with triumphing robes. But before he went vp to the Capitoll, he went out of his charret, and fell downe on his knees before Auguſtus. Then he made a dinner for all the people, and had a thouſand tables ſet vp for them: and gaue to euery one of then ſeuen crownes and a halfe. Vnder the Conſulſhip of C. Silius, and of Munatius Plancus, Auguſtus hauing obtained ten yeares with Tiberius to prouide for the affaires of the commonwealth: to the end to quench many falſe rumors, about ſixteene moneths before his death, he made his will, and gaue it to the Veſtall virgins to keepe. Becauſe his ſickneſſe kept him from coming to the Senate, he prayed the Senators to thinke of ſome meanes to entertaine the men of warre. Which they hauing well conſidered, found no better meanes then that which he himſelfe had found out, to wit: of the twentieth part of the inheritances: and they all agreed vnto it. The next yeare following, he went (as they ſay) to ſee Agrippa in his Iſle of Planasia, the which troubled Liuia much: for ſhe knew what was paſt. At the ſame time he and Tiberius tooke muſter of the Romaine citizens, and ſhortly after he fell ſicke, wherof they recite many cauſes. But therupon he went into the countrie vnto ſome places of pleaſure, where he mended a litle, and paſſed the time away pretily merie, carying Tiberius with him, whom he would haue brought on his way to Benevent, from whence he went into Illyria. At his returne his ſickneſſe increaſed, that he was faine to ſtay at Nola, and ſent for Tiberius, and talked with him a long time very priuately, and after that neuer did any thing of importance: although the Hiſtorians do not agree whether Tiberius was come before his departure or not. For Liuia had ſet ſpials in the houſe he lay ſick in, and on the high waies, giuing it out abrode that Auguſtus was well: & on the other ſide ſending meſſages vpon meſſages vnto Tiberius, fame ſpreading it abrode that Auguſtus was dead, and that Tiberius held his place. Auguſtus being at the point to giue vp the ghoſt, made himſelfe to be combed, and ſpeaking to his friends, asked if no bodie made any noiſe without. So he exhorted them to reioyce with him, for that he had ſo happily played the Comedy of this humane life. Then hauing ſent them all out of his chamber, he asked if Liuilla Druſus daughter were in health: and ſo embracing his wife, ſaid theſe words vnto her: Farewell Liuia, behaue thy ſelfe well, and remember our mariage: and ſuddenly went away, making a ſweet end, which he alwaies deſired as often as he heard talke of thoſe that died quietly. He died in the ſame towne, and in the ſame chamber that his father Octauius died in, and liued neare vnto the age of three core and ſixteene yeares. His corps being brought to Rome, the Veſtall virgins brought out his will and teſtament, by the which he appointed Tiberius his heire, and gaue him three parts of his goods, and his wife Liuia the fourth part. Furthermore he gaue to the people of Rome twelue hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes: to the fiue and thirtie Tribes, thirteen hundred, ſeuen and thirty thouſand, fiue hundred crownes: to euery one of the Pretorian ſouldiers diers 25 crownes, to thoſe of the towne 12 crownes and a halfe. There were other legacies to be payd within a yeare: & he ſayd, that all his legacies performed, he left his heires foure millions of gold. Within 20 yeares before his death, he did inherite of his friends goods which had made him their heire, about 35 millions of gold: howbeit that he had ſpent all that with two patrimonies of his owne for maintenance of the common wealth. With his teſtament there were three litle libels or codicils, the one ſhewing what he would haue done at his funerals. The ſecond was a briefe of all his actions, which he commanded ſhould be grauen in copper tables before his tombe. The third contained the eſtate of his reuenew, & of the principall affaires of the Empire. He had added to them alſo the names of the infranchiſed bondmen and of the ſlaues, whom they might bring to account, and therewith he aduiſed them to keepe the limites of the Empire which they had at that time. They caried him with great pompe into the field of Mars, where he was reduced into aſhes, which they cloſed vp in his ſepulcher built in his ſixt Conſulſhip. After all theſe ceremonies the Senate appointed him a temple and diuine honors, and was placed in ranke with the gods. To make this honour yet greater, one Numerius Atticus that had bene Prætor, a man of great authority in ROME, was entiſed by Liuia, who gaue him fiue and twenty thouſand crownes, to ſweare before all the people, that he ſaw Auguſtus caried vp into heauen. After his death, many ſpeeches were diuerſly ſpoken of his life: ſome reprouing him, as much as others commended him. But his ſucceſſour made him oftentimes to be lamented. And ſo he was wont to ſay of Tiberius, that he ſhould leaue to the ROMAINES in ſucceſſion of the Empire, a ſucceſſour that neuer conſulted twiſe of one thing. And as he was a happy Prince in all his enterpriſes, and that by his Lieutenants had done an infinite number of worthie exploits againſt the enemies of the Empire: ſo in his life amongſt his friends he ſhewed himſelfe very gracious, pleaſant, and well diſpoſed in company: being learned, eloquent, and ſententious in all his talke. And to conclude, ſuch as the Empire of ROME had neuer any Auguſtus Cæſar but him alone.

The end of Octauius Cæſar Auguſtus life.

THE LIFE OF Plutarch.

Thy precepts are a crowne of pureſt gold
To Traian, deem'd the glorie of mankind.
In hands, and harts, if great men would thee hold,
Vertue ſhould rule, and vice ſhould go behind.

HAuing vndertaken to gather the liues of Plutarch and of Seneca, as they themſelues are amply ſhewed in their workes, the which in deſpite of the furie of an infinitie of ſtraunge accidents haue yet remained whole and in reputation vntill this preſent time: Firſt, this thought hath poſſeſſed me before, that ſome man may maruell, how, and wherefore I do ioyne Philoſophers, quiet men, and friends of ſolitarineſſe: vnto ſo many noble and worthy warriers. Wherein it ſeemeth I wander tóo farre off from the principall intention of Plutarch, who was ſo willing to honor the Muſes, ioyning into one body ſo many members and parts of hiſtories offered vnto the poſteritie, that in the meane time he hath accompanied, and as it were enuironed them:

With darts, and targets of Mars redoubtable.

But I hope, that if thoſe (which thinke ſtraunge of my doings) will but at leiſure with a repoſed eye looke vpon the liues before: they ſhall find that I haue not gone ſo farre from the right meaning, as at the firſt ſight may be iudged. For, beſides that the liues of ſome Orators, eſpecially of Demoſthenes and of Cicero, are ſeene amongſt the others: you ſhall find few noblemen repreſented by our Author, but that they haue as carefully handled bookes, as their ſwords. And if ſome ſeeme to be ſo much giuen to armes, that they haue left the ſtudie of learning behind them: yet we may ſee that they haue loued Philoſophers, and that they themſelues haue earneſtly and effectually reaſoned of Philoſophy, in time of warre and peace. And whereas Plutarch hath mingled ſome with vertuous men, ſome (I ſay) which haue done infinite hurt to themſelues, and to all the world during their liues, and whoſe names are deteſted at this day by thoſe themſelues which follow their execrable doings: his intention was not to place them in the Theater of vertue, as if they had deſerued it: but as learned painters finely apply cloudy and darke colours in their tables, to the end that the liuely and freſh colours ſhould appeare more beautifull and as it were imboſſed; ſo in entermingling the ſtrange exceſſes of ſome GREEKES and ROMAINES amongſt amongſt ſo worthie acts of others, he hath ſo fitly mingled the ſweete and profitable together, that it is not poſſible to be better. But if my two Philoſophers (ſince I haue begun to qualifie them thus) were contented to ſhut vp themſelues in ſome ſchoole or ſtudie, and to do nothing elſe but declaime and faſhion ſome ſcholers: it may be indeed I ſhould haue better left this enterpriſe vnto ſome follower of Diogenes Laertius, that would deſcribe the ſects of Philoſophie, and the principall founders of the ſame. Now there are here two perſonages, which (as the ſoule within the body) haue through their notable counſels giuen motions vnto great and meane men in their time, and by other mens eyes and hands haue done infinite things in the ſocietie of mans life, vnto the which they ſerue at this day with their precepts and goodly inſtructions, without the which the exploits of others ſhould be partly buried and aboliſhed: as thoſe haue bene of ſo many other men that came before and after. They be the two ſchoole-maiſters and counſellors of two Emperors. They be men that beſide their ſtudy haue borne great and honorable offices, in the which they haue ſo caried themſelues, that by their actions a man may gather, that knowledge is a great prop and ſtay to a vertuous man. If they haue not worne armor and commanded armies: if a man ſee them in a long gowne, and their bookes in their hands, they loſe not therefore their glory which ſo many wayes recommendeth them at this preſent, hauing lift vp learning in honour, and furniſhed ſtrong armes, by meanes whereof all Princes may wiſely and happily maintaine their eſtates againſt the fury of warres, and vnder the quiet gouernement of peace. As to the contrary, when violence alone would rule, and that men thought there was no need that our ſpirits ſhould be kept in and directed by the exhortations of Philoſophy: confuſions came on in heapes, which ruined and ouerthrew that which they thought had bene ſureſt ſet in the ground. Moreouer, I did not beare my ſelfe in hand that I could attaine to that, as to repreſent Plutarch and Seneca in their beſeeming comelineſſe. They themſelues could haue done that, and in their writings there are draughts very agreeable to their grauity. But as we do not willingly take the penſile to paint our ſelues, but to pleaſe our ſelues, the diſcourſe of our thought ſufficeth. In like maner alſo theſe goodly ſpirits here, being contented to be knowne by the glaſſe of their vertue which followeth them: they leaue euery body to thinke of their deeds and words that that is meete. Amongſt all the bookes that ſerue for the vſe of mans life, next vnto that which concerneth our ſoueraigne good we hope for in a better place then this world: I thinke there are none more profitable nor neceſſary to all ſorts of men, then hiſtories. And amongſt hiſtories, thoſe of men which haue bene brought to honor and place of gouernment in the commonwealth: and among thoſe men there, thoſe that haue brought their deeds and ſayings to ſome commendable end. Wherefore I will not enter into diſputation nor conference of ſtories, nor mingle the Scriptures with the prophane, or confound the diſcourſe repreſenting men deſtitute of the knowledge of the true god, with the holy and admirable conſiderations of the life of them, which haue bene lightned with the happy and ſupernaturall light. That requireth a whole booke, and ſeparated from this preſent worke, our purpoſe being otherwiſe bent to the ſame. But as in the former liues I was deſirous to waken the good ſpirits of our nation, and by the interiection of ſome of my conceipts to induce them to do better: I do the like alſo in theſe two, attending the commoditie to ſet foorth others, if the Author of life do permit me.

Now before we proceed any further, for as much as Seneca was long time before Plutarch, ſome might alſo require another order in my diſcourſe. Notwithſtanding, as Plutarch doth ordinarily place the GREEKS before the ROMAINES, and that for the matter of their liues there is no need otherwiſe for a man to trouble himſelfe much about the diſpoſing of them, and that thoſe which be dead do not quarrell together to know who ſhall go before or behind: I haue thought with my ſelfe that I might begin this worke where I thought good, without binding my ſelfe too curiouſly, either to the order of time, or to ſuch other circumſtances. For if any man be offended, I will alledge that vnto him which was ſpoken vnto one diſpleaſed, becauſe his horſe was painted ſtanding on his feete, which he would haue had lying on his backe, and his feete vpward: Turne the other ſide vpward, and you ſhall be pleaſed. Euen ſo is it in his choiſe to reade ſuch a life firſt, as he thinketh good, and to turne the table at his pleaſure, no man being conſtrained to come into the cloſet of the Muſes, but at his owne will, and by the gate which pleaſeth him beſt. I could haue bene contented to haue offered Plutarch onely, or left him hidden in his workes, the true and durable treaſures of his glory: but hauing bene ſolicited to ſhew ſome patterns, I was vnwilling to let him go alone. Now, I cannot caſt mine eye vpon that perſonage, but Seneca doth alſo preſent himſelfe vnto me, for many reports and agreements that are betweene them. For, beſides that nature hath brought them into the world, in the reuolution of one age, both came out of a ſtraunge countrey to ROME: both of them were rich and of great power, maiſters and teachers of two Emperours, which did enrich and aduance them to honour, and great offices in the commonwealth. In regard of their learning, although the one of them was of a ſect impugned by the other in diuerſe reſpects: yet they both tended to one end, although it was by diuerſe wayes: to wit, to driue away vice and vanity out of the harts of their diſciples, and to plant in them the loue of vertue, the contempt of death, and of the world, with ſo ſound reaſons, and ſo well combined the one to the other: that it is vnpoſſible to enter into a ſchoole of the heathen better ordred then that of theſe two, to learne (as we ought) to be aſhamed of diſhoneſt things, and to exerciſe thoſe that be honeſt and vertuous. But as touching other agreements and diſſemblances which may be noted as wel in their life and behauiour, as in their doctrine: peraduenture it ſhall be better to reſerue it to fitter place, or to leaue the diſcourſe vnto the ſtudious reader: who aduiſedly conſidering this litle which we preſently preſent vnto them, and ioyning thereto the writings of the one and the other: ſhall know what authority and art theſe two wiſe men haue to draw the moſt ignorant and fooliſh to the loue of vertue. Alſo that their ſtile with their pertinent and plaine manner of diſcourſe is accompanied with great grauity and forcible reaſons, to make men confident to beleeue them. If the one flow ſweetly, and alwayes almoſt maintaineth himſelfe in the ſame: the other in his wandrings and rollings about can well reforme his errors, and come to it againe in time: and then go on better then when he firſt began. Plutarch vſeth a world of approches and hookes to pull downe vice. Seneca ſeemeth to prouoke him to the combat, and when he ſetteth vpon him, it is in taking him by the coller and ſhaking him in all parts. The one ſeemeth to be a company of light horſemen charging very ſwiftly, and at diuerſe wheelings and returnes: the other, to a battalion of footmen well ſet in order, aſſailing reſolutely, and not remouing out of the place before he haue won the victory. The opinions of Plutarch are handled with Platonicall inductions, enriched with examples, with ſimilitudes, with quicke ſentences, and gracious recitals, which force the reader to yeeld. Seneca drawing that which is praiſe-worthy from the STOICKES, and from EPICVRVS alſo goodly inſtructions: as the Bee finely draweth from the herbe of bitter iuyce that which maketh ſweet hony, differing ſomwhat from the common vſe, he maketh a very profitable and ſure harbor wherein a heart ill ſetled may repoſe it ſelfe. The one ſpeaketh as a friend, the other as a maiſter: and both with ſuch a grace, that whether they giue good counſell, or that they command: the eares and hearts do bow at their voices. Inſomuch that the wicked are conſtrained in reading of theſe Philoſophers to acknowledge and plainely to heare within this graue ſchoole, a million of truths which condemneth them: and I cannot tell with what hidden force (as the Adamant draweth iron) they feele themſelues to be caried that way, vnto the which the learned inſtructions of theſe two Philoſophers do direct them, to delight in them euen with mourning, and to confeſſe that thoſe be the perſons of whom men may learne to be leſſe vicious, and more vertuous: good men alſo they gather there a ſweete fruite as poſſible may me, for remedy againſt ſo many cruelties of this preſent life. And although they find their true and perfect contentment in a farre better ſchoole without compariſon: yet ſo it is, that in this ſchoole here they vnderſtand things which afterwards makes the other more agreeable, and more honourable. Now for as much as afterwards we haue mixed the memories of their liues with diuerſe particularities, which will make vs ſee a part of their compariſons that may be noted betweene them: let vs begin with Plutarch, and conſider his life principally by the inſtructions which he himſelfe hath left vs, and namely in many places of his morall and mingled workes.

Pauſanias, in the ninth booke of his deſcription of GREECE, ſaith, that there ranne a common rumour abroad among the THEBANS, that Cadmus the ſonne of Agenor comming from DELPHES into PHOCIDE, was guided by a cow marked in both her flankes with white ſpots in forme of a full Moone: and that the Oracle commaunded him to ſtay with his troupes in that place where the cow ſhould lie downe. Which came to paſſe in the territory afterwards called BOEOTIA, becauſe of this cow. At the beginning of the ſame booke he ſayth that BOEOTIA tooke the ſame name of Bœotus the ſonne of Iton, and of the nymph Menalippe: which

ſhould ſeeme repugnant. But the one and the other opinion may well agree, if we ſay that Cadmus being come into that part of the countrey, Bœotius that had a charge in theſe troupes, and remaining there after the others, left his name to all the territorie which is neare neighbour to ATTICA, but in a thicker aire, becauſe it ſtandeth betwixt two mountaines, and that the country is more Northwards. So that the ATHENIANS were euer thinner of body, and of liuelier ſpirit: and the BOEOTIANS to the contrary, fuller of fleſh, and duller of wit alſo. From whence came many ſlents of laughter againſt the maſſe and waight of their vnderſtandings, and they made prouerbes diſperſed in Greeke and Latine bookes. Yea the Poets themſelues, and Ebulus among others, do floute the BOEOTIANS, that they are great feeders, and loue to ſpeake much: which agreeth very well with the reſt of their maners. Plutarch alſo himſelfe in his firſt treaty of eating of fleſh, noteth ſomewhat of that. Neuertheleſſe, of ſuch a countrey came Pelopidas, and other excellent men, but namely him of whom we are now preſently to ſpeake of, no ſimple nor ſottiſh man: but as

The floures of tendreſt violets are borne.

Euen ſo out of a countrey accuſtomed to bring forth fat men, as they ſay, and fitter for war then learning: came Plutarch, borne in the city of CHÆRONEA, neare vnto LEBADIA. In old time (as Pauſanias ſaith) it was called ARNE, becauſe of Arné the daughter of Æolus. But afterwards becauſe it ſtood euill, and looked towards the Weſt: Cheron the ſonne of Apollo and of Thero the daughter of Phylas, cauſed it to be new built, and turned to the Eaſt, to make it more wholeſome and habitable. Vpon which occaſion, in token of thankfulneſſe for the good act of the founder, it was euer after called CHÆRONEA. And although for many memorable accidents this towne is noted in hiſtories, yet do I not know any thing that hath ſo much kept vp the memorie of it vntill this preſent, as the name of Plutarch, whoſe anceſtours, men of a noble race, maintained themſelues from father to the ſonne in honourable office and place of charge in their litle common wealth, vntill the time of Nicarchus his great grandfather, who liued in the time of Auguſtus Cæſar, as Plutarch reporteth in the life of Antonius: where he ſaith alſo, that all the citizens of CHÆRONEA, not one excepted, were compelled themſelues to carie vpon their ſhoulders, a certaine meaſure of corne to the ſea coaſt, which is before the Ile of ANTICYRE: and yet they were driuen forward whipped with many a ſore laſh. Againe, as they were preparing for a ſecond iourney, and that euery man had his burthen ready: newes came that Antonius had loſt the battell before ACTIVM, which ſaued CHÆRONEA. For Antonius commiſſioners and ſouldiers fled immediatly, and the citizens deuided the corne amongſt them. Nicarchus, amongſt other children had Lamprias, a learned man amongſt thoſe of his time, and of whom Plutarch makes often mention in his bookes, where he ſpeaketh of talke at the table: how that he had bene in company with other learned men at many feaſts, where there was no talke but of learning, and matters of Philoſophie. He ſpeaketh alſo of his father, the ſonne of Lamprias, not expreſſing his name although he repreſenteth him diſcourſing of many points of Philoſophy, and namely in the bookes aboue mentioned. Of this Philoſopher then the ſonne of Lamprias, were borne many children, and amongſt others Plutarch, Timon, and Lamprias: all which three were very carefully brought vp and inſtructed in the liberall ſciences, and in all the parts of Philoſophie: vnto the which they ſhall euer ſee an humble reuerence towards their grandfather and father ioyned together, and amongſt themſelues a faſt and pleaſant friendſhip, as may be gathered in many places out of their table talke. Whereupon in reſpect of the grandfather and father, I remembred that Plutarch in thoſe bookes ſpeaking of his grandfather, he makes alwayes honourable mention of him. And as for his father, in the inſtruction for thoſe that deale in affaires of the eſtate, he reporteth, that he being young was ſent with another in embaſſage to the Proconſull, and his companion remaining vpon ſome occaſion behind, he went thither alone, and executed the commiſſion. And at his returne, as he would haue giuen the common wealth account openly, and haue made report of his charge and embaſſage: his father riſing vp alone, forbad him to ſay, I went, but we went: and I ſpake, but we ſpake, and ſo commanded him to make his report, alwayes ioyning his companion with that he had done. We ſee in the treaty of brotherly loue, how hartily he loued his brother Timon, when he ſayd in theſe words: For my ſelfe, although fortune hath ſhewed me many fauours, which deſerue that I ſhould be thankfull to her for them, yet there is none that maketh me ſo much bound vnto her, as the loue and good will my brother Timon hath borne, and doth beare vnto me in all things: the which no man can deny to be true, that hath but a litle frequented our company. And in his talke at the table, bringing in his father and brethren with many others, or together, reſoluing diuerſe queſtions of Philoſophy, he repreſenteth men that with a grounded knowledge had ioyned a ſweete behauiour, and a wonderfull good vnderſtanding, and namely the yong Lamprias, who was of a pleaſant nature, and loued to be merry. Plutarch then hauing a father that loued learning and vertue, was in a good houre put out to learning, whereunto he was wholly inclined. And amongſt other good maiſters, he met with Ammonius, an Ægyptian borne, ſaith Eunapius, who hauing with great praiſe taught in Alexandria, he did alſo viſite the cities of Greece wherein learning did yet flouriſh, and taried a great time in Athens, reſpected and well beloued of euery man. In the latter end of Themiſtocles life, Plutarch ſheweth that he was a boorder and lying in Ammonius houſe, and in talke at the table he brought him in, either diſputing, or teaching his ſcholers. So the cuſtome to teach the youth at that time was very fine and eaſie, to giue children a taſt of learning and vertue: for as the tutors imployed part of their time to diſcourſe in the preſence of their diſciples, they occupied them in the ſame exerciſe afterwards, and made them declare, and ſay their opinion of diuerſe matters: ſo that in few weekes by way of ſport and recreation they had runne through all the ſecrets of Philoſophie. Vnto the which they ioyned alſo, beſides their compoſitions and particular exerciſes, their familiar talke and recreatiue diſputations in their walkes, at their ſuppers and feaſts, where nothing elſe could be heard but that which made the young men wiſe and vertuous in a ſhort ſpace. That may be gathered out of Plutarchs writings, and out of thoſe eſpecially where he ſpeaketh how children ſhould be taught, of the lecture of the Poets, how they ſhould heare, his talke at the table, and a good number of declamations diſperſed in the middeſt of his morall workes. In this place I remember that which he himſelfe ſpake in diſcourſe, how a man ſhould know a flatterer from a friend, touching the direction of this his tutor. Our maiſter Ammonius, ſayth he, perceiuing in his lecture he made after dinner, that ſome of his diſciples & familiars had made a larger dinner then was fit for ſtudens: he commaunded one of his ſeruants a free man to beate his owne ſonne: he could not (ſayth he) dine without vineger. When he had ſpoken that, he caſt his eye vpon vs: ſo that they which were indeed culpable, found that he meant it by them. We may ſee alſo in the firſt and ſecond queſtion of his third booke of talke at the the table, how ready this Philoſopher was to ſharpen the ſpirits of young men that frequented him. Thus therefore Plutarch hauing ſo good a helpe, in few yeares he profited greatly in the knowledge of all the parts of Philoſophy, and neuer went out of his countrey, nor trauelled to vnderſtand ſtrange languages, although the Latine tongue was common in Rome, and in diuerſe places of the Romaine Empire: which extended it ſelfe into Greece, and beyond, as Plutarch noteth it in the end of his Platonicall queſtions. Without notwithſtanding that he euer profited much in the knowledge of any other tongue, ſauing in the knowledge of the Greeke: the which alſo hath a taſt of his Philoſophie of Boeotia. He doth alſo confeſſe in the beginning of the life of Demoſthenes, that whileſt he was in Italie and in Rome, he had no leiſure to ſtudie, nor to exerciſe the Latine tongue, as well for the buſineſſe he had then in hand, as to ſatisfie thoſe that frequented him to learne Philoſophie of him. So that very late, being well ſtepped on in yeares, he began to take Latine bookes in his hand, wherein there happened a ſtrange thing vnto him, but yet true notwithſtanding: that is, that he did not learne nor vnderſtand things ſo much by the words, as by a certaine vſe and knowledge he had of things he attained to the vnderſtanding of the words. But furthermore (they are his owne words) to know how to iudge well, wherein conſiſteth the beautie of the Latine tongue, or to ſpeake it readily, or to vnderſtand the figures, tranſlations, and the fine knitting of ſimple ſayings one with the other, which do adorne and beautifie the tongue, I thinke well (ſayd he) that it is a very goodly thing and pleaſant: but withall it requireth a long and labourſome exerciſe, fit for thoſe that be at better leiſure then I am, and that be yet able for age to attend ſuch fineneſſe. That which is aboue aboue ſpoken of, ſheweth that in that time they learned ſciences in their mother tongue, ſo that euen from their cradle children began to enter into the ſchoole of the Muſes, and pierced into the goodlieſt ſecrets of the ſame, hauing in their owne tongue the arts and goodly diſciplines diſcouered euen to the bottome: whereas preſently the beſt of our age ſtealeth away in learning of words, and when we ſhould enter into the knowledge of things, our memorie is ouer-whelmed and iudgement altered with an infinitie of obiects, which (like diuerſe fawces) haue moſt times altered our right taſt. Inſomuch that almoſt commonly we ſee that we delight for the moſt part to heape together letters vpon letters, and after a great prouiſion of ſtrange words, we find our ſelues children, and voide of the true knowledge of things. But now to come againe to Plutarch, as touching his ſufficiency and his aduancement in ſciences, we need not ſpeake of them in particular, conſidering that his writings do ſufficiently proue them, and that we haue alſo ſpoken ſomething in the preface of his morall workes.

Now, as his good fortune made him meete with excellent maiſters, and men very carefull to manure ſo noble a ſpirit: ſo he for his part aunſwered their hope very ſufficiently, ſhewing himſelfe euen from his infancy to the end of his life wholly giuen to ſtudy, with an earneſt deſire (but well gouerned) to keepe his body in health, to content his mind, and to make himſelfe profitable a long time to himſelfe, and to others alſo. Which was no hard matter for him, hauing bene carefully brought vp euen from his cradle, and ſo well gouerned, as was requiſite to maintaine himſelfe long in ſtrength: his fathers houſe and table being a ſchoole of temperance and of frugalitie. Conſidering furthermore that talke with learned men was very neceſſary for him to attaine to that which he pretended: and hauing a mind deſirous to excel in all things, he trauelled into Ægypt, & talked there of all the ancient doctrine with the wiſeſt men, whereof afterwards he made a collection and intituled it, of Iſis, and Oſiris: which is yet left vnto vs, where he ſheweth himſelfe to be well ſtudied in the Diuinity and Philoſophy of the Ægyptians. From thence he returned againe into Greece, and viſited the townes and vniuerſities where there were any Philoſophers, and frequented them all, to gather together the goodly inſtructions which he hath left vs. Moreouer he began to make collections, & culled out remembrances not only out of the bookes already publiſhed, but alſo of the notable talke and diſcourſe which he vnderſtood of the one & the other. Alſo of regiſters & autenticall inſtruments kept in towns where he came, whereof afterwards he did moſt artificially frame the moſt part of his workes. And pretending ſuch a laudable end, the better to eſtabliſh his conceits, and to ſpeake with a more commendable authority and good maner: he made a iourney vnto the city of Sparta, of purpoſe to ſee the papers & memories of all the gouernment of this goodly commonwealth, & of their lawmakers, Kings, and Ephores, and gathered together all their notable deeds & ſayings ſo carefully as could be poſſible, euen to the leaſt words of the ſimple ſouldiers and women of Sparta, together with all their cuſtomes, ordinances, ceremonies, and faſhions to liue in common, and particularly, in warre and in peace. He did the like in diuerſe other commonwealths, as his liues, & the demands of things pertaining to the Greekes and Romaines doth amply proue it: without which collections alſo it was vnpoſſible for him to haue left in writing ſuch particularities, & he could not but of neceſſity haue had communication with a great number of men louers of antiquities. Vnto that he ioyned a curious ſearch of ſtatues, mettals, inſcriptions, paintings, tables: alſo of Prouerbes, Epigrams, Epitaphes, Apophthegms, & other ornaments of hiſtory, to leaue nothing behind him. And being continually almoſt in the company of learned men in all profeſſions: it ſeemeth his memory was alwayes bent to gather, & his iudgement occupied to diſcerne that which was to be reiected or retained. By which meanes he ſaw himſelfe in a ſhort time aduanced to the knowledge of all things: moreouer he had in his hands goodly briefes and collections, with the which he finely holpe himſelfe, and afterwards made a good part vnto his friends and poſterity. He himſelfe at the beginning of his booke treating of the contentment and quietneſſe of the mind, makes mention of the memories which he had of long time made for his owne vſe. So that out of this rich cloſet he hath drawne the excellent peeces which haue remained vnto vs, and which ſhew how much we haue loſt being depriued of them that are no more to be found, and the which time hath diſperſed, or vtterly conſumed.

Now though that in generall it may be ſayd, that this man was ignorant in no learning, nor of the goodly ſecrets of nature: yet this word we muſt adde to it, that whoſoeuer ſhall duly conſider the entrance, continuance, compoſition, binding and incloſing of his diſcourſe, be it that he write an hiſtorie, or that he by any treatie apart will put backe vice, and make vertue to be beloued: be it that he ſport himſelfe in clearing the difficulties of naturall Philoſophie, or of the Mathematickes, be it that he beginneth to commence ſome diſputation againſt thoſe whoſe opinions he diſproueth: we ſhall find in his writings an exact and eaſie method both together, his proofes ſound, and his inductions pleaſant and agreeable to all ſorts of wits, and of ſuch

pithie diſcourſes, ſo that of force we muſt confeſſe that this perſon had bene moſt excellently directed in his ſtudies, conſidering that in ſpeaking after ſuch an eaſie manner, he preſenteth ſo profound inſtructions, and I cannot tell what, where there is alwayes ſomewhat to be learned. Furthermore, ſeeing diuerſe ſects in credite in his time, it ſeemeth he had a good will to ſound into the depth of the value & error of them. Then reaching higher yet, he hath ſearched out the opinions of the firſt Sages. So that the Pythagorians, Platonians, Epicurians, Stoickes, and Peripatetitians, with their precepts haue bene very familiar with him. But not being content with turning ouer the leaues of their writings, and ſeeing to the end all that which the naturall Philoſophers haue thought of the ſecrets of the world: yet would he familiarly frequent thoſe whom he vnderſtood to be practiſed in ſciences, and conferre with them, vnderſtand their reaſons, and be throughly reſolued of them: and at the length obtained his deſire, as his bookes make mention. That was accompanied with a continuall reading of all ſorts of good Authors, as well to amplifie his collections, as ſtill more and more to enrich his memorie, and to poliſh his iudgement: as may be noted in his workes three ſeuerall excellences of his ſpirit. For ſome of them are certaine declamations made in the ſchoole, and by way of exerciſe, as we haue ſhewed them placed at the beginning of the ſame: ſo that if he would haue taken the paines to haue reuiewed and ſmoothed thoſe peeces there, they would haue ſeemed to be others then they were. But we perceiue that he left ſome vnperfect, not thinking that that (which ſerued not but for a proofe of ſome thing better laboured) deſerued to come to light. There are alſo ſome other diſcourſes better poliſhed, yet in ſuch ſort notwithſtanding, that it plainely appeareth, he might haue amplified them and made them better. And there be other peeces, vnto the which it may be ſayd, he hath put his laſt hand: as are his Liues, and the moſt part of his Morall workes, written at leiſure, very aduiſedly, conſidered in all vnderſtanding, and to diuerſe reiterations. He could haue done the like in all, and with the like ſtile haue raiſed his writings to their perfection: but hauing as it were more expreſſely ſtayed himſelfe vpon ſome, he hath ſhewed therein the diſpoſition of his ſtudies, and with what diſcretion he ſpent his time.

Now, though he had taſted of all the ſects of the Philoſophers, yet you may perceiue that inclining to the Platonians (for he greatly reuerenced Socrates and Plato, whoſe birth dayes he did yearely celebrate) he neuertheleſſe ſhut himſelfe within the bounds of modeſtie of certaine Academickes, being content ſimply to propound the things, but to leaue them to the iudgement of the readers, forcing no man. Furthermore, we ſee with what diligence he had turned ouer the leaues of the writings of the Epicurians, and of the Stoickes, againſt whom he ſtoutly oppoſed himſelfe. But morall Philoſophie was his chiefeſt end: for the rationall, the naturall, and the Mathematickes (the which he had greatly ſtudied) they were but ſimple paſtimes in compariſon of the other. Whereupon may be diſcerned, that hauing receiued in himſelf a ſingular pleaſure of ſuch ſtudy, he alwayes ſought to print the ſame deſire and contentment in the thought of all men, leauing the ſpeculations and pricking queſtions: onely tending to this good, to bring wiſedome into the houſes, to eſtabliſh it in the thrones of kings, to make it go in the ſtreetes, to lodge it in the eyes, in the eares, vpon the tongues, and in the bottome of the hearts of all men. See here what his thoughts haue bene, which he could well diſgeſt afterwards: ſo that it ſeemeth he was altogether giuen to that. Now though he was occupied in meditations and ſo excellent workes, he forgot not therefore any thing that was requiſite for the exerciſes of his body, ſuch as men vſed at that time, to keepe their ſpirits in ſtrength, as alſo more ioyfully to paſſe ouer ſo manie other croſſes as our life is aſſailed withall. And we may ſee alſo in the precepts he hath written of health, that albeit Phyſicke was not his profeſſion, neuertheleſſe he learned that which was the principall for his owne priuate good. For in that booke of his, he ſpeaketh reaſonably of the vſe of meates, and ſheweth from what meates we ſhould abſtaine. Afterwards hauing declared in what ſort one ſhould vſe his appetite and the pleaſures of the bodie, he condemneth the exceſſe of drinking and eating, he teacheth how to preuent ſickneſſe, ſetteth downe remedies, treateth of diet, and of ſignes of ſickneſſe, and of the true wayes how to keepe health. And thereupon he commeth to reaſon of the exerciſes and diet of ſtudents, laying that open which we ſhould moſt carefully obſerue therein: which maketh me beleeue that he hauing knowne ſo well what was fit for the preſeruation of the body, he did wiſely helpe himſelfe: as alſo euen to very old age he hath hath borne office in the commonwealth, and alwayes caried a body and mind lusty and readie to take paines, hauing had this wisedome to consider well his nature and disposition: also to take such meates and drinkes as were good for his stomacke, and to vse them soberly, and keeping his body in good state by commendable exercises and nouriture, to make himselfe profitable a long time for humane society. It is true that he being a graue man, raised to honour, and a Philosopher by profession, his chiefest exercises of body were to walke with other learned men, where without contention of words, he alwayes decided some points of Philosophie. Furthermore he loued to talke at the table, and to mingle pleasant & graue matters with some new deuice: so wittily and sweetly to enterlace and deuide the course of his life: being no crabbed nor sullen person, but pleasant, and whose company was troublesome to none: and otherwise as sober and discreet in his talke, as he was in drinking and eating.

So then his maners, as well alone, as with his friends and openly, do shew, that truly he had a good soule within a body well tempered. Now I do not enter here into the examination of the ridiculous opinions of Plutarch in matter of religion: being sory that so rare a spirit hath bene so miserably enuironed with the darknesse which was at that time in the most part of the townes & men of Grece, & specially among so many wise men, straungely ignorant and dull in respect of the knowldge of the true God. If we had not bin warned betimes by the true and onely wise men taught in the schoole of eternall wisdome, of such a iudgement of God vpon the wise men of the world, who haue bene confounded in their discourse, when there hath bene question of the honor due to our soueraigne Lord: then we might haue bene astonied, and remained as men cast away. And whereas so many great wise men haue erred in their wayes, that will not excuse them before their iudge, as if he had kept the light from them. For, since that which may be knowne of his eternitie and omnipotent power, hath bene reuealed vnto them in nature and in philosophie: staying a man vpon himselfe, or vpon other creatures, and forsaking the onely Creator, they condemne themselues by their owne words and writings. Now to come againe to Plutarch. He hauing bene Apolloes Priest, as himselfe confesseth, and from his youth suckled with the foolish dotings of the Greekes: I do not find it straunge, that many absurd opinions and without good ground (yea wicked and pernicious) are scattered in his disputations, touching the default of Oracles, of the religion of the Iewes, of the inscription of the letter E ϒ in the temple of Delphes: why the propheteſſe Pythia doth no more giue her oracles in verse, and in many places of the liues and workes, in the which he openly inclineth to the superstitions and Atheismes of the Pagans. There he sheweth a conscience euill informed, and a man running very swiftly out of the right way. By the same meanes a man may plainely note, that in matter of supernaturall and diuine philosophy, another manner of light then that of our corrupt vnderstanding is wholly required, not being possible that a man left to his owne wit can comprehend the things which are of God: because they are discerned after a fashion meerly vnknowne vnto him, and of the which he cannot be partaker but by a speciall grace, and which nature doth not bestow vpon him, but he which hath made and reformed nature. It is no maruell then if Plutarch should be misled, that hath had so manie instructions and maisters strayed from the way of the eternall truth, and whose predeceſſours were drowned in the bottomlesse pit of ignorance. Yet notwithstanding, in the middest of that darknesse he hath had so much light, that he seemeth at times to note and condemne the laberinth of errour, as a man that hath lost his way in an horrible darke night should from one time to another be directed rightly by the light of the flashings of lightning. For some do gather by his discourse, of the cessation of the Oracles, and by other places, that he did acknowledge one God, and very liberally condemned many old and new superstitions, vnto the which both himselfe, and others his like, did cleaue vnto rather by custome for fashions sake, and to please the people, then for any opinion they had that they were worth ought. But as I haue sayd, my intention is not to iudge this person nor his deeds: considering that besides the matter I touch (euery where where he goeth out of the way) he confuteth himselfe sufficiently: witnesse his discourse of superstition, and the seuenth chapter of his first booke touching the opinions of the Philosophers, where he will dispute of the eternall prouidence: and the third question of the second booke of talke of the table, making mention of the egge: and the last question of the fourth booke, where he medleth with speaking of God, and of the ceremonies of the Iewes. In the meane time, and in the middest of this great blindnesse, they see in Plutarch a heart that is enemie vnto vice, and a friend of good manners. Let a man ſee him in his familie, in the ſchoole, in bankets, with his friends, and openly: behold, there is a graue man, modeſt in behauiour, ſharpe, learned, and pleaſant in his diſcourſes, offending nor hurting no man. If he ſpeake of vice, he letteth out the filthineſſe, and ſcantly maketh the patient cry. If he ſpeake for vertue, it is with ſuch efficacie, that euerie man may know he ſpake of the aboundance of his heart. He is a good father of a houſe, a wiſe ſchoole-maiſter, a graue hiſtorian, a braue politician, an excellent Philoſopher, a good writer to imitate: and furthermore, a faithfull, profitable, true, and a ioyfull counſellour and friend. His plaineneſſe, ſimplicitie, and graue modeſtie ſhineth in all his writings: his vertue, accompanied almoſt ordinarily with all others which we need not ſpeake of particularly, neither to vnfold the life of our Philoſopher from one part to another to ſee his vprightneſſe, integritie, grauity, ſweetneſſe, conſtancie, force, prudence, temperancie, and liberality: that may be truly ſpoken of him, which had bene long time before applied in the Theaters vnto Amphiaraus, and to Ariſtides:

He litle cares to ſeeme vpright, but ſtriueth ſo to be,
In deepeſt thoughts preferring vertue ſtill:
Whence day by day, proceeding we do ſee
Wiſe counſels, that without reſpect, true honours lawes fulfill.

In teſtimonie of his ſweete grauitie, and of part of his thoughts: I will alledge ſome words couched in his owne diſcourſe againſt choler. As for me, ſayd he, If I haue done well or euill I know not, but by that meanes I haue rid my ſelfe of choler. As the LACEDÆMONIANS did in old time, who to learne their children not to be drunke at all, ſhewed them their ſlaues being drunke: ſo do I conſider the effects of choler in others. And afterwards he addeth more, that a man ſhould accuſtome himſelfe to beare many of his wiues words, and of his familiars and friends, which do reproue vs for that we are too gentle and ſoft. And this was the chiefeſt cauſe (ſayd he) why I was ſo often angrie with my ſeruants, fearing they would waxe worſe for want of reproofe and correction. But I obſerued my ſelfe at the laſt, though late, that firſt I were better by patience and pardoning them, make my ſeruants worſe: then to hurt my ſelfe by ſharpneſſe and choler, ſeeking to reforme others. I conſidered alſo with my ſelfe, and remembred (ſayd he) that as he which teacheth vs to ſhoote in a bow, doth not forbid vs to draw, but to faile in drawing: ſo he that teacheth vs to puniſh in time and place, moderately, profitably, and as we ſhould: doth not let vs but that we may puniſh. I do labour all I can to withdraw, and vtterly to baniſh all choler: principally becauſe I would not take from them that are puniſhed, the meane to iuſtifie themſelues, and to heare them. For time bringeth in the interim to the paſſionate mind, a delay and forgetfulneſſe which diſſolueth it: in which ſpace the iudgement of reaſon findeth both the meane and the meaſure to giue reaſonable correction. And beſides that they giue the partie puniſhed no place to reſiſt the puniſhment, if he be not corrected in anger and choler, but conuinced for that he had well deſerued it. And (which were yet more vnſeemely) they ſhall not find that the ſeruant puniſhed ſpeaketh more iuſtly then his maiſter that puniſheth him. Touching this purpoſe, I will remember the pleaſant report which the Philoſopher Taurus made of Plutarch, as Gellius reciteth it in the ſixe and twentieth chapter of the firſt booke of his nights Attiques, as ſome man hath heretofore expreſſed it in our language. A ſlaue, a vile and vicious man (but yet that had his eares ſomewhat inſtructed with bookes and diſputations of Philoſophie) hauing bene ſtripped naked for ſome fault he had done, by the commaundement of his maiſter Plutarch, whileſt they were whipping of him, he grombled at the firſt that it was without reaſon, and that he had done nothing: but in the end crying out amaine, and iniuring his maiſter, he told him that he was no Philoſopher as he bragged himſelfe to be: and that he often heard him ſay it was a fowle thing to be angrie, yea that he made a booke of it: and that now (ouercome with choler) in making him be beaten ſo cruelly, he vtterly belied all his writings: Thereunto Plutarch coldly and quietly aunſwered: Why, how now roiſter, ſayd he? whereby doeſt thou thinke that I am angrie at this preſent? my countenance, my voice, my colour, my words, do they giue thee any ſigne that I am angrie? I do not thinke I haue cruell eyes, nor a troubled face, nor any fearefull crie. Do I bluſh? do I fome? doth any thing eſcape me that I ſhould repent me? do I ſtampe? do I rage? For to tell thee truly, theſe be the ſhewes of choler. Afterwardes he turned to him that whipped him:

ſaying: Forward with your buſineſſe, whiles he and I do reaſon the matter. Furthermore, we may eaſily gather what Plutarch was amongſt his friends, from the nine bookes, containing the queſtions decided at the table. And for his diſputations againſt the EPICVRIANS and STOICKES, they ſhew that this perſon for the regard of his actions concerning the commonwealth, hauing reſpect vnto thoſe whom at that time he made his iudges, and to the poſterity into whoſe hands his writings might come hereafter: he alwayes caried himſelfe in ſuch a modeſt grauity, that they could require no more of him. And if ſometime he did feelingly touch ſome, as Colotes, and Herodotus, it was not in vaine. Alſo he alwayes vſed termes which witneſſed that he had an vpright ſoule. To be ſhort, it appeareth euery where that his paſſions were maruellous well ſtaied. And if any of them were furious or violent, he could tell in time and place how to reforme them by the precepts of Philoſophy, leading (as is ſayd) a life without blame of men. But aboue all the reſt, when any diſcourſe or diſputation drew him vnto it, to ſpeake of ſhamefull or diſhoneſt things, he did conuey it with ſuch diſcretion as it cannot be amended: whereof we need not to bring forth examples diſperſed in his writings, and eſpecially in the dialogue of loue, ſeeing that being concealed it doth no hurt, as alſo remembred or too expreſſely reuealed, it cannot but hurt the eyes, and an honeſt thought.

Furthermore, Plutarchs ſtudie of Philoſophie tooke not away the care he had to liue with ſome profit amongſt men, nor made him to diſdaine the meanes which his predeceſſors had left him. But as he came of a noble houſe, and with time being aduanced vnto office and charge in the commonwealth, greatly eſteemed of Traian the Emperor, and of the noble men of ROME, he ſaw he had goods inough to liue at eaſe: whereof notwithſtanding he neuer made ſuch account as that he wold forget his ſtudy, & intangle himſelf in the ſnares of the loue of riches, within the which ſo many miſerable ſoules haue bin engaged vnto death. His means ſerued his turne to maintaine himſelfe among his friends, and to bring vp his children: for he had many of an honorable Lady which he maried, and loued moſt dearly. Amongſt his other ſons, himſelfe maketh mention of Autobulus, of Plutarchus, & of Charon, who died a yong infant, & ſome others whom he nameth not at all. Alſo of daughters, two of the which were maried to Firmus, and vnto Craton, learned philoſophers: and Timoxene, who died very yong. As for Autobulus, he maried in his fathers life time, and it is not well knowne, whether Sextus of CHÆRONEA, a Philoſopher of the Scepts, who liued in great honour in the Empire of Antonius, was his ſonne, or the ſonne of Plutarchus. That which I am now about to ſpeake of, may be gathered out of diuerſe places in the workes of Plutarch, and ſpecially of the diſcourſe at the table. And in the conſolation which he wrote to his wife vpon the death of their daughter, they may note that ſhe was an honorable Lady, modeſt, and vertuous, well attended on with women and ſeruants: and otherwiſe charitable to her children, and bearing great reuerence vnto her husband. That the houſe of Plutarch was very well gouerned: that he had a great number of kinsfolkes and friends. And in other places of his booke intituled Sympoſitum, and other treaties, we may know that his ſonnes and nephews were ſtudious and learned, and ſpecially in the ſixt queſtion of his eight booke of talke at the table, ſpeaking of his youngeſt children: who becauſe they taried ſomewhat longer at the Theater then they ſhould haue done, to ſee and heare the paſtimes they made there, came by that meanes late to ſupper: it ſhewed ſufficiently that they now began to follow the fathers ſteps. And there appeared in no part any euill touch amongſt theſe perſons: but as Plutarch did conuerſe in a ſingular reuerence, friendſhip, and gentleneſſe, with his grandfather, his father, and his brethren: we are to iudge the like conuerſation with his wife, his children, and his nephews: as alſo they being in ſo good a ſchoole could not faile but euery day to go forward in the knowledge and practiſe of vertue.

But as a fountaine hidden ſerueth to no vſe, ſo it had litle preuailed Plutarch to haue ſeene, read, and gathered ſo much together, vnleſſe he had made litle ſtreames runne from ſuch a liuely and goodly fountaine, vnto ſuch places where his vertue might ſhine more then in any other parts of the world. That was ITALIE, and the city of ROME, the ſeate of the Empire, and where (notwithſtanding the diſorders brought in by former warres, and by the diſſolutions and tyrannies of ſome Emperors) notwithſtanding there were many learned men, and in the Emperors courts alſo ſome counſellors, and other perſons of authority which loued vertue. Now Plutarch hauing begun to aduance himſelfe in GRECE, about the time of Veſpaſian and Titus, it ſeemeth he came to ROME immediatly after the death of Titus, vnder Domitian, as well to make

profeſſion there of Philoſophy, as alſo that he might more nearly know the auncient gouernement of the commonwealth, and to increaſe his collections, from the which proceeded afterwards infinite particularities incloſed in his workes: but eſpecially the liues of the noble Romaines compared with the Greekes. For my part, I thinke Plutarch was drawne to Rome by meanes of ſome friends he had there, eſpecially by Soſsius Senecio, that had bene a Conſull, who was of great eſtimation at that time, and namely vnder the Empire of Traian. And that which maketh me thinke ſo, is becauſe of Plutarchs owne words, who ſayth in the beginning of his firſt booke of his diſcourſe at the table, that he gathered together all his reaſons and diſcourſes made here and there, as well in Rome with Senecio, as in Greece with Plutarch and others. Not being likely that he wold haue taken the paines to haue made ſo long a voyage, & to haue come to ſuch a citie where he vnderſtood not their vulgar tongue, if he had not bene drawne thither by Senecio, and ſuch other men: as alſo in acknowledgement of the good turnes and honour he had receiued by ſuch men, he dedicated diuerſe of his bookes vnto them, and among others, the liues vnto Senecio, and the nine volumes of his diſcourſe at the table: with the treatie, How a man may know that he profiteth in vertue. Now for the time, conſidering what he ſayth in the end of his booke againſt curioſitie, I ſuppoſe that he taught in Rome in the time of Titus and of Domitian: for touching that point, he maketh mention of a noble man called Ruſticus, who being one day at his lecture, he would not open a letter which was brought him from the Emperor, nor interrupt Plutarch, but attended the end of his declamation, and vntill all the hearers were gone away: and addeth alſo, that Ruſticus was afterwards put to death by the commaundement of Domitian. Furthermore, about the beginning of the life of Demoſthenes, Plutarch ſayth, that whileſt he remained in Italie and at Rome, he had no leiſure to ſtudie the Latine tongue: as well for that he was buſied at that time with matters he had in hand, as alſo to ſatisfie thoſe that were his followers to learne Philoſophie of him. He doth not tell what matters he had in hand beſides his profeſſion: but following that which Suidas and others ſpeake of him, that he was neare to the perſon of Traian, and had the honor and place to be his ſchoole-maſter and teacher, or at the leaſtwiſe one of ſo many learned men as this prince made much of, as ſome ſtory writers do teſtifie, he was honoured and aduanced to ſome charge or gouernement: which I thinke is that he ſpeaketh of in this place. Now furthermore, his chiefeſt labour was publickly to teach all the parts of Philoſophie, mingling in his declamations and lectures a diligent and curious ſearch of all that the auncient Philoſophers, reaſonable, naturall, or morall, of what ſect ſoeuer they were had treated of: as appeareth by his writings, which are as ſummaries of his leſſons and orations he made with his owne voyce. His ſpeech doth not flow ſo as that of many other Philoſophers, Oratours, and Greeke Hiſtorians: but being come later, and in a more rude and harſh world, his ſtile alſo is more hard, briefe, enforced, and Philoſopher like: ayming at this marke to inſtruct the mind firſt, not tarying to tickle the eares much, though he did fill and content them learnedly. But the flowing ſweetneſſe we taſt in Plato, in Xenophon, in Herodotus, and in ſome other, wanting indeed in Plutarch, is ſupplied and recompenced in him by infinite ſtories, ſentences, ſimilitudes, and notable particulars which he boroweth of others, and whereof he compoſed a worke ſo well deuided, ſo rich, and ſo pleaſant, by reaſon of his varietie, that it is not poſſible to reade bookes of a more gentle and profitable reading, amongſt all the hiſtorians, & Philoſophers, Greeks or Romaines. If Plutarch then doth at this preſent content all ſorts of men, what may we thinke he did with his liuely voyce? but after the example of this Hercules of Gavle, which held his auditors eares faſt chained to his toung: ſo hath he by his goodly documents moued an infinite number of men, to leaue vice, and to cloath them with the loue of vertue.

So he hauing continued theſe exerciſes for ſome yeares, being heard and viſited of all ſorts of men, grew to be of ſuch reputation, that the greateſt perſons began to ſeeke him and to make much of him, yea to thinke themſelues honoured by his friendſhip: as his bookes dedicated vnto ſome of them do ſufficiently teſtifie it. And touching the acceſſe he had about the perſon of Traian himſelf, it may be gathered from the beginning of this goodly collection of Apothegmes, which he dedicated vnto this great Emperour, what was his intention: that is to wit, to ſerue for the good of all the Romaine Empire, giuing wholeſome inſtructions vnto the head thereof. For he wiſely iudged, that in ruling the thought of that man, it was to giue phiſicke at once vnto all the ſubiects of that great Monarchie. The ſame being a common thing, that

Subiects

Subiects and kingdomes commonly do chuſe
The manners that their Princes daily vſe.

It is true that ſuch inſtructions in reſpect of Traian, do onely concerne his perſon and politicke affaires. For as touching the only true religion, it was meerely vnknowne of Plutarch, and rudely perſecuted vnder the Empire of Traian: who notwithſtanding in the end being ſoftened by the precepts of moral Philoſophie, and through the aduertiſements his deputie gouernors gaue him, & namely Plinius ſecundus gouernor of BITHYNIA, of the innocencie of the Chriſtians: or rather reſtrained by the ſecret prouidence of our ſoueraigne Lord, (who excellently ſtrengthened his, put the Oracles of the lying ſpirit to ſilence, and ouerthrew Idolatrie in moſt places) he caried himſelfe more gently, and did forbid to vexe and trouble them any more, whom before they had purſued with all ſorts of cruelties. Furthermore, I thinke that it was in fauour of Traian chiefly, that Plutarch made certaine particular Treatiſes, (beſides the liues of Noblemen) and amongſt others that, where he maintaineth, that it is requiſite a Prince ſhould be wiſe. The inſtruction for thoſe that deale in the affaires of eſtate. The notable ſayings of GREEKES and ROMAINES, and others concerning the dutie of Princes and great Lords. Now conſidering that wherein he reaſoneth, and briefly defendeth, (but gaudy, and with aſſured proofes) that a Philoſopher ought to conuerſe with Princes: ſome may ſay that it is an Apologie of Plutarch, againſt the common and light obiections of ſome Courtiers, which thinke that Princes cannot be well counſelled, but by men that blow (as they ſay) fire with their mouthes, and that carie the rapier and dagger in their hands: and would that men of learning (whom in ſcorne they call ſchoolemaiſters and Philoſophers) ſhould be turned to their ſtudie, or into a ſchoole, to crie out there as much and as lowd as they thinke good. Therefore he was willing as well to encourage himſelfe firſt in that diſcourſe, as alſo to remedie what in him lay, certaine euils infinitely abounding and ouerflowing in others. In all times and ages euery man hath granted and confeſſed, that amongſt thoſe that want good companie, are Princes, Lords, and great perſonages. For their affaires being ſo important and waightie, as euery man knoweth, their bodies being weake, and their ſpirits not able to diſpatch all things: they muſt needes ſee by others eyes, and worke with others hands. Whereupon there are three ſorts of men which are to be reproued. For the firſt, they are the Princes themſelues, who in ſtead of calling and drawing neare vnto them, men of honour that might helpe them in any matter, they giue acceſſe vnto ill-minded men, that corrupt them, and ouerthrow their eſtate. The ſecond (but a ſmall number at all times) are the Philoſophers, that is to ſay, men of authoritie, wiſe, learned, louers of vertue, and of the good of Princes and of their ſubiects: who being able to do much, yet they draw backe: or being aduanced, haue not alwaies that conſideration nor courage that is fit, being oftentimes caried away with the greateſt opinion, and mingling ſomewhat too much their humane wiſedome with the apprehenſion of their true dutie: whereof their conſcience being cleared diuerſe waies, doth ſufficiently informe them. For the laſt, they are ignorant tutours, or Atheiſts, minions, ſhifters, ieſters, flatterers, brokers of filthie pleaſures, and ſuch practiſers, which by wicked meanes creepe into Princes Courts, houſes and cloſets. And in recompence of the charges they boldly accept, and of the treaſures which they heape together with a wicked conſcience, and do afterwards ſpend of the ſame, they do deceiue, diſhonor, and finally they vndo their vnwiſe maiſters: as a million of examples in hiſtories do teſtifie. Plutarch therefore conſidering theſe things, doth attempt in this Treatiſe to giue courage vnto thoſe, that haue a deſire to ſee all things well ordered: and ſuch maner of men doth he exhort to be about Princes. But becauſe grauity and wiſdome maketh men modeſt and ſlow: as to the contrary, ignorance & malice maketh them haue braſen faces: he ſheweth that it is no ambition of a Philoſopher to be about great Lords, but rather that his duty doth beare it, ſithence that ſuch receiue honor, pleaſure and profit: and this he proueth by reaſons, & notable examples. But aboue all, he forgetteth not to ſet vpon thē that come to Princes courts to make thēſelues great, ſhewing that Philoſophers ſhould ſhoot at another marke. And laſt of all he treateth of the contentment thoſe receiue, which ſeruing one alone, do by the ſame means helpe an infinit number of others that are bound vnto them for ſo great a good turne. I haue written at large the argument of this treatie of Plutarch, becauſe it containeth the briefe of al the conceits of this Philoſopher coming to the Emperor: & it is a patterne alſo to al learned mē that enter into ſeruice of great lords, the which if they wil painfully follow, the chiefeſt may recouer ſome part of their auncient glorie. Now I make no doubt of it, but that Plutarch hath aſſayed by all poſſible meanes to practiſe that which he teacheth in this booke, to gaine to himſelfe a great contentment in his ſoule, and to leaue a good ſent of him vnto all poſteritie.

The cauſe that maketh me ſpeake this, is the conſideration of the eſtate in the which the Empire of ROME ſtood in at that time, the which if any man will at leyſure confer with that which he may gather out of many parts of Plutarchs workes, he ſhall find the words of Plato very true: that happie are thoſe commonwealths which are gouerned by Philoſophers, or by Princes that haue Philoſophers about them. For like as an expert pylote by his skill and knowledge reſiſteth the winds and billowes of the ſea, and in deſpite of their force beareth ſaile to the deſired hauen: euen ſo when the ſhip of the commonwealth hath a maiſter that guideth it by the precepts of Philoſophie, the gouernment is peaceable and happy euery way. And if any ſtorme happen, and neceſſitie requireth it, he finely plucketh downe the ſailes, and yeeldeth himſelfe in ſuch ſort to the waues, that he eſcapeth and ouercometh it with honor. Dion writeth, that one of the firſt actes Traian did, after he was choſen Emperor in the place of Nerua, was: that he wrote letters with his owne hand to the Senate of ROME, promiſing by them he would neuer put any man to death, or make him infamous, that was an honeſt man: and this he afterwards confirmed by ſolemne oth. He put Ælianus and the ſouldiers Prætorians to death, becauſe they mutined againſt Nerua. And after he had made his entrie into ROME, he gaue good order for the affaires of the eſtate, and ſpecially fauoured vertuous men many waies, graunted them great priuiledges, and gaue meanes to the cities of ITALIE to bring vp their youth. He raigned Emperour ninteene yeares and a halfe, being two and fortie yeares old when he was choſen. His behauiour was ſuch that he obtained the name of a iuſt, valiant, moderate, & a good Prince: ſo that in the flower of his youth, they noted in him a ſtayed iudgement, and in his age a great courage. He enuied no man, he hurt no man, he raiſed good men to honorable place and charge in the commonwealth: whereby it came to paſſe that he was neuer afraid, nor had no enemy in the world. Accuſers had no acceſſe vnto him: he was as gentle a Prince as was poſſible, and as much an enemy of couetouſneſſe, as he was of murthers and robberies. In time of peace and warre he was at great charge in ſtately buildings, witneſſe the wonderfull bridge ouer Danuby. But with magnificence ſuch enterpriſes and reparations ordinarily were neceſſarie, without oppreſſing or wronging any man: for he was a noble Prince, that deſired rather to be beloued of his ſubiects, then feared and much made of, as ſome of his predeceſſors. To meane men he ſhewed himſelfe courteous and eaſie to haue acceſſe vnto: graue and honourable among the Senatours. The ROMAINES loued him as much as they could poſſible, and his enemies infinitely were afraid of him. His paſ-times were hunting, feaſting, and the Theater to ſee common playes and ſports. Oftentimes he would be priuate with his friends, and came without his guard into their houſes, yea ſometimes he would lye there, and paſſe away the night. He was not of the wiſeſt, although by his behauiour they could not iudge otherwiſe of him, but that he was a wiſe and learned Prince. There was nothing in him but it was excellent, and in manner blameleſſe. For although he loued to drinke wine, and delighted to ſee faire boyes: yet for all this he neuer committed any foule act, being very warie in his paſſions, and aboue all, keeping himſelfe from abuſing his authority. He deſired nothing but war, but it was principally to ouercome his enemies, and to enrich his friends. Furthermore, he was ſo fortunate and braue a chieftaine of an armie, ſo beloued of his Captains and ſouldiers, that there was neuer any mutinie or diſorder in his campe. That made him dreadfull to thoſe that troubled him neare or farre off, of which the chiefeſt was Decebalus king of the DACIANS: whom he purſued ſo hard, that being vnpoſſible for him to eſcape, he killed himſelf. Furthermore he made warre with the PARTHIANS, with the ARABIANS, and with the IEVVES, with diuerſe euents, but almoſt alwaies to his aduantage. Furthermore, to come to his manners, he loued ſo faithfully, that it was a hard thing to make him thinke euill of thoſe whom he loued, which we will proue by ſome example. Certaine ill-willers brought him word that Sura Licinius, one of his priuate friends did practiſe ſomewhat againſt him. In ſtead of taking it ill to conceiue a hard opinion of him, he went (vnbidden) into Sura his houſe, he would ſup there, and ſending backe his guard, firſt he made Sura his Phiſition come to him, and ſhewed him his eyes to helpe ſome griefe that troubled him: not being ſo contented, he ſendeth for his Barber to ſhaue his beard: then being trimmed, and hauing waſhed, he ſate down at the table and ſupped.

The

The next morning ſome reporting vnto him the ill will that Sura did beare him: If he would haue killed me, ſaid he, yeſterday he might haue done it, for he had meanes to do it. This Sura was he vnto whom Traian had giuen the office of the great Marſhall of the Empire: and coming to him to tie his girdle baudricke wiſe about his necke, hauing the ſword drawne in his hand, he vſed this ſpeech vnto him: Receiue this ſword of me, and if I commaund as I ought, employ it in my defence: if I do otherwiſe, draw it againſt me, and take my life from me. He cauſed ſtatues to be ſet vp of Soſsius Senecio, of Palma, and of Celſus, who were all three Senators whom aboue all others he loued and honored. He ſet vp Libraries, and did many notable acts, in teſtimonie of his great courage. But that which moſt of all other doth commend him, is, that hauing done wonderfull much good to the Empire, by decree of the Senate, he was ſurnamed Optimus Imperator: that is to ſay, moſt good Emperour. And ſo was he wonderfully beloued of the Senators, and Officers of the Empire, of all the people, and ſpecially of the ſouldiers, amongſt whom he would be ſo familiar as if they had bene his companions. Furthermore, nothing pleaſed him ſo much as this title of Optimus: wherin he gloried amongſt his friends, and did more and more indeuour to ſhew himſelfe ſo. As alſo after him (as Eutropius reporteth) when any new Emperor was choſen by the Senate, after the ſhowtings of happie preſage, and well wiſhings of the Senatours, they cryed out vnto him: What, canſt thou be more fortunate then Auguſtus, and better then Traian! Now if we bring to the writings of Plutarch the life of this Prince, we will ſay that the Prince did alwaies thinke of the wiſe precepts of the Philoſopher: and on the other ſide that the Philoſopher hath framed the deedes of the Prince to the rule of good life, which he hath ſo fitly propounded to great and meane men. And therefore it is not to be maruelled at, if Plutarch declare (to the high praiſe of Traian and the Senate) in his treatie, where he inſtructeth thoſe that deale in publike affaires: that in his time for peace ſake, people had no need of wiſe gouernours to defend them: for (ſaid he) all the warres againſt the Greekes and barbarous people are fled from vs. Thus ſtandeth the eſtate of the Empire, the which if any man will particularly conferre with that which Plutarch ſetteth downe in his writings: he ſhall find it was happie to haue met with ſo well diſpoſed hearts, to receiue, and carefully to practiſe his goodly leſſons. And that as it was a ſingular honour to Traian by his vertue to haue obtained a ſurname that made him greater then the moſt part of the Romaine Emperors: ſo is Plutarch euery way to be commended, that was the excellent inſtrument to aduance and maintaine ſo great a good. Whereupon I deſire his Morals ſhould be ſpecially remembred, to apply that which he ſpeaketh of vice and vertue, vnto that which hath bene touched in the life of Traian. For I thinke the one can hardly be ſpoken of, but that the other by the ſame meanes muſt be remembred. And it ſeemeth that one ſelfe ſoule hath put forward theſe two hearts, both to giue and receiue one commendable inſtruction. Onely for proofe a man may with his eye run ouer two or three diſcourſes. As for example, that of the difference betwixt the flatterer and the friend: Againſt choler: How a man may know if he profite in the exerciſe of vertue: That it is requiſit a Prince ſhould be wiſe: The inſtruction for thoſe which deale in the affaires of the eſtate: The apothegmes: and there ſhall a man find the rules which the Emperour Traian could wiſely apply to himſelfe, and practiſe in all his actions.

So could he well acknowledge the good he had receiued of Plutarch, being a noble and bountifull Prince, as hath bene ſaid here-before. For, beſides the great honour he had done him at Rome, hauing made him a Conſull: he commanded (as ſaith Suidas) that all the magiſtrates and officers which were in the Prouince of Slavony, ſhould do nothing but vnder his authoritie. If we had the bookes of Marius Maximus, of Fabius Marcellinus, of Aurelius Verus, and of Statius Valens, which haue written the life of Traian: we might eaſily draw on this matter further, the which Suidas (according to his ſtile) is contented to touch in one word. And Dion who was a Greeke, a man very forgetfull for an Hiſtorian, and that in ſome places ſhewed he had no great iudgement: he ſeemeth to haue ſuppreſſed the name of Plutarch, as though he had bene offended with the fame obtained by this man. Or elſe, if one will take things in good part, as I encline vnto it: it may be he thought he needed make no mentiõ of one whoſe writings made him to be knowne ſufficiently. Yet furthermore, I do not find that Plutarch was in Slavonie at all, and if ſo be that he made any iourney thither, I thinke he taried not long there: becauſe it appeareth in diuerſe places of his works, that his abode was moſt in Italie and in Greece. And for his honorable charges committed vnto him, that ſhould not be thought very ſtraunge, if we conſider the merits of Plutarch, the names of Traian, and the goodwill that Soſsius Senecio, (one of the principall men of Rome, and of the chiefeſt fauorites of Traian) bare vnto Plutarch. For he that was in ſo great credit with his maiſter, would not forget him whom he loued aboue all other men: wherein he loſt not his time, foraſmuch as the ſtatue that was ſet vp for him, and that which Dion and ſome others do briefly paſſe ouer, do not commend Soſsius, as do the prefaces of honor, and the bookes which Plutarch dedicated vnto him. The which we need no more rehearſe, then to write ouer againe the Epiſtle of Plutarch vnto Traian, the which is written in Latine, as Amyot ſheweth in his preface of the liues: where he hath inſerted the Epiſtle at length, becauſe he thought it wiſely and grauely written, a briefe worthie of ſuch a Philoſopher as Plutarch. That which Cuſpinianus ſaith in the latter end of the life of Traian, ſeemeth to touch that: ſpeaking alſo, as if it had bene expreſſed out of Greeke into Latine. But time hath depriued vs of that, and of many other goodly peeces of the ſelfe ſame, as we haue ſomewhat ſpoken of it before in the beginning of the Morall workes. Now he hath written nothing touching his behauiour in his publike charge, but contenteth himſelfe to ſpeake a word ſometime paſſing by, becauſe he made no account of any thing but of Philoſophie, through the helpe whereof he aſſayed to make him ſelfe and others wiſer, and more vertuous euery day then other. Being a thing very likely that ſuch a man as had ſo painefully conſidered of the eſtate of the world, and of all ſorts of publike gouernments, and had ioyned his ſtudies with ſo great experience: that he hath happily managed the charges that were committed vnto him. To conclude, to liue as we ſhould amongſt men, the ſpeculation and knowledge of things being ioyned with the practiſe of the ſame, do bring foorth excellent effects: whereas thoſe that do content themſelues with the ſimple theoricke, and others that follow exerciſe, contemning the true vnderſtanding of the cauſes and grounds of affaires, as Philoſophie doth ſhew them: they oftentimes fall into wonderfull difficulties.

For Plutarch, though he taried a long time in Italie and in Rome, yet that tooke not away the remembrance of the ſweet aire of Greece, and of the litle towne where he was borne: but being touched from time to time with a ſentence of an ancient Poet, who ſaid, that

In whatſoeuer countrey men are bred,
(I know not by what ſweetneſſe of it led,)
They nouriſh in their minds a glad deſire
Vnto their natiue homes for to retire:

He reſolued to go back into Greece againe, there to end the reſt of his daies in reſt and honor amongſt his citizens, of whom he was honorably welcomed home. Some iudge that he left Rome after the death of Traian, being then of great years, to leade a more quiet life. So being then at reſt he earneſtly took in hand that which he had long thought of before, to wit, the Liues: and tooke great paines in it vntill he had brought his worke to perfection, as we haue done at this preſent: although that ſome liues, as thoſe of Scipio African, of Metellus Numidicus, and ſome others are not to be found. Now himſelfe confeſſeth in ſome place, that when he began this worke, at the firſt it was but to profit others: but that afterwards it was to profit himſelfe, looking vpon thoſe hiſtories, as if he had looked in a glaſſe, and ſeeking to reforme his life in ſome ſort, and to forme it in the mould of the vertues of theſe great men: taking this faſhion of ſearching their maners, and writing the liues of theſe noble men, to be a familiar haunting and frequenting of them. Alſo he thought (ſaid he himſelfe) that he lodged theſe men one after the other in his houſe, entring into conſideration of their qualities, and that which was great in either of them, chooſing and principally taking that which was to be noted, and moſt worthie to be knowne in their ſayings and deeds. In ſumme, he declared that by continuance of reading auncient hiſtories, and in drawing out the liues which he hath written, and receiuing daily in his vnderſtanding the memorable things of the moſt honeſt and vertuous men of times paſt: he inſtructed himſelfe, and prepared him to lay aſide all euill, fooliſh, diſhoneſt, or ſpitefull condition: if by chaunce by often frequenting their companie he muſt of neceſſitie keepe, he learned any euill touch. The which he did reforme, turning his quiet thought not ſtirred with any paſſion at all, to the conſideration of ſo many goodly examples. Now becauſe that ſome might obiect vnto him, that for the finiſhing of ſo great a peece of worke, he could not haue made choice of a fitter place then Rome: or rather that being a man giuen to his booke as he was, he ſhould haue left that worke vnto ſome other that had ſeene more. This obiection being of ſome weight, he anſwereth it at the beginning of the life of Demoſthenes, and ſaith: That to attaine to true felicitie, whereof the greateſt

part consisteth in the maners, qualities and conditions of the soule: it maketh no matter whether a man be borne in an obscure towne and of small name, no more then if he were borne of a foule or litle mother. For it were a mockerie to thinke that some small townes or litle Ilands could notwithstanding bring forth good Poets and excellent players of Comedies: & that they could not in like sort bring out an honest, iust, constant, wise, and noble or worthy man. And although we haue reason to thinke that arts and sciences inuented to make things necessary for the vse of men, or else to win a name and reputation, are made and counterfeited in poore litle towns: so we must also thinke that vertue, none otherwise then a straunge plant can take foot and root in any place, where it meeteth with a good nature, gentle and patient to indure paines. Wherfore if we come to cõmit any error, or that we liue otherwise then becometh vs, we must not accuse or blame the meannesse of our countrey, but iustly attribute the fault to our selues. It is true (saith he) that he that hath vndertaken to frame a peece of work, or to write any history, in the which many things should be put, not familiar in his countrey, and that they find not alwaies at their hand euery where, but strange for the most part, dispersed here and there, and that must be gathered from many places and diuers authors: in truth he must first and before all other things dwell in a great and noble city, full of people, and a great number of men louing goodly and honest things, to the end there may be store of books, and that in searching vp and downe, and hearing them tell with liuely voice many things, which other story-writers peraduenture haue left vnwritten, and that shall beare so much more credit, because they are fresh in memory of the liuing: he may make his worke complete and perfect in all things, and not wanting many things that should be necessarie for it. Hauing made this preface, he excuseth himselfe, that he could not profit so much in knowledge of the Latine tongue, as he desired, and sheweth how he did helpe himselfe. But forasmuch as it is in this worke of his Liues that Plutarch hath most shewed his sufficiencie, whether you consider the length of the worke, or trie with what iudgement he hath proceeded: peraduenture it will not be hurtfull to speake somewhat of it, beside that which hath bene spoken by his Translator in the Preface. I do not enter here into commendation of Historie in generall, nor we need not apply that vnto Plutarch, which Cicero and many others haue spoken. For if euer there were booke, next to that we call the holy Scriptures, it may be said, that that which containeth the liues of the noble GREEKES and ROMAINES, is an assured testimonie of many hundreds of yeares, a Sunne of veritie, a life of memorie, a true mistresse of life, and an excellent messenger of antiquitie. And as the stone called the Opall, sheweth many Orient colours aboue all other precious stones: so doth the liues of Plutarch make an abridgement of all the best things contained in the Greeke and Latine histories. For there are seene worthie examples of vices and vertues, an infinite number of Maximes and notable precepts touching the duties of euery one, their vertues and vices. Now although Plutarch in the ignorance and blindnesse of the true God, could not (no more then other prophane Historians) touch the true end of historie: yet we may note some admirable thing in him in that respect. Since historie (which containeth in it an infinite number of particular deedes and honourable actions, as the collection of the liues of Plutarch) is a goodly or glistering glasse or table, within the which may be discerned the wonders and admirable working of the diuine Prouidence: for to comprehend that well which God and men do, there are three things to be considered in euery historie: to wit, the men whereof there is question, the things worthie of memorie, and the circumstances, keeping this ground against the Epicurians and enemies of mans life: That there is a Godhead and supernaturall power which gouerneth and maintaineth the world, wherein nothing happeneth by chaunce, but all is guided by a most wise disposition of the same, for the preseruation of families, of ciuill pollicie, and of a companie and happie congregation that shall be taken out of this world into a better. A wise and learned Historian must haue an eye vpon these three things, for to applie them vnto three other vertues that ought to shine in him: veritie, moderation, and eloquence. Forsomuch as if he set out fables, or if he talke to no purpose, and make discourses at pleasure, or if he be troublesome in a speech not coherent and hanging well together: then he deserueth no more the name of an Historian. As for these vertues, I do assure my selfe that euery man of iudgement will agree, that they are readily to be found in Plutarch, accompanied with a sweet grauitie that alwaies pleaseth the reader, and giueth him at a hundred times reading as good a sauor and tast of him as at the first. Let a man look vpon stories that haue nothing in them but the name, and vpõ so many books ill composed, of the which Europe is full: they ſhal find that the parts neceſſarie to be obſerued in the perſons is nothing at all regarded: that thoſe which thinke to repreſent others, they do ſample them after a ſtrange faſhion. Therupon the affections and paſſions, the hatred, the enuie, euill ſpeaking, falſe reports, flatteries & lies, preſent themſelues ſo vntowardly that they marre all. To the contrarie, we ſee Plutarch very exact in that reſpect. It ſufficeth me to touch the things paſſing by: whether he ſhew the vices or vertues of great and meane perſons, he doth it in good termes, without aggrauating or making it leſſe. He taketh no maner of pleaſure to ſpeake euill of any, but wiſely hideth that whereof we ought not to ſpeake but with ſhame and compaſſion of mans infirmitie. And he is more enclined to commend the good in vicious perſons, then too much to ſet open the ſhops of their wickedneſſe. But if neceſſitie enforce him vnto it, it is with ſuch manifeſt proofes, that others which are wicked ſeeing him waſh the head of their companions, they are compelled to hang downe their heads, and to condemne their wicked thoughts. Now touching matters that ought to be remembred in hiſtories, therein are to be conſidered, the counſels, executions, and accidents. For counſels, who noteth better then he the wickedneſſe of thoſe which aske counſell of the world, of the vnconſtant multitude, of men of as litle iudgment as themſelues, or of themſelues? With what grace doth he lay open the errors committed by Xerxes, Pyrrhus, Marius, and infinite others? And though euill counſell proſper for a time, yet the eternall wiſedome, hath a ſecret intention to bring things to paſſe, which the wiſedome of man cannot ſee till it be done: as Plutarch doth finely diſcouer them in the life of Cato Vtican, and of others. The executions are of diuers ſorts, according to the workmen and their means. In this point, Plutarch is admirable, ſhewing particularly infinite thoughts in actions which he repreſenteth: ſo that for one ſelf deed he giueth alwaies entrance and direction vnto the ſtudious reader, to make halfe a douſin of ſundrie rules for the direction of mans life: he was euer ſo fortunate to comprehend all things well, and to draw that which was to be offered vnto the view of poſteritie. If accidents come in queſtion, he can excellently referre them to the counſels, and draw out goodly inſtructions for all ſorts of men. Now there remaineth the circumſtances of times, of places, of people, and others ſo diligently ſearched out in Plutarch, that in this matter he ſeemeth to haue ſurmounted himſelfe. To proue all that hath bene preſently ſpoken in few words, behold here the booke lyeth open, and vnder the indifferent examination of the learned and vertuous men.

I am not ignorant that ſome men wel thought of among the learned men of our time, haue ryboldly cenſured Plutarch, accuſing him of ignorance: alſo that he had writtē things incredible, fabulous, and that he had made vnapt compariſons. For his ignorance, that hath bene ſufficiently handled heretofore ſpeaking of Plutarchs toung. And if we muſt ſpeake of the ſufficiencie of an Hiſtorian, I thinke it is moſt excellent in him: howbeit I ſhall not need to defend him, ſeeing that he defendeth himſelfe ſufficiently well. If he be miſtaken in ſome circumſtances, and that they diſcouer ſome fault in his memorie, or of diſcordance condemned by many other Hiſtorians: that deſerueth not ſo ſharpe a reprehenſion. And for all the reſt, I will adde too the anſwer of a noble perſon well ſtudied in Plutarchs lecture, for that it ſufficeth and fully agreeth with that which we now ſpeake of. And theſe be his words: If one had ſpoken ſimply that Plutarch reciteth things otherwiſe then they be, it was no great reproch: for thoſe things which we haue not ſeene, we take them at other mens hands of credit: and I ſee that to his knowledge he reporteth at times one ſelfe hiſtorie diuerſly. As the iudgement of three of the beſt Captaines that euer were, giuen by Hanniball, is otherwiſe ſet downe in the life of Flaminius: and contrarie again in the life of Pyrrhus. But to charge him to haue taken for ready money things vncredible, and alſo vnpoſſible: it is euen to accuſe for want of iudgement, the author of the beſt iudgement in the world. And here is the example which they alledge, to wit, that Plutarch ſaid that a child of LACEDÆMON ſuffered his belly to be torne out by a foxe he had ſtolen, & hid vnder his gowne, euen to ſuffer death rather then to bewray his theft. Firſt of all I find this example very euill choſen to bound the indeuours of the faculties of the ſoule, whereas for corporall forces we haue more law to limite and know them. For this cauſe, if I had had to do withall, I would rather haue choſen an example of this ſecond ſort, and they are leſſe credible. As amongſt others, that which he reciteth of Pyrrhus: that being hurt as he was, he gaue his enemy armed at all peeces ſuch a blow with his ſword, that he claue his head downe to the loweſt parts, ſo that the body fell aſunder in two parts. In the other example I find no great wonder, neither do I like the excuſe they make for Plutarch, for that he added too this word, (as they ſay) to aduiſe vs, and to be warie in our cariage and behauiour. For vnleſſe it be in things receiued by authoritie, or in reuerence of antiquitie or of religion, he would not himſelfe haue receiued, nor haue made vs beleeue things of themſelues incredible. And that this word (as they ſay) is not vſed in that place to that purpoſe, is eaſie to be iudged: for that he himſelfe reporteth in another place vpon the ſubiect of the patience of the children of LACEDÆMON, of examples that fell out in his time vnlikelier, to perſwade vs. As that which Cicero alſo hath teſtified before him: for that he was (as he ſaid) euen in the very places: that euen till their time there were children, for proofe of patience, that were tried before the altar of Diana, who ſuffered themſelues to be whipped vntil the bloud ran down their legs, not onely without crying, but alſo without weeping, yea and ſome of them euen to death. And that which Plutarch telleth with an hundred witneſſes: that at a ſacrifice a burning cole being fallen into a boies ſleeue of the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he was cenſing: he ſuffered all his arme to be burnt, vntill the very ſauor of the burnt fleſh came to them that were preſent. There was nothing according to their cuſtome that did more diſgrace them, and for the which they ſhould ſuffer more reproch and ſhame, then to be taken ſtealing. I am ſo inſtructed with the greatneſſe of theſe men there, that it ſeemes to me, that this report which Plutarch made ſhould not be incredible, or not ſo much as rare or ſtraunge. Marcellus alſo reporteth, touching this matter of theft: that in his time there could be found no manner of torture or torment how cruell ſoeuer, that could force the ÆGYPTIANS taken with theft, (whereunto they were accuſtomed and hardened) once to tell their names. I know that there were certaine poore countri-men, in the miſerable ciuill warres, that did indure the fryi:g of the ſoles of their feet againſt the fire, and the nipping of their fingers ends, to thruſt their bloudie eyes out of their heads, their foreheads being faſt bound with a great cord, before they would be ranſomed. I haue ſeene one left ſtarke naked in a ditch for dead, hauing his necke ſwollen with a halter tyed about it, with the which they had dragged him at a horſe taile all night long, his body thruſt in with a dagger in an hundred places, not to kill him, but to make him full of paine: who had endured all that, hauing loſt his ſpeech and ſenſes, reſolued (as he told me) to die a thouſand deaths, rather then to promiſe any thing, and he was one of the richeſt laborers in all the countrey. We muſt not iudge that which is poſſible and that which is not, as it is credible and vncredible to our capacitie. It is alſo a great fault, (into the which notwithſtanding the moſt part of men do fall) to make it nice to beleeue that thing of another man, which we our ſelues cannot do. This is that which this perſon anſwereth vnto the obiection made, touching the fact of the boy of LACEDÆMON ſet out to accuſe our Plutarch ouerthwartly with a lye. The other example which they alledge of incredible things, and altogether fabulous, ſpoken by Plutarch, is: that Ageſilaus was condemned in a fine by the Ephores, becauſe he alone had won the harts and goodwils of al his citizens. I know not what note of falſhood they find in that: but ſo it is, that Plutarch ſpeaketh of things which he ſhould better know then we. It was no new thing in GREECE to ſee men puniſhed and baniſhed onely for that they were too great with their Citizens: witneſſe the Oſtraciſme and Petaliſme. And where they accuſe Plutarch, that he did not well ſort the GREEKES with the ROMAINES: witneſſes, Demoſthenes and Cicero, Ariſtides and Cato, Lyſander and Sylla, Pelopidas and Marcellus, Ageſilaus and Pompey; iudging that he fauoured the GREEKES, for that he gaue them companions ſo litle reſembling them: which is iuſtly to blame Plutarch for that wherin he was moſt excellent and praiſe-worthie. For in his compariſons (which is the moſt admirable part of his works, and in the which (in my opinion) he tooke more delight then in any other of his writings) the fidelitie and ſinceritie of his iudgements, equalleth their profoundneſſe and their waight. He is a Philoſopher that teacheth vs vertue. Let vs ſee if we can defend him from this reproch of malice and falſhood. I think that which hath bene the cauſe of this cenſure, is the great ſhining colour of the names of the ROMAINES which we haue in hand. It appeareth not to vs that Demoſthenes can equall the glorie of a Conſull, Proconſull, or Quæſtor of this great commonwealth. But he that ſhal conſider the truth of the thing, & the men in themſelues, wherat Plutarch euer moſt aimed: and to weigh their maners, their diſpoſitions, their ſufficiencie and their fortune: I think to the contrarie, that Cicero and old Cato are indebted to their companions. For the purpoſe of this cenſure, I would rather haue choſen the example of the younger Cato cõpared vnto Phocion: for in this compariſon there might be found a more likely diſparitie to the aduantage of the ROMAINE. For Marcellus, Sylla, and Pompey, I ſee well that their exploits of war are more puft vp, glorious and ſumptuous, then thoſe of the GREEKS which Plutarch compareth

with them. But the moſt faire and vertuous actions are not alwaies (no more then in wars) the moſt famous. I oftentimes ſee the names of Captaines drowned by the glory of other mens names of leſſe merit: witnes, Labienus, Ventidius, Teleſinus, and diuers others. And to take it from thence, if I were to complaine me for the Greekes, might I ſay that much leſſe is Camillus comparable vnto Themiſtocles, the Gracchi vnto Agis and Cleomenes, Numa vnto Lycurgus, and Scipio vnto Epaminondas, which were alſo of his rolle. But it is a follie to iudge things on a ſudden of ſo many men. When Plutarch compareth them, he doth therefore equall them. Who could more eloquently or conſcionably note the diſparities and differences? Doth he come to compare the victories, the exploits of armes, the power of armies led by Pompey, & his triumphes, with thoſe of Ageſilaus? I do not beleeue, ſaid he, that Xenophon himſelf if he were aliue, although that they ſuffered him to write what he would to the aduantage of Ageſilaus: durſt put him in compariſon. Doth he ſpeake to compare Sylla with Lyſander? There is no compariſon, ſaid he, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battels: for Lyſander wan only but two battels by ſea, &c. That taketh away nothing from the Romaines. To haue ſimply preſented them to the Greekes, he could haue done them no iniurie, what diſparitie ſoeuer there might be: neither doth he weigh them alſo all together: in the great there is no preferencie. He hath compared the peeces and circumſtances one after another, and iudgeth them ſeuerally. Wherfore if they wold conuince him of fauour, they muſt vnfold ſome particular iudgement, or to ſay in generall that he had failed to match ſuch a Greeke with ſuch a Romain: becauſe there were others fitter to be compared, and of better report. So much for this point. There are other that haue blamed the length of Plutarchs diſcourſes, alſo that he hath mingled many light things, & that he delighteth to thruſt in many verſes of Poets, without any neceſſity, ſay they: iudging that he did that to loſe no part of his memories, & ſo hath confuſedly put all peeces together in his worke. But that which hath bene ſpoken of before, anſwereth that obiection. And to accuſe Plutarch to haue wanted iudgement, (he that hath alwaies bene very diſcreet in his writings, as he proteſteth at the beginning of his booke of fatall deſtiny) is to ſhew himſelfe madde, and out of his wits. Thoſe things that men iudge to be ſmall are not ſo alwaies, if they be better conſidered of: neither is his length ſo far out of ſquare and troubleſom, neither is that out of the matter, which he intermingleth of the Poets, but is ſpoken to good purpoſe, and oftentimes vpon good ground of aduice in matters of great waight: whereof his workes ſhall make proofe whoſoeuer will examine them without paſſion.

But now let vs leaue theſe cenſors to thinke more aduiſedly hereafter what they ſpeake, and come againe to Plutarch: who after his returne to Greece, gaue himſelfe more to his booke then he did before: and notwithſtanding he was very old, he made an end of his Liues. And furthermore, continuing ſtill the loue he bare vnto his countrey: he employed himſelfe in diuers Offices of the commonwealth, whereof he maketh mention alſo in ſundry places of his Morals, and eſpecialy in the booke where he inſtructeth thoſe that deale in the affaires of eſtate. For he ſaith there theſe words: I anſwer them that reproue me when they find me preſent in our towne, to ſee them meaſure, and tell bricke, and tile, ſtones, ſand, and lime which they bring: that it is not for my ſelfe that I build, but for the Commonwealth. And in his Treatiſe, Whether an old man ſhould yet deale in the affaires of eſtate. Thou knoweſt (ſaid he, writing vnto Euphanes) that there are many Pythiades, that is to ſay, many termes of fiue yeares that I do exerciſe the Prieſthood of Apollo Pythian: yet I thinke thou wouldeſt not ſay to me, Plutarch, thou haſt ſacrificed enough, thou haſt made proceſſions enow, thou haſt led many dances: and now that thou art old and ancient, it is time thou leaue thy crowne off thy head, and abandon the oracle, becauſe of thy age. At the beginning of the eight queſtion of the ſixt booke of his diſcourſe at the table, he mentioneth his Office of being Maior of the towne of Chæronea. To conclude, euen to the end of his life he ſhewed in his deedes, that which he excellently handled in his writings: which is, that there is nothing letteth old men to ſerue and profite their commonwealth in diuers ſorts of gouernment, whether it be with good words, with good counſell, with liberty and authority to ſpeake boldly, and with graue reſpect, as the Poets ſay. For they are not the feet, nor the hands, nor al the ſtrength of the body only, which are the parts and good of the cõmonwealth: but they are firſt of all and principally the ſoule, and the beauties thereof: as iuſtice, temperance, and wiſdom, the which coming late to their perfection, it were to no purpoſe they ſhould enioy a houſe, land, & all other inheritances of his citizens, and that it could receiue no more any profit by thẽ for the good of the Commonwealth, becauſe of their long time, the which doth not ſo much

depriue them of ſtrength and abilitie to do ſeruice, as it doth increaſe them with ſufficiencie and knowledge of faculties requiſite to commaund and gouerne. Furthermore Plutarch hauing liued alwaies honorably euen to old age, he died quietly among his children and friends in the citie of CHÆRONEA, leauing in his writings an immortall ſauour of his name vnto poſteritie. Beſides the honour his citizens did him, there was a ſtatue ſet vp for him by ordinance of the people of ROME, in memorie of his vertue. Now furthermore, though time hath deuoured ſome part of the writings of this great man, and miniſhed ſome other: neuertheleſſe thoſe which remaine being a great number, haue excellent vſe to this day among vs. Howbeit, hauing met with ſome fragments in Stobeus, of ſome Treaties which are not to be found any more, I thought it would not miſlike the reader to cull out ſome peeces to preſent them vnto him, to ſhut vp all this diſcourſe. Wiſedome, ſaith he, (in the booke Of the profite which knowledge bringeth of the time to come) conſiſteth not in ſhew, but in affaires, before a man ſetteth too his hand: and ſheweth how he ſhould come before them, and receiue them when they be offered him: for it conſidereth the things to come. The bodie hath no eyes but before, the backe ſeeth nothing at all: but wiſdome by helpe of memorie, ſeeth euen the things that are paſt and gone. It is the Secretarie which alwaies remaineth and abideth within, as Plato ſaith. It is the part or inſtrument of the ſoule which taketh hold of things paſt, keepeth them, and layeth them vp ſafe, making a circle, within the which that that is paſt ioyneth with the thing preſent, and will not ſuffer it to extend it ſelfe beyond compaſſe, and to paſſe the bounds of nature and knowledge. Of the Booke againſt pleaſure. Pleaſure vndoeth the bodie, and daily maketh it tender by deliciouſneſſe, the common vſe whereof cutteth downe the luſtineſſe and conſumeth the ſtrength, ſo that weakneſſe and ſickneſſe do abound, and in youth they begin to waxe old. Voluptuouſnes is a beaſt that maketh men ſlaues, but yet no ſauage beaſt: for if ſhe did openly aſſaile any bodie, there would ſoone be an end: but ſhe is ſo much more daungerous, becauſe ſhe hideth her ill courage, and taketh vpon her the habite of goodwill. We muſt ſhunne her therefore for two cauſes, the one, that ſhe ſhould not hurt vs, the other, that ſhe ſhould not ſeduce vs. Let vs no more call voluptuouſneſſe honeſt pleaſures, but rather acknowledge that they be troubles, ſeruices and duties: and eſteeme the reſt as ſhamefull and violent things, which by their diuerſitie flatter vs, and in the meane time finely hurt vs. Now our ſelues and affaires ought to be ſubiect to the ſame law that the brute beaſtes are: to the end that when we haue ſatisfied our deſire, we haue no new mind to couet further, but that our moderate pleaſures be contented when they haue things neceſſarie. Is there any man that will commend traitours? Now pleaſure is euen ſuch a one: for ſhe betrayeth all that dependeth vpon vertue. Doth any bodie eſteeme hangmen much? See notwithſtanding what it is to follow ſenſualitie, which tormenteth and rendeth aſunder all moderate things. Will any man commend auarice? Voluptuouſneſſe is as vnſatiable as the loue of money. What pleaſure can we take of a beaſt that deſtroyeth vs by flatterie? I aske, why doeſt thou not play the foole and knaue in the preſence of all men? To the contrarie thou flyeſt, and beareſt reuerence to thy ſelfe, abuſing thy ſelfe in the night and darkneſſe which cannot depoſe againſt thee. No man ſeeketh to hide him that doth well, nor is affraid of the light that is round about him: but rather to the contrarie, he would all the world were become a bright Sunne, to giue light to all the parts of the good workes he doth. But if he happen to commit any fault, he doth all his poſſible indeuour to hide it, and blameth his paſſion. Now let vs take away the veile, and openly muſe vpon theſe pleaſures. They make vs drunke, euen to loſe our ſences: they continually make knaues and drowſie lubbers to follow harlots when they ſhould labour: enemies of mans life, neither caring for father nor mother, void of all reuerence vnto the lawes. In the Booke that treateth, how women ſhould be taught and learned. It is no eaſie thing to hide his ignorance, ſaith Heraclitus: and much leſſe then when he hath drunke more then ordinarie. Plato ſaith alſo, that the thought is diſcouered by wine: as much to ſay, after a man hath drunke too much. Sophocles blamed Æſchylus, becauſe he wrote his tragedies when he had drunke out of meaſure: for, ſaith he, though Æſchilus doth well, yet he knoweth not what he doth. Pythagoras being asked how it could be brought to paſſe, that a drunkard ſhould abſtaine from being drunke? If he remembred ſaid he, oftentimes what he did when he was drunk. It is a common ſaying in euery mans mouth, Let not the child haue a knife. And I ſay, keepe riches from a child, and ignorance from a man. Of the Booke of accuſation. Hippias ſaid, there was nothing ſo intollerable as accuſation: becauſe there was no puniſhment ordained by lawe for accuſers, as there was for theeues: although they ſtole friendſhip from men, which is the goodlieſt riches a man can haue. So that an outrage of fact though it be great, is leſſe then accuſation, which doth much more hurt becauſe it is hidden. Of the diſcourſe or Epiſtle of friendſhip. He is a true witneſſe of the truth, that is not bound by benefite vnto him that bringeth him forth, and that ſpeaketh before the Iudges without exception of perſon. We muſt win loue by gentleneſſe and bountie, rather then by menaces: and for the commonwealth, wiſedome and gentleneſſe ſhould be ioyned together. Agrippinus in his gouernment, attempted to perſwade them whom he condemned to loſe goods and life: that it was expedient for them they ſhould be condemned. For, ſaid he, I do not pronounce ſentence againſt you, as a theefe paſſing by ſhould ſay, Deliuer thy purſe, or thou art dead: but I do that as your tutor, and one that hath a care of you: like vnto the Phiſition that comforteth his patient from whom he would cut ſome member, and perſwadeth him to be ruled. Cotis king of THRACIA was very cruell vnto his ſubiects: and when one of his familiars told him, That is called furie not kingly gouernment. But ſo it is, anſwered the king, that this furie of mine maketh my ſubiects wiſe and quiet. Of the booke againſt the ſtrength of the bodie. Doeſt thou thinke the ſtrength of the body to be ſo great a happineſſe, that thou wilt conclude that nature which hath giuen more ſtrength to beaſts then to men, ſhould be mother to them, and ſtepmother to the other? Doeſt thou think it is by reaſon of the maſſiuenes or waight, or by the ſwiftneſſe or ſtrength of the eyes? The true ſtrength of men conſiſteth in diſcourſe of the ſoule, by means wherof he hunteth in the forreſts, and taketh the Elephants in a ſnare: he rideth horſe and breaketh them, he bringeth oxen ſubiect to the yoke, he beateth downe birds with bolts, and catcheth with angles fiſh that lye hidden in the bottome of waters. There is his ſtrength, which is ſeene much better, when he conſidereth at his eaſe, the roundneſſe of the earth, the breadth of the Element, and the reuolutions of the ſtars. Such were the worthie exerciſes of Hercules. And who had not rather be Vlyſſes, then Polyphemus the CYCLOPIAN? Alſo when one ſpake much in commendation of a venturous and hardy man, as if he had bene ſome braue ſouldier: There is great difference, ſaid Aratus the SICYONIAN, betwixt eſteeming vertue, and regarding life nothing. Of the booke of Deuination. It is moſt apparant that from the beginning Neceſſitie inuented and poliſhed certain arts, which ſhe doth keepe euen till this preſent. It is ſhe that hath taught all things. For, is there any thing that neceſſitie hath not thought of? ſhe hath brought foorth the occupation of weauing, of building, the art of Phyſicke, tilling of the ground, and all that belongs vnto it. There be other crafts alſo found out, I cannot tell by what pleaſure: as Perfumers, Apothecaries, Cookes, and others that ſerue for ornaments of the bodie: alſo Painters. Againe, there are ſciences which men ſeeke, learne, and teach, becauſe of the probable and apparant reaſon which they diſcouer, and for the beautie of them: as Arithmeticke, Geometrie, and all others conſiſting in meaſures and proportions, then Aſtrologie. And yet though we contemne them, neuertheleſſe becauſe of their excellencie, we are conſtrained in ſome ſort to know them, ſaith Plato. Of the Treatie, That loue and iudgement are diuerſe things. Some ſay, that loue is the facultie of the ſoule, which we call vnderſtanding: others, that it is a concupiſcence or voluptuouſneſſe: others, that it is a madneſſe: and there are that thinke it is, I cannot tell what diuine agitation of the ſoule: and others that make it a God. This diſputation hath made that ſome haue iudged, and rightly, that from the beginning, loue is a ſimple deſire or luſt: but if it exceed, it is furie. Alſo that friendſhip doth reſemble it. If loue be deſpiſed, it begetteth melancholie: if it increaſe as wiſhed, he that is poſſeſſed withall hath a thouſand conceipts and phantaſticall imaginations, and doth imagine all the greatneſſe and fauours of heauen and earth. And this is the reaſon why the Poets ſay, that loue is a Torch: and the Painters, Potters, and Statuaries do repreſent it in that eſtate. For that part of the fire which doth giue light, is very pleaſing, profitable and commodious: but that which burneth, bringeth nothing but trouble and ſorow. Like as it is a good thing to reproue and admoniſh our friends, and ſuch as belong vnto vs, whileſt they be in their right wits, and capable of iudgement and vnderſtanding: ſo to the contrarie, if they be light headed and diſtraught of their wits, we do not vſe then to reaſon and conteſt with them, but we rather do yeeld to that they ſay. So muſt we freely and liuely reproue them, that commit a fault through choler or couetouſneſſe: but as for louers, they muſt be excuſed becauſe they be ſicke. And therefore from the beginning, it were the beſt way not to ſuffer loue to take root in them: if it do, repaire then to the altars of the gods that giue remedy, as Plato ſaith, that is to ſay, keepe company with wiſe men. Driue this beaſt farre from thee, before his teeth and nailes do grow: if not, thou muſt fight with the euill when it is great and full growne, the which thou didſt embrace in thine infancie and youth. But which are theſe teeth and nailes of loue? Suſpition and Iealouſie. Now ſome will ſay to me that there is alſo I know not what, a thing that draweth, and is pleaſant. So had this famous Sphinx wings of diuerſe colours, very pleaſant to behold: for when he turned them to the beames of the Sunne, they ſhined like gold: and when he was againſt the cloudes, one would haue ſaid it had bene azure mingled with yellow and red, like the rainbow in the Element. Loue after the ſame ſort hath in it (I know not how) a gracious, gentle, and faire ſhew. But it deſtroyeth men, ouerthroweth houſes, diſſolueth mariages, and confoundeth great Captaines, without propounding of hard Enigmaes or queſtions to be reſolued: but himſelfe being ſo taken that he cannot be freed. For example. If one asked: What is that which at one inſtant loueth and hateth, flieth and purſueth, threatneth and prayeth, angreth and flattereth, taketh and leaueth, laugheth and weepeth with a breath? it is a knot which one cannot eaſily vndo. Furthermore, the Sphinx had many things deuiſed for pleaſure, mingled in the midſt of his Enigma. For though an old man go with a ſtaffe, yet he hath not three feet: and the litle child is not a beaſt with foure feet, although he creepe of all foure, helping his weake legs with his two hands. But there be no ſuch Enigmaes in the paſſions of louers. They loue and hate, deſire the thing abſent, and feare the thing preſent: they flatter and do iniurie, they die and kill themſelues for the thing they loue: they deſire not to loue, and yet will not leaue to loue: they repent them and waxe blind: they become wiſe, and yet caſt themſelues away: they will command, & yet yeeld themſelues ſlaues. And therfore it is that ſuch a paſſion is holden for a pure rage: as alſo Eurypides doth confeſſe it. Now loue is not begotten vpon a ſudden, nor doth not inuade all the perſon, as choler doth: but it kindleth by litle and litle, as a litle fire. It ſlippeth in ſoftly, and when it hath poſſeſſed the ſoule, it diſlodgeth not eaſily: but we ſee it ſomtimes luſty and freſh euen in old men that haue white haires. If it ceaſe, and begin to coole by ſucceſſion of time, or that it be dead by ſome accident: it doth not altogether leaue the ſoule, or the ſubſtance of his fire conſumed, where the marks of his heate paſſed are to be ſeene, as if lightning had paſſed thorow there. As for the ſorow paſt and the choler after it is quenched, there is no ſpark left in the ſoule, but they perceiue that the inflammation of the paſſion which made a great noiſe is quiet: but the bitings of loue, albeit the beaſt be gone, do not therfore loſe their venime, but the inward wounds do renew and refreſh thēſelues again. To be ſhort, no man knoweth what ſuch a paſſion meaneth, nor how it cometh, nor from whence it ſlipped into the heart. In the booke where he diſputeth for beautie. Are not men compounded of bodie and ſoule? Is the one enough for vs without the other? how could that be? for if the body were not gouerned by the ſoule, it would not liue, and the ſoule had need of a place to be kept and lodged in. Since then both the one and the other are adorned with gifts proper vnto them: the ſoule with iuſtice, temperance, and wiſedome: and the body with force, beautie and health: were it not to be wondred at, if one deſpiſed that which cōcerneth the bodie, & that he made no reckening but of the goods of the ſoule? Corporall beautie is a worke of the ſoule, which maketh a preſent of this gift to the bodie. For when the ſoule is gone, there remaineth nothing good in the bodie. The ſtrength, the colour, the ſight, and the voice do vaniſh. To conclude, the body being abandoned of his auncient inhabitants, there is nothing left that is amiable. Thou therefore that accuſeſt beautie, vnwares thou ſpeakeſt outrage to the ſoule, which is cauſe of this beauty. Ariſtotle to one that asked him, why a man did loue faire things? anſwered: It is for a blind man to aske ſuch a queſtion. Diogenes called faire Curtiſans, Queenes, becauſe many do execute that which they commaund. Of the Booke againſt Nobilitie. What do we thinke that Nobilitie is, but riches gathered together by aunceſtours, or ſome honour attained vnto long time before? whereof the one nor the other proceedeth not of our will: but the one cometh by vnconſtant fortune, the other proceedeth from the diſorders of the world. So then this proud name of Nobilitie floweth from two ſtraunge ſprings. Now riches maketh not thoſe that are born like vnto them: but vertue proceeding from the ſincere habitude of the ſpirit, is planted in the race of the vertuous, and doth make them truly noble. In this is true Nobilitie, to wit: the conformitie vnto vertuous manners. But I pray you, king Midas riches, were they more rich then the pouertie of Ariſtides? although he left not wherewithall to defray his charges of funerall. To the contrarie, king Midas tombe paſſed for magnificence all the riches of the world: but Nobilitie is not incloſed in gold nor ſiluer. Vice is rightly compared vnto fire: for when neither the one nor the other wanteth nouriture, it goeth out. But the baſeneſſe of the race of Socrates the Philoſopher, the ſon of an Imagegrauer, and of a midwife: is it not more noble then the glorie of Sardanapalus? Thou ſhouldeſt not thinke Xerxes more noble then Cynegyrus, who had one of his hands cut off fighting for his countrey: ſince the other fled to ſaue his life, being a king enuironed with cowardlines. Of the Treatie againſt riches. Hunger neuer gaue any man cauſe to be an adulterer: nor want of money hath made any man diſſolute. Pouertie is a kind of temperance, and need may be called a ſummarie obſeruation of the lawes. Arceſilaus ſaid, pouertie was rude, no leſſe then the Iſle of ITHACA: but furthermore, a good nurſe for children: becauſe it did vſe them to frugalitie and abſtinence: and at one word, it is the healthfull ſchoole of vertue. Thus haue you ſome fragments of our Philoſopher, of the which as of the reſt of his workes, we deſire that all may learne to be vertuous.

THE LIFE OF Seneca.

A knowledge that doth many errors ſlie:
A life reſiſting vices poiſoned breath:
A death, in death, that conquerd death by death,
O Seneca, are fruits of thy Philoſophie.

SPAINE is deuided by the Geographers into three principall parts, of the which, one of them abutting vpō the ſtraights of GIBRALTAR and the Mediterrane ſea, called by Strabo TVRDITANIA, was in old time the beſt inhabited. And albeit he doth confine it into two thouſand furlongs in compaſſe, yet he ſaith that in his time they made account of two hundred towns within that circuite, which at this day is called ANDALVZIA, hauing taken the name of the VANDALES, which haue dwelt there ſince the ruine of the ROMAINE Empire. In this part of SPAINE was (and yet is) ſituated vpon the riuer called of the auncients Bætis, and at this day Guadalquibir, (that is to ſay, the great riuer, by reaſon of his long courſe) the citie of CORDVBE, or CORDOVE: which was in old time one of the moſt famous cities of SPAINE, built by Marcellus, and inhabited with noble ROMAINES, as Plinie and Strabo do witneſſe. This place amongſt others was a ſeed-plot or garden of good ſpirits, and men giuen to ſtudie. Among other honourable families of that time was that of the Annæans, which beſides beſides their nobilitie loued learning, ſpecially about the father of Seneca, whoſe life now we write. He was a ſimple gentleman bearing no charge in the commonwealth, for that he had no ſpirit in him to embrace ſuch burthens, and gaue himſelfe moſt to learning, although otherwiſe he left not his ſword, being a knight as many other PATRICIANS in the prouince where he was. With his armes he ioyned the profeſſion of learning, but ſpecially of eloquence, in the which he excelled the moſt in his time. He maried a Lady called Elbia, of whom he had three ſonnes, the eldeſt bearing the name of the father, to wit, Lucius Annæus Seneca. The ſecond, Annæus Nouatus, afterwards called Iulius Gallio. The third, Annæus Mella, father of Lucan the Poet. The father was very carefull to haue his children well taught and brought vp, but the eldeſt eſpecially, who with time gaue himſelfe wholly vnto Philoſophie. For Gallio, beſides his learning, he was raiſed vp to ſome publicke dignities at ROME. Mella on the other ſide, he cared not for aduancement, and therein he followed his father, as we will ſhew hereafter more at large. Seneca, of whom we haue preſently to ſpeake, was borne as it ſhould ſeeme a litle before the death of Auguſtus Cæſar. For himſelfe writeth in the hundreth and ninth Epiſtle vnto Lucillius, that he was a young man when by the commaundement of Tiberius the ceremonies of the ſtraungers religions were driuen out of ROME: the which Cornelius Tacitus in the ſecond booke of his Annales ſayd to haue happened in the fift yeare of Tiberius. But of this we will ſpeake more hereafter, treating of the writings of Seneca. Furthermore, the occaſion why himſelfe and his brethren came out of SPAINE to ROME, was this. About the tenth yeare of the raigne of Tiberius Empire, matters began to be troubleſome in diuerſe parts of the dominion of ROME, by reaſon of the cruelties and inſolencies of this Prince: who hauing about him Seianus, and ſome other dangerous counſellers, he ſhewed his diſpoſition more then before. The ſickneſſe of the head floweth into all the principall members: ſo that the prouinces were left without gouernours, or elſe were tyrannized by Prætors: whereupon followed great alterations. SPAINE amongſt others, in many places liued as they liſted: it was managed at that time by exactors, which cauſed people to rebell and enter into factions. It chanced amongſt others, that L. Piſo Prætor, was killed by a TERMESTAN, becauſe he caried himſelfe tyrannouſly amongſt the people. This TERMESTAN being caught by the backe, and cruelly tortured, he ſhewed himſelfe ſo ſtout notwithſtanding, that they could not poſſibly make him confeſſe any of his aſſociates. But being quickly diſpatched by the hands of the hangmen, who would haue put him to a new torture, he knocked his head againſt a ſtone with ſuch force, that he died preſently in the field. Shortly after the cities began to be wearie of their yoake, and CORDOVE ſpecially among others, which being of the principalleſt and of great importance, an army was ſent thither vnder the conduct of Cneus Domitius Aenobarbus, who hauing ſubdued CORDOVE, tooke amongſt others Seneca, his two brethren, and Lucan his nephew, their father being dead ſome yeares before. Domitius knowing what men they were, he ſet them at liberty, and did ſo much that he perſwaded them to leaue SPAINE, and go to ROME, aswell to continue and to aduance their ſtudies well begun, as to be knowne and honoured with publicke office. Now the ſtate of SPAINE was ſuch at that time, that Seneca and his were eaſily perſwaded and won by him that had authority ouer them, and at the laſt they went into ITALIE. Some thinke that Annæus Mella remained ſtill in SPAINE, being a man that loued to liue priuately, and that made no account of the honour and vanity of the world. For his ſonne Lucan, he was brought very young after his two vnckles, who did heare at ROME Pomponius Marullus, Iulius Hyginus, Ceſtius and Aſinius Gallus in Rhetoricke: and in Philoſophie, Socio Alexandrinus, and Photinus a STOICKE, very famous. Vnder which they all profited, and Seneca ſpecially, who ioyning to the grauity of the doctrine of the STOICKES, a compendious and ſententious ſpeech, in ſhort time made himſelfe to be knowne.

Now hauing remained a ſpace ſhut vp in ſchooles, or hidden in the companie of ſome learned men whom he harkened vnto, and familiarly frequented: he was put forward at the beginning of the Empire of Caligula, by Cneus Domitius (who had maried Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, & litle daughter of Tiberius, of whom Nero was borne, nine moneths before the death of Tiberius) and began to ſhew himſelfe openly, pleading before the Senate with great grace: for from that time foorth he was eſteemed for one of the wiſeſt and moſt eloquent men of ROME. By meanes whereof his credite increaſed from day to day. But as prickes be hidden vnder roſes, and where men thinke to winne honour, oftentimes they get repulſe and contempt: the reuolution of mens affaires flouriſhing, yet maruellous brittle and ſubiect to fall: So Seneca proued that his eloquence profited others more then himſelfe: and that as ſometimes it is a wiſer part to keepe the ſword in the ſcaberd, then in the hand: euen ſo

The Emperour Caligula was a Prince that cared little for liberall ſciences, yet he was very curious to ſpeake well, hauing words at commandement, and eſteemed eloquent among others: ſpecially if ſometime he diſpoſed himſelfe to ſpeake againſt any man, the words and whole ſentences did increaſe in his mouth, with ſuch an accent and geſture, that they heard him and knew him a farre off, and ſometimes he threatned men with the force of his tongue. This quickneſſe and vaine eloquence of his, made him (beſides that he had an ill ſhaped head) wonderfull preſumptuous. For there was neuer a learned man and eloquent in all the ROMAINE Empire, but he would prefer himſelfe before him. And thoſe which directly or indirectly went about to croſſe him, they did put themſelues in manifeſt danger: witneſſe that which happened to the Orator Domitius Afer, and vnto Seneca. Caligula bearing ill will a long time vnto Domitius for ſome light ſpite he had vnto him, Domitius was accuſed before the Senate: where Caligula made a long oration written, and therein layed open all his ſufficiencie, to ſhew himſelfe better able then Domitius, eſteemed one of the beſt ſpoken men at that time. Now his purpoſe was to put Domitius to death, if he had ſtudied to anſwer eloquently. But Domitius eaſily diſcouering this dangerous reſolution, made no reply, nor excuſed himſelfe, but ſayd he was aſtonied at the oration of the Emperour: and faining that the babling of Caligula had rauiſhed him, he made a briefe repetition, as if he had come thither to hearken. Then hauing magnified his diſcourſes, and being commaundéd to defend himſelfe: he began to lament, and to craue grace, and kneeling downe beſought Caligula, being more afraid of his word then of his hand. Caligula wonderfull ioyfull of this honour, and thinking to be Eloquence it ſelfe, receiued Domitius into grace. Seneca taking no heed otherwiſe to that matter, and hauing at that time the free ſpirit of the STOICKES: within few dayes after he fell almoſt into the like perill or greater daunger then Domitius: he knew that Caligula did beare him ill will, and did alſo ſpeake euill of him amongſt his friends: and did compare him in his talke to grauell or ſand without lime, as if he would haue ſayd, that there was neither good band or conſequence in Senecaes diſcourſe. And to conclude, that he was but a iangler. But Seneca being caried away with the glorie he had wonne, which pleaſed him well, continued notwithſtanding to be in the Senate. Inſomuch that one day hauing a cauſe to pleade before Caligula, he behaued himſelfe with ſuch a grace and vehemencie, that all that heard him eſteemed him more then they did before, Caligula onely excepted: who being vexed, and as it were pierced through with the eloquent words of Seneca, (he hauing in the meane time let fall no word to offend Caligula, but went on roundly with his matter) he was euen at the point to put him to death, and then had executed his thought, had it not bene for a woman he kept, who perſwaded him not to do it, aſſuring him that Seneca had a diſeaſe that would ſoone diſpatch him out of the world. But after that, Seneca forbare, knowing with whom he had to deale. And ſoone after Caligula being ſlaine by Chærea: and Iulius Sabinus his vnkle (the ſonne of Druſus and of Liuia) called Claudius, was choſen Emperour: at the beginning Seneca came againe into his former credite and fame, and continued it for ſome yeares: but at the laſt he was baniſhed ROME for this cauſe. Claudius was a Prince of ſmall iudgement, and caried by certaine minions and paraſites of the court, and by his wife Meſſalina, one of the moſt ſhameleſſe women that euer was. This woman wholly poſſeſſing Claudius, cauſed men and women of all qualities to be put to death, and baniſhed as ſhe thought good: and thoſe aboue all others that went about to hinder the courſe of her ſtrange wayes. Among others ſhe did beare Iulia the daughter of Germanicus ill will, (as Dion reporteth) becauſe Iulia did not regard nor flatter her. Furthermore Iulia was a very faire Lady, which made Meſſalina iealous, who by litle and litle, found the meanes to accuſe this Lady of many crimes, and ſpecially of adulterie: and made her be baniſhed, then put to death immediatly after. Seneca was caried away with this tempeſt, as culpable of the faults pretended againſt Iulia. Some thinke that Iulia is this Agrippina mother of Nero, whom Claudius maried after the death of Meſſalina, and that ſhe was baniſhed from the court but for a time onely. The which is very likely, as alſo Cornelius Tacitus ſeemeth to incline to that opinion. But for Seneca, it is not onely in one place, but in many, that Dion and others do accuſe him, that he had bene ſomewhat bold with Agrippina, as if the credite he had in the houſe

of the late deceaſed Cneus Domitius, had giuen him the boldneſſe to defile the bed of his benefactor, dead a little before Tiberius. Furthermore, he was baniſhed into the Ile of CORSE, where he remained about two yeares: during which time he earneſtly diſpoſed himſelfe to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, with a ſingular contentment and quietneſſe of mind, as may be gathered out of the goodly diſcourſe he wrote, and ſent vnto his mother Helbia, who did hardly beare this baniſhment of his. But he did comfort her, and by liuely reaſons ſhewed her that this entertainement was not grieuous vnto him, but that Philoſophie had ſtrengthened him after an excellent faſhion, againſt all the aſſaults of fortune. Whileſt he was in this profitable ſolitarineſſe, Meſſalina continued in her wantonneſſe with ſuch an impudent and hote furie, that without the teſtimonie of ſo many worthie hiſtorians, it were impoſſible to beleeue that the wife of an Emperour durſt once haue thought to haue committed the thouſandth part of the villanies vnto the which ſhe had giuen her ſelfe ouer to the ſight and knowledge of all the world. In ſo much as in the end in the day time, within ROME, in preſence of many perſons of qualitie, & in the ſight of all the people, Claudius being no further off then at HOSTIA: ſhe maried with great pompe an adulterer called Sillius, a gentleman of ROME, with all accuſtomed ceremonies and ſolemnities. Se made a feaſt, and held Sillius for her husband. Tacitus in his Annales reporteth theſe things at large. Now though Claudius was ſo fooliſh before, and then too, that he perceiued not that which all others ſaw ſo openly: in the end being wakened by Narciſſus, one of his minions, he put Sillius to death, and ſome others culpable of this ſtraunge exceſſe. And for Meſſalina, ſhe had almoſt come againe into grace: but in the end ſhe was killed by the commaundement of Narciſſus. After Meſſalina was executed, the three minions of Claudius, to wit, Narciſſus, Calliſtus, and Pallas, they layed their heads together to giue their maiſter a wife. But in the end Pallas, that pleaded for Agrippina the widow of Cneus Domitius, litle daughter of Tiberius, daughter of Germanicus, and neece of Claudius: he caried it from them, the reaſons he propounded had ſo much more force, being accompanied with dainty ſugred words: who vnder the colour of a kinſwoman, came often to viſite her vnkle, and ſhe flattered him ſo brauely, that ſhe being preferred before others, and not yet maried, ſhe did already vſe the authority and power of a wife. And out of hand, immediatly after the mariage was ſolemnized with her vnkle Claudius, ſhe aduanced Domitius Nero her ſonne, and the ſon of Cneus Domitius. Furthermore by her practiſes, Octauia the daughter of Claudius, & of Meſſalina, betrothed vnto Sillanus, was promiſed and afterwards giuen vnto Nero for his wife. Who being yet very yong when his mother maried Claudius (and but eleuen yeares old onely) it was in queſtion to get him a good maiſter and tutor to teach him his booke betimes, and to traine him vp in affaires of eſtate. Agrippina, a woman of a maruellous ſpirit, and that plotted great things, as the effect ſhewed afterwards, as Tacitus hath wiſely noted: ſhe reſolued to haue Seneca called backe againe, and immediatly obtained his grace of the Emperour. She did this to diuerſe ends, the one was to haue a man of great authority and bringing vp about her ſonne, to the end to maintaine Nero vnder the ſhadow of ſo great an apparance, vntill the time of his aduancement were come. The other, to make the remembrance of Meſſalina the more odious, who had bene the cauſe of the baniſhment of Seneca: to put backe Britannicus, the ſon of her, and brother of Octauia, & by that meanes to haue men at her cõmandement, litle affected vnto Claudius. So then Agrippina ouer-ruling Claudius at her pleaſure, ſhe did not only obtaine the repeale, but alſo the Prætorſhip for Seneca, whom they ſent for quickly, & he returned to ROME with great honor, to the contentment of high and low.

Immediatly after he was arriued, Claudius receiued him graciouſly, made him a Senator, and inſtalled him in his charge. Afterwards being called into the pallace of the Emperour, Domitius Nero is giuen him in charge, with great promiſes of Agrippina, who had two vices common to ſuch perſons. The one was, that ſhe was ſet on fire with extreame couetouſneſſe to get money, vnder colour that ſhe layd a foundation in ſtore to helpe to maintaine her eſtate. The other, that ſhe gaue largely vnto thoſe whom ſhe knew meete for the aduancement of her ſonne, whom ſhe would raiſe vp to be Emperor what ſoeuer it coſt her, yea were it her owne life: as appeared by her anſwer to a wiſe man whom ſhe had asked what ſhould become of the future greatneſſe of her ſonne Nero. For he hauing aunſwered her, that he might be Emperour, but it ſhould be to her vndoing: Let me dye then, ſayd ſhe, ſo he may raigne. Tacitus writeth that Agrippina thought the people would reioyce at the returne of Seneca, becauſe of the great fame of his knowledge: and alſo procured this good, to the end that the infancie of Domitius might grow vntill his adoleſcency vnder ſuch a maiſter, and ſhe to vſe his counſell, to attaine to the greatneſſe of commaund which ſhe hoped for: Seneca, in ſtead of continuing in his ſolitarineſſe, and not remembring that

A ſlaue: though he a free man thither come.

He to the contrary, thinking he had found the meanes to ſhew the effects of a Philoſopher (the wit of man, yea of the wiſeſt, is ſo ſnared in darkneſſe vpon darkneſſe, when there is queſtion of the troubles of this life) went and engaged himſelf in the ſeruice of Agrippina. And although for a time he bridled the youth of Nero, and did withſtand certaine diſorders: yet in the end he was conſtrained to leaue all, and ſuffer the fierce ſtreame to runne, hauing deſired (but too late) ſolitarineſſe: and with leſſe goods and honours of the world, more libertie, and quietneſſe of mind. Now, as he himſelfe knew very well, and did excellently teach it vnto others, that ſo as migrims and paines in the head are not healed by a crowne or royal band, neither to the contrary is good health, nor the good ſtate of a man loſt, though he be not a great Lord: ſo this greatneſſe in the which he ſaw himſelfe highly lift vp in a ſhort time, did nothing elſe but increaſe his cares, wherwith he found himſelfe bound, as with ſtrong chaines to the end of his life. And though he did ſhake them, and at times had proued to breake them, yet he could not poſſibly vnlooſe them: and in the end there was no way but he muſt periſh vnder the waight

Of maſsie chaines, that of no iron were,
But ſuch as ſhamefaſtneſſe, did make him beare.

It is true that at the firſt this charge and gouernement ſeemed light vnto him. For Nero was a yong Prince of great hope, & in youth he ſhewed himſelfe gentle, tractable, obeying his ſchoolemaiſters inſtructions, who delighted to manure this plant, hoping all the world ſhould haue ioy of him. But as the Emperors that were before, euen in their young age, had made ſome ſhew of that which might be expected of them in time to come: Seneca alſo perceiued through the goodly apparance of his ſcholer, ſome part of his wild, naughtie, and vntoward nature, which he ſhewed within few yeares after. Alſo Cneus Domitius his father, as ſome came to gratifie him for that Agrippina his wife had brought him a ſonne: he holding downe his head, anſwered, that that they ſhould not thinke that of him and of ſuch a woman ſhould be borne an infant, but to the ruine and confuſion of the Empire. This prediction was not noted. But when Agrippina her ſelfe felt by the loſſe of her life, what a child ſhe had brought into the world, and aduanced by ſo many ſtraunge practiſes, and by the degrees of inceſt, of bloud, and filthineſſe vnto the Imperiall dignitie. Now whileſt Seneca imployed himſelfe to poliſh this ſpirit of Nero, and ſought to print in his hart the loue of vertue: Agrippina, carefull of the worldly greatneſſe of her ſonne, ſhe followed her purpoſe, cunningly helping her ſelfe (as much as ſhe thought fit to ſerue her turne) with the counſell of Seneca, whom ſhe acquainted not but with the leaſt part of the corruption of her intentions: for ſhe being a cruell woman, and that neuer receiued thoſe into fauour whom ſhe hated: ſhe cauſed Lolia Paulina to be put to death, that had reaſoned againſt her for the mariage of Claudius. She cauſed Calpurnia to be baniſhed out of ITALY. And hauing through Pallas credite, who priuatly gouerned her, and alſo kept her, made her ſonne Nero to be adopted, who was preferred before Germanicus the right ſucceſſour vnto the Empire: to the end ſhe would haue her power and authority to be knowne to the friends and allies of the Empire, ſhe cauſed a number of ſouldiers of the old bands and people to be caried to the place where ſhe was borne, a towne of the VBIANS, at this day called CVLLEN, vpon the Rhein. So that this citie was afterwards, and is at this preſent called COLONIA AGRIPPINA. Afterwards, for a new teſtimonie of this authoritie, Caractacus king of ENGLAND, was led priſoner vnto ROME, and preſented with his wife and his brethren vnto Claudius: who in preſence of the people and of his gards pardoned them: this king and his traine went the ſame time before Agrippina (who was ſet vpon a ſcaffold ioyning vnto that of her husbands:) they did her reuerence, and thanked her with the ſame praiſes they gaue the Emperour. Which was found very ſtraunge and new, againſt the cuſtome and faſhion of doing of the ancients: to ſee a woman ſet amongſt the ſtandards and enſignes of the ROMAINES. But ſhe maintained that ſhe was a companion of the Empire obtained by her predeceſſors. Now theſe were but ſlight approches in compariſon of this that followeth. For hauing cauſed her ſonne to be declared to be of ſufficient age, in teſtimonie whereof he tooke the robe due vnto thoſe that were come to mans eſtate.

Caractacus a king of England and his Queene ſubmitted themſelues to Claudius the Empeour of Rome.

eſtate, and obtained that he might receiue the Conſulſhip at twentie yeares of age: ſhe made him haue the power of Proconſull out of the city, and the name of Prince of the youth. Beſides all this, there was great largeſſe made vnto the people in his name, and a ſumme of money giuen to euery ſouldier. Alſo Nero himſelfe paſſing on to go to the playes of Circes, went apparelled with an Imperiall robe, and Britannicus as he was wont: who remembring ſo many outrages as they had done vnto him, could not containe but muſt ſhew ſome diſcontentment. But this ſerued Agrippina her intention: for ſhe preuailed ſo much with Claudius, that ſhe procured him to baniſh or put to death all the gouernours of his ſonne Britannicus. And worſe yet: he committed him vnto men ſuborned by Agrippina; who paſſing further yet, diſcharged Lucius Geta of his Captaineſhip of the gard, and Ruſſus Criſpinus, ſeruants of the houſe of Meſſalina, and placed in their roomes, Burrus Afranius, a man greatly eſteemed for a warriour, but who knew well inough by whoſe fauor he was aduanced. Such was the boldneſſe of this Agrippina, a great Ladie in truth (for ſhe was the daughter, ſiſter, wife, and mother of an Emperour) but of a ſpirite compounded of all ſorts of miſchiefes. We haue touched theſe things paſſing by, vpon the occaſion of Seneca: who being occupied about his pupill, was conſtrained to be partaker of many counſels, of the which he vnderſtood not the depth alwayes. But ſo it is, that Agrippina ſerued her turne much by his authoritie, to aduance her buſineſſe: the which Seneca perceiued well, but he could not remedie it, for he thought of it too late. Now touching Nero: although the free admonitions of his maiſter were barres to keepe him in order, yet the corruptions of that time, and the working of his mother alſo, began by litle and litle to appeare in him: ſo that by time he made it manifeſt, that the good inſtructions had beaten his eares a litle, and troubled his braine ſomewhat: but that euill had taken too deepe roote in his heart. Furthermore, whileſt Nero remained ſo as vnder the rod, openly there could be noted in Agrippina nothing but ſeueritie and grauitie, no inſolencies in her houſe, otherwiſe then ſhe thought might ſerue for the aduancement of her affaires: for then, her ſelfe, as alſo all her traine, gaue themſelues ouer to all diſſolution. Now after ſhe had aduanced a part of her intentions, Nero being ſixteene yeares old maried Octauia the daughter of Claudius: and to ſhew that he had learned vnder Seneca, he pleaded many cauſes of importance vnto the Senate, with the praiſe of all men. Immediatly after, a matter happened, that compelled Agrippina to looke aduiſedly vnto her affaires. Claudius hauing drunke well at a feaſt, let theſe words eſcape him, that his deſtinie was firſt to endure all the miſchiefes of his wiues, and afterwards to puniſh them. She being afraid to be preuented, determined to make haſt, after ſhe had firſt deſtroyed Lepida her coſin germaine, who wanne the heart of Nero by her kindneſſe and liberalitie. Theſe troubles of Agrippina gaue Narciſſus the alarme, and made him ioyne with Britannicus. But in theſe ſtirres Claudius was poyſoned by a woman, an Eunuke of his, and his phyſition, practiſed of long time by Agrippina, who hauing diſdained Britannicus and his ſiſters a long time, ſuddenly the gates of the pallace were opened, and Nero accompanied with Burrus preſented himſelfe to the ſouldiers PRETORIANS, of whom being ſaluted Emperour, he was confirmed by decree of the Senate, and afterwards allowed by the Prouinces. Then Nero made diuerſe orations penned by Seneca, who beſides the contentment he had of the high dignitie of his pupill, wrote a pleaſant diſcourſe vpon the death of Claudius, and did intitule it, Apocolokynthoſis, that is to ſay, immortalitie gotten by muſhrommes: becauſe the meate was ſprinkled all ouer with muſhrommes, whereof Claudius was poyſoned. The which Nero afterwards called the meate of the gods, ſeeing that by that meanes his father in law was ſcraped out of the world, & made one of the gods after the faſhion of the ROMAINES. Alſo Gallio Senecaes brother gaue Claudius a mocke, ſaying that he was drawne vp to heauen with a hooke, ſlenting at the cuſtome in practiſe at that time: to draw the bodies of malefactors put to death in priſon, with an iron hooke into the riuer. Such was the end of Claudius, rewarded for his inceſt, and for the iniurie he did vnto his ſonne Britannicus, to aduance a ſon in law, for to pleaſe an ambitious woman, to wit, Agrippina. Nero being thus raiſed vp, his mother ſet vpon Iulius Sillanus Proconſull in ASIA, who was poyſoned becauſe ſhe feared him, for that being the laſt ſon of Auguſtus, the people did greatly honor him, and ſayd he ſhould be preferred before Nero. On the other ſide Narciſſus was haſtily compelled to die, although Nero was very angry withall. To be ſhort, the kniues were drawne, and this woman had ſhed much bloud, if Burrus and Seneca had not beaten downe the blowes. They being Neroes gouernours, and agreeing well together in this equall and common greatneſſe, they had both alike power and authority, but by diuerſe meanes. Burrus, he diſpoſed of all matters militarie, and was a graue man, but had ſower maners. Seneca with a pleaſant and comely faſhion taught this young Prince eloquence. They did carefully helpe one another, and often conferred together what meanes they ſhould vſe to make Nero loue vertue, whereof he ſeemed to haue great beginnings. To hold him in more eaſily, they let him haue his owne will in exerciſes and honeſt pleaſures, and left him to his diſpoſition to do as he thought good. This young man from his infancie vſed his wit, which was quicke to diuerſe things, peraduenture better for a man of ſome other qualitie, to wit: to graue, to paint, to ſing, to play on the citherne, to ride horſes, and to make verſes. That a Prince haue all theſe parts in him, and be furniſhed with others: is not a thing in it ſelfe to be blamed, ſo that the principall do alwayes go before, and that nothing be forgotten requiſite for diſcharge of his gouernement receiued of God. Otherwiſe, as he was iuſtly reproued, that of a wiſe Phiſition was become an euill Poet: and ſometime a great Lord was blamed for that he was too good a Muſitian. Alſo it was ſayd to a king, that would conteſt againſt a player on the flute: that it was not his craft. So they may aunſwer him that would deſcribe the praiſes of a Prince: He was a good player at tennis, a cunning workeman, a braue fencer, a fine dauncer, a great talker: My faire friend, thou doeſt as if one being about to ſpeake of a man and his contentment, came to tell vs that he handleth his feete and his hands finely, and that he hath fine ſhooes on, and weareth his hat gallantly: and thou forgeſt bodies without a ſoule, and men without vocation, and vocations ridiculous. Ageſilaus hearing one call the king of PERSIA, a great king: Why, ſayd he, is he greater then my ſelfe, vnleſſe it be that he is iuſter then I am? Nothing ſurely maketh Kings and Princes truly great but iuſtice. Other things how exact ſoeuer they are found, they ſhall oftentimes meete with more excellent in a poore crafts mans hand, hidden amongſt the refuſe of the people. The Prince therefore is not deſirous of true honour, nor a man that deſerueth praiſe, that is carefull to cloth his bodie ſumptuouſly, and that glorieth to be a painter, a grauer, a cunning workeman, a ſinger, a player at tennis, a hunter, a dauncer, and that his houſe be richly furniſhed with houſhold ſtuffe, and himſelfe daintily ſerued: and all this while he giueth no order for his ſpeech, his companie, and conuerſation, that therein he be grauer and wiſer then a baſe and common perſon, making no account to haue the pallace of his ſoule royally apparelled and ſet foorth, as appertaineth to a royall magnificence. But how can a Prince be great, what power or authoritie ſoeuer he haue, if he be giuen to vile things, vnworthy of his true greatneſſe: and worſe then that, if he ioyne vice vnto theſe ridiculous things in him? Away with this traſh, and take vertue from a great man in the world, you ſhall ſee him little in all other things. Litle in his gifts and preſents: becauſe he will not, or knoweth not how to diſpoſe them. Litle in paines, becauſe of his delicateneſſe: litle towards God, becauſe of his ſuperſtition: litle vnto the good, becauſe of his enuie: litle vnto men, becauſe of his cowardlineſſe: litle among women, becauſe he is ſubiect vnto voluptuouſneſſe. For like as euill workemen, which ſet vp litle ſtatues vpon great and large baſes, do by meaſure ſhew the ſmalneſſe of their ſtatues: euen ſo when fortune lifteth vp to high eſtate a man of a weake and little hart, where he is to be ſeene of all the world, and in the place of the robe and ſtaffe of iuſtice, he is ſeene apparelled like a crafts man, or an enterlude player: ſhe doth diſcouer, deſcrie, and diſhonour him, making it to appeare how he reeleth and ſtumbleth for his lightneſſe. Let this be ſpoken to the purpoſe of Neroes paſtimes: who ſhortly after left all ſuch comedies, to play terrible tragedies. And for his ſmall pleaſures, although at the firſt Burrus and Seneca were warie that this young Prince liued modeſtly inough: yet we muſt confeſſe that ſometime they gaue him libertie to entertaine women: which the eſtate of his court and of ROME did offer him at pleaſure. But that which moſt troubled them, was the boldneſſe of Agrippina: who being ſet on fire with all the paſſions that may be found in a wicked gouernement: had neare about her pallace an arrogant man, and that hauing forgotten with what condition he came to mount ſo high, braued all the world, and Nero himſelfe: who, notwithſtanding his youth, did very vnpatiently beare the inſolencie of this minion. And yet he bare it, becauſe he would not anger his mother, to whom he ſpared no reuerence, honour, and kindneſſe amongſt his Lords: alſo he called her his good mother, euen to giue this name otherwhile for a watch-word vnto the Captaine. In theſe beginnings Nero made many goodly and well penned orations, after the manner of Seneca, who had a gentle ſpirit, and meete for the eares of this time. Theſe exerciſes

faſhioned Nero, kept vnder his wild nature, and framed it to the affaires of eſtate: in ſuch ſort, that the firſt fiue yeares of his Empire, he was ſo finely handled by Seneca, ſeconded with Burrus, that the affaires of peace and warre proſpered, euery man hauing great hope of Nero, who ſhewed himſelfe lowly, and giuen to vertue. Seneca reporteth wonders in his bookes he did dedicate vnto him, where he treateth of clemencie, ſingularly of this gentleneſſe of his. For at the beginning of the ſecond booke he ſayth, that Burrus deſirous to hang two theeues, ſued to the Emperour ot ſet too his hand, againſt whom, and for what cauſes this execution ſhould be done. This being put off diuerſe times, Burrus ſollicited the diſpatch, and being angrie, preſented the paper vnto Nero: who with a diſcontented countenance, and doing it as againſt his will, he cried out: By my will, I would I could neither write nor reade. See to what end the inſtructions of Seneca ſerued: where I will tell you another ſtorie, although it chaunced a long time after the firſt, to ſhew the credite of the maiſter towards his ſcholer. Nero hauing made a pauilion with eight panes wonderfull ſumptuous, Seneca told him: Thou haſt ſhewed thy ſelfe in this pauilion that thou art poore: for if thou looſe it, thou ſhalt neuer haue the like againe. As it came to paſſe: for the ſhip wherein this pauilion was, was caſt away. And Nero remembring Senecaes words, did beare the loſſe of it more patiently. Furthermore, Seneca accompanied Nero in the aſſemblies of counſell, and oftentimes told him in the field what he ſhould do, according to the occurrences: and in diuerſe orations he procured that Nero made proteſtation of his gentleneſſe before the Senate. The which turned to the praiſe of Seneca, in ſuch ſort notwithſtanding that the people perceiued it, and reioyced at it. So they report that the Emperor Traian was wont to ſay, that all the other Princes were farre from the firſt fiue yeares of the Empire of Nero: as Tacitus and others do teſtifie. In the meane time Nero ſhewed himſelfe very liberall vnto Seneca, and did eſteeme him as much, or more, then any man in Rome at that time: for he made him a preſent of great ſummes of money, vnto three thouſand Seſtertium, which ſome thinke do amount vnto ſeuen millions and 50000 crownes, of the which part of it yeelded him great profite at vſurie: the other part was beſtowed vpon ſumptuous gardens, houſes of pleaſure, lands & poſſeſſions farre off and neare Rome: and furthermore, a pallace in the city, full of all ſorts of precious moueables. For all this Seneca waxed nothing the prowder, but fearing fortune, and remembring his old ſtate and condition, ſought to keepe himſelfe vpright in the middeſt of the great combats which were like to come, hauing vpon his armes the vnconſtant youth of Nero, the which in ſight began to runne to his deſtruction: on the other ſide, the ambition of Agrippina to fight withall and beate downe: this woman being of ſuch a ſpirit, that ſhe could tarry in no place, but ſet her ſelfe and others on worke. But this credite of Burrus and of Seneca, and their great riches alſo, eſpecially of Seneca, made them to be enuied of many, that did blame and accuſe them openly. Wherunto Seneca oppoſed the grauity of his maners, and ſought by diuerſe writings to ſtrengthen himſelfe more and more: as ſome of his workes, ſpecially the diſcourſe of a happy life, ſeemeth to be done by him during theſe alarmes.

Now the beginning of theſe griefes of Seneca, came partly for that he perceiued Neroes mind ſo corrupted, that he began to be very diſſolute: and partly alſo for that he diſcouered that Agrippina and her minions would ſet vpon him and Burrus alſo, which with time would bring them into many daungers. And though for his owne part he was reſolute againſt all accidents: neuertheleſſe the charge and care he had of the affaires of the Empire, and the loue which he bare vnto Nero his ſcholer, troubled him exceedingly. Neuertheleſſe as hope entertaineth vs in all daungers, attending better: he determined to keepe himſelfe vpright as long as he could poſſible, and to expect ſome other iſſue in the affaires. Nero was enamoured with a bond woman called Acté, which his familiars did indure, alledging they muſt ſuffer one euill, for feare a worſe ſhould happen: and that ſo long as he ſhould ſatisfie himſelfe with her, he ſhould not runne after the Ladies of Rome. But Agrippina that could not beare with this inſolencie, began to take vp her ſonne roundly, thinking ſhe could by her magiſtralitie remedie this well inough. To the contrarie, this was to kindle the fire, and to embrace it altogether in this girle. Nero being waxen great, and counſelled by Otho and Claudius Senecio, who made the meſſages of Loue: he ſnuffed at theſe reprehenſions, and began to deſpiſe his mother: who on the ſudden came to change her ſubtilties. And ſhe had not bene ſo ſharpe before in rebuking, but ſhe was now as gentle in yeelding, and offered her cloſet to her ſonne for the accompliſhing of his deſires. This ſudden chaunge, made Nero and his minions thinke much of it, in ſo much as they prayed him to beware of the deceipts of this woman, that practiſed in her heart ſome villany. Nero countermining her, preſented his mother with many rich iewels and apparell of great price. But ſhe being ſuſpicious as could be poſſible, gaue them iniurious words that brought them. Wherewith Nero being offended, and knowing that Pallas was the chiefe counſellour of Agrippina, tooke his offices from him which were committed to him by the Emperour Claudius. Agrippina began then to diminiſh in reputation, and to flye off the hookes: and comming to Nero himſelfe, threatned him to take his Empire from him, and to eſtabliſh Britannicus, the lawfull ſucceſſour of Claudius: and hereupon deteſted in expreſſe termes the wickedneſſe ſhe had committed to bring vp a ſonne that was ſo vnthankfull vnto her: adding moreouer that ſhe would go find out the armies with Britannicus: ſo long as they ſhould ſee on the other ſide, this baggage fellow Burrus, and this baniſhed pedanticall companion Seneca (ſo did ſhe qualifie him) barking after he gouernement of the world. Theſe threatnings were accompanied with ſuch ſtrange countenances and imprecations, that they troubled Nero, beſides that Britannicus came now to be fourteene yeares old: and that one day playing, he could ſay aloud before Nero himſelfe, that they had taken his Empire from him. Shortly after Britannicus was poyſoned, and died ſuddenly, to the great aſtoniſhment of Agrippina and of Octauia alſo. Afterwards, Nero deſiſted to conuerſe ſo priuatly with his mother as he did at other times: and began to giue eare vnto them that would ſet them further at oddes: ſo that a certaine foole called Paris, hauing told Nero one night that Agrippina conſpired againſt him: he was reſolued to make his mother be put to death, and to take from Burrus the charge of Captaine of the gards. But Seneca kept him from that, and after ſome reaſons paſſed betweene them, Burrus being ſent for, to put Nero by his choler, he beſought him to let him haue the charge of this buſineſſe, aſſuring him that he would put Agrippina to death, if ſhe were conuinced of any villanie. Notwithſtanding that euerie bodie ſhould be heard ſpeake in their defence, and aboue all, a mother: adding alſo that the accuſers were not preſent, and that there was but one accuſer ſuſpected. And that he could not iuſtifie, that ſuch an important deliberation ſhould be made by night, and at the table: and that all that would ſhew his raſhneſſe and follie more then any other thing. Nero being ſomewhat pacified, they taried till day, that they might go to the mother, to know how theſe accuſations fell out. Burrus was there by expreſſe commiſſion with Seneca, and ſome others, to marke what ſhould be ſayd. But Agrippina could ſo well iuſtifie her ſelfe, that her accuſers were puniſhed: for one of them was put to death, and the reſt baniſhed. From that time forward Nero began to runne riot as is deſcribed by Suetonius, Tacitus, and Dion. But the beginning of new and horrible miſeries, (the other that went before being but light in reſpect of them) was the falling in loue with Sabina Popea, the wife of Otho, who had taken her away from her firſt husband Ruffus Criſpinus, a knight of Rome. Nero did the like vnto this Otho, and tooke from him this minxe that knew the trickes of the occupation. She hauing gained Nero in a little ſpace, preuailed ſo much with him, that he determined to put his mother Agrippina to death. Who hearing of the ill will her ſonne did beare her, ſought by all meanes to get into his fauour againe: euen to preſent her ſelfe ſo ſhamefully vnto him, that I ſhame to be the reporter of that which the hiſtorians ſpeake of her. This notwithſtanding he perſeuered in his determination, and commanded Anicetus Generall of the galleys of Miſene, to ſee her drowned: the which was executed in ſome ſort, yet Agrippina for that time eſcaped being hurt, and got to a houſe of pleaſure of hers. Nero hearing theſe newes, more dead then aliue, thinking he was vndone: ſent preſently for Burrus and Seneca, to haue their aduice: and we cannot tell (ſayth Tacitus) whether they were of counſell and priuie to this fact, or not. Both of them therefore were a great while and ſpake not a word: being afraid they ſhould looſe time, if they ſhould go about to diſſwade Nero from that which he was purpoſed to redouble vpon her: and they knew well that the day was come, that Nero muſt needs dye, if Agrippina were not preuented. Seneca, who vntill this preſent time was euer ready to ſpeake, looked vpon Burrus, as to know of him if he thought good to commaund the men of warre to do this murther. Burrus anſwered, that the Pretorian ſouldiers were ſo affectioned to the houſe of the Cæſars, and did ſo much reuerence the memorie of Germanicus, that they would neuer enterpriſe any thing againſt the life of his children: and that Anicetus was to performe his promiſe.

Who

Who without any further thought, demaunded and accepted the commission, which was foorthwith executed, and Agrippina put to death in her house, where she thrusting out her body to the Centener, who tooke his sword in his hand to kill her, she cried out: Ventrem feri, desiring that the wombe which had borne such a fruit as Nero, should be first striken, and runne through. Nero defiled with this execrable murther, added thereto other infinite abhominations, specially the putting away and doing his wife Octauia to death, a vertuous Princesse, and that deserued better. Now this is inough that we haue touched these things by the way, because they specially concerne the life of Nero, who payed his maister with an euill reward, entangling him in such wicked counsels. On the other side also it cannot be denied, that Burrus and Seneca yeelded too much to the cruell will of this Parricide. And as for the extremitie they feared, there were meanes inough to haue holpen it: and we must neuer do euill, that good may come of it. And what good could come of such an execrable abhomination? For though Agrippina deserued such a cruell punishment, for so many wicked deeds as she had done: yet should not her sonne haue had his hand in it, and his counsellers should not haue consented vnto it, nor Anicetus haue executed it. As all were much to be blamed for this deed, yet some more then other, so they had all their turne, as Tacitus and Suetonius do shew particularly.

Burrus dislodged the first, and as least to be blamed for so many disorders, he was spared, in that he saw not the other incredible confusions that fell out afterwards. His throate swelling within, by little and little, he died, his pipes being stopped that he could fetch no wind. Many affirmed, sayth Tacitus, that by the commaundement of Nero, making as though they would helpe him, the pallate of his mouth was rubbed with poyson, and that Burrus perceiued that wickednesse, & when Nero came to see him, he wold not vouchsafe to looke on him, but turned on the other side. And Nero asking him how he did, he aunswered onely, I am well. This man was wonderfully lamented of the Romaines, because of his vertue, and of the foolishnesse of one of his successours, and of the notable villanies of the other called Tigellinus, who was the vtter ruine of Nero. The death of Burrus much impaired the power and authority of Seneca: for that the meanes to do good were weake, as hauing lost the halfe part of their life: and because that Nero inclined vnto those which held him vp in his wickednesse, against the which Seneca opposed himselfe as time and occasion would suffer him. But his enemies hauing the Princes eare, they failed not to set vpon this honourable person, because of his age and the seruices he had done to Nero. They did falsly accuse him, sayth Tacitus, for that he hauing great riches, and more then was fit for a priuate man, he did still increase them, and grew greater: and besides did gaine and draw the good will of the peoole too much vnto him. That he had goodlier gardens and more sumptuous houses of pleasure, then the Emperor himselfe. Furthermore, that he imputed all the honour to himselfe for knowing how to speake excellently well: and that he made verses oftener then he was wont, after that he perceiued Nero tooke pleasure to make them himselfe. That flatly condemning Nero his exercises, he mocked him, seeing him ride and manage horses, and laughed at him hearing him sing. And all this was but to make men beleeue, that nothing was well done in the affaires of the estate, that proceeded not from his inuention. Now that Nero was come out of his infancie, and in the flower of his youth, that he should leane his maister, considering that his aunceſtours should serue him well inough for great and good tutors: Seneca vnderstanding by the report of those that yet somewhat regarded vertue and honour, how these lewd incensers did accuse him: perceiuing also that Nero withdrew himselfe more and more from his familiaritie, which he had shewed in times past: he besought him to heare him, the which hauing obtained, he sayd thus vnto him: My Lord, it is now fourteene yeres since I was first called to accompany the great hope that was had of your infancy, & eight yeares since you haue bene Emperor: during which time you haue heaped so much goods and honor vpon me, that nothing wanteth to my felicity, but to know how to vse them well. To this purpose I will lay before you notable examples practised by men of your quality, not of mine. Augustus great father of your grandfathers father, licensed M. Agrippa to withdraw himselfe vnto Mytilene, to leade a priuate life: and to C. Mecenas to liue at his ease within Rome it selfe, as in some pleasant remote place farther off. The one of them had accompanied him in his warres, and the other hauing bene beaten and tormented with great tempests in Rome, had bene both, to speake the truth, amply recompenced, as also the great seruice they had done well deserued it. As for my selfe, I brought nothing that deserued you should be so noble and liberall vnto me, but onely my ſtudies nouriſhed (if I may be ſo bold to ſpeake it) in the ſhadow, and couertly, from whence notwithſtanding all my reputation is proceeded, for as much as it ſeemeth I haue bene in your apprentiſhips: which truly is to me a great reward and rich recompence. But beſides all this, you haue infinitely fauoured me, and preſented me with innumerable goods. In ſo much that I often reaſon thus with my ſelfe: Is it poſſible, that I that am but of a ſimple houſe of Knights (alſo dwelling without ROME) ſhould hold the place of one of the chiefeſt Lords of ROME? and amongſt the moſt noble, and thoſe that are noted to be of ſo great antiquitie, that a new come man as my ſelfe, hath dared to ſhew himſelfe in place? Where is that ſpirit that contented it ſelfe with mediocritie? what meaneth he to haue ſo fine and goodly gardens? What? he walketh by ſuch and ſuch houſes of pleaſure, neare vnto the citie. His lands and poſſeſſions are of ſo great an extent, and his money bringeth him in ſuch a commoditie many wayes, that he is full to the throate. For the which there is nothing to be offered, but a defence for my ſelfe: that I could not refuſe your preſents. Now we haue, both the one and the other, performed our duty: you, in giuing ſo much as a Prince could giue to him that he loueth: and I, in receiuing that which a man in great fauour might haue and take of his Prince. As for my honours and eſtates, Enuie looketh awry vpon me: howbeit (as all other things of the world) ſhe is vnder the feete of your greatneſſe. Yet in the meane time ſhe lighteth vpon me, and therefore I haue need of helpe. And as in warre, or otherwiſe in trauelling abroad, if I were wearie I would require reſt: ſo finding my ſelfe in the trauell of this life now old and very vnmeet for the leaſt office, ſince I can no longer ſupport the burthen of my riches, I do deſire to be diſcharged. Commaund therefore that your receiuers henceforth do take them and put them into your treaſure. I ſhall not therefore become poore, but when I ſhall be rid of thoſe things which blindfold me with their brightneſſe, I ſhall beſtow my time in ſtudie, which I was wont to imploy in my gardens and poſſeſſions. You are young and luſtie, and time hath eſtabliſhed you in the greatneſſe of your eſtate: but we that are your ancient ſeruants haue leaue as it were to repoſe our ſelues. It ſhall be alſo a great honour for you to haue raiſed thoſe to great offices, to whom meane things had ſufficed. Vnto this Nero made aunſwer, in manner as followeth: For that on the ſudden I do aunſwer your premeditate Oration, it is becauſe I haue learned it of you, that haue taught me how I ſhould deale, not onely in things ſeene farre off, but alſo in thoſe which are preſented vpon the ſudden vnto me. Auguſtus my grandfather ſuffered Agrippa and Mecenas to repoſe themſelues after their trauels: but it was in ſuch an age, that his authoritie might maintaine that, and any thing elſe by him graunted: and yet he did not take from the one nor the other any goods that he had giuen vnto them. They got it in the warres, and with daunger of their liues: for Auguſtus ſpent his youth in warres. I do aſſure my ſelfe that your armes nor hands would haue failed me, if I had gone to the warres: but as the eſtate of my affaires did beare, you haue by reaſon, by counſell, and by inſtructions raiſed vp my infancie and youth. So will I remember all the dayes of my life the good ſeruice I haue receiued at your hands. That which you hold of me, your gardens, money in banke, houſes in the countrey abroad: all that is ſubiect vnto diuerſe accidents. And though all together ſeeme much, yet is it ſo, that many farre ſhort of your deſerts haue poſſeſſed more. I am aſhamed to name bondmen made free, whom men ſee richer then you: and the cauſe that maketh me aſhamed is, that you whom I ſhould cheriſh aboue all others, do not paſſe them in riches and humane greatneſſe. Furthermore, you are yet in good age, to gouerne your lands and reuenewes, and we do but now enter into managing the affaires of the Empire: but it may be that you eſteeme your ſelfe leſſe then Vitellius, three times Conſull: and commend Claudius aboue me, as if I could not by my liberalitie giue you as much goods as Voluſius by long ſparing hath gotten. Moreouer, if our ſlippery and vnconſtant youth ſway on one ſide more then it ought, you reforme it, guiding by your aide and vigilancie that ſmall direction we haue. If you bring your money into my coffers, If you forſake the Prince, they will not ſay it is becauſe you are content with litle, and ſeeke your eaſe: but their talke ſhall be none other, but of my couetouſneſſe, and my cruelty. And although they ſhould much praiſe your moderation in this action, yet it becommeth not an old man to ſeeke honor by doing any thing that ſhould diſhonor his friend. Nero added to this fine ſpeech, many embracements and kiſſes, being made by nature, and brought by cuſtome to couer his malice with falſe and counterfeit kindneſſe. Seneca (as it is the concluſion of a ſpeech holden with him that commaundeth) thanked him:

him: yet he immediatly changed his accuſtomed manner he was wont to vſe during his former greatneſſe: gaue them leaue to depart that came euery morning in troupes to ſalute him: turned away from others that offered to follow and accompany him: very ſeldome times he went into the city, and ſtirred not out of his houſe, as if he had bene ſicke, or troubled after his ſtudie of Philoſophie. This was the talke betwixt Nero and Seneca, who hauing leiſure to bethinke himſelfe better of the anſwer of Nero, knew very well that his fortune was changed, and that the diſciple was become the maſter: yea and that ſo much more dangerous, for that his cruell courage was wrapped vp in ſo gracious words and countenances, the which a man was conſtrained to truſt, or at the leaſt to make ſhew of it.

Nero being as it were ouercome by Seneca, was as cruell and more then before, counſelled by Tigellinus and Popea. Firſt of all then he began to cut off the heads of Plautus and Sylla, honourable men baniſhed before into Asia & to Marseilles. He refuſed, confined, and finally put to death his wife, the Princeſſe Octauia, vſing an infamous and ſtraunge manner in his proceedings againſt her. He maried the adultereſſe Popea, who brought him a daughter that died ſoone after. He counterfeited the player, alwayes intermixing ſome new cruelty with his paſtimes. Afterwards he being preſent at a banket made by Tigellinus, in the which were committed all ſorts of villanies, and he himſelfe being defiled with naturall and vnnaturall whoredomes and abhominations, within few dayes after (a matter incredible, if ſo many graue hiſtorians, amongſt others Tacitus did not aſſure vs of it) he maried one Pythagoras as his husband, which was of the company of theſe villans, and was ſolemnly maried according to the cuſtome of other mariages. The yellow veile of the maried couple couered Neroes head. Soothſayers were ſent for, the ioynter was aſſigned, the bed of the ſpouſe prepared, the wedding torches were lighted: and to be ſhort, they ſaw that openly which the night hideth, when the queſtion of mariage is in hand with a woman. Thirdly, he ſet fire on a great number of houſes in Rome, ſo as the moſt part were burnt. And to cleare himſelfe of this wickedneſſe, he falſly laydit vpon the Chriſtians, (being a great number at that time in Rome) that they were the authors of this diſorder: in ſomuch that they were ſet vpon with a ſtrange crueltie. And yet as they put them to death, they did a thouſand mockeries vnto them, putting beaſts skins vpon them to be torne in peeces with dogges, or elſe they were hanged vpon the croſſe, or burnt with a litle fire: their wood-houſes, or ſtackes of wood ſerued to giue light in the night. Now though the people of Rome were bloudily bent againſt theſe innocents, yet there were many that had pity of them, ſeeing honeſt men tormented, to ſatisfie the cruell inſolency of Nero: who apparelled like a coach-man, and driuing the horſe himſelfe in the middeſt of theſe confuſions, made the people paſtime. Beſides all this, he forraged and ranſacked all Italie with impoſitions and exceſſiue lones, ruining the townes, and not ſparing alſo the temples of Rome, of Asia, nor of Grece. It was giuen out abroad, ſaith Tacitus, that Seneca (whom Nero went oftentimes to viſite, to keepe him in breath, and gently to lull him aſleepe) to auoide the ſuſpition that he had bene of counſell with this ſacriledge: had asked leaue to go to ſome houſe of his farre into the countrey. Which being denied him, he kept his chamber, faining to be ſicke of the goute. Some haue written that a bondman of his enfranchiſed called Cleonicus, did prepare to poyſon him by the commandement of Nero: the which he auoided vpon warning giuen him by him, or for that he feared ſuch a thing, liuing meanely, eating ſuch fruits as were brought him out of the country, and being contented to drinke cleare running water if he were athirſt. Such deteſtable wickedneſſe of Nero hauing of long time offended many honorable perſons, which could no longer endure ſuch a maiſter: they reſolued to ſet themſelues at liberty, and conſpired to kill him one day when they ſaw oportunitie. The day being come, one called Millicus, an enfranchiſed bondman of one of the principall conſpirators, went to diſcouer to Nero what they had complotted againſt him. This gaue a ſtraunge alarme to the Emperour, who cauſed them to lay hands of one and other, amongſt which number there was Lucan the nephew of Seneca, that was a party in this conſpiracie, for anger againſt Nero: who was the cauſe that his verſes were not had in that eſtimation they deſerued, and commaunded him not to publiſh them, thinking (but in vaine) that he could make as good. From that time forth they could ſee nothing in Rome but impriſoning of men of qualitie, and preparation for execution which followed.

Seneca, that ſtirred not out of the countrey, was not forgotten of Popea, nor of Tigellinus, which were the ſecret counſellors of Nero in his cruelties. And Nero alſo failed not to take hold of this occaſion to make away his ſchoole-maiſter, whoſe ſhadow did torment him. It was not for that Seneca was partaker of the counſell with the conſpirators, but Nero was glad to find the meane to diſpatch him with a ſword, ſince he could not do it by poyſon. For one of the conſpirators called Natalis (whom Nero had pardoned) ſayd nothing elſe of him, but that he was ſent to viſite Seneca being ſicke, and to complaine becauſe he thought not good that Piſo (being the head of this enterpriſe, and ſhould be created Emperour after the murther of Nero) ſhould come to ſee him, and that he would confirme their friendſhip, frequenting familiarly together: but that Seneca had anſwered, that their talke and meeting would neither be profitable for the one, nor for the other: and moreouer, that his life depended vpon that of Piſo. Grauius Siluanus Captaine of a band of gards, was commaunded to go to Seneca, to know if he would take any knowledge to haue ſpoken the words confeſſed by Natalis, and the anſwer that he made at that time. By chance, or wittingly, Seneca was come home that very day, and remained in a houſe of his two ſmall miles from Rome. The Captaine came thither about night, and placed his ſouldiers round about the houſe: and afterwards came in, and found Seneca at ſupper with his wife Pompeia Paulina, and two of his friends. So hauing deliuered his meſſage vnto him, Seneca anſwered ſtraight being nothing moued, that Natalis was indeed ſent vnto him to complaine in the name of Piſo, for that Seneca would not ſuffer him to come and ſee him: and that for himſelfe, he did excuſe himſelfe as well by reaſon of his ſickneſſe, as for the deſire he had to take his eaſe. And for thoſe words: that his life depended vpon that of Piſo, he ſayd he had no occaſion to preferre the preſeruation of another priuate mans life, before his owne. And that furthermore, he gaue not his mind to flatteries, whereof he would haue no better teſtimonie then Nero himſelf, who had oftner knowne that Seneca was a free man, then a ſlaue or a bondman. Siluanus returned vnto Nero, and made report in the preſence of Popea and Tigellinus, who were very deſirous to heare his aunſwer: which being heard, Nero asked him, if Seneca made any ſhew to be willing to dye. The Captaine aſſured him that he perceiued no ſigne of feare nor of ſorrow, in the words, nor countenance of Seneca. Thereupon Nero commaunded this Captaine to returne to Seneca againe, and to commaund him to dye. Some thinke that this executioner returned not againe that way he was come, but went another way, to find out Fenius Captaine of the gards, whom after he had acquainted with Neroes commaundement, he asked him if he would execute this commiſſion. Fenius, that was of the number of the conſpirators, neuertheleſſe aduiſed him to obey the Emperours commandement, by a fatall cowardlineſſe of as many as were of them. For Siluanus that had this commiſſion to go to Seneca, was alſo one of the conſpiracie, and yet his hand was readie to increaſe the wickedneſſe of Nero, of the which before he was deſirous and procured to ſee the puniſhment. To hide his offence in ſome ſort, he would not, or durſt not returne into the preſence of Seneca, nor ſpeake to him: but made one of his Centeners go into the houſe to declare the Emperours commandement, which was, that Seneca muſt dye. At that time it was halfe a fauour vnto thoſe that were condemned to looſe their liues, to ſuffer them to be put to death, either by themſelues, or by any of their acquaintance: which was done in diuerſe ſorts. Some pricked their veines and let themſelues bloud, and then went into a hot-houſe where they ended. Others ſwallowed downe poyſon: others ſtabbed themſelues in with their daggers, or their ſwords. It is iudged this was done, that they ſhould not fall into the hands of the hangmen: for when it happened ſo, the bodies of the condemned were not buried, and their goods were forfeited: whereas if they put themſelues to death (of the which the moſt part following the doctrine of the Stoickes were nothing afraid) their bodies ſhould be buried, and their wils and teſtaments good. Sometimes this choice did cut off the grieſes of a more ignominious and cruell puniſhment.

Pompeia Paulina the wife of Seneca.

Now to returne to Seneca. Hauing heard the meſſage of the Centener, without changing countenance, and wholly reſolued: he called for his booke of tables, in the which was written his will: which being denied him by the Centener, turning to his friends, he proteſted, that ſince he was let to acknowledge their merites, that he would leaue one onely thing (and notwithſtanding the beſt) yet his, to wit, the image of the example of his life, the which if they remembred, they would carie a commendable reputation of honeſt & vertuous men, for a worthy reward of ſo conſtant a friendſhip. And ſeeing them weepe, he ſought to appeaſe them, or to ſtay their teares, now with ſweete words, by and by with vehemency, as if he would haue reproued them. To conlude, he did encourage them to remaine firme and conſtant, asking them where was the reſolution they had learned ſo many yeares in the ſchooles and ſtudies of Philoſophie, againſt all the chances of the world. He added further, that euery one knew well what Nero was, what cruelties he had committed: and after that he had ſo wickedly behaued himſelfe to his father in law, to his mother, to his brother, and to his wife: there was nothing left behind for the accompliſhment of his cruelties, but to adde too the murther of his ſchoolemaiſter. After he had diſcourſed ſuch or the like words before them all, and as in generall, he embraced his wife, and hauing a litle emboldened her againſt this blow, he inſtantly prayed her to moderate her griefe, and exhorted her alſo to remember how vertuouſly he had paſſed his life, and gently to beare (and with a heart worthy her ſelfe) the ſorow of the death of her huſband. She for her part aſſured him that ſhe was reſolued to die, and bad one of them giue her the blow. Then Seneca, not to depriue himſelf of that honor, and being touched with the loue he did beare her, was contented not to leaue to the mercie of the diſſolution that then raigned, her whom he had moſt dearely loued. I did ſet before you (ſaid he) the ſweetnes of life; but ſince your ſelfe hath choſen rather an honorable death, for my part, I ſhall not be ſorie if you ſhew me the way. Let the conſtancie therfore of ſo coragious a death as ours, be alike to vs both: although the end of your life ſhal be more famous. Immediatly thereupon, they cauſed the veines of their armes to be opened: but becauſe that Seneca had an old bodie, and thin by eating litle, there would no bloud come out but drop by drop: he made the veines of his legs and hams to be cut. Then wearie of ſuch a cruell butcherie, being affraid that his paines would make his wiues heart faile her, or that he himſelfe ſhould grow impatient for ſo many torments as he endured: he perſwaded her to withdraw her ſelfe into another chamber: and for himſelfe, hauing to his laſt gaſpe his words at commandement, he cauſed his Secretaries that were wont to write vnder him, to come vnto him, and told them there many notable things in fine termes, the which were publiſhed after his death: but time hath taken them from vs for want of ſtorie-writers: although ſome thinke that that might be kept as well as other writings of Seneca. Others carying ſome enuie to the vertue of this man, haue kept it backe, being loth that the poſteritie ſhould enioy a table, where the viſage of Seneca might be better knowne, then in other places of his works. Nero, that had men comming and going euery minute of an houre from Senecaes houſe to Rome, vnderſtanding how euery thing paſſed, and bearing no particular hatred to Paulina, fearing alſo he ſhould increaſe the blame of his crueltie: he commaunded they ſhould keepe Paulina from dying. Wherefore his ſlaues and freed bondmen, warned by the ſouldiers themſelues, bound vp her armes, and ſtaunched the bloud, not knowing whether ſhe felt any thing or not. For as there are alwaies among the people that take things at the worſt, there wanted not men which thought that ſo long as Paulina ſtood in feare of Neroes anger, ſhe deſired to haue the report that ſhe was a companion of the death of her huſband. But afterwards whē there was a better hope offered her, ſhe was contented to be won with the flatteries of life, vnto the which ſhe added ſome few years with cōmendable memory, and ſorow for her husband: being otherwiſe ſo pale of countenance, that ſhe ſhewed to haue loſt a great deale of bloud and her ſtrength. On the other ſide Seneca ſeeing his death prolonged, he prayed Statius Annæus (whom he eſteemed much for his faithfull friendſhip he had borne him a long time, and for his skill in Phiſick) to bring him of the like poiſon to that which they keepe by publike ordinance in Athens to put offenders to death, whereof he had of long time made prouiſion. So when it was brought him, he ſwallowed it downe without regard, his members bieng cold, and his bodie conſtant againſt the force of the poiſon. In the end, he entred into a bathing tub of hote water, with the which ſprinkling his ſlaues that were about him, he added to it, that he offered this liquor vnto Iupiter the deliuerer. After that being caried into a ſtoue, and hauing through the heat thereof yeelded vp the ghoſt, his bodie was burned without any ſolemnitie of obſequies. He had ſo appointed it by his will made at that time when he was very rich, and of great credit. It was reported that Subrius Flauius, one of the chiefeſt conſpirators, had ſecretly determined with the Centeners (yet not without the priuity of Seneca) that after they had killed Nero by the meanes of Piſo, they ſhould alſo diſpatch Piſo himſelfe, to the end to make Seneca Emperour, as an honeſt man, onely elect and choſen to that greatneſſe for the fame of his vertues. Such was the end of Seneca, that had liued in honourable and publike charges, of Prætor, Quæſtor and Conſul vnder two Emperours, and was long in credit with the laſt: who ſeeing himſelfe couertly deſpiſed of his maiſter, that could no longer endure ſuch wickedneſſe: ſought the occaſion before mentioned, but with extreame iniuſtice, to rid him out of the way. Furthermore, Dion thinketh that Senecaes two brethren were likewiſe put to death. But becauſe he is contented to touch it but in a line, and that that which Tacitus ſaith is to be marked, ſet downe in particular, and with moſt likely circumſtances: we will ſpeake one word more. Shortly after the death of Seneca, he commanded they ſhould put Annaus Lucanus to death, the ſon of Mela: who feeling his feet and his hands cold whileſt the bloud ran downe, and that by litle and litle his ſpirit parted from the extremities of his body, his heart being yet liuely and his vnderſtanding good, calling certain verſes of Poetrie to mind, in the which here preſented a ſoldier hurt: dying of the ſame death, he recited the ſame verſes, which were the laſt words he ſpake. Altitia, Lucans mother was left aliue, neither being pardoned nor puniſhed. For Iunius Gallio, who was a Senator, he was ſo aſtonied at the death of his brother, that before all the Senat he fell down at Neroes feet, beſeeching him to giue him his life. Whereupon another Senator called Alienus Clemens, ſet vpon him with iniurious words, calling him traitor and parricide. But the other Senatours with one conſent made Clement hold his peace, telling him that he ſhould not ſeeke common aduerſities for to reuenge his priuate quarrell, or to draw on the Prince to a new crueltie, who had now by his clemencie quieted and forgotten all. Within a few moneths after Annaus Mela was diſpatched: he was a knight of Rome, but of the dignitie of a Senatour. And although Seneca and Gallio his brethren were aduanced to greater honor, yet he would neuer purchaſe it by extremitie of ambition: but being come out of Spaine to Rome, more for the loue of his brethren and of his ſonne then for himſelfe, he was contented to haue this honour, that a knight was euer equal in power and credit with a Conſul. The name of his ſon Lucanus greatly eſteemed of euery bodie, and ſpecially of learned men: had gotten him great reputation. Immediatly after his ſons death, he ſeeking ſomwhat too eagerly after his ſons goods, he raiſed againſt him an accuſer called Fabius Romanus, one of Lucanus chiefeſt friends. This man ſhewed counterfeit letters as done by Lucanus, which charged Mela that he was partaker with his ſonne of the complot againſt Nero. Though this accuſation was vtterly falſe and fained, yet Nero that thirſted after the riches of Mela, commaunded thoſe letters ſhould be caried to Mela: that was as much to ſay, he muſt die. The which Mela knowing well enough, made his veines to be opened, and followed the way of others. Seneca in his writings yeeldeth great teſtimonie of the conſtancie and vertue of his brethren: and I thinke he was a man that was not giuen to ſpeake lightly. Notwithſtanding, I haue ſimply recited that which Tacitus ſaith, who ſufficiently ſheweth in the example of diuers others, that it is not to be maruelled at if the cruelties of Nero, who leaſt ſpared the great then the ſmall: made the boldeſt hearts of them all quake ſometimes.

The death of Annæus Mela.

Now there remaineth to tell you ſomething of the Philoſophie and writings of Seneca: for it is in thoſe tables that we muſt looke to ſee him liuely, and ſpeaking with that ſelfe vehemencie of ſpirit that followed him euen to the laſt gaſpe of his life. It is true that the inſolencies of Nero had oftentimes as it were ſtopped his mouth, and hindered that good ſoule to giue free paſſage to his diſcourſes, yea and in ſome places they made him ſtumble. Yet he called himſelfe backe againe to his firſt thoughts, and remained conſtant in the midſt of the cruell raging ſtormes of his time. Now as it is eaſie for men that be on the land, where they do idly behold ſome maſter Pylot ſtriuing with the force and furie of the wind and billowes, to ſay: That man there ſhould guide his ſhip after another faſhion: who if they were in his place, ſhould without all compariſon find themſelues more troubled, or at the leaſt would make a ſorowfull wracke. Euen ſo it happeneth, that Senecaes Philoſophie is deſpiſed of many, that think he could ſpeake Philoſophy but by his booke, and that when he ſhould come to ſhew it indeed, men would ſay he doth like the maiſters of fence, who being in a ſchoole of fence with young youths, they do wonders, and giue mortall vennies at pleaſure: but if they come to any priuate fight at the ſharpe, where it ſtandeth them vpon for their liues: aſſoone as they ſee the gliſtering of the naked ſword, you may perceiue all their flouriſhes and trickes are gone, or changed into a flat running away. I will ſay at one word, that I thinke Seneca as much and more a Philoſopher in deed then in name. His life and his death can ſay it, and in the laſt Chapter hereafter we muſt ſpeake more at large. For this preſent let vs a litle conſider his tongue. Life is a ſweet thing, and all deſire to liue, yea the beaſts themſelues ſeeme to haue a ſingular contentment, for that they haue a being and life. If life be a pleaſant thing, yet is it much more pleaſing and acceptable when it is well gouerned, and tendeth to a good end. So then a quiet and contented life is much better, ſweeter, and more excellent, then a life full of troubles and paſſions. This quietneſſe is none other but felicitie and good

fortune. Furthermore all men do not aſpire to this end, but onely wiſe men, and the true friends of wiſdome. For the moſt part of men whom the earth ſuſtaineth, do run a ſtrange courſe when they ſhould ſet a foot forward to betake them to ſome courſe of life: and all in maner erre, when they ſhould iudge what happie life is. Thoſe that delight in money and to gaine, ſeeke felicitie in riches. The idle and ſlouthfull thinke, that to make great cheare, to liue (as they ſay) in the ſhadow of tables, of pots, of curtaines, and at the eaſe of their bodies, is the onely ſoueragine good. There are another ſort of men greedie of worldly honour, which eſtabliſh an vnſpeakable happineſſe to commaund many, (in what manner, or how deare ſoeuer it be) taking themſelues to be halfe gods, if they may ſee many men, or two or three go vnder their feet. But wiſe men eſtabliſh ſoueraigne good in vertue. And if they be asked, What is a happy life? they anſwer, That it conſiſteth in liuing vertuouſly, and ſeruing God. This was the Philoſophie of Seneca in generall. But becauſe there are certaine clouds of opinions which darken humane felicitie, it is good we looke to examine them briefly. Nature hath diſperſed in vs ſome ſeeds of vertue, and hath giuen vs ſome graines of knowledge and wiſedome, which are borne with vs and take roote (if we may ſay ſo) in our hearts. This notwithſtanding, we muſt manure it, and vertue hath his precepts which openeth the way to attaine to the ſoueraigne good, whereunto the Philoſophie of the Stoickes doth ſummon vs. Foure things are enemies to that good, yea they obſcure it, they corrupt and aboliſh it in an euill diſpoſed heart. The firſt cauſe is death, that is to ſay, the feare and imagination to loſe this earthly and corruptible life. For where there is feare, it cannot be ſaid there is contentment and felicitie, but miſerie: it is not a pleaſant life, but a ſorowfull life, and a torment of the mind. The ſecond, is the bodily griefe, lingering diſeaſes, cruell and ſharpe in a thouſand kinds, the torments and tortures: and briefly a thouſand euils which hurt the contentment of the ſoule. For no man will ſay, that to be troubled in his mind with a burning feauer, to crie out night and day becauſe of the gowte, or for paine of his teeth and the reines, or to be brought to any extraordinarie torment, and to be diſmembred by the hangman: is a thing where there is no apprehenſion that moueth the ſpirit. Beſides all this, there are the griefes of the ſoule: mourning, loſſe of children, of kinſfolks and deare friends: for that afflicteth and eateth our thoughts without ceaſſing, and giueth tragicall Poets ample arguments to write vpon. If the griefe of the bodie affecteth the reſt and contentment of the mind: much more doth the inward griefe and anguiſh. And finally there are paſſions, as ioy and pleaſure, which hinder and aboliſh the feeling of a happie life. Thoſe that are poſſeſſed with an extraordinarie ioy, oftentimes both do and ſay many fond things and ieſtures, in wordes and workes. As if a man be told that land is fallen to him, or that he is raiſed to wiſhed dignitie not looked for: ye ſhall ſee him play the foole and wanton like a child. There are ſome whoſe maners honor chaungeth in ſuch ſort, that from the day till the next morning you ſhall not know them by their face, by their countenances, by their words, nor by their apparell: they will ſtraight diſdaine them that they called before ſeruants or louing friends. Now this vaine pride and fooliſhneſſe are in manner one ſelfe thing: and it may be ſaid that all ambitious men are altogether beſotted, or doubtleſſe they will be ſo. If thou wilt make me ſee a proud man, one that preſumeth to know much, and that looketh vpon his feathers, as they ſay, I will preſently ſhew thee a foole furniſhed at all peeces. There is no ſurer ſigne of fooliſhneſſe then pride: and who will ſay then that the life of ſuch a one is happie? And as for pleaſures, we ſee how a man is caried away, who then is no more himſelfe: but to the contrarie, thinketh that the deſtruction of bodie and ſoule is his ſoueraigne good. Now amongſt all the Philoſophers which haue tried to remedie theſe troubles of the mind, and to maintaine a man in this contentment which they call ſoueraigne: it may be ſaid the Stoickes were the chiefe, and among the Stoicks Seneca. I will not here enter into examination of the doctrine of this ſect, nor declare that which Zeno and Chryſippus haue written, as may be gathered of Laertius and of Plutarch: but ſimply to ſtay my ſelfe vpon my principall purpoſe, which is is of Seneca. And in this place to follow that which many learned men haue gathered of his workes, to ſhew what was his Philoſophie: vnto the which we will adde ſome Summarie of reaſons with the which he helpeth himſelfe, to fight with thoſe paſſions, and to make the ſoule at peace, aſmuch as he himſelfe could apprehend it. This is out of all queſtion, that Seneca was one of the firſt and principall Philoſophers of the Stoickes among the Latines, as he himſelfe doth boaſt in his owne writings. Furthermore, he exalteth this ſect aboue all others, and ſaith, That the Stoickes do make profeſſion of a Philoſophy worthie of men: forasmuch as there is difference betwixt them and others, as betwixt males and females. That the other kinds of Philosophies are made, to heare and to obey: but that the Stoicke is borne to teach and commaund. He being desirous to present some perfect Idea of a wise man, bringeth foorth Cato: and in the Treatie where he will shew that the wise man cannot be offended nor outraged, he lifteth vp this man out of the rancke of all other men, and specially commēdeth him in his death. If he speake of the Stoickes, he calleth them his, and doth make open profession of their instructions. Now in many places he distinguisheth Philosophie into three parts, which he calleth Rationall, Morrall, and Naturall. But after the fashion of the Stoicks, he rested more vpon the morall, albeit that all his discourses shew that he had a maruellous veine in the rationall. And the bookes of naturall questions shew that he had a deepe insight in the secrets of nature. So then his principal end was to frame good maners, and to bring men to the knowledge of the contentment of the mind, to desire and apprehend it. They saw him oftentimes exhort Lucilius to the studie of morall Philosophy, as in the end of his 89. Epistle: So set down these things, saith he, to others, that thou thy selfe maist take pleasure to comprehend them. Write, to reade afterwards thy writing, referring all things to the reformation of life, and to the meanes of appeasing the furie of passions. Study, not to be wiser then others, but to be better. On the other side, he turned the same Lucilius from the study of Logicke, and from his subtill disputations, in the which they please themselues that do but linger after sillables and words. Leaue (said he to him in the 71. Epistle) this occupation and sifting of letters, to those maisters that shut vp a thing so magnificent as Philosophy is in syllables: and do imbase, yea bring to nothing, and vtterly destroy the mind, in teaching things that are not worth the labour and study. I am content that thou resemble wise men that haue inuented letters, but not those that teach them. In some other places he laugheth at the subtilties of these schoole disputers, namely, where he setteth down one of their fashions of speech, to wit, in the 48. which is the 49. in the editions not well corrected, vpon these words: Mus (that is to say a mouse) is a syllable: a mouse eateth cheese, therefore it followeth that a syllable eateth cheese. But it is not only that he setteth vpon Logicke, or rationall Philosophie, but also on the sciences commonly called the liberal sciences, and especially when there is question of the Philosophie of manners. Witnesse that which he writeth in the fourescore and eighth Epistle worthy to be diligently read of all, but specially of them whom such sciences do puffe vp, & who for the rest do litle care to rule their life within the compasse of vertue. In sum, he declareth in a great number of places, that Philosophie consisteth not in the knowledge of these things, but that the end thereof is, to giue counsell against all the accidents of this life: and that men were wont to repaire vnto Philosophers, who do shew them in the midst of darknesse (wherwith humane society is snared) the way they must follow not to erre, shewing what things are necessarie and vnprofitable: how easie the lawes of nature are: how ioyfully we liue & at our ease, following of the same. And to the contrary, that there can be nothing but misery in the condition of those, which suffer themselues to wander rather by opinion, then by nature and reason. I thinke therefore that all the Philosophie of Seneca looketh vnto that, to establish the mind all that may be: to attaine to the which it speaketh of the soueraigne good, to the end to draw vs to aspire vnto it. And because the accidents of this life, namely the causes before mentioned, do obscure this happines: he striueth with infinit discourses and reasons against them. Now it were to make a great volume, if all were put together that he speaketh, & it were better to leaue it to their liberty that shall reade the works of this Philosopher, of the which I will note here some heads or rules, on the which he reasoneth very amply to remedie the griefes before named. The intention therfore of Seneca aboue all in matters most important, is to beat downe first all corporall and spirituall passions: to wit, opinion and apprehension. He discouereth the vanitie, sheweth the wrong which men of vnderstanding do, and the errour of their iudgement: who see things as in the water, and with a corrupt eye. Which done, he goeth further, and seeketh to shew, that when that which is called euill is arriued, the wise man feeleth it not: as also it is as litle trouble to him when one thinketh to touch him, as it is then when one threatened him a far off. For proofe of this, he sheweth that they cannot hurt a wise man any maner of way: and that no man is iniuried or hurt but by himself. That the wise man bending al his thoughts vnto vertue, cannot be offended, but rather ouercometh all humane accidents, as well for respect of himselfe, as for all others. Hereupon he cometh to this point, to maintaine, that that which they call euill, is good to the wise man: who like a good husband maketh his profite of all in such sort, that there is nothing in

in the world but ſerueth his turne, and whereof he is not maiſter with a ſingular contentment. Of theſe rules and Maximes, there riſe many Paradoxes diſperſed in his bookes, the which if a man conſider apart, are very ſtrange and ridiculous withall: but being brought to their originals, they may receiue ſome expoſition. Furthermore, to frame a perfect wiſe man, he will haue nothing pleaſant vnto him but vertue, which conſiſteth in contemning all that the world admireth: and a loue of beautifull things which giue contentment to the ſoule. That all that which is earthly and corruptible, ſhould be eſteemed as much as nothing: that the wiſe man infolding himſelfe in his vertue, ſeeth all the greatneſſe of this world very low vnder him, and as it were troden vnder the feet of his heart. And that in the midſt of all dangers, yea euen in the moſt fierceſt death of all, and when heauen ſhould fall vpon him: he remaineth merie and pleaſed with the felicitie which his vertue bringeth vnto him. Afterwards he reaſoneth particularly againſt the apprehenſions of death: and ſheweth that it is as ineuitable, as it is alſo good and neceſſarie. That the greateſt contentment of a wiſe man is, that he can breake in ſunder the iron chaine that holdeth him, as often and when he thinketh good: and vpon this occaſion treateth in ſome places of the immortalitie of the ſoule, as in the end of the ſeuen and fiftith Epiſtle, in the threeſcore and fift, threeſcore and ſixteenth, and the hundred and ſeuenteenth, in his comfortable diſcourſe vnto Martia, and elſewhere. Touching theſe corporall paines, he ſheweth that they cannot turn a man out of the pathway of vertue, nor from the profeſſion of conſtancie and truth, nor from the reſolution to maintaine a iuſt cauſe. That there is no paine nor griefe ſo ſharpe, that can let a wiſe man to thinke of his duty, and to acquit himſelfe ſo far as his hands may reach. That theſe corporall griefes cannot eclipſe the leaſt of the beames of vertue, and the hope of the immortality of our ſoules, for the which we exchange in the day that our paines come as it were to haue greateſt ſtrength, all the diſcommodities we apprehend in this tranſitory life. Furthermore, that the troubles which the eſtate of this world doth ſpreade as a vaile before our minds, cannot blindfold them to ſee the perfect beautie of vertue, and to heare the excellent comforts which ſhe propoſeth. Alſo that the wiſe man is ſufficiently defended not to be ouercome by paſſions, which haue no power on him that is in the ordinarie ſafegard and protection of vertue, in poſſeſſion wherof he is already ſo entred, that he ſtill goeth forward euery day more then other, ſhortly to enioy her with perfection. To conclude, that there is no hinderance at all for him whom vertue pleaſeth, and whom ſhe bringeth to immortalitie. And this is a litle touch (me thinketh) which may be particularly noted in Seneca: in the beautie whereof, as in faces better formed, there are ſome ſpots diſcouered as in other Philoſophers, namely the Stoicks. Aboue all, in his portraiture of this wiſe man, he imagineth in this life a thing that is not to be found in a corrupt man giuen ouer to ſenſualitie, which is, vertue and perfection. But let vs refer that to the ignorance of true religion, and conſider this Philoſopher in the limits of his ſect. For other Paradoxes, as of the world, of the ſpirit, of paſſions and affections of vertue, and ſome others borrowed of the ſchoole of his maiſters, that Plutarch hath examined in his booke Of common conceptions, and in that which he entituleth, The contradiction of the Stoickes: that which is euill doth condemne it ſelfe, or excuſeth it ſelfe vnder the queſtions and diſputations, which permit a man to ſay ſomewhat. And for the other, foraſmuch as Seneca made profeſſion to forme maners, he ſeemeth therin to haue giuen way and free paſſage to ſome of his conceptions, and after the example of Painters, to giue ſome ſhadowes vnto his tables, the better to retaine the iudgement of the reader. That which I leaſt allow in him, or rather which I cannot approue, is the exceſſiue praiſe he giueth to his wiſe man, lifting him vp, yea aboue the gods. And afterwards in diuerſe places he would haue this wiſe man put himſelfe to death, and of his authoritie and power diſſolue the bands of this life, without leaue of the ſoueraigne Captaine, and with a teſtimonie of a ſtraunge cowardlineſſe and diſtruſt of the doctrine of the eternall Prouidence: the which would haue vs keepe a ſtedfaſt hope and confidence, yea euen when things ſeeme to be moſt deſperate. And that which he often applyeth vnto the death of Cato, whom he infinitly commendeth, hath bene by vs examined in the compariſon of Cato and of Phocion. Furthermore, Seneca ſtayed not vpon one or two in his diſcourſes he hath left vnto vs, but hath culled out of all the Philoſophers Greekes and Latines which were before him, all that he thought good to ſet downe for the rule and gouernment of our life, according to the end he looked vnto. And as for his writings, all that we haue left concerning morall and naturall Philoſophie, with the pleaſant diſcourſe vpon the death of Claudius, is out of all diſputation vntill this preſent: as the ſtile that is hard, ſhort, ſententious, and in apt

tearmes for that time, and after the manner of teaching of the Stoickes, doth ſhew it. But for the bookes entituled, Controuerſiæ & Suaſoriæ, that is to ſay, pleadings and orations, or declamations, I am of the ſame opinion that diuerſe learned men of our time are, to wit: that theſe bookes are not of Seneca, but of the father of Seneca. And becauſe many other learned men ancient and moderne haue thought the contrarie, we muſt needs ſay ſomewhat for proofe of the opinion which we follow. The authour of theſe collections ſaith, that he heard Ouid and Cicero declame, and that he was familiar with Portius Latro, Valerius Meſſala, and with others that were in the time of Auguſtus. When he heard Cicero, he could be no leſſe then fifteene yeares old: how can that be attributed vnto Seneca, dead in the end of the Empire of Nero, wel-neare ſixe ſcore years after that time? Now, that which Tacitus ſpeaketh in diuers places of the age of Seneca, reacheth not ſo farre: and Nero ſpeaking to Seneca a litle before his death, ſaid that he had yet ſtrength enough to vſe his goods, and gouerne his poſſeſſions. That could not be ſpoken of an old man of a hundred and twelue yeares old. Alſo Seneca ſpeaketh otherwiſe of his age in one of his Epiſtles noted here before, where he telleth that about the fifth yeare of the Empire of Tiberius, he came out of his infancie, of the age of eighteene yeares. Furthermore, Seneca was Prætor, Quæſtor, and Conſull, as in his diſcourſe to his mother Elbia, the Chronicles, and the Lawyers bookes do make mention. And to the contrarie, his father dedicating his bookes aboue named vnto Seneca, Iunius, and Mela, his three ſons: and ſpeaking to Mela in the Preface of his ſecond booke of pleadings, he exhorteth him to follow the inclination of his mind, and contenting himſelfe with the ſtate of a priuate gentleman, and a ROMAINE knight as his father, the better to warrant his life in the hazards and accidents of this world. That which made Seneca to be eſteemed the authour of thoſe bookes there, is, for that his father did beare that name: and that theſe three, Seneca, Nouatus, (ſurnamed Iunius Gallo) and Mela be brethren, and the ſonnes of one ſelfe father and mother, it appeareth by the hiſtorie of Tacitus, in the fifteenth booke of his Annales, and by the writings of Seneca himſelfe, ſpecially by the diſcourſe to Elbia, where he ſaith amongſt other things: Conſider my brethren, that being ſafe, you haue no cauſe to accuſe fortune: you haue in thē cauſe to reioyce in a diuerſe kind. For the one, through his good wit hath attained to honor, and the other hath wiſely deſpiſed it. Tacitus plainely ſheweth that, as we haue ſeene here before. And whereas commonly they alleadge the age of Seneca to be ſixe ſcore years and aboue, to giue the more authoritie to the pleadings and Orations of his father, that is to ſay, to the fragments which he ſeemeth to haue ſet foorth in the fauour of his children, to frame them betimes one day to practiſe that whereof he made profeſſion, to wit, eloquence: there cannot be ſhewed any ſufficient or authenticke teſtimonie of that which is alleadged, that Seneca had three ſonnes called, Nouatus, Seneca, and Mela. Touching the true bookes of Seneca, the dilgent reading and conſideration of them will incontinently ſhew the profite that may be gathered by them. For a man to ſtand reſolued againſt the diuers and troubleſome euents of this life, to repoſe himſelfe ſweetly vpon the diuine Prouidence, to contemne death, and to deſire the bleſſed immortalitie, for to repreſſe the inſolencie of ſtrange paſſions which do often carie vs too high and too far, and for to enioy a great reſt amongſt ſo many tempeſts and wrackes as happen daily, I know not an Hiſtorian among the Painims, Philoſopher, Orator, or author whatſoeuer, that I would preferre before Seneca: yea, there are few to be compared to him, and the moſt part do follow him farre off.

This bringeth vs to the conſideratiō of ſome cenſures made of Seneca by diuerſe learned men, as well auncient, as thoſe of this latter age, to the end to induce them that behold Seneca, to looke nearely into him: for if there be any thing wherein humane wit doth giue ſcope and licence, let another iudge that. But that ſpecially is as an ordinarie thing vnto them that make profeſſion ſtudiouſly to thruſt their noſes into bookes, to marke preſently, and ſometime too ſuddenly, that which is before them: to beare others in hand afterwards that things are ſuch as they did imagine them to be. And although I do not acknowledge my ſelfe to be one of the number of them that reade and know paſſably ſomething: yet for all that ere I beware, I am too often attainted with this diſeaſe, which poſſeſſeth thoſe that make many bookes, reprouing and iudging others. But as I do not commend them in any wiſe vnto whom the bookes of ſound erudition are not pleaſing, (like to weake ſtomackes vnto whom meats euill dreſſed and alſo hurtfull, ſeeme to be the moſt ſauorie) but feedes themſelues with their follies, vaine fancies and abhominations, wherewith this latter age is miſerably defiled: ſo would I wiſh that the excellent wits which are yet

in EVROPE were on the one ſide better aduiſed in many reſpects, and in the others more carefull to diſcerne that which is commendable and blameable, certaine or vncertaine in good authors: to note them particularly vnto poſteritie, with two conditions: the one, that it ſhould be done by the ſufficienteſt men, and as it were of purpoſe appointed to that end, by conſent of fame and truth: the other, that all ſcoffes, ſpitefull and ſiniſter paſſions, ſhould be farre from ſuch cenſurers. To come againe to Seneca: I ſee that ſome haue too much axalted him, as I thinke: and others haue imbaſed him more then needed. Which being particularly conſidered, peraduenture it will not miſlike: and if it profite not, I hope it will moue the Reader to ſome thought higher then mine, both to ſearch matters more exactly, as alſo to ſettle his opinion vpon mine with the compaſſe of truth, of mildneſſe, and of vertue. Becauſe Seneca ſpeaketh amply in ſome places of the prouidence and maieſtie of God, before whom he exhorteth vs to walke, and ſomtimes prayeth Lucilius to liue with men as if God ſaw him: and to ſpeake with God, as if men heard him. Alſo that he died in the end of the Empire of Nero, at which time S. Paule the Apoſtle was priſoner at ROME. Some haue thought that Seneca of long time had leaned vnto Chriſtian religion, by reaſon whereof his writings were read as proceeding from a man aduanced in the knowledge of the true God. And otherwiſe he was contented to ſpeake in general, and as vnder a veile of the ignorance of his time, and becauſe he would haue them no more enuied whom the world did altready hate. Briefly, that he was a ſecret diſciple of Chriſt, in the ſchoole of his Apoſtle. In confirmation wherof, they ſhew certaine letters of Seneca vnto Paule, with mutuall anſwers: and they do adde alſo the teſtimonie of a great chriſtian Doctor, who hath placed Seneca in the Catalogue of Saints, whoſe ſoules we beleeue are in glorie with their Sauior. Howbeit certaine learned men of our time haue ſpoken their opinion touching all that, to whom I do agree, to wit: that whether Seneca ſaw the Apoſtle and ſpake with him, whether he diſdained to ſee him, or that he cared not, nor did inquire after him, as I thinke that he thought then of any thing elſe rather then of the doctrine taught by S. Paul: there is nothing in his life, in his writings, nor in his death, that cometh neare to the Chriſtian beleefe and profeſſion. But if we ſhould call all thoſe Chriſtians, in whoſe writings we do reade goodly and true ſentences of wiſedome, iuſtice, and the prouidence of God: it would make a ſtraunge mingling of Scripture with prophane bookes: and further, they wold diſpute if the one ſhould be put in the place of the other. As wee ſee that in the bodies of the bookes which for excellencie we call the Bible, there are two, in the which the name of God is neuer expreſſed: which notwithſtanding are holy, and do containe infinit inſtructions and ſingular conſolations. Seneca hauing written in ſome place, The Godhead is I know not what great thing, yea ſo great, that it paſſeth al mans vnderſtanding. Our life is dedicated to his ſeruice. Let vs take order to be approued of the ſame: for a hidden conſcience is good for nothing: God ſeeth vs. An auncient Doctour ſaid thereupon, Any man that ſhould know God, could he ſet foorth any more certaine veritie, then that which is ſpoken here by the mouth of a man, that knew not what true religion meant? For he repreſenteth the maieſtie of God, ſaying that it is ſo great, that mans vnderſtanding cannot meaſure it: and plainely, the fountaine of veritie: ſhewing that the life of men is not vnprofitable, (as ſome Epicurians think) ſince it is referred to the glorie of the Creator, when they follow iuſtice and pietie. Other diſcourſes of Seneca might be alleaged touching the prouidence of God, againſt idolatrie, ſuperſtition, and impietie: but the conſequence is not ſtable. That he hath therfore knowne any thing of the doctrine of the Goſpell, you ſhall not find one diſcourſe in all his writings, and the doctrine of the Stoickes doth in nothing agree with that, which neither fleſh nor bloud can reueale: and wherof it is not our purpoſe to ſpeake in this place, which requireth not that we ſhold diſcouer the holy things, and much leſſe that we ſhould mingle them with the prophane. As for the letters publiſhed vnder the name of Seneca and of Paule: both the ſtile and the matter ſhew at the firſt ſight, that it is the worke of ſome idle man that thought himſelfe very wiſe, if he diſſembled with thoſe which did not ſift it ſo narrowly. And we ſhall not need here to make a recapitulation of the iuſt and learned cenſures that haue bene made: where you ſhall ſee the madneſſe, repugnancies, and falſhoods hidden in thoſe letters, if they be conferred with the life and doctrine of them vnto whom they were attributed. We do not meet with any thing ſo much in the writings of Seneca, as the conſtancie and contempt of death: how commeth it then that you ſhall not find one word that ſheweth him to be a Chriſtian? That Nero hath not diſcouered or perceiued any thing to charge Seneca with, when he commanded him to die? For that had bene an ample diſcharge before the people that extreamely hated the Chriſtians. Suetonius and Tacitus, litle fauouring our religion, would not haue forgotten it. But how chaunceth it that in his death he remembred Iupiter, and not Chriſt? Now, in regard of the Catalogue which is alleaged for a buckler: I deſire that learned men do conſider, if they haue not wronged the perſon to whom it is attributed, mingling amongſt his workes this ſcoffe, and others which are no better, forged vpon the like anuile and with the ſelfe ſame hammer, which the letters were before mentioned. Now I thinke, (theſe are the words of a learned man that had well read Seneca) that it is beſt for the reader to take Senecaes bookes, as proceeding from a man ignorant of true religion. For if you reade them as a Pagane, he hath written like a Chriſtian: but if you take him for a Chriſtian, know that it is a Pagane that ſpeaketh. There are many things that may inflame vs with the loue of vertue: they will pricke vs more nearely, if we remēber from whom they come. If we meet with any ſentences that ſeeme to be drawn out of our fountains, they will be ſo much the ſweeter vnto vs: and as for vncertaine and falſe opinions, they will offend vs leſſe, when we ſhall ſay that it is a Pagan that hath ſet them out. Let vs come to the other point, and conſider thoſe that haue too much imbaſed him, either in reſpect of his life, or becauſe of his writings. For his life, ſome (and Dion amongſt others) haue accuſed him of auarice, of ambition, of diſſolution, of adulterie, and of other ſuch like vices: vnto the which I will not vouchſafe to make anſwer, ſince ſo many learned men auncient, and moderne, and the life and death of Seneca do ſay the contrarie. And it were an eaſie thing for one that would cut Dion a gowne of his owne cloth, to diſcouer in him many things impertinent and euill beſeeming the name wherof he maketh profeſſion. But it is better to confute euident ſlaunders by ſilence, then with long diſcourſe. Some other ſpeake not ſo plainely, but ſay that Seneca liued not after his owne precepts. On the contrarie, the honour which he maketh often to Epicurus, ſeemeth to ſhew that he hath mingled the wickedneſſe of the Epicurians with the auſteritie of the Stoickes. I graunt that Seneca hath not in all the parts of his life ſhewed this conſtancie which he requireth of a wiſe man, and I perceiue well that he hath diſſembled too many things in the gouernment of Nero: the which the wiſe Thraſca would neuer haue allowed of the preſence, nor of the word, nor of the deed. But mans infirmitie is ſuch, that that which the mind ſeeth plainely enough, it cannot or dare not effect it, becauſe of the reſiſtance of reaſon and paſſions: or if it dare, it is ſtaid with the leaſt obiect through this naturall faintneſſe that keepeth vs backe, when we ſhould reſolutely follow vertue. Now of this cenſure there followeth no more, but that the Eternall wiſdome doth giue vs knowledge of many notable things vttered by the mouth and teſtimonie of this ſtranger: and in the mean time doth admoniſh vs in no wiſe to ſtay our ſelues vpon him that ſpeaketh: which ſhe doth well in her proper houſe, where ſhe vnderſtandeth that we lend our eares vnto thoſe which go with other feet then they ſhould, ſo that they keepe within the bounds of their commiſſion. And as a Sergeant or Herauld that had but one eye, or were lame, could notwithſtanding deliuer a meſſage of importance in the name of the Prince, and muſt be heard: euen ſo whatſoeuer he be that cometh to vs with the notes of chaſt and faire Veritie, he ought to haue audience, to be beleeued and followed, ſo long as he containeth himſelfe neare to her, and reiecteth all that is contrarie, be it in words or in fact. For Epicurus, Seneca alleageth ſome notable matters of him, wherefore it followeth not that he doth allow of his faults, nor of his ſect, as is alſo to be acknowledged in many places. And there can be nothing obſerued in the life of Seneca, that ſheweth him to be an Epicurian or a Libertine. For euen in the midſt of the abundance and of the great riches he poſſeſſed by the liberalitie of Nero, they ſaw a great moderation witneſſed, alſo in his death: not being forbidden to Noblemen to poſſeſſe gold, ſiluer, earthly goods, and moueables of great value, ſo that ſuch proſperitie do not make them drunke, to cauſe them deſpiſe God and men. As for the laſt, be they auncient or moderne whoſe names I am not content to expreſſe, which very boldly do cenſure the writings of Seneca: and in agreeing to him in ſome excellent thing, they afterwards take licence to thinke him rude in his ſtile, too rigorous a Iudge of other mens labours, a fooliſh ieaſter, affected in his diſcourſes, troubleſome by reaſon of his repetitions, without art, of ſmall iudgment, forgetfull, truſting to his owne wit, curious of light things, and ſeeking I know not how to be particular, becauſe he would not ſeeme to haue borrowed any thing of any man. Theſe be accuſers in the moſt part of ſuch articles, and no competent Iudges, ſauing the honour due to their erudition. For proofe whereof we do exhort the reader to take one whole booke of Seneca which he liketh of beſt, and then to examine it all, if I

ſpeake euill, ſaying, that he had wrong to be ſo toſſed and played vpon. I thinke that there is nothing in his workes, be it in his ſtile, in the method, or in matter that could be better performed. Alſo if they conſider what words he vſeth, how he ioyneth them together, what is the end of his diſcourſes, and what the matters are that he treateth of: they will be leſſe rigorous vnto him. For concluſion, I deſire that Senecaes life, referred to his writings, do teach foure things to my ſelfe, and to all others. The one, that being in meane or baſe condition, we neuer care to clime vp any higher. The other, that if we chaunge a meane eſtate with another greater, we do remember the former, to conuerſe modeſtly with great and ſmall. The third, that we neuer paſſe for any worldly proſperitie, but that we be alwaies afraid of it, vntill we be looſed by the meanes of a happie death. And the laſt, that in our publike and priuate conuerſation, in our thoughts, words, writings, and actions, there ſhine in vs the loue and reuerence of true pietie and iuſtice.

The end of Senecaes life.

THE LIFE OF Miltiades.

MILTIADES an ATHENIAN, the ſonne of Cimon, being one of the chiefeſt of his citie, as well becauſe of the ancientry of his race, as for his modeſtie ioyned to the glorie of his predeceſſors, after he had attained to that age, which his citizens had occaſion not onely to hope well of him, but alſo to aſſure themſelues that he would be ſuch a one as they iudged him after they knew him: it chaunced that the ATHENIANS reſolued to ſend a Colonie into CHERRONESVS. And becauſe many men prepared themſelues to go thither, and that there was great ſute who ſhold leade them: they choſe ſome to go to DELPHES, to inquire of the Oracle who ſhould be their Captaine: foraſmuch as the THRACIANS at that time did occupie all thoſe parts thereabouts, and they muſt be driuen out by force of armes. The Prophetesſe enioyned the Commiſſioners expreſly to chooſe Miltiades for chiefe of this people or Colonie, the which ſhould proſper in this enterpriſe vnder his conduct. With this anſwer Miltiades accompanied with a choſen companie of men, ſailed vnto CHERRONESVS, and when he came neare to LEMNOS to ſubdue the inhabitants of that Iſland, he ſummoned them without any compulſion. They mocking him, anſwered, That they would then yeeld themſelues when Miltiades ſhould come from ATHENS to LEMNOS with a Northrene wind, which was full in the faces of them that ſhould come from ATHENS to LEMNOS. Miltiades hauing no leyſure to tarie there, hoiſſed ſaile, and arriued in CHERRONESVS. And there hauing in a ſhort time broken all the troupes of the barbarous people, he made himſelf Lord of the whole countrie, built vp ſome fortreſſes, placed his people in the countrey which he had brought with him, & made them rich, by diuerſe attempts againſt the ſelfe ſame countreymen. Wherein he preuailed as much by his wiſedome, as through his good fortune. For after he had through the valiantneſſe of his ſouldiers ouercome the armies of his enemies, he eſtabliſhed his affaires with great equitie, and reſolued to remaine in CHERRONESVS. So he was there as king, although he had not the name, and attained to this degree of honour as much through his vpright adminiſtration of iuſtice, as for his ſufficiencie in warres. This kept him not from doing his dutie vnto the ATHENIANS, from whom he was parted: the which was the occaſion indeed, that as well thoſe which had ſent him thither, as thoſe with whom he was imbarked, were content he ſhould continue there alwaies Gouernor. CHERRONESVS being brought to this order, he came againe to LEMNOS, and according to the promiſe of the inhabitants, he demaunded that they would yeeld vp their citie vnto him: for they promiſed to giue him their hands when he ſhould come vnto them from his countrey by the North wind. Now (ſaid he) that his countrey was in CHERRONESVS. The CARIANS, who held LEMNOS at that time, ſeeing things go otherwiſe then they looked for, and taken not ſo much by their words as by the good fortune of their aduerſaries, durſt not make head, but went ſtraight from thence. So all things proſpering according to his deſire, he brought all the other Iſles called the CYCLADES, to be ſubiect to the ATHENIANS.

At

At the ſame time Darius king of PERSIA hauing paſſed all his armie out of ASIA into EVROPE, determined to make war with the SCYTHIANS, and made a bridge ouer Danuby to paſſe ouer his troupes: the guard of the which in his abſence, was committed vnto the Lords which he had brought with him out of IONIA and ÆOLIA, and vnto euery one of the which he had giuen perpetuall power and gouernment ouer their townes. Suppoſing by this policie, eaſily to bring into ſubiection all the GREEKES that dwelt in ASIA, if he gaue the guard of the townes vnto their friends and confederates, that could not eſcape by any meanes if he were oppreſſed. Miltiades was of the number of the guards of this bridge. Newes being brought by diuerſe meſſages that Darius had but ill ſucceſſe, and that the SCYTHIANS held him hard to it: he perſwaded the other guards not to loſe the occaſion that was offered to ſet GREECE at libertie, conſidering that if Darius and his forces he brought with him were ouerthrown, all EVROPE ſhould be in peace, and the naturall GREEKES remaining in ASIA ſhould ſee themſelues out of daunger, and freed from the domination of the PERSIANS. And this might eaſily be done, ſince that by cutting of the bridge, Darius ſhould in few daies be cut in peeces by the enemies, or ſhould die for penurie with all his armie. Many agreed vnto it: but Iſtiæus MILESIAN brake the necke of it, ſaying, that the kingdome of Darius vpon whom their authoritie depended, made difference betwixt the good of the affaires of them that commaunded, and the people that was vnder ſubiection and gouernment. That if Darius ſhould happen to die, they ſhould be driuen out and puniſhed by their citizens: and therefore that he was of a contrarie mind to all the reſt, thinking nothing more profitable, then to ſee the kingdome of the PERSIANS eſtabliſhed. The greater part of them being of his mind, Miltiades was affraid, for that there were ſo many witneſſes, that the king ſhould ſoone be aduertiſed of that which was propounded: wherefore he left CHERRONESVS, and returned againe to ATHENS. Now though his counſel tooke no place, yet he was highly commended, hauing ſhewed more regard to the good and libertie of all, then to his owne particular aduancement.

For Darius, he being returned out of EVROPE into ASIA, his friends counſelled him to ſet vpon GREECE. Whereupon he armed a fleet of fiue hundred galleys vnder the charge of Datis and Artaphernes, giuing them two hundred thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand horſe, ſaying that he would be euen with the ATHENIANS, becauſe that the IONIANS had in fauour of the ATHENIANS forced the citie of SARDIS, and killed his garriſons. Theſe two Lieutenants of Darius being arriued in EVBOEA with their galleys, they preſently wanne ERETRIA, tooke all the inhabitants of the countrey priſoners, and ſent them to the king in ASIA. From thence they went into ATTICA, and camped in the plaine of MARATHON, which is within fiue leagues or thereabouts from ATHENS. The ATHENIANS aſtonied at ſo great a number of enemies, and ſo neare vnto them, knew not of whom to demaund aide, but of the LACEDÆMONIANS, vnto whom they diſpatched a very ſwift footman, a foote Poſt, called Philippides, to aduertiſe them that they had need to ſend them aide, and that preſently. In the meane time they choſe tenne Captaines to commaund and gouerne their troupes: Miltiades was one of them. So there was great diſputation among them, to wit, whether they ſhould keepe the walles of their citie, or they ſhould go meete with their enemies to bid them battell. There was none but Miltiades that reaſoned, that there was no delaying or protracting of time, but they muſt make a campe: and that that would lift vp the hearts of the ATHENIANS, when they ſhould ſee and behold, that they had a good opinion of their vertue and valiantneſſe: and that the enemies hearts would faile them, when they ſhould vnderſtand that ſo few men came reſolutely to fight with them. At that time the ATHENIANS had no aide from any citie but from PLATÆA, which ſent them a thouſand men: who being come, the armie of the GREEKES was compounded but of tenne thouſand men in all, who deſired nothing but to fight. That was the cauſe that Miltiades counſell was preferred aboue all the other Captaines. For the ATHENIANS reſpecting his valor, cauſed their troupes to march into the field, and they camped in a place of aduantage. Then the next morning hauing diſpoſed their footmen at the foote of the mountaine, which they had in flancke, they gaue charge vpon their enemies couragiouſly, with a new and ſure faſhion of fight. For there were trees growing here and there, by meanes whereof they were vnder couert of the rockes, and the trees kept them from being encloſed by the multitude of the enemies horſemen. Now although Datis ſaw that the place did not fauour and affect him, yet becauſe he had ſo many men, all his deſire was to fight, thinking he ſhould win and obtaine much, if he could ioyne before the aide of the LACEDÆMONIANS came to them. And therefore he made an hundred thousand footemen and ten thousand horse to march against them. Then he went to charge the ATHENIANS, who made excellent proofe of their valiantnes, considering that they hauing to fight one against ten, they made the PERSIANS flie for life, and so astonished thē, that in stead of returning backe to their campe, they saued themselues in their ships. See, here was one of the braueſt battels that a man can speake of: for neuer such a handfull of men ouercame so great forces. Peraduenture it will not be impertinent to shew what reward Miltiades had for obtaining of so noble a victorie: to the end that all men may know the better, that all commonweales haue one disposition. As the honours of the people of ROME were in times past rare and simple, and by consequent more glorious & to be desired: and now to the contrarie more disordered and lesse esteemed: the very same we find to haue bene practised among the ATHENIANS. For all the honour they did vnto this Miltiades, the sauiour of ATHENS and of all GREECE, was, that the battell of MARATHON hauing bene painted ouer the porch called Pœcile, his image was set vp the first in rancke of all the Captaines, with the countenance of a man speaking to his souldiers, and going first to fight. The same people of ATHENS being come to be of greater power, and corrupted by the gifts of those which sued for charge and office in the commonwealth, caused three hundred statues to be set vp for Demetrius the PHALERIAN.

After this battell, the ATHENIANS gaue a fleet of threescore and ten gallies vnto Miltiades, to make war vpon the Iles which had aided the PERSIANS. He cōpelled some by simple commandements, others by force of arms to yeeld thēselues. And not being able by any perswasiōs to bring the Ile men of PAROS to reason (proud becausе of their riches) he landed his forces, enclosed the town with trenches, and took from the besieged all meanes either to come by victuals or munition of war: then hauing set vp his Gabions and Mantelets, he came neare the wals. He was at the point to win the towne, when one night (not knowne by what mischaunce) there was a great fire seene vpon firme land in a wood which they saw from the Isle. This flame made those that were besieged, and them that lay at the siege thinke that it was a signe of the fleet of the PERSIANS, to encourage the PARIANS, and to keepe them from yeelding vp their towne. Herupon Miltiades fearing that Darius army by sea was at hand, he set fire of his Mantelets and Gabions and hoisſed saile towards ATHENS, where he arriued with all the gallies he caried out: wherwith the people were maruellously offended. They accused him of treason, that when he might haue won PAROS by assault, he had taken money of the king, and was returned without fighting, or doing any memorable act. At that time he was sicke of the wounds he had receiued at the siege of PAROS: wherefore not being able to defend himselfe in person, his brother Stesagoras pleaded his cause, the which hauing bene debated, he was quit for death, yet condemned to pay a fine of thirtie thousand crownes, to the which they valued the charge of the armie in that iourny. And being vnable to pay so great a summe, he was committed to the common prison, and there died. Now this matter of PAROS was but a cloke: and they speake of it thus for another reason. For the tyrannie of Pisistratus, who had altered the estate some yeares before, was the cause that the ATHENIANS were affraid of their citizens that were in any credit. Miltiades, that had had many great and honorable charges, seemed that he could no more be brought to liue as a priuate person, considering also that he was giuen to this desire to commaund alwaies. For all the time of his abode in CHERRONESVS there was no other Lord but he, and also they called him tyrant: but iust, becausе he had not gotten this authoritie by force of armes, but with the consent of his citizens, and caried himselfe very modestly. Now they take and call them tyrants, which haue a perpetuall power in a commonwealth that was free before. Furthermore, Miltiades was a very gentle person, wonderfull affable, and there was not so meane a man, but might easily come and speake with him. All the townes respected him, he was very famous, and they reputed him for one of the braueſt Captaines of GREECE. The people of ATHENS considering these things, had rather condemne this innocent man in a fine, then to be longer in paine to take heed of him.

THE LIFE OF Pauſanias.

Auſanias LACEDÆDONIAN was a great man, but vnconſtant in all the parts of his life, furniſhed with vertues, but ouerwhelmed with vices. It was he that wanne that ſo famous victorie of PLATÆES. For he being Generall of the GREEKE armie, this great Lord Mardonius, a MEDE by nation, and ſonne in law of the king of PERSIA, the moſt wiſe and valiant captaine among all the PERSIANS, folowed with two hundreth thouſand choſen footemen, and twentie thouſand horſe: he was ouercome, the reſt of all his troupes driuen out of GREECE, and himſelfe ſlaine in the field. This victorie raiſed vp Pauſanias heart to ſuch a height, that he beganne to confound the affaires, and to deuiſe great chaunge in his braine. The firſt ſhame he receiued was, that he hauing offered a triuet of gold vnto the temple of DELPHES, of the bootie he had gotten vpon the enemies, with an Epigram containing in ſubſtance, that vnder his conduct the barbarous people had bene ouerthrowne before PLATÆES, and that acknowledging this victorie he made this preſent to Apollo: the LACEDÆMONIANS razed out theſe verſes, and wrote no other thing but the names of the townes, through whoſe aide the PERSIANS had bene ouercome. After this battell they ſent him againe with an armie by ſea of the allies into CYPRVS and HELLESPONT, to expulſe the garriſons of the barbarous people thence. The which he hauing fortunately executed, he then grew to be more inſolent and ambitious then euer.

For, hauing taken the citie of BYZANCE by force, and made a great number of gentlemen of PERSIA priſoners, among which were manie kinſmen of Xerxes, he ſecretly ſent them to him, and gaue it out that they eſcaped out of priſon. Gongylus ERETRIAN did accompany them carying letters to the king, the effect whereof was this, as Thucydides ſayth: Pauſanias, Captaine of SPARTA, knowing that the priſoners of BYZANCE are thy kinſmen, he ſendeth them vnto thee for a preſent, and deſireth to be of alliance with thee, and prayeth thee to giue him thy daughter in mariage. If thou do it, he promiſeth that by his meanes SPARTA and all GREECE ſhall be brought vnder thy power. Therefore if it pleaſe thee to giue eare vnto it, ſend him a man expreſſely with whom he may conferre. The king very ioyfull and glad for the deliuery of ſo many friends of his, ſent Artabazus preſently to Pauſanias with letters, in the which he commendeth him, and prayeth him to ſpare for nothing to bring his promiſe to paſſe. If he do, that all ſhall be graunted which he demaundeth. Pauſanias vnderſtanding Xerxes mind, reſolued reſolutely to put his hand to this worke: which the LACEDÆMONIANS miſtruſting, hauing ſent for him home, they accuſed him of treaſon: whereof he was quit, and yet condemned to pay a fine. This was the cauſe that they ſent him not againe to the armie: but ſhortly after he returned of his owne mind, and by a raſh and euill grounded Oration, he eaſily diſcouered the thought of his heart. Furthermore, he did not onely chaunge his faſhion of liuing after the LACONIAN maner, but alſo of his diet and apparell. For he had a royall pompe, trayning a long gowne after the faſhion of the MEDES, followed with a troupe of the MEDES and ÆGYPTIANS for archers of his gaurd. His table did ſo abound in all kinds of dainties after the maner of the PERSIANS, that no man could away withall. He gaue no acceſſe vnto him but very ſeldome: to them that would ſpeake with him, he anſwered very proudly: and commanded with all cruelty, refuſing to returne any more to SPARTA.

He went to COLONES, which is a place in the countrey of TROAS, and there plotted all his dangerous practiſes againſt his countrey and himſelfe. When the LACEDÆMONIANS had vnderſtanding of it, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him with the Scytala, in the which was written, after their accuſtomed maner, that if he came not into the city, they would condemne him to death. This letter aſtonied him. Yet hoping to eſcape this imminent danger by force of preſents, and by reaſon of his credite: he went home into his countrey, where being, the Ephores made him to be apprehended, and caſt into priſon: for it is lawfull for one of the Ephores to take the king, and vſe him ſo. Neuertheleſſe Pauſanias looſed himſelfe, being notwithſtanding ſuſpected of euery man: for they had alwayes this opinion of him, that he had intelligence with Xerxes. There are certaine people there called ILOTES, and they are a great number of them, and they plow the lands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, whom they ſerue as ſlaues. It was ſuppoſed he did practiſe with them, vnder promiſe to make them free men. But becauſe they had no pregnant witneſſe to conuince him, they thought they muſt not condemne ſo noble a perſon as he by bare coniectures, but rather to tary till time did reueale it of it ſelfe. In theſe buſineſſes, a young man called Argilius, who in his infancie had ſerued Pauſanius for a Page, hauing receiued letters of him to cary to Artabazus, he doubting leaſt there were ſomewhat therein that might hurt him, for of all thoſe that went into PERSIA about theſe affaires, not one of them came backe againe: he brake open the ſeale, and knew by the contents thereof that if he had caried them, he had died for it: alſo the letter mentioned matters whereof Pauſanias and Xerxes were agreed. Agilius caried theſe letters, and put them into the hands of the Ephores. Here is to be noted the moderation and grauitie of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that would not yet take vantage of this detection, to lay hold vpon Pauſanias: and reſolued not to proceed with rigour, till he firſt diſcouered it himſelfe. And therefore they taught Argilius what they would haue him to do.

At TÆNARE, there is a temple of Neptune, the priuiledge whereof the GREEKES hold for ſacred and inuiolable. Argilius fled thither, and ſate him downe vpon the Altar: neare vnto the which the Ephores made a caue vnder the ground, from whence one might vnderſtand all that any bodie would ſay vnto Argilius. Some of the Ephores hid themſelues within it. Pauſanias vnderſtanding that his man was in the priuiledge of the temple, went thither maruellouſly troubled, and began to aske him how this change happened. Argilius confeſſed he had opened the letters, and ſeene the contents of them. Wherewith Pauſanias more troubled then before, began to pray him to ſay neuer a word, and not to betray him who had done him ſo much good: that if he would do him that fauour to helpe him out of this trouble, he would make him a great man. The Ephores hauing heard all this talke, they iudged that the ſureſt way was to take him in the citie. Whither they being gone, Pauſanias thinking he had appeaſed Argilius, and thereby aſſured his affaires, he returned home to his houſe: and as they were ready to catch him by the coller, he perceiued by the countenance of one of the Ephores that called him as if he would haue ſpoken with him, that they went about to intrap him. Wherefore doubling his pace ſomewhat faſter then thoſe that followed him, he ſaued himſelfe within the temple of Minerua, called Chalciæcos. But becauſe he ſhould not come out, the Ephores cauſed the Church doores preſently to be mured vp, and the roofe of the temple to be pulled downe, that he might dye the ſooner with aire. It is reported that Pauſanias mother, being a very old woman, liued yet at that time: and that ſhe vnderſtanding of the wickedneſſe of her ſonne, her ſelfe brought the firſt ſtone to mure him in there. Behold, how Pauſanias ſtained with a ſhamefull death the great glorie he had obtained in the warres. Being brought halfe dead out of the temple, he died immediatly. Some would haue had his bodie caried to the gibbet: others liked not that opinion, and buried him farre from the place where he died: from whence he was digged vp againe, by commaundement of an Oracle of DELPHES, and put in the ſame place where he died.

THE LIFE OF Thraſybulus.

FOr Thraſybulus, he was an ATHENIAN, the ſonne of one called Lycus. If we ſhould conſider his vertue a part, and leaue his fortune behind, it may be we ſhould place him firſt of all others. And to confeſſe a troth, I know no man more faithfull, more conſtant, more nobly minded, and more louing to his countrey, then he. For whereas many haue deſired (and few executed) to free their countrey from the hands of one onely tyrant: it was his fortune to deliuer his countrey from the violence of thirtie tyrants. But it chanced, I know not how, that he which went before all others in vertue, was put downe by many others in charge and dignitie. In the warres of PELOPONNESVS, Alcibiades did nothing without him, but he on the contrary did many things without Alcibiades, and wanne honour through the goodneſſe and excellency of his nature. This notwithſtanding, all the exploits of warre ought to be deuided amongſt the Chieftaines, ſouldiers, and fortune: for when armies meet, that which hath bene determined in counſel, is executed by the force and valiantneſſe of the ſouldiers that fight. Wherfore the ſouldier may pretend right to that which his General hath done: Fortune challengeth the better part, and may ſay that ſhe hath in ſuch a caſe ſtood them in better ſtead then all the wiſdome of the Generall. Euen ſo then, this worthie act of Thraſybulus is proper to himſelfe. For as the thirty tyrants eſtabliſhed by the SPARTANS, that kept the city of ATHENS in ſubiection, had baniſhed part of the citizens eſcaped from the warre, put ſome to death, and forfeited the goods of others: Thraſybulus was the firſt and onely man that began to make warre with them. He was gotten into a ſtrong hold, called PHYLE, in the territorie of ATTICA, hauing but thirtie men with him in all.

This was the beginning of the health of the ATHENIANS, and the foundation of the liberty vnto the goodlieſt commonwealth of GREECE. And for as much as the tyrants ſcorned him and his company, it was the cauſe of their deſtruction, and of the preſeruation of Thraſybulus: and their not caring to ſet vpon him and his, made them ſtronger by the leiſure they had giuen them. The which ſhould teach all to remember this rule: that we muſt neuer deſpiſe our enemy. And ſo it is not ſpoken in vaine, that the mother of a coward doth neuer weepe. For all his fame that went of him, many did not ioyne with him: for then thoſe that were beſt affected, made warre with the tyrants more with their toungs then with their hands. From PHYLE Thraſibulus went to the port of PYRÆA, and did fortifie the fortreſſe called MVNYCHIA: the which the tyrants did aſſault, but they were repulſed with ſuch ſhame, that they ſuddenly retired to the town with loſſe of armes and baggage. In this action, Thraſybulus ſhewed himſelfe no leſſe wiſe then valiant: for he commaunded his men to touch none that made no reſiſtance, thinking it reaſonable that the citizens ſhould pardon one the other: and there was not a man of them hurt, but thoſe that aſſaulted them. He would ſtrippe none of the dead, nor ſuffer any thing to be taken from them, but their armes and victuals which he needed. Critias, the chiefe of all the tyrants, hauing fought very valiantly againſt Thraſybulus, was ſlaine at the ſecond aſſault. After he was diſpatched, Pauſanias king of SPARTA came to the aide of the ATHENIANS, and made peace betwixt Thraſybulus and thoſe which kept the city: with theſe conditions, that the thirtie tyrants, and the ten new gouernours, which had committed as many cruelties as the tyrants themſelues, ſhould be baniſhed, and their goods forfeited, without touching any other citizens: and that the ſouereignty and gouernement of the eſtate ſhould be reſtored againe vnto the people.

It was another fine deuice of Thraſybulus, that after he had pacified all matters, and obtained great credite in the citie, he made a law that no man ſhould be called in queſtion nor troubled for things that were paſt, and that was called Amniſtia, or law of obliuion. But he was more carefull to keepe it, then to publish it. For some of his followers in his exile, complotted to kill some that were pardoned: but he stopped it by open proclamation, and kept his promise. To recompence these so many good deeds of his, the people gaue him a Crowne of two branches of Bayes, the which got him no enuy, but great glory: because he had obtained it through the good will of his citizens, and not by force. It was wisely spoken of Pittacus, one of the seuen Sages: when the MITYLENIANS gaue him many thousand of daies worke of lands, I pray you, sayd he, giue me not that thing which is enuied of many men, and desired of all the world: of all those I will onely take but a hundred dayes worke, which shall make proofe of my moderation, and of your good affection: for small presents do continue long, but we are no long time owners of great riches. So then Thrasybulus contenting himselfe with this Crowne, he sought for no more, and did thinke that no man was more honored then he. Shortly after he being arriued in SICILIA with a fleete the which he commanded, his souldiers were not carefull to keepe good watch in his campe: vpon which occasion, the barbarous people that were besieged, hauing by night made a sally out of the towne vpon him, they surprised him, and killed him in his tent.

DVring the warres of PELOPONNESVS, Conon ATHENIAN began to deale in the affaires of the common wealth, and did great seruice: for he was chosen Colonell of the infanterie, then Admirall, in which charge he did many goodly exploits. By meanes whereof he grew to be of singular reputation amongst all men, and had the gouernement of all the Iles: during which time he wanne PHARES a Colony of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Towards the end of the warre of PELOPONNESVS, at what time Lysander ouercame the army of the ATHENIANS vpon the sea coast which they call the riuer of the Goate, he had then charge of certaine galleys: howbeit he was not at the battell, which was cause that all came to naught, for he was a wise and valiant Captaine: in so much that it was in euery mans mouth, that if he had bene there, the ATHENIANS had not sustained such a losse. He seeing things brought to so poore an estate, and vnderstanding that his citie was besieged: he sought not to hide himselfe to liue I satety, but thought how he might helpe his citizens. For this purpose he went to Pharnabazus, a kinsman and sonne in law of the king of PERSIA, and gouernour of IONIA and of LYDIA, into whose fauour he insinuated himselfe, but with great trouble and much danger. Now when the LACEDÆMONIANS, after they had subdued the ATHENIANS, in stead of maintaining the alliance made with Artaxerxes, had sent Agesilaus to make warre in ASIA, through the perswasion of Tissaphernes, which had forsaken the king (of whom heretofore he was greatly beloued) and ioyned with the LACEDÆMONIANS: Pharnabazus was appointed Lieutenant generall of the armie of the PERSIANS to make head against Agesilaus. But in truth Conon commaunded all, and nothing was done without his aduice and counsell. It was he that brake the most part of all the intentions and attempts of this great Captaine Agesilaus, being a thing certaine inough, that if Conon had not opposed himselfe, the LACEDÆMONIANS had taken all ASIA from the king, vnto the mountaine Taurus. Hereupon Agesilaus being sent for home by the Ephores, because the BOEOTIANS and ATHENIANS had proclaimed warre against SPARTA: Conon left not to be euer neare to the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, and did them great seruice.

Tissaphernes withdrew himselfe from the court of PERSIA, the which all men perceiued well inough

inough but the king, with whom he was in great credite and estimation, though he was no more his seruant. And it is not to be maruelled at if Artaxerxes could beleeue nothing, remembring himselfe that by Tissaphernes meanes he ouercame his brother Cyrus. Conon being sent by Pharnabazus vnto the king to accuse this Tissaphernes: he being come to the court, came first to the Captaine of the guard, called Tithraustes, according to the custome of the PERSIANS. He is chiefest of all the officers of the kingdome, and no man can be suffered to come neare the king to speake with him, without his leaue and licence. He being intreated by Conon to let him go vnto the Prince: I am contented, sayth he, but consider first if thou be determined to speake with him thy selfe, or to deliuer thy mind by writing that thou wouldest say vnto him. For if thou come to his presence, thou must kneele to the king: and if thou thinke that grieuous vnto thee, thou maiest execute thy commission by my meanes, as well as by thine owne mouth. As for me, answered Conon, it shall be no troublesome thing to me, to do the king that honour that shall please thee: but I am afraid to do my city dishonor, if I do a thing proper to the barbarous people, & vnfit for that city which was wont to cõmand other nations. So then he deliuered his message in writing: which when the king had seene, he was so moued with the report of so great a person, that he iudged Tissaphernes his enemy, decreed warre against the LACEDÆMONIANS, and suffered Conon to make choise of such a man as he would, to distribute the money necessary to defray the charge of this warre. Conon made this answer, that this election pertained nothing to him, but to the king, that knew his seruants best: yet in his opinion, this charge should be best bestowed vpon Pharnabazus. He was sent backe with great presents to the maritime townes, to commaund the CYPRIOTS, PHENICIANS, and others dwelling vpon this coast to put galleys in readinesse, and to arme a fleete that might keepe the seas the next Sommer, vnder the conduct of Pharnabazus and of Conon, who had so required it.

The LACEDÆMONIANS being aduertised thereof, were amazed, perceiuing well that they were to make another maner of warre then with the barbarous people. For they saw that they must needs come to fight against a valiant and wise Captaine, hauing the kings treasure in his hands, and that had asmuch & better direction and forces then they. With this thought they gathered together great store of shipping, & imbarked themselues vnder the conduct of Pisander. Conon met with them neare vnto CNIDOS, gaue them battell, made them flye, tooke store of galleys, and sunke a great number of them. By meanes of this victory, ATHENS and all GRECE subiect to the dominion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, were set at liberty. Conon returned againe to his countrey with part of these galleys, built vp againe the wals of ATHENS and of the hauen of PIRÆA, which had bene ouerthrowne by Lysander, and presented his citizens with 30000 crownes which Pharnabazus had giuen him. But that which happeneth oftentimes vnto other men, chanced also vnto Conon, that is, to haue lesse courage in prosperity, then in aduersitie. For now that he had ouercome the fleete of the PELOPONNESIANS, thinking he had taken sufficient reuenge of the wrongs receiued by his country: he began to embrace in his mind imaginations too high for his cariage: although this was good and commendable in his enterprise, that he had rather make his owne countrey great and rich, then the king of PERSIA. Therefore he being now growne into wonderfull credite, not onely amongst the barbarous people, but also amongst all the cities of GRECE, after this battell of CNIDOS, he began vnderhand to practise the meanes to restore IONIA and ÆOLIA to be subiect againe to the common wealth of the ATHENIANS. His practises being discouered, Tiribazus gouernour of SARDIS, sent to pray him to come to him, to be sent in Ambassage to the king. Conon straight obeying his commaundement, he was no sooner arriued, but he was straight clapt vp in prison, where he remained some time. Some write that he was caried to the king, and died in PERSIA. But Dinon the historian, to whow we giue great credite in that he treateth of the affaires of PERSIA, reporteth that Conon saued himselfe, leauing it in doubt whether Tiribazus was priuy to it, or that he knew not of it.

THE LIFE OF Iphicrates.

Iphicrates the ATHENIAN was famous, not ſo much for his diuerſe exploits or for the greatneſſe of them, as for his military diſcipline: for he was ſuch a Chieftaine of warre, that they compared him vnto the braueſt men of his time, and they did not ſet him behind any of thoſe that had gone before him. He had bene in many warres, had commanded armies oftentimes, he neuer had misfortune by his owne fault, he euer ouercame by wiſedome: his vnderſtanding reaching ſo farre, that he brought in many good things neuer ſeene before in the art military: and made ſome of them better that were in vſe. He altered the armes of footmen: and where before him the Captaines did vſe great targets, ſhort partiſans, and litle ſwords: he to the contrarie brought in light bucklers, to the end his men ſhould be lighter to remoue and to runne to giue charge. He made the partiſans greater by halfe, and the ſwords longer. He changed alſo the corſlets, and in ſtead of iron and copper, he made them of canuaſſe well wrought together, which made the ſouldiers much lighter: for being eaſed of that waight, they had meanes to defend themſelues nimbly againſt blowes, and were ready beſides to giue charge vpon the enemy. He made warre with the THRACIANS, and reeſtabliſhed Seuthes againe in his kingdome, an allie of the ATHENIANS. Being at CORINTH, he obſerued ſo good diſcipline in his armie, that they neuer ſaw any ſouldiers in GRECE better diſpoſed, nor more obedient to their Colonell then they were. To be ſhort, he did vſe them to ranke themſelues ſo well in battell, without helpe of the Captaine, ſo ſoone as euer the Generall had giuen them the ſigne to fight: that it ſeemed expreſly as if the moſt expert Chieftaine of warre had imbattelled them.

With ſuch an army he aſſailed the LACEDÆMONIANS, which was a moſt famous act through all GRECE: and in this warre he put all their forces to flight, which wanne him great honour. And as Artaxerxes was ready to ſet vpon the king of ÆGYPT, he demanded of the ATHENIANS Captaine Iphicrates, to be the chiefe leader of all the ſtrangers troupes, to the number of twelue thouſand men. Whom he ſo well trained and diſciplined, that as the FABIAN ſouldiers had bene famous among the ROMAINES, ſo in GRECE they ſpake of none but of Iphicratian ſouldiers. Afterwards being gone to aide the SPARTANS, he ſtayed Epaminondas roundly: and had not he come, the THEBANS would neuer haue returned backe before he had taken and burnt the citie of SPARTA. He was a man of a ſtout heart, and of a high ſtature, hauing the port and countenance of a Soueraigne captaine, ſo that he made all men wonder at him that ſaw him: but he was ſlouthfull and impatient, as Theopompus ſayth, but otherwiſe a good and faithfull citizen, whereof he made proofe among others, eſpecially in keeping Perdiccas and Philip the ſon of Amyntas MACEDONIAN ſafe. For Euridice their mother comming with them for refuge vnto Iphicrates, after the death of Amyntas: he ſpared no meanes of his owne to defend them. He liued a long time, being in good credite with his citizens: ſauing that on a time during the warres of the allies he was criminally accuſed with Timotheus, howbeit he cleared himſelfe, and was quit by iudgement. His wife was Threſſa, daughter of king Cotys: and of her he had a ſonne called Meneſtheus: who being asked which he loued beſt, either his father, or his mother? My mother, ſayd he. Whereat euery man muſing: Maruell not, anſwered he, I haue reaſon to ſay ſo. For my father, as much as was in him, begat me a THRACIAN: and my mother to the contrarie, ſhe made me an ATHENIAN.

Chabrias was an ATHENIAN, and was placed in ranck of excellent Captaines. So hath he done many things worthie of memorie. Amongſt others, his ſtratageme he ſhewed at the battell of THEBES is famous, where he was to aide the BOEOTIANS. For, that great Captaine Ageſilaus reioycing becauſe of his victorie, and that he had made all the troupes at the THEBANS pay run away: Chabrias ſtood ſtill with them that were left of his battalion, teaching the ſouldiers to reſiſt the charge of the enemies, caſting downe their pikes, and couering themſelues with their bucklers vpon one knee. Ageſilaus moued with this nouelltie, durſt not runne in to them, and made them ſound the retreat, to keepe his men they ſhould paſſe no further. This act was ſo renowmed through GREECE, that Chabrias cauſed a ſtatue to be made of him in the ſtate aboue mentioned, the which the ATHENIANS ſet vp for him in the great market place. Afterwards the wreſtlers, and other ſuch kind of people followed this faſhion of erection of ſtatues, which they deſerued for their victories. To come againe to Chabrias, he made many warres in EVROPE, in the qualitie of Generall of the ATHENIANS, and went alſo of his voluntarie will to make warre in ÆGYPT, in the ſeruice of Nectanebos whom he did ſet againe into his kingdome. He did the like in CYPRVS, whither the ATHENIANS ſent him of purpoſe to helpe Euagoras, and would not depart thence, before he had firſt ſubdued all the Iſle: for the which the ATHENIANS wan great honour. In theſe buſineſſes, warre fell out betwixt the PERSIANS and ÆGYPTIANS. They of ATHENS were allies of Artaxerxes, and the SPARTANS tooke part with ÆGYPT. King Ageſilaus did greatly inuade the PERSIANS, and caried great booties away. Chabrias conſidering that, and giuing no place to Ageſilaus, went of his owne head to aide the ÆGYPTIANS: who made him their Admirall, and gaue the charge of the armie by land vnto Ageſilaus. Then the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA ſent vnto ATHENS, to complaine that Chabrias made warre with the ÆGYPTIANS againſt their king. The ATHENIANS ſent for Chabrias immediatly to appeare in perſon, threatning him to condemne him to death, if he were not there by the day appointed. This meſſage made him to come againe to ATHENS, where he taried no longer then needes he muſt. For the Citizens bare him no great goodwill, becauſe he caried himſelfe ſo ſtately, and would be ſo merie, that the people enuied him. This vice raigneth commonly in thoſe great and free townes, that glorie is euer accompanied with enuie: and they willingly ſpeake ill of them whom they ſee to be great. And to be ſhort, the poore cannot abide wealthie and rich men. Therfore Chabrias did abſent himſelf out of the citie as much as he could poſſible, and he was not alone in that, for almoſt all the chiefeſt of the citie did the like: thinking themſelues ſafe from the teeth of the enuious, ſo long as they were far off from the ſight of their citizens. Therefore Conon liued for the moſt part of his time in the Iſle of CYPRVS, Iphicrates in THRACIA, Timotheus in LESBOS, Cares in SYGEA. As for Cares, he was not to be likened in any reſpect vnto the others, in exploits, nor in maner of life: and yet he was honoured in the citie of ATHENS, and had great meanes.

As for Chabrias, he died in the war of the allies in this maner. The ATHENIANS made war with the Iſlanders of CHIO, at what time Chabrias had no charge in the armie by ſea. Notwithſtanding he had more authoritie then all the Captains: and the ſouldiers did eſteeme him more then any other of the commaunders. That was cauſe of his death. For ſtriuing to enter the firſt into the hauen, and commaunding the Pylote to row right thither, it was his deſtruction: for being moored there within, the other ſhips followed him not. Whereupon the enemies compaſſed him in: but as he fought valiantly, his galley being beaten with the ſpurre of another veſſell began to leake, and to ſinke to the bottome. He ſeeing there was no way for him to eſcape, becauſe the fleet of the ATHENIANS was too farre off to receiue him in, if he ſhould haue attempted to haue ſwomme: he had rather die then leaue his armes, and forſake the galley which caried him.

The others, they tooke another course, and saued themselues by strength of their armes. But he esteeming an honest death to be more excellent then a shamefull life: fighting very neare, was killed by the enemies with darts.

Timotheus the sonne of Conon, a Captaine of ATHENS, did by many vertues amplifie the glorie receiued of his father. For he was an eloquent man, diligent, painefull, expert in militarie discipline, and a great Politician. He hath executed great things, whereof the most notable are these, to wit: he subdued the OLYNTHIANS and BYZANTINES: he wanne the citie of SAMOS, the siege whereof in the former warres had stood the ATHENIANS in the summe of twelue hundred talents. He deliuered it vnto the people freely without any charge to them. He made warre with king Cotys, and brought of the bootie he had gotten there vnto the Treasurie, the like summe of twelue hundred talents. He also raised the siege that was before CYZICA, and went with Agesilaus to the aide of Ariobarzanes, of whom hauing receiued money, he had rather his citizens should buy townes and lands, then to carie it home to his lodging. Therefore he ioyned ERICTHONE and SESTOS to the signiorie of ATHENS. Afterwards hauing charge of the armie by sea, he inuaded PELOPONNESVS, spoiled all the territorie of SPARTA, and had all their ships in chase. He brought the CORCYREANS vnder the subiection of the ATHENIANS: and drew into their alliance the EPIROTS, ATHAMANES, and CHAONIANS, and all the people vpon that sea coast. The which made the LACEDÆMONIANS leaue their so long old quarrell, and of their owne goodwils let the ATHENIANS haue the principalitie of the sea: treating peace with these conditions, that the ATHENIANS should be Generals vpon the sea.

This victorie did so please the ATHENIANS, that there was then first of all an altar built to the common peace, and they did ordaine a pillow should be made for that goddesse. Furthermore, that such a glorious act should remaine for perpetuitie, they raised vp a statue vnto Timotheus in the market place, by ordinance of the people, which was an honour that neuer man receiued before, to wit, that the people hauing graunted a statue for the father, they should also giue one to the sonne. By this meanes the statue of the sonne so freshly set vp, renewed the memorie of the father. Now Timotheus being very old, dealing no more in affaires of the commonwealth, they began afresh to torment the ATHENIANS of all sides. SAMOS and HELLESPONT shrunke backe and reuolted. Philip king of MACEDON, who began to waxe great, plotted wonderfull things in his head. Chares was sent against him to make head. But they thinking him not sufficient to repulse Philip, they therefore sent Menestheus the sonne of Iphicrates, sonne in law to Timotheus, and made him Colonell, gaue him the charge of the affaires of the warres, hauing for his counsellers, his father, and father in law, braue Captaines, wise and expert men to direct him with their counsell: their authoritie being so great, that euery man hoped that all that was lost, should be recouered againe by their meanes. They pointing for SAMOS, Chares that had heard newes of it, sailed vp and downe that coast, to the end nothing should be done in his absence. Drawing neare to the Isle a storme rose, and to defend themselues against it, the two old Captaines strake saile, and hulled, going no further into the sea. Chares to the contrarie vpon a head, not respecting them that had seene more then he, held on his course, thinking to haue found an occasion as he wished, and sent as well to Timotheus as to Iphicrates, that they should follow him. But hauing had euill successe, and lost many of his shippes, he fell backe againe to that very

place frō whence he came,& ſent letters to the people of ATHENS of this effect, that he had eaſily taken SAMOS, if Timotheus and Iphicrates had not forſaken him at his need. Vpon this accuſation they were ſummoned to appeare in perſon by this bold people, ſuſpitious, vnconſtant, enemy and enuious of another mans greatneſſe,and are charged to be traitors vnto the commonwealth. Timotheus was condemned,and a fine ſet vpon his head of ſixty thouſand crowns. Iphicrates conſtrained by the importunitie of his vnthankeful citizens,went for a time to CHALCIS. After Timotheus death,the people repenting their ſentence, abated nine parts of the ſum aboue named,and commaunded Conon, the ſon of the deceaſed, to furniſh ſixe thouſand crownes for the reparation of a pane of the wall. Here is to be noted a wonderfull reuolution of the affaires of this world: for the young ſonne was conſtrained at his owne charges (to the great diſhonour of his houſe) to repaire the wals, the which his grandfather Conon had made vp with the booty gotten of the enemies. We could alleadge many examples of the modeſtie and wiſedome of Timotheus: but we will adde for the end a matter whereby may be eaſily coniectured, how much he was eſteemed of the GREEKES. Being young he was accuſed, and brought before the Iudge: whereupon his friends and familiars came out of all parts into ATHENS to defend him: and amongſt others the tyrant Iaſon, who was at that time the mightieſt Lord of all GREECE. This tyrant was neuer aſſured in his owne countrey without his guard: and yet he came without any traine to ATHENS, eſteeming ſo much his hoſt Timotheus, that he had rather hazard his life, then faile his friend in time of neceſſitie. Notwithſtanding this, ſhortly after Timotheus made warre with Iaſon, by the commaundement of the people: thinking that to obey his countrey, and to maintaine the right of the ſame, is a more deuout thing, then to fauour a priuate friend. After this laſt age, which tooke away Iphicrates, Chabrias, and Timotheus, Captaines of ATHENS: they could neuer find in the Commonwealth after their death, any Chieftaine of war, that deſerueth any memorie of them.

THE LIFE OF Datames.

I Preſently enter into the life of a moſt valiant and wiſe Captaine, among all the barbarous: Hamilcar and Hannibal of CARTHAGE excepted. We will ſpeake ſomwhat more amply of this man, for that the moſt part of his exploits are litle known,& becauſe alſo that he had obtained his victories not ſo much by force of armes,as by his wiſedome: a vertue in the which he did ſurpaſſe all the men of his time. But this cannot be iudged, vnleſſe we make him knowne in all particulars. Datames the ſonne of Camiſſares a CARIAN and of a SCHYTIAN, was at the beginning a ſouldier of the guard of the pallace of Artaxerxes. His father Camiſſares, becauſe of his valiantnes and direction in the warres, and for that he had done many good ſeruices vnto the king, was made Gouernour of CILICIA, neare vnto CAPPADOCIA, where the LEVCOSYRIANS dwell. As for Datames, following the warres, he made proofe of his valour in the warre which Artaxerxes had againſt the CADVSIANS: where many men being ſlaine on both ſides, he fought ſo valiantly, that his father being killed,he had his authorie and place of Gouernour of CILICIA. He ſhewed himſelfe no leſſe valiant in warre, then Antophradates did by the kings commaundement vnto thoſe that had rebelled. For, by the direction of Datames, the enemies that were now entred into the PERSIANS campe, were repulſed, and all the armie of the kings in ſaftie: the which was the cauſe of his calling and aduauncement vnto higher charges. There was at that time in PAPHLAGONIA a Gouernour called Thyus, deſcended of an auncient race of one Pylæmenes, whom Homer ſaith, was killed by Patroclus in the warre of TROIA. He not regarding the kings will and commaundements, who therefore reſolued to make warre with him, and gaue the charge of it vnto Datames, couſin germaine to Thyus. By reaſon of kindred, Datames would prooue by all means he could to draw his kinſman to ſome conformitie before he tooke armes: he went vnto him without any traine, litle thinking that his friend would haue laid any ambuſh for him: but he had almoſt bene taken tardie, for Thyus ſought to ſurpriſe him, and to cut his throate. Datames mother, Aunt vnto Thyus, being told what was practiſed againſt her ſonne, ſhe did aduertiſe him in ſo good time, that he eſcaped with ſpeed, and proclaimed warre againſt his aduerſarie. And although that in the purſute of this warre, he was forſaken of Ariobarzanes, Gouernour of LYDIA, of IONIA, and of all PHRYGIA, yet he let not to go further: he tooke Thyus priſoner with his wife and children, and then very carefully tooke order that no man but himſelf ſhould carie newes of it to the king. So following that purpoſe, without any mans priuitie he arriued at the Court, and the next morning apparelled Thyus (a tall man and of a terrible grimme looke, being blacke haired, and wearing his haire long) with a rich robe, ſuch as great Lords vſe to weare. He apparelled himſelfe like a countrey man, in a Lion tawnie coate, with a cloke of diuerſe colours, and a hunters hat, hauing in his right hand a club, and in his left hand a leace, vnto the which Thyus was tyed, who went before, as if he had led ſome ſauage beaſt he had taken in the chaſe a hunting. They all ran to ſee this new monſter thus diſguiſed: and thoſe which knew Thyus went preſently and told the king of it: who at the firſt would beleeue nothing, but ſent Pharnabazus to ſee what it was. So when he had told him all what had happened, he made this pompe come in preſently: and the king tooke great pleaſure to ſee it, but ſpecially to ſee ſo mightie a Prince beyond all hope ſo ſubdued.

Therefore after he had giuen ſumptuous preſents vnto Datames, he ſent him vnto the armie that was leauied vnder the conduct of Pharnabazus and Tithrauſtes, to make warre in ÆGYPT, and ordained that he ſhould haue as much authoritie as they. Now after that the king had ſent for Pharnabazus, all the charge of the warres was committed to Datames. Who being greatly occupied about leauies of men to go into ÆGYPT, he receiued letters from the king, commanding him to inuade a Lord called Aſpis, who held CATAONIA, a prouince ioyning neare to CAPPADOCIA, beyond CILICIA, a mountaine countrey well furniſhed with fortreſſes, that deſpiſed the king, and made inuaſions vpon the Prouinces thereabouts, ſpoiling victuals and all things elſe that were caried to the king. Though Datames was farre from that place, and had other affaires of greater importance in hand: yet he determined to obey the king, and ſuddenly imbarked himſelfe with a ſmall number of reſolute men, thinking (that which came to paſſe) that with a few men he ſhould ſooner ſurpriſe a man not dreaming of any ſuch matter, then with a great armie to go and aſſaile him. He being arriued in CILICIA, landed, then marched day and night ouer mount Taurus, and came to the place where he would be: he inquireth for Aſpis, and vnderſtandeth that he was not farre off but a hunting. But as he ſtayed for his comming, Aſpis knew that he was come, and immediatly diſpoſed of his PISIDIANS and others of his traine to make head. Datames knowing this reſolution, takes his armes, made his men march, and galloped to the place where Aſpis was: who ſeeing him come with ſuch a furie, he loſt his courage to defend himſelfe, and preſently yeelded. Datames made him to be bound, and ſent him by Mithridates to the king. Hereupon Artaxerxes conſidering better what he had done, drawing his Lieutenant farre from his armie, to ſend him in commiſſion about a matter of leſſe conſequence, being angrie with himſelfe, ſent a meſſenger to the campe, thinking Datames was not yet gone from thence, to tell him that he ſhould not go. But before this meſſenger came to the armie, he met them by the way that brought Aſpis. This ſo ſudden execution wanne Datames the kings good fauour, but made him very much hated of the Courtiers, ſeeing one onely man more made of then all the reſt: which was the cauſe that they all ioyned together to deſtroy him.

Pandates Treaſurer of the ſpare, and Datames friend, did aduertiſe him by expreſſe letters, that he ſtood in great daunger, if any ſiniſter fortune happened, whileſt he ſhould commaund the armie in ÆGYPT: that it is the cuſtome of kings to impute all misfortunes to their ſeruants that chaunce in their affaires, and to attribute the good ſucceſſe vnto themſelues. And this makes them very eaſily incline to the extermination of them, of whom report is made; that they haue not done that which was committed to their charge. And as for him, that he ſhould ſo much more ſtand in feare, becauſe that thoſe which could do moſt with the king, were his greateſt enemies. Datames hauing receiued theſe letters in his campe, and knowing that they caried truth

with them: he reſolued to forſake the king: which doing notwithſtanding he committed no breach of his fidelitie. For he left Androcles MAGNESIAN Generall of the armie. And for himſelfe he went with his men into CAPPADOCIA, afterwards he wan PAPHLAGONIA which was hard by it, without ſhewing himſelfe either friend or enemie of the king. He ſecretly contracted friendſhip with Ariobarzanes, aſſembled forces, and gaue the guard of the townes of warre vnto thoſe he truſted beſt: but the winter did let him that his affaires went not forward. He vnderſtandeth that the PISIDIANS did leauie ſome troupes to ſet vpon him: which cauſed him to ſend his ſonne Arideus before with an armie. The young man being killed at an encounter, the father marched right thither with his men, hiding his griefe as much as he could poſſible, becauſe he deſired to meete with his enemies, before thoſe that followed him ſhould heare of his loſſe, being affraid leſt the newes of the death of this yong Lord ſhould kill their hearts. So being come to the place where hē pretended, he camped in ſuch ſort that the multitude of his enemies could not encloſe him, nor keepe him from comming to fight when he thought good. He brought with him Mithrobarzanes his father in law, who was Colonell of the horſemen. He perceiuing the affaires of his ſon in law in ſo poore an eſtate, forſooke him to go yeeld himſelfe to the enemies. Datames being told of it, iudged that his ſouldiers if they once perceiued that his father in law had forſaken him, they would alſo follow his example: wherfore to preuent all, he gaue it out that Mithrobarzanes was gone by his commandement, pretending to yeeld themſelues to the enemies: to the end with more eaſe and aduantage to cut them in peeces. And therefore that there was no reaſon to leaue ſuch a man ſo far from them, but they muſt needes follow him with ſpeed. So that they ſtanding to it luſtily, the enemies could not reſiſt, conſidering they ſhould be charged within and without their campe. So hauing thought that the beſt way in the world, he marcheth into the field with his troupes, and followeth Mithrobarzanes: who did but newly yeeld themſelues to the enemies, when Datames appeared, who put out the ſignall of battell. The PISIDIANS troubled with this ſtraunge ſight, did ſuſpect that Mithrobarzanes and his would betray them, and that they were come of purpoſe to do them ſome miſchiefe. Thereupon they vehemently gaue charge vpon theſe traitors, who not knowing what to think of ſuch a charge, were conſtrained to fight againſt them, vnto whom they had yeelded themſelues: and to returne vnto them whom they had forſaken. But the one and the other not knowing them any whit, in a ſhort time theſe wicked men were cut in peeces. So withal Datames ſetteth vpon the PISIDIANS who made head againſt him, paſſed through them, and brake them at the firſt charge: purſued them that fled, killed a great number of them, and was maſter of their camp. Note here how wiſely (and all done at one time) he puniſhed the traitors, and put his enemies to flight: turning that to good, which was deuiſed for the ouerthrow of him and his. This is the moſt braueſt and moſt ſpeedieſt executed ſtratageme of a Chiefe in wars, that can be found in hiſtories.

Notwithſtanding that, this great perſon was forſaken of his eldeſt ſon Sciſmas, who went to the king to aduertiſe him that his father was reuolted. This troubled Artaxerxes greatly, knowing that he had to deale with a valiant and a wiſe Captaine, who boldly did ſet vpon any enterpriſe with diſcretion. Thereupon he ſent Autophrodates into CAPPADOCIA, whom Datames tooke paines to go and meete, to preuent him that he ſhould not win the ſtraight of CILICIA. But being long aſſembling his forces, and that hope being fruſtrate, he choſe with thoſe few men that followed him ſuch a place, that his enemies could not encloſe him, nor paſſe, but that he ſhould ſhut them vp in very vnwholeſome places, nor hurt him when he liked to ioyne in fight. Now though Autophradates vnderſtood ſomwhat of that, yet he made account that it was more expedient for him to ioyne then to flee from the liſt, hauing ſo great forces. He had 20000 horſe, and 100000 footmen, which they call GARDATES, with 3000 ſlings of the ſame name. Furthermore, he had 8000 CAPPADOCIANS, 10000 ARMENIANS, 5000 PAPHLAGONIANS, 10000 PHRYGIANS, 5000 LYDIANS, and about 3000 ASPENDIANS and PISIDIANS, 2000 CILICIANS, as many CAPTANIANS, and 3000 GREEKS in pay: beſides a great nūber of men light armed. Againſt this world of forces, Datames could hope no more but in his direction, and in the commodity of the place where he camped: for he had not the twentith part ſo many men. Yet truſting to himſelfe, to the place, and to the valour of his men, he came to fight, and put to the ſword many thouſands of his enemies, hauing loſt of his ſide but one thouſand of his men. For this cauſe he ſet vp the next day in the field a ſigne of triumph where the battell was fought. So being remoued from thence, as he was the weaker in number of men, he to the contrarie remained victor in all skirmiſhes and fights, and neuer came to hands, but he put his enemies to the worſe: in the which he had oftentimes very good ſucceſſe, becauſe he knew all the waies, and did wiſely conſider his affaires. Antophradates ſeeing the king loſt more in theſe warres then he got, he perſwaded Datames to fall to agreement, and to make his peace with the king. Though Datames had no great truſt in that, yet he accepted the condition, and ſaid he would ſend ambaſſadours vnto Artaxerxes And thus the warre of the king ended againſt Datames. And for Antophradates, he retired into PHRYGIA.

But the king being vexed to the heart againſt Datames, conſidering that he could not preuaile againſt him by armes, ſought to make him away by treaſon. Datames looked warily to his wayes, and auoided many ambuſhes. As on a time, hauing vnderſtanding that ſome pretending to be his friends, had laid a plot for him: although his enemies had giuen him intelligence of it, yet he thoght that as it was not a thing lightly to be beleeued, ſo was it not altogether to be diſcredited: wherupon he reſolued to trie whether it was a true or falſe report brought him. Therefore he ſet forward to the place where it was told him this ambuſh was laid: but he choſe amongſt his men one that was of his height, he gaue him his furniture, and made him march in the ranck which he was wont to hold. He on the other ſide apparelled like a ſouldier, went with the archers of the guard. Thoſe which lay in ambuſh deceiued by the order and furniture, aſſoone as they ſaw their time, they began to ſet vpon the ſuppoſed Datames. But the right Datames had warned them before with whom he marched, to be readie to do all as he did. He ſeeing then theſe traitors running, he threw darts at them, and ſo did all thoſe that were in his companie, ſo that the other fell to the gronnd, before they could come neare him whom they would ſurpriſe. Now notwithſtanding all this, this ſo warie and ſubtill Captaine was in the end betrayed by the deceipt of Mithridates the ſonne of Ariobarzanes, who promiſed the king to do the deed, ſo that he would afterwards ſuffer him to do what he thought good, without being called in queſtion any maner of way. The king conſented vnto it, and gaue his hand vpon it after the cuſtome of the PERSIANS, to make him more aſſured. Mithridates hauing the kings word, made ſhew to be ſworne enemy vnto Artaxerxes, he gathereth troupes together, and by meanes treateth friendſhip with Datames, he entreth with a maine armie into the kings country, beſiegeth and taketh fortreſſes, carieth away great bootie, he giueth part of it to his ſouldiers, he ſendeth the reſt vnto Datames, and deliuereth many fortreſſes and holds into his hands. So hauing continued his courſe a reaſonable time, Datames began wholly to beleeue that Mithridates had vndertaken a warre which he would neuer leaue, and this traitour gaue him great occaſions to thinke ſo. For fearing leſt Datames would miſtruſt ſome ambuſh, he ſought not to ſpeake with him, nor went about to meete together: but without enterview he entertained his alliance ſo finely, that theſe two men ſeemed both one, not ſo much for mutuall benefite, as for a common hatred conceiued againſt the king. When he ſaw his ſnare well laid, he wrote to Datames that time required they ſhould aſſemble greater forces to make warre againſt the king: and if he thought good, he would appoint a place where they might one ſee another, and conferre together. Datames found this aduice good, and ſo they appointed a day to meete together, and place where they might ſpeake perſonally one with the other. Some daies before Mithridates came to the place, ſeconded with another in whom he put great truſt: he hid poigniards ſeparated in diuerſe places, and did carefully marke the places where they were laid. The day being come of their talking together, both of them ſent men to diſcouer the place, and to ſearch one the other, becauſe they ſhould be without weapons. That being done, they enter into talke, and after they had ſpoken ſome time together, they departed: ſo that Datames was gone a good way off. And as for Mithridates, before he went to his men (to giue no occaſion of ill thought) he cometh to the ſame place againe where they had ſpoken together, and ſate him downe in a place where there was a poigniard hidden, faining to be wearie, and to refreſh himſelfe a litle. Then he ſent for Datames vnder colour that he had forgotten to tell him ſome thing. In the meane time he tooke the poigniard out of the place where it was hidden, drew it, and put it naked vnder his robe. And ſeeing Datames, told him they muſt go a litle aſide, and that he had diſcouered a place directly ouer againſt them very fit to campe in. He began to ſhew him the place with his finger: and as Datames turned to ſee what it was, this traitour ſtabbed him with his poigniard, and made an end of killing of him before any of his men could come to helpe him. See here how through pretence of friendſhip he was ſurpriſed, who had entrapped ſo many others by his valiant direction, but none by treaſon.

Hamilcar the ſonne of Hanniball, ſurnamed Barcas, a CARTHAGINIAN Captaine. being very young began to commaund an army that was in SICILIA, in the end of the firſt warre of AFRICKE. Before his comming thither the CARTHAGINIANS had very ill ſucceſſe both by ſea and land: but ſo ſoone as he led the army, he neuer gaue place to the enemy, and gaue him no aduantage to hurt him. But to the contrary he found many an occaſion to draw them to fight, wherein he had the vantage. Which being done, although the CARTHAGINIANS had well-neare loſt all that they held in SICILIA, yet he kept the city of ERIX ſo well, as it ſeemed that there had neuer bene warre made in that quarter. In the meane time the CARTHAGINIANS hauing loſt a battell at the ſea neare vnto the Iles ÆGATES, againſt Catulus Luctatius a ROMAINE Conſull: they determined to leaue armes, and gaue all the charge vnto Hamilcar to treate of peace. For his part he deſired nothing but warre: yet ſeeing his towne in want of money and meanes, and in danger to ſinke vnder their burthen, he concluded that they muſt make peace. Yet ſo notwithſtanding he reſolued with himſelfe, that as ſoone as all matters were pacified, he would make warre againe, and ſet vpon the ROMAINES, either to make them Lords of all, or elſe to compell them to be ſubiect. With this mind he entred into parley of peace, where he ſhewed himſelfe ſo ſtout: that as Catulus declared he would agree to nothing, before Hamilcar and his ſouldiers which had kept ERIX had layd downe their armes, and were gone out of SICILIA, he made anſwer that he would rather dye in the ruines of his countrey, then to returne home with ſuch ſhame: and that honour would not ſuffer him to yeeld vp his armes to his enemies, which his countrey had put into his hands to be imployed againſt them. Catulus let him go with this obſtinate reſolution.

But when Hamilcar was arriued at CARTHAGE, he ſaw matters go farre otherwiſe then he hoped for. For during the long wars againſt the enemies abroad, there was miſchiefe ſprung vp among them within: which went on ſo fiercely, that CARTHAGE was neuer in ſo great danger but when it was altogether deſtroyed. Firſt of all, the mercenarie ſouldiers that had bene in the warres againſt the ROMAINES, to the number of 20000 they rebelled, they made all AFRICKE riſe, and they beſieged CARTHAGE. The CARTHAGINIANS being greatly afraid of ſo many euils, they demanded aide of the ROMAINES, which they granted. But in the end, when all was thought to be in a deſperate caſe, they choſe Hamilcar their Captaine generall: who did not onely driue the enemies farre from the towne, which were in number aboue a 100000 fighting men: but he did alſo ſhut them vp in ſuch ſtraights, that the moſt part of them died of famine, and the reſt were ſlaine. Furthermore, he brought the cities which had reuolted, vnder the obedience againe of CARTHAGE, and amongſt others VTICA, and HIPPONA, two of the ſtrongeſt cities of AFRICKE. But not ſtaying there, he extended the limites of the ſigniory of CARTHAGE, and pacified all AFRICKE in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed there had bene no warre of long time.

Now hauing done all things according to his mind, he bearing ill will to the ROMAINES, and hoping to be reuenged: to find a more eaſie way to daw them to warre, he practiſed ſo well that he was choſen Generall, and they ſent him with an army into SPAINE, whither he caried with him his ſonne Hanniball nine yeares old, and another faire young gentleman called Haſdruball, whom many iudged to be loued of Hamilcar otherwiſe then was fit for honeſt men. For there were many alwayes that could not containe themſelues from ſpeaking euill of this great Captaine. Which was the cauſe that the gouernour of Haſdruball did forbid him to come no more to Hamilcar, who afterwards gaue him his daughter in mariage, ſo that they began againe to meete together. For by the cuſtome of the countrey they could not forbid a ſonne in law, to frequent with his father in law. We haue made mention of Haſdruball, becauſe that after Hamilcar was ſlaine, he was made chiefe of the army, which did great exploits vnder his conduct. But ſo he was the firſt, that by preſents and gifts corrupted the ancient maners of the CARTHAGINIANS. After his death, Hannibal had the charge of the army, with the conſent of all the men of warre. As for Hamilcar, he hauing paſſed the ſea, entred into SPAINE, and did great things there with good ſucceſſe. He ſubdued many warlike nations, enriched all AFRICKE with horſes, with armes, with men, and with money. As he had thought to haue tranſported the warre from thence into ITALIE, nine yeares after his comming into SPAINE: he was ſlaine in a battell againſt the VACTONS. The deadly hate he bare vnto the ROMAINES, ſeemeth to haue kindled the ſecond warre with AFRICKE. For his ſonne Hannibal was brought to this paſſe, by the continuall adiurations of his father: that he had rather deſtroy himſelfe, then to faile his helpe againſt the ROMAINES.
